SECT. I.

From the Acceſſion of King GEORGE the I, to the End of the Rebellion in SCOTLAND.

30. GEORGE I.

THE illuſtrious houſe of Hanover entirely owe their advancement to the throne of Great-Britain, to the effectual meaſures taken by king William and queen Anne, for the excluſion of all catholic princes. Had not the order of the ſucceſſion been changed, and ſuppoſing the doubtfulneſs of the pretender's birth a ſufficient reaſon to ſet him aſide, the houſe of Savoy would have been in poſſeſſion of the Britiſh dominions, as they derive their right from the princeſs Henrietta, daughter of king Charles I, whereas the houſe of Hanover are deſcended from the princeſs Elizabeth, daughter of king James I. Nor was it out of any particular regard for the dukes of Hanover, that the Engliſh nation agreed to alter the ſucceſſion, but out of a belief, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the liberties of the ſtate. All catholics were therefore declared incapable of ſucceeding to the crown, and conſequently the ſucceſſion was eſtabliſhed in the proteſtant branches. Upon this foundation it was, that, the duke of Gloceſter being dead, the princeſs Sophia was acknowledged for lawful heir to the imperial crown of Great Britain.

Though this change of the ſucceſſion has been exclaimed againſt by many, it is built on very ſtrong reaſons. In catholic countries, a proteſtant king will not be endured: why therefore ſhould a proteſtant ſtate be obliged to ſuffer a catholic king? Are there not, between ſovereign and ſubjects, mutual obligations? And is not the preſervation of religion one of the greateſt? If the catholics think their religion unſafe under a proteſtant prince, has not experience taught the proteſtants, that their religion can never be ſecure under a catholic prince? What the nation had ſuffered from the zeal of king James to introduce his religion, did it not ſufficiently juſtify their fears and precautions? To maintain the proteſtant ſucceſſion againſt the pretended heir, and ſeveral others, who, after his deceaſe, might put in their claim, the beſt meaſures were taken. Of theſe, the moſt effectual was the humbling the exorbitant power of France, by which king James and his pretended ſon were protected. Lewis XIV was at laſt forced to abandon their defence, and acknowledge the proteſtant ſucceſſion. All the other ſtates, enemies of France, rejoiced at the revolution, and made it their intereſt to ſupport it. The union of Scotland with England had the ſame end, and was ſo eagerly deſired by king William, only that the Scots might ceaſe to wiſh for a ſeparate king, and concur with the Engliſh in the ſucceſſion they had eſtabliſhed.

Purſuant to the act of ſucceſſion, George Lewis, ſon of Erneſt Auguſtus, firſt elector of Brunſwick-Lunenburg, by the princeſs Sophia, grandaughter of king James I, aſcended the throne on the death of queen Anne. His mature age, being then fifty four years old [a], his experience, his perſonal qualities, his numerous family, the general peace then in Europe, the intereſt his allies had to ſupport him, ſeemed to promiſe him a quiet and peaceable reign; but, however, he was not without his diſturbances. This prince had great talents for a crown, and had not failed to exert them on occaſion. He was concerned in all the affairs of Germany, and always came off with advantage. The great ſervices, he had done for the emperor Leopold, determined the emperor Joſeph, his ſucceſſor, to uſe all his power to procure him admittance into the electoral college: and the emperor Charles, ſucceſſor of Joſeph, cauſed him to be acknowledged elector by Lewis XIV, and by the electors of Cologn and Bavaria, who, till the treaty of Raſtadt, had refuſed him that title. He had waged war in perſon and with ſucceſs. His campaign on the Rhine in 1709 was glorious, and would have been much more ſo, had not the too great bravery of count Merci diſappointed his project of ſending aid to the duke of Savoy, to enable him to penetrate into la Franche Comté. This prince had an excellent ſpirit and noble ſentiments: he was much more ſenſible of ſervices than of injuries; courageous, little capable of diſſembling or hiding his thoughts; my maxim (ſaid he, ſoon after his arrival in England) is never to abandon my friends, to do juſtice to all the world, and to fear no man. To theſe valuable qualities he joined a great application to buſineſs, and a ſincere deſire to render his ſubjects happy.

All theſe virtues together had gained him the reſpect and love of his German ſubjects, who were all ſubmiſſive to his will; and their obedience had nothing of conſtraint, becauſe his commands were always reaſonable, and dictated both by equity and goodneſs.

As ſoon as queen Anne had reſigned her laſt breath, the privy council met, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor and reſident Kreyenberg (in whoſe hands they were lodged) produced the elector of Brunſwick's three inſtruments, nominating the perſons to be added, as lords juſtices, to the ſeven great officers of the realm [b].

After the opening of the inſtruments, a proclamation was iſſued, declaring, that the high and mighty prince George, elector of Brunſwick Lunenburg, was, by the death of queen Anne, become our lawful and rightful liege lord, king of [a] He was born May 28, 1660.

[b] The great officers were:
Dr Tenniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury,
Lord chancellor Harcourt,
John Sheffield, duke of Buckinghamſhire, lord preſident,
Charles Talbot, duke of Shrewſbury, lord treaſurer,
William Legg, earl of Dartmouth, lord privy ſeal,
Thomas Wentworth, earl of Strafford, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty,
Sir Thomas Parker, lord chief-juſtice of the king's-bench.

To theſe were added, by the elector of Brunſwick, in the inſtrument under his own hand, the following perſons;

Duke of Shrewſbury,	Earl of Angleſey,
Duke of Somerſet,	Earl of Carliſle,
Duke of Bolton,	Earl of Nottingham,
Duke of Devonſhire,	Earl of Abingdon,
Duke of Kent,	Earl of Scarborough,
Duke of Argyle,	Earl of Orford,
Duke of Montroſe,	Lord Viſcount Townſhend,
Duke of Roxburg,	Lord Halifax,
Earl of Pomfret,	Lord Cowper.

Great-Britain, France, and Ireland. This proclamation was ſigned by above a hundred lords and gentlemen, ſeveral of whom, in leſs than a year, entered into treaſonable plots to deprive the king of his right, and broke out into open rebellion againſt him.

King George was proclaimed at the uſual places, and with the uſual ſolemnities, in the cities of London and Weſtminſter. The ſtreets were crowded with multitudes of people, and no diſorder was committed. The ſame day the lords-juſtices appointed the earl of Dorſet to carry the king the news of his inauguration, and to attend him in his journey to England.

The earl of Ila, lord juſtice general of North-Britain, having received notice of the queen's death, and orders to proclaim the king, went to the lodgings of the duke of Montroſe (one of the lords of the regency) where he found the marquis of Tweedale, and ſeveral other lords and perſons of diſtinction, who, with the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, and the officers of the ſtate, cauſed the king to be proclaimed with great ceremony.

Two days after the lords juſtices of Ireland, the archbiſhop of Armagh, and ſir Conſtantine Phipps, having received the like notice, proclaimed the king on the 6th of Auguſt at Dublin. At the ſame time, they iſſued a proclamation for diſarming papiſts, and ſeizing their horſes.

There was not the leaſt diſturbance or interruption given in any place to the proclaiming of the king; only at Oxford, the mayor received a letter brought by a perſon in a bachelor's gown, requiring him to proclaim the pretender[c]. The mayor communicated this letter to the vice-chancellor, and both of them tranſmitted copies of it to mr. ſecretary Bromley, repreſentative for the univerſity of Oxford, who ſent them letters of thanks. The vice chancellor alſo offered a reward of a hundred pounds to the diſcoverer of the author.

In the mean time, the lords of the regency finding the nation much expoſed by the ill condition of the army and fleet, took all poſſible precautions to guard againſt a ſurprize. They diſpatched ſuch officers of the army, as they could truſt, to their reſpective poſts; gave orders to reinforce the garriſon of Portſmouth, and ſent veſſels out to view the harbours of France. They choſe mr. Joſeph Addiſon to be their ſecretary, and ordered all diſpatches, directed to the ſecretary of ſtate, to be ſent to him. This was particularly mortifying to the lord Bolingbroke, who was now obliged to ſtand at the door of the council chamber with his bag and papers, and to receive orders from thoſe, whom, a few days before, he expected to command.

The parliament met at Weſtminſter, the afternoon of the very day the queen died, purſuent to the act, which regulated the ſucceſſion. The ſpeaker being in Wales, it was moved by mr. ſecretary Bromley, that the houſe ſhould adjourn to the Wedneſda following. But this motion, though ſeconded, was anſwered by ſir Richard Onſlow, that time was too precious for any to be loſt at ſo critical a juncture. And therefore the houſe adjourned only to the next day.

On the 5th of Auguſt, the lords-juſtices came to the houſe of peers, where the lord chancellor, in their name, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'It having pleaſed Almighty God to take to himſelf our late moſt gracious queen of bleſſed memory, we hope, that nothing has been omitted, which might contribute to the ſafety of theſe realms, and the preſervation of our religion, laws, and liberties, in this great conjuncture. As theſe invaluable bleſſings have been ſecured to us by thoſe acts of parliament, which have ſettled the ſucceſſion of theſe kingdoms in the moſt illuſtrious houſe of Hanover; we have regulated our proceedings by thoſe rules, which are therein preſcribed.

The privy-council, ſoon after the demiſe of the late queen, aſſembled at St James's, where, according to the ſaid acts, the three inſtruments were produced and opened, which had been depoſited in the hands of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, and the reſident of Brunſwick. Thoſe, who, either by their offices, or by virtue of theſe inſtruments, had the honour of being appointed lords-juſtices, did, in conjunction with the council, immediately proceed to the proclaiming of our lawful and rightful ſovereign king George, taking, at the ſame time, the neceſſary care to maintain the public peace.

In purſuance of the acts before-mentioned, this parliament is now aſſembled, and we are perſuaded, you all bring with you ſo hearty a diſpoſition for his majeſty's ſervice, and the public good, that we cannot doubt of your aſſiſtance in every thing, which may promote thoſe great ends.

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

'We find it neceſſary to put you in mind, that ſeveral branches of the public revenue are expired by the demiſe of her late majeſty; and to recommend to you the making ſuch proviſions in that reſpect, as may be requiſite to ſupport the honour and dignity of the crown: and we aſſure ourſelves, you will not be wanting in any thing, that may conduce to the eſtabliſhing and advancing of the public credit.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'We forbear laying before you any thing, that does not require your immediate conſideration, not having received his majeſty's pleaſure. We ſhall only exhort you, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, to a perfect unanimity, and a firm adherence to our ſovereign's intereſt, as being the only means to continue among us our preſent happy tranquility.'

The commons being returned to their houſe, mr. ſecretary Bromley moved for an addreſs of condolance and congratulation, inſiſting much on the great loſs, the nation had ſuſtained by the death of the late queen. mr. Robert Walpole moved for ſomething more ſubſtantial, 'to give the king aſſurances of their making good all parliamentary funds;' and mr. Onſlow, afterwards lord Onſlow, very juſtly obſerved, 'that the ſtreſs of the addreſs ought not to lie upon condoling, but upon congratulating and giving the king aſſurances of their maintaining both his majeſty's undoubted title to the crown, and public credit.' Accordingly, inſtructions were given for drawing up the following addreſs, which was unanimouſly agreed to the next day:

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

'We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great-Britain, in parliament aſſembled, having a juſt ſenſe of the great loſs the nation has ſuſtained by the death of our late ſovereign lady queen Anne, of bleſſed memory, humbly crave leave to condole with your majeſty on this ſad occaſion.

It would but aggravate our ſorrow, particularly to enumerate the virtues of that pious and moſt excellent princeſs; the duty we owe to your majeſty, and to our country, oblige us to moderate our grief, and heartily to congratulate your majeſty's acceſſion to the throne; whoſe princely virtues give us a certain proſpect of future happineſs in the ſecurity of our religion, laws, and liberties, and engage us to aſſure your majeſty, that we will, to our utmoſt, ſupport your undoubted right to the imperial crown of this realm, againſt the pretender and all other perſons whatſoever.

Your faithful commons cannot but expreſs their impatient deſire for your majeſty's ſafe arrival and preſence in Great-Britain.

In the mean time, we humbly lay before your majeſty the unanimous reſolution of this houſe, to maintain the public credit of the nation, and effectually to make good all funds which have been granted by parliament, for the ſecurity of any money which has been, or ſhall be, advanced for the public ſervice, and to endeavour, by every thing in our power, to make your majeſty's reign happy and glorious.'

The ſame day, the houſe of peers agreed upon the following addreſs:

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

'We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, though deeply ſenſible of the great loſs theſe nations have ſuſtained, by the demiſe of her late majeſty of bleſſed memory, think it our duty, at the ſame time, with thankful hearts to Almighty God, to congratulate your majeſty upon your happy and peaceable acceſſion to the throne: and we do, with the utmoſt loyalty and duty, aſſure your majeſty of our zealous and firm reſolutions to ſupport your undoubtedly rightful and lawful title to the crown, againſt all enemies and pretenders whatſoever.

Our zeal and affection for your majeſty's ſervice engage us to exert ourſelves with all vigour and unanimity for ſecuring the public ſafety; and we will always, to the utmoſt of our power, maintain the honour and dignity of your crown. And we do, with faithful hearts, beſeech your majeſty, as

[c] In the letter were theſe expreſſions:
'This is to warn you, if you ſhould receive an order to proclaim Hanover, not to comply with it for the hand of God is now at work to ſet things upon a right foot, and in a few days you will ſee wonderful changes; which if you are wiſe enough to foreſee, you will obtain grace and favour from the hands of his ſacred majeſty king James, &c.'

ſoon as poſſible, to give us your royal preſence, which we are perſuaded will be attended with all other bleſſings to your kingdoms.'

This addreſs having been tranſmitted by the lords-juſtices to the king, he returned this anſwer:

GEORGE R.

'I take this firſt opportunity to return you my hearty thanks for your addreſs, and the aſſurances you have given me therein.

The zeal and unanimity you have ſhewn, upon my acceſſion to the crown, are great encouragements to me; and I ſhall always eſteem the continuance of them as one of the greateſt bleſſings of my reign.

No one can be more truly ſenſible than I am, of the loſs ſuſtained by the death of the late queen, whoſe exemplary piety and virtue ſo much indeared her to her people, and for whoſe memory I ſhall always have a particular regard.

My beſt endeavours ſhall never be wanting to repair this loſs to the nation. I will make it my conſtant care to preſerve your religion, laws, and liberties inviolable, and to advance the honour and proſperity of my kingdoms.

I am haſtening to you, according to your deſire, ſo affectionately expreſſed in your addreſs.'

The addreſs of the commons being alſo tranſmitted to the king, he returned the following anſwer:

GEORGE R.

'Your dutiful and loyal addreſs is very acceptable to me. The unanimity and affection my commons have ſhewn, upon my acceſſion to the crown, are moſt agreeable inſtances and pledges of their fidelity to me. I have a juſt ſenſe of your inexpreſſible loſs, by the death of your late ſovereign. You may be aſſured of my conſtant endeavours to ſecure to you the full enjoyment of your religion, laws, and liberties; and that it will always be my aim to make you an happy and flouriſhing people; to which your reſolution to maintain the public credit of the nation will greatly contribute. I am haſtening to you, according to your earneſt deſire, and the juſt expectations of my people.'

A great many perſons, particularly the leading men among the party, whoſe deſigns were fruſtrated by the queen's ſudden death, being extremely angry with dr. Ratcliffe, for not attending the queen, when ſent for by the duke of Ormond, their reſentments were carried ſo far, that, on the 5th of Auguſt, ſir John Packington made a complaint againſt him in the houſe of commons. But it being repreſented, that the doctor, who had the honour of being a member of the houſe, was then abſent, that matter dropped.

Two days after, there was a debate about the choice of a chairman of the grand committee of ſubſidy; ſome of the tory members having moved and inſiſted on placing ſir William Wyndham in the chair. But mr. Walpole repreſented, that mr. Conyers had, for ſo many years, ſo well diſcharged that office, that it would be inconſiſtent with gratitude, good manners, and prudence, to chuſe another. Upon which mr. Conyers was placed in the chair. The tories having loſt this point, ſome of them, on pretence of ſhewing extraordinary zeal for the new government, propoſed the giving the king a million ſterling for the civil liſt, which was 300,000l. more than the late queen had enjoyed. But, though no direct oppoſition was then made to that motion, yet it was afterwards dropped; the wiſeſt of the king's friends knowing, that the tories would take occaſion from thence to reproach him, as oppreſſing the nation by a higher revenue than the queen, as they afterwards ſuggeſted in their libel, called Engliſh advice. For this reaſon, the propoſal for the ſame ſum as had been granted to the queen was approved, and a bill for that purpoſe, being brought in, paſſed with great diſpatch. While the bill was depending, mr. Horatio Walpole moved, that the committee ſhould have power to receive two clauſes; one for the payment of the arrears due to the Hanover troops in Engliſh pay, being 65,000l. the other for 100,000l. to be paid by the treaſury, to any perſon that ſhould apprehend the pretender, if he ſhould land, or attempt to land in any of the king's dominions. Sir William Wyndham ſeconded mr. Walpole as to the arrears; and mr. Shippen very frankly owned, he had oppoſed that payment in the late reign, but that he was for it now. Mr. Aldworth, member of parliament for New Windſor, ſupported likewiſe the motion; but, as if he deſigned to expoſe the members, who, at this juncture, appeared ſo forward to pay thoſe very troops, which, a few months before, they had treated as runaways, he ſaid, 'That, for his part, he had formerly been againſt the payment, becauſe he had been given to underſtand, in that very houſe, that thoſe troops were deſerters; but that he had ſince been informed, they were hired to fight, and had ſerved well as long as there was fighting: and if, when they came in ſight of the enemy, they, who hired them, would not ſuffer them to fight, he did not ſee any reaſon, why they ſhould be called deſerters.' As to the clauſe, for giving 100,000l. to ſuch, as ſhould apprehend the pretender, mr. C—n ſaid, the next day, 'That he was not the day before in the houſe, when that clauſe was moved; but, if he had been preſent, he would have oppoſed it, becauſe, in his opinion, the proteſtant ſucceſſion was no longer in danger, ſince his majeſty's peaceable acceſſion to the throne:' and he was ſo poſitive in this aſſertion, that he defied all the houſe to prove the contrary. He was ſeconded by mr. Shippen; but mr. Pulteney, and after him the lord lumley, made it clearly appear, 'That the proteſtant ſucceſſion was in danger, as long as there was a popiſh pretender, who had many friends both at home and abroad: that the late queen was ſenſible of that danger, when ſhe iſſued out her proclamation againſt him; and that the caſe was not altered by her majeſty's demiſe: that the nation would be at no charge, if the pretender did not attempt to land; and if he did, 100,000l. would be well beſtowed to apprehend him.' To this mr. C—n made no reply.

Mr Craggs, who, the day before the queen died, had been diſpatched to Hanover, returned, the 13th of Auguſt, with letters from the king to the lords-juſtices: Upon which they went to the houſe of peers: and the chancellor, in their name, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

It is with great ſatisfaction we can now tell you, that we have this morning received a letter from the king, wherein his majeſty is gratiouſly pleaſed to acquaint us, that his majeſty is haſtening hither, to employ his utmoſt care for putting theſe kingdoms into a happy and flouriſhing condition.'

'He has commanded us, in the mean time, to continue our care of every thing, that may conduce to the peace and ſafety of his dominions. And we are aſſured, that, if this had required his more immediate preſence, he would, without the leaſt delay, have repaired hither, for the ſupport of ſo dutiful and faithful ſubjects. For his majeſty does very particularly expreſs his great ſatisfaction in the loyalty and affection, which his people have univerſally ſhewn upon his majeſty's acceſſion to the crown.'

'At the opening this ſeſſion, we did not mention to you the apprehenſions we then had, from the ſmallneſs of the ſum at that time advanced, that the lottery would not be full, being deſirous, in the firſt place, to try to make it effectual in the manner the parliament had eſtabliſhed it. But we are obliged now to acquaint you, that all our endeavours have failed of the deſired ſucceſs, though the contributions have been thereby conſiderably increaſed.'

'We muſt therefore earneſtly recommend to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to take this into your conſideration, and to give ſuch further encouragement, as you ſhall think proper, for raiſing the whole ſum, which was intended, and is abſolutely neceſſary for carrying on the ſervice of the year.'

The parliament had, before the queen's death, paſſed an act for a lottery for 1,400,000l. but public credit was then ſo low, that not above ſixty or ſeventy thouſand pounds had been ſubſcribed. This was occaſioned partly by the diffidence of the monied men in the late adminiſtration, and partly by the low intereſt allowed for the blank tickets. The lords of the regency and privy council, to reſtore public credit, and fill the lottery, went in a body to the bank, and ſubſcribed large ſums themſelves, which was ſuch an encouragement to others to follow their example, that 700,000l. was ſubſcribed in two days; and the parliament, purſuant to the king's deſire giving further encouragement by making a ſmall addition to the intereſt for the blank tickets, one per cent. only, the remainder was ſubſcribed in a few days more.

Addreſſes of thanks for the king's letter were voted by both houſes, and ſent to Hanover by the lords-juſtices, who, about a week after, came to the houſe of peers to paſs the money-bills, that were ready for the royal aſſent. The ſpeaker, upon preſenting the civil liſt and lottery bills, made a remarkable ſpeech [d] and, the buſineſs of the ſeſſion being finiſhed, the lords-juſtices prorogued the parliament to the 3d of September.

Thus ended the ſecond and laſt ſeſſion of the fourth parliament of Great-Britain, and the laſt of queen Anne's reign.

The French miniſter, monſieur d'Iberville, who had behaved himſelf with great hautineſs, was, upon the queen's death, ſeized with ſuch an apprehenſion of being inſulted by the people in his own houſe, that he ſent a letter to the duke of Ormond, to deſire his protection; and, the duke acquainting the lords-juſtices with it, ſome of the trained-bands were ordered to guard his houſe. That miniſter had before he received any orders from his court, aſſured the regency, 'That his maſter would inviolably maintain the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, particularly with relation to the ſettlement of the Britiſh crown in the houſe of Hanover.' And the earl of Peterborough, who arrived in London from France on the 7th of Auguſt, told ſome of the regency, that the French king had given him the like aſſurances; mr. Prior having likewiſe, by orders of the regency, notified the queen's death to the French king, received the ſame anſwer. Some days after, Iberville received a letter from the marquis de Torcy, approving what he had done; and another from the French king to the Britiſh regency with the ſame aſſurance, importing likewiſe, 'That having been informed, that reports had been ſpread, as if he deſigned to make alterations in the late renunciations, he thought fit to declare, as he had already done to the earl of Peterborough, that theſe reports were altogether falſe and groundleſs: That, the king of Spain having ſent the cardinal del Guidice as embaſſador to France, which might create ſome ſuſpicions, his moſt chriſtian majeſty had deſired the king, his grandſon, to recall him: And that the elector of Brunſwick having, ſome time before the death of the queen, ſignified to his moſt chriſtian majeſty, that, whenever his ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain ſhould take place, he would cultivate a friendſhip with his moſt chriſtian majeſty, he (the king of France) on his part, aſſured the lords-juſtices, that he would do all that lay in his power to maintain a good intelligence and amity between the two crowns.'

The anſwer, which mr. Prior received about the Catalans was not altogether ſo agreable to England. The regency had wrote to the court of France, 'That, his moſt chriſtian majeſty having promiſed to interpoſe his good offices with the king of Spain in favour of the Catalans, they were ſurprized to find, that, inſtead of that, his moſt chriſtian majeſty had ſent his troops to aſſiſt thoſe of his grandſon, in the reduction of Barcelona; and that they hoped, his moſt chriſtian majeſty would make good his promiſes, and conſider the ill conſequences of his ſuffering his forces to act againſt a people, who were under the protection of the crown of Great-Britain.' To this mr. Prior received an anſwer, 'That the moſt chriſtian king had already made good his engagements in behalf of the Catalans: That their obſtinacy was the cauſe of all the misfortunes, that might befal them: And his glory that would not ſuffer him to recall his troops from before Barcelona.' Some days before this anſwer was tranſmitted to England, the marquis d' Almanza, one of the deputies from the principality of Catalonia, made application to the lords-juſtices, and communicated to them a letter he had received from the governor of Majorca, with an account of the condition of the city of Barcelona. Upon which they ordered, that a copy of the letter, which they had written to the court of France, ſhould be communicated to the marquis; and he was farther aſſured, that directions had been ſent to admiral Wiſhart, not to moleſt the inhabitants of Barcelona, or hinder any relief to be brought to them by ſea.

The lords-juſtices were ſenſible how little the French king's aſſurances, that he would not diſturb the proteſtant ſucceſſion, were to be relied on; and therefore, though they had ſent a reinforcement to the garriſon of Portſmouth, under the command of colonel Pocock, they ordered another draught of five hundred out penſioners of Chelſea-Hoſpital to march thither, under the command of colonel Jones and at the ſame time, ordered the juſtices of the peace of London and Weſtminſter to take exact liſts of the popiſh reſcuants, and to ſeize their arms and horſes; and, upon the landing of the ſeven Britiſh batalions from Oſtend, a battalion of the earl of Orkney's regiment of fuſileers was commanded to march to Portſmouth, which made a ſtrength ſufficient for the defence of that important place.

On the 17th of Auguſt, the earl of Berkley, commander of the ſquadron of men of war and yachts, appointed to attend the king and prince, arrived on the coaſt of Holland. Monſieur Klingraef, the king's reſident at the Hague, immediately diſpatched an expreſs to Hanover, to acquaint him with it.

The ill conduct of the late miniſtry with relation to the treaty of commerce with Spain ſoon appeared. For, on the 19th of Auguſt, the merchants trading to that kingdom, laid before the regency the difficulties under which they laboured, by means of a large donative which king Philip was about to extort from the Britiſh and other merchants [e]. This increaſed the general indignation againſt the managers of the Spaniſh treaty, who had ſettled our trade to Spain in

[d] The ſpeech was as follows:

My Lords,

'The knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of Great-Britain, in parliament aſſembled, under the preſent happineſs they enjoy by his majeſty's peaceable and quiet acceſſion to the throne, could not enter upon any work more ſatisfactory and pleaſing to themſelves, than the providing a ſufficient revenue for the occaſions of his majeſty's civil government, in order to make his reign as eaſy and proſperous, as the beginning of it hath been ſecure and undiſturbed.

They are ſenſible, that the peace of the kingdom is not to be preſerved, nor the rights and liberties of the ſubjects to be protected, without ſupporting the juſt authority and dignity of the crown; and therefore they have thought it their intereſt, as well as duty to make ſuch a proviſion, as may not barely ſuffice to the neceſſity of the government, but may be ſuitable to the ſtate, the honour and luſtre, which the crown of Great-Britain ought to be attended with.

Whatſoever is ſuperfluous in that proviſion, and more than the ordinary ſervices of his majeſty ſhall require, will but inable him to exert his higheſt and moſt valuable prerogative of doing good: And we can give no greater proof of the truſt we repoſe in his majeſty's gracious diſpoſition, than putting the ſame intire revenue into his hands, which her late majeſty died poſſeſſed of; whoſe virtues we all admired, and of whoſe affection and concern for the religion, laws, and liberties, of this kingdom, we had ſo long experience.

As the crown itſelf deſcends immediately, and knows no vacancy, the commons have taken care, that the revenue ſhould follow it as cloſe as poſſible for they have given all the diſpatch to this grant, which the forms of their proceedings would allow. So that when his majeſty ſhall pleaſe to anſwer the impatient deſires of his people, by coming to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms, he will find himſelf equally eſtabliſhed in theſe revenues, as if he had ſucceeded to all by an uninterrupted right of inheritance. The only difference is this, that, if he had inherited them, he would have wanted one ſingle proof of the duty, and affection, and unanimity of his ſubjects.

Our deſire is, that this may be looked upon as an earneſt and pledge of that zeal and fidelity, which we ſhall always retain, and which, upon every occaſion, we ſhall be ready to demonſtrate to his majeſty's perſon and government: As ſuch, we hope his majeſty will graciouſly accept it at this time; and hereafter, when he ſhall have had experience of this firſt voluntary offering of his loyal commons, we hope he will find it to his ſatisfaction, as large and as ample as he could wiſh, might but the term of the grant be as long as we could wiſh, ſince it is to have equal continuance with his majeſty's life.

My lords, the bill, which the commons have paſſed for the purpoſes I have mentioned, is intitled, An act for the better ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and of the honour and dignity of the crown of Great-Britain.

They have alſo prepared another bill, as well for rectifying miſtakes in the names of the commiſſioners for the land-tax, as for raiſing ſo much as is wanting to make up the ſum of fourteen hundred thouſand pounds, intended to be raiſed by a lottery, for the public ſervice, in the year 1714. This having been recommended to their care, and appearing to them to be neceſſary for his majeſty's and the public ſervice, they have reaſon to think they have now abundantly ſupplied the defects in the former proviſion; and in this aſſurance they humbly preſent this bill alſo for the royal aſſent.'

[e] An account of this affair was publiſhed in the two following letters from Cadiz;

Cadiz, July 29.

'The king of Spain has demanded a donative in this place, and in other parts of Spain, and particularly of the Britiſh merchants and other foreigners inhabiting here: and their proportion of the donative is ſettled by a note left at each of their houſes, regulating what each perſon is to pay, which the merchants have refuſed to comply with, as being contrary to treaties in force, and have repreſented the ſame to the king of Spain; But, inſtead of finding redreſs, they have had ſoldiers quartered upon them, and expect the number to be doubled every day, during the time they ſhall refuſe to pay the donative. However, they have reſolved to let their effects be ſeized, rather than comply with a demand ſo unjuſt in itſelf, and ſo diſhonourable to the Britiſh nation, of which there is no precedent.'

Cadiz, July 29.

'Our factory is inſulted the moſt that ever was yet experienced from this government; a donative (or free gift) being endeavoured to be extorted by violence from us. To which effect our governor has put guards of ſoldiers in our houſes, threatening to double them at 8 rials value per diem, which amounts to half a dollar, until we pay the ſaid donative, which amounts to 125 pieces of eight on ſome, on others more or leſs. Thus the principal of our articles and privileges are trampled on. This is the reſpect ſhewn to our queen and nation, and the honourable uſage given to her ſubjects here. And what can be expected for the future? We hope a ſudden and determined reſolution will be taken at the court of England, to get ſatisfaction for this arbitrary dragooning the Britiſh ſubjects; and that a ſtop will be put to their ever pretending here any more to ſuch an extortion and breach of public faith; otherwiſe no living, nor can we be ever ſecure here'. Hiſt. Reg.

ſo precarious a manner, as made it ſubject to the will and pleaſure of the king of Spain, whoſe miniſters believed themſelves ſo ſecure of ours in England, that they thought they might put any hardſhips on our merchants. But upon the news of the queen's ſudden death, and of the vigorous proceedings of the regency, they entertained other ſentiments, and recalled the orders they had given for exacting the donative.

[1714] The latter end of Auguſt, the abbot Gaultier, who had been the agent of France and the pretender, ſet out for that kingdom, as many others had done upon the queen's death who had come hither on very ill deſigns.

About the ſame time, mr. Murray arrived expreſs from Hanover, with an account that the king had deferred his departure for ſome days; and brought ſeveral orders for the regency and council, particularly for the preparing a patent to create the prince royal prince of wales; and for removing the lord Bolingbroke from his office of ſecretary of ſtate; which was done on the laſt of Auguſt, with particular marks of diſpleaſure; three of the lords of the regency, the dukes of Shrewſbury and Somerſet, and the lord Cowper, having taken the ſeals from him, and locked and ſealed up all the doors of his office.

The union between England and Holland was ſo neceſſary for their mutual preſervation, that it was one of the firſt cares of the lords of the regency to notify to the ſtates the queen's death, and his majeſty's peaceable acceſſion to the throne. This was done on the 4th of Auguſt by the earl of Strafford, the Britiſh embaſſador in Holland, who made a ſpeech on the occaſion, wherein he obſerved, that, by the act of ſucceſſion, all officers were to continue in employment ſix months after the demiſe of the queen, unleſs the ſucceſſor otherwiſe diſpoſed of the offices; and that conſequently he remained ſtill embaſſador of the crown of Great-Britain. Upon the arrival of baron Bothmar's ſecretary with the news of the queen's death, monſieur Klingraef, the reſident of Hanover, preſented to the ſtates a memorial, with a letter from the king, which was lodged in his hands, to be in readineſs, if there ſhould be occaſion, by which the king required of the ſtates the preformance of their guaranty of his ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain. The ſtates aſſembled that very night, upon Klingraef's delivering the king's letter; and, the next day, came to a reſolution to return this anſwer, 'That, as ſoon as they were informed of the ſickneſs and death of the queen, they immediately bethought themſelves of their engagements for the guaranty of the ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain in the proteſtant line, as it was ſettled by acts of parliament. That, at the ſame time, they conſidered with themſelves, not only how much it concerns the kingdoms of Great-Britain, that the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line ſhould have intire effect, but alſo how deeply the proteſtant religion, the ſafety of their ſtate, and the liberty of all Europe, were intereſted therein. That therefore they unanimouſly reſolved to perform their engagements, and to execute all that by treaty of mutual guaranty they had promiſed. That as they received the account of the queen's death with grief, ſo it was very acceptable news to them, that his electoral highneſs, as the next heir in the proteſtant line, was inſtantly proclaimed king by the unanimous advice of the council, and with the acclamations of the people. That they moſt heartily congratulate him thereupon, and wiſh him all further happy ſucceſſes in a proſperous reign. That from this good beginning they hope his majeſty will take peaceable poſſeſſion of his kingdoms without any oppoſition. That, nevertheleſs, they were willing and ready to perform their engagements, and to take all proper meaſures with him for that end. That, it being likely his majeſty will ſpeedily go for England, they will be very glad, if he will pleaſe to take his journey thro' their dominions. That they will endeavour to facilitate his paſſage with all that is in their power; and that they will at all time ſhew the high eſteem they have for his majeſty's perſon and friendſhip; and that they have his intereſts as much at heart as their own.' This reſolution was, with a letter to the king, delivered to the reſident of Hanover; and, at the ſame time, the ſtates diſpatched letters to the ſeveral provinces, deſiring them forthwith to provide the neceſſary funds for ſetting out a ſtrong ſquadron of men of war; of which twelve that were ſaid to be deſigned for the Baltic, were almoſt ready to put to ſea.

About the middle of Auguſt, the count of de Tarouca, embaſſador plenipotentiary of Portugal, in a conference with the ſtates-deputies notified to them the favourable declaration the regents of Great-Britain had cauſed to be made to monſieur de Bruciado, the Portugueſe envoy at London, 'That Spain ſhould be obliged to conclude peace immediately with the crown of Portugal; or, in caſe of refuſal, his Portugueſe majeſty might depend upon being aſſiſted by the crown of Great-Britain, conformably to the treaty of defenſive alliance between theſe two crowns.' This declaration having been reported to the ſtates-general, they cauſed aſſurances to be given to the Portugueſe miniſter. 'That they would readily concur in all meaſures his Britannic majeſty might judge proper to be taken for obliging Spain to agree with Portugal on fair and juſt conditions of peace.' After theſe declarations, there was little difficulty in concluding the treaty between Spain and Portugal.

The earl of Strafford having received a letter from the king, to return the ſtates thanks for their reſolution about the guaranty, the earl, two days after, made a ſpeech to the ſtates, and, among other things, ſaid, 'That they had thereby engaged the friendſhip of a king, which could not but be very advantageous to them, as well in regard to the neighbourhood and powerfulneſs of his kingdoms and ſtates as with reſpect to his majeſty's perſonal merit, who, for his many excellent qualities, would be eſteemed and courted by all Europe, as well as loved and reſpected by his own ſubjects: And that he was known to be a prince, who was a religious obſerver of his word, they might be aſſured, that in gaining his friendſhip, they ſecured to themſelves a ſolid and laſting ſupport,

The court of France, confounded by the queen's ſudden death, followed the beſt council, which, in the preſent condition of their affairs, they could take, which was, to acknowledge king George. Accordingly, beſides the forementioned declarations, monſieur de Chateauneuf, their embaſſador at the Hague, made the earl of Strafford the uſual compliments of condolance upon the death of the queen, and, at the ſame time, thoſe of congratulation upon the king's acceſſion to the throne. And it is obſervable, that the pretender, who, by our miniſters and thoſe of France, had been put in hopes of carrying his point, as appears by his own declaration, and by what paſſed between our miniſters and the abbot Gaultier, was intirely diſappointed. For upon the news, which he received the 14th of Auguſt, that the queen was either dead, or paſt recovery, he poſted immediately for Verſailles: But, the king of France having notice of it, the marquis de Torcy ſent to tell him, 'That his moſt chriſtian majeſty was ſurprized at his being returned into his dominions, knowing the engagements he was under, in reſpect to the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great-Britain in the houſe of Hanover; and therefore deſired him to quit his teritories.' Upon this the pretender, having made a melancholy viſit to the queen-dowager of England at Chaillot, returning to Barleduc, under the deepeſt concern for the ill ſucceſs of his journey; and ſet out afterwards for the court of Lorrain at Luneville, from whence he went to Plombieres, to drink the waters of that place.

It will not be improper to take notice of ſome remarkable paſſages at Hanover before the news of the queen's death reached the court. On the 26th of July, the earl of Clarendon, envoy extraordinary from the queen, arrived at Hanover; but, the elector being then at Herenhauſen, it was the 4th of Auguſt, before the earl was conducted thither to have his firſt audience: One reaſon of the delay was, that the king of Pruſſia arrived there incognito on the 30th of July, The cauſe of this interview between theſe two princes at this juncture was variouſly diſcourſed of; but, very probably, the deſign of it was to cultivate a good correſpondence between them which their enemies had endeavoured to interrupt. The French court and ours knew, it would not be eaſy to defeat the proteſtant ſucceſſion, while theſe two families, which were both included in the intail, were united in affection and intereſt; and therefore they attempted to divide them, by propoſing to the king of Pruſſia's miniſter here, that his maſter ſhould immediately ſucceed after the queen, if he would fall in with the meaſures of the courts. But that king was too diſcerning to be caught in that ſnare: He knew, that their deſign was only to ſet the two families at variance which muſt not only defeat the proteſtant ſucceſſion, but ruin the intereſt of the reformation, render the two families incapable of ſupporting their own or their country's intereſt againſt the deſigns of France and Sweden, and facilitate the pretender's way to the throne of Great-Britain. He therefore not only rejected the propoſal, but likewiſe aſſured the elector of Hanover, that he would aſſiſt him with all his power to maintain his title to the Britiſh crown; and having concerted meaſures with him for their common intereſt, returned to Berlain the 3d of Auguſt,

Mr Craggs, who had been ſent to Hanover with an account of the queen's dangerous illneſs, arrived there on the 16th of Auguſt, and went directly to Herenhauſen with the privy-council's letter to the king. The ſame night three other expreſſes arrived at Hanover; two to the king, and one to the earl of Clarendon, with the news of the queen's death; which the earl communicated to him at two o'clock in the morning. This was confirmed, four hours after, by the arrival of monſieur Godike, ſecretary to baron Bothmar, with the further account of his majeſty's being proclaimed king of Great-Britain in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, without the leaſt ſhew of oppoſition. The king received this news, ſo much to his glory and advantage, with a ſerenity of countenance and compoſure of mind, peculiar to him. The baron de Rhede, his firſt chamberlain, was immediately diſpatched to Berlin, to deſire an interview with the king of Pruſſia, before his departure for Holland. But, that prince having begun his journey to Koningſberg in Pruſſia, before the baron's arrival at Berlin, the interview was prevented. However, as ſoon as the king of Pruſſia received from the Hague the news of the queen's death, and of the proclaiming of king George, he immediately declared his reſolution to contribute his aſſiſtance to the maintaining of that ſucceſſion, in caſe it ſhould be diſputed; and ſent orders to his miniſters at the ſeveral courts, particularly to mr. Bonnet, his reſident at London, to notify, 'That, as his majeſty had conſtantly declared himſelf in favour of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great-Britain, ſo now he was affected with peculiar joy to hear, that the ſettlement of that crown had, in due time, taken effect, by the proclaiming of king George, the rather, becauſe it viſibly tended to the promoting the proteſtant religion, and the true intereſt and welfare of the Britiſh nation: and that, in caſe of need, he was ready to employ all the power which God had put into his hands, in aſſiſting to maintain that ſucceſſion againſt all, who might offer to diſpute it.'

The neighbouring princes and ſtates likewiſe either went in perſon, or ſent envoys and deputies to congratulate his majeſty's happy acceſſion to the crown; which occaſioned a great concourſe of people, and retarded the king's departure; the thoughts of which ſo afflicted the inhabitants of Hanover, who had ſo long enjoyed the bleſſings of his mild government, that they were inconſolable. The king, in order to alleviate their grief, cauſed intimation to be given to the magiſtrates, that they might aſk ſome favour of him; and, at their requeſt, the exciſe of proviſions was taken off, the debts of inſolvent debtors were diſcharged, and their perſons ſet at liberty.

The king, having committed the government of his German dominions to a council, at the head of which he placed his brother prince Erneſt, took into conſideration what part of the royal family he ſhould carry with him, and then determined, that the prince ſhould go with him; that the princeſs, his conſort, ſhould follow a few weeks after, with the two eldeſt princeſſes; and that the young prince Frederic George ſhould remain at Hanover with his youngeſt ſiſter. The king alſo named thoſe of the houſhold, who were to attend him to Great-Britain. [f]

The king ſet out from Herenhauſen the 31ſt of Auguſt, and in four days came to Utrecht, from whence he went to the Hague. He had there ſeveral conferences with the ſtates, wherein the aſſurances, which had been mutually given by letters of friendſhip and effectual aſſiſtance, were confirmed. [g] At length, on the 16th of September, the king and prince embarked at Orange-Polder, on board the Peregrine and the Mary Yatcht, which having, ſoon after, joined the ſquadron of Engliſh and Dutch men of war, that waited for them, under the command of the earl of Berkeley, they all ſailed for England with a fair wind; and, the next day, about nine in the evening, arrived ſafe at the Hope, where the admiral thought fit to drop anchor. There being a thick fog the ſaturday morning, the yatch did not go up the river till the afternoon. The king and prince went into a barge in Long Reach, and arrived at Greenwich about ſix o'clock in the evening. The duke of Northumberland, captain of the life-guard, and the lord-chancellor, at the head of the lords of the regency, received him at his landing, and complimented him on his ſafe arrival. The king choſe to walk to his houſe in the park, accompanied by moſt of the nobility, and great numbers of the principal gentry, through an infinite crowd of perſons of all conditions. Before he left his yatcht, he appointed the earls of Dorſet and Berkeley to be lords of his bedchamber, and knighted mr. William Sanderſon, captain of the Peregrine. After the king had undergone the fatigue of paſſing through the crowd, and of giving his hand to all, who approached him, he retired to his bed-chamber, and ſent for ſeveral of the nobility, ſuch as had moſt diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their zeal for his ſucceſſion. It was obſerved, that the duke of Ormond, the lord chancellor, and the lord Trevor were not of that number. The earl of Oxford, was not at Greenwich that evening, but was one of the earlieſt there the next morning; but had the misfortune to be undiſtinguiſhed among the crowd, and, with great difficulty, had at laſt the bare honour of kiſſing his majeſty's hand, without exchanging a word with him. Nor did the earl eſcape ſuch reflections from the ſpectators, as his conduct had juſtly deſerved. On the other hand, the duke of Marlborough appeared there, juſtly favoured by the king, and looked upon (though not yet declared) as captain general. [h] The dukes of Shrewſbury, Somerſet, Bolton, Argyle, Montroſe, Rutland, and Montague; the marquis of Dorcheſter; the earls of Dorſet, Bridgewater, Sunderland, Carliſle, Berkeley, Nottingham, Portland, Orford, Wharton, and Cholmondeley; the lord viſcount Townſhend; the lords Oſſulſtone, Sommers, and Halifax; the biſhop of Saliſbury; general Stanhope, mr. Lechmere, and many others, received particular marks of favour; and the duke of Argyle was declared groom of the ſtole to his royal highneſs; colonel William Car and colonel Tyrrel, grooms of the bed-chamber; the earl of Hertford, the lord Finch, the lord Lumley, and colonel Oughton, gentlemen of the bed-chamber to the prince.

On the 20th of September, the king and prince of Wales made their entry with great pomp and magnificence. There were in the king's coach the prince, and the duke of Northumberland, captain of the life-guard in waiting. Above two hundred coaches of the nobility and gentry, all with ſix horſes, preceded the king's. When he came to St Margaret's Hill in Southwark, he was met by the lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, ſheriffs, and officers of the city of London; in whoſe name ſir Peter King, recorder, made a congratulatory ſpeech. The lord-mayor delivered the ſword to the king, who returned it to him, and he bore it in the proceſſion bare-headed. The royal pomp continued till his arrival at his palace of St James's, and was favoured by as fair a day as was ever known in that ſeaſon of the year.

The court was extremely numerous the next day, when, beſides the Britiſh nobility and gentry, ſeveral foreign miniſters made their appearance; particularly thoſe of France, [i] Poland, Pruſſia, and Sicily, took that occaſion to congratulate his majeſty's happy acceſſion to the throne, and ſafe arrival in England. [k]

[f] Theſe were, the baron de Kilmanſeck, maſter of the horſe; baron Bernſdorf, firſt miniſter of ſtate; baron de Goritz, preſident of the finances, and miniſter of ſtate; monſieur de Robethon, privy counſellor to the king; count Platen, great chamberlain; baron de Rhede, great chamberlain; the marquis de la Foret, chamberlain; baron Schutz and his two brothers, one gentleman of the bed-chamber to the king, the other to the prince; monſieur Reiche, privy-counſellor, and ſecretary to his majeſty; baron de Hartoff, counſellor of war; monſieur Schraden, ſecretary of ambaſſies; monſieur Hammerſtein, gentleman of the king's bed-chamber; monſieur Kempe, gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince; two phyſicians, dr. Steigerthal and dr. Chappuzeau; two ſurgeons, and two valets de chambre.

[g] The marquis de Chateauneuf, embaſſador of France, had an audience among other foreign miniſters, to compliment the king on his acceſſion; and the report was, that he uſed theſe, among other civil expreſſions, 'There are yet a few difficulties to be removed, to put the finiſhing hand to the treaties yet depending; but your majeſty ſhall be the arbiter of the peace.' To which the king anſwered, 'I will be the guaranty of it.' The duke de Oſſuna, and the marquis de Monteleone, plenipotentiaries of Spain, came from Utrecht to the Hague, to wait on the king and had a private audience, the 9th of September.

[h] The duke of Marlborough, having been detained a fortnight at Oſtend by contrary winds, happened to land at Dover, the day the queen died. He knew nothing of the queen's death, no more than the mayor and jurats of Dover, by whom he was received in their formalities with the acclamations of the people, and with a diſcharge of a great number of guns from the platform, but none from the caſtle, which are uſed only in royal ſalutes. The reaſon of his coming at that time is not known for certain. He had been invited firſt by the lord treaſurer Harley, and afterwards by the lord Bolingbroke, and great promiſes were made him. The compliment went ſo far that orders were ſaid to be ſent to the commanders of the caſtles and forts on the coaſts of Kent, Eſſex, and Suffolk, to pay the ſame honours, by the firing of guns wherever he landed, as was done when he returned in triumph from his glorious campaigns. But it ſeems this ceremony was ſoon after countermanded by an expreſs. However, the duke conſented to make a kind of public entry. About two hundred inhabitants of Southwark, with their member at their head, reſolved to meet and attend him through the Borough. He was likewiſe attended as he paſſed through the city with the like number on horſeback. His coach happened to break down at Temple-Bar, and he was forced to go into another. He was cenſured by his enemies for this conduct, as if it was a ſort of inſult on the queen, who was but juſt dead.

Before we proceed to the events of this reign, it will be proper to give a general idea of the ſtate of affairs in Great-Britain and Ireland.

The animoſity between the ſeveral parties, which even at this day divide England, was, at king George's acceſſion, higher than ever. The whigs, who had been in diſgrace the four laſt years of the queen's reign, were full of reſentment at the uſage they had received from the tories, and hoped to have full ſatisfaction under the new reign, which they looked upon as the end of their humiliation. The tories, on their part, were extremely apprehenſive of a downfall, and this apprehenſion had engaged ſeveral of their leaders in practices not only dangerous, but directly contrary to the meaſures, the nation had taken with the two laſt ſovereigns and the houſe of Hanover. To the views of theſe men were aſcribed the late peace with France, and the violence offered by the queen to her allies, to compel them to a reconciliation with that crown, and to the ſacrifice of the fruits of their victories.

Moreover, the principles of the revolution had been far from being univerſally embraced. Not only the papiſts eſpouſed the abdicated family, but alſo great numbers of churchmen; and it was much to be feared, that they would join with the catholics to dethrone a prince, whom they looked upon as a foreigner. The famous diſtinction of a king de jure, and a king de facto, was not yet forgot, nor the doctrine of paſſive obedience; and ſeveral refuſed to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration.

Scotland was generally diſſatisfied with the union. They were apt to conſider themſelves as degraded to a province of England. They had always been pleaſed with the title of an independant kingdom, heartily lamented the loſs of it, and as heartily wiſhed to recover it. That the Scots ſhould, at king George's acceſſion, be in theſe ſentiments, is no great wonder, ſince it requires ages to root out of the minds of a nation ſuch ſort of impreſſions, however ill-grounded. Accordingly, the Scots began to ſhew their diſcontent ſoon after the queen's death, of which there is the following account: the regency having iſſued a proclamation for a reward of 100,000l for ſeizing the pretender, they were informed that the pretender's friends in Scotland deſigned an inſurrection; and that ſome of them had been ſeen to go in arms towards the Highlands; upon which they ordered a good number of half-pay officers, eſpecially of thoſe belonging to the Scots regiments, to go thither immediately, that, in caſe of neceſſity, they might raiſe the militia of the country, under the orders of major-general Whetham, who commanded in chief there. Though this precaution was neceſſary, yet the Scots jacobites were ſo confounded, that they could do nothing conſiderable; ſo that the chief of them only held ſome conſultations, and retired to their lurking places.

Some of the Highlanders appeared in a body near Fort William at Inverlochy, in the weſtern Highlands. But, the governor ſending out a detachment againſt them, they marched off; ſo that they could do nothing at that time in Scotland, but only ſteal ſome cattle, and took an opportunity by night to proclaim the pretender. The government ordered them to be proſecuted; and, by way of prevention, the duke of Gordon was confined by the regency to the city of Edinburgh, on his parole; his ſon, the marquis of Huntley, to his houſe in the north; and his ſon-in-law, the lord Drummond, to his caſtle of that name. The duke of Athol, lord privy-ſeal, who had cauſed the king to be proclaimed at Perth, was ordered to continue at his caſtle of Blair in the Highlands, to preſerve the peace of the neighbourhood: and the regency being informed, that the Highlanders had appointed huntings, when it is uſual for the Clans to attend their chiefs, they forbad thoſe huntings, and ordered ſir Donald Macdonald of Slait, one of thoſe chiefs, ſuſpected to be in the pretender's intereſt, to be made priſoner, and ſent to the caſtle of Edinburgh. The lord Drummond was alſo ordered to be ſeized, but eſcaped to the Highlands, from whence he wrote to the lords juſtices, and offered bail for his good behaviour. The earl of Broadalbin, who had ſufficiently declared himſelf for the pretender, tho' he had abjured him when he ſat as one of the ſixteen Scots peers, thought fit to retire to an inacceſſible caſtle in a lake: upon which a detachment of foot was ordered to guard the avenues; and captain Campbel of Glendoroul, who had a commiſſion, by the earl of Oxford's means, to raiſe an independant company in the Highlands, was taken at Inverlochy, and from thence ſent priſoner to Edinburgh. The late lord-treaſurer had, a little before, ſet up a new chamberlain's court in Scotland, the old one having been long diſcontinued, becauſe arbitrary princes had made it a grievance to the ſubject. The deſign of reviving it now was only for a cover to beſtow money upon ſuch, as were in the court-meaſures. Accordingly, the earl of Mar, who managed the affairs of Scotland, reccommended his own brother-in-law, ſir Hugh Paterſon of Banockburn, and the lord Haddo, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Aberdeen, to be two of the commiſſioners, to whom the queen had granted a bill of 1000l. each, payable by mr. Douglaſs, receiver-general of the land-tax. The lord viſcount Kilſyth, one of the ſixteen Scots peers, and the lord Lyon, king at arms, two other relations to the earl of Mar, had alſo grants for the like ſums. Soon after the queen's death, ſir Hugh Paterſon demanded payment of his bill; but the earl of Ilay, lord juſtice-general of Scotland, interpoſed, and acquainted the regents, how unreaſonable a thing this was; and particularly that men, ſuſpected of diſaffection to his majeſty's government, ſhould have the public money diſtributed amongſt them. Upon this the lords regents ordered the duke of Athol, lord privy-ſeal, to put an immediate ſtop to all grants, that were not paſſed before the queen's death; which diſappointed thoſe gentlemen of their money, and ſaved 4000l. to the government.

When the king was proclaimed at Glaſgow, forty or fifty unknown perſons, while the magiſtrates were buſy in attending the proclamation, took an opportunity to pull down the epiſcopal meeting-houſe there, where one mr. Cockburn had ſet up the Engliſh liturgy, by countenance of the late government, more to diſguſt the citizens, than in hopes of gaining proſelytes. As ſoon as the magiſtrates heard of it, they ſent to apprehend the actors, and to prevent the pulling down the houſe; but they had done their work, and made their eſcape, before the magiſtrates came thither; ſo that none of them were diſcovered or taken. The jacobite party took occaſion from hence to reflect upon the preſbyterians, as if they had perſecuted thoſe of the church of England, and inſerted an account of it in the poſt-boy, with all the aggravating circumſtances, that their malice and invention could ſuggeſt. Complaint was likewiſe made of it to the regency, who ordered the lord advocate of Scotland to inquire into it. There was found good reaſon to ſuſpect, that the thing was done on purpoſe by the diſaffected party, to raiſe a clamour; becauſe mr. Cockburn, the day before, had retired with his family and effects to Edinburgh, though the magiſtrates of Glaſcow had given him aſſurance of protection. This account being taken upon oath by the magiſtrates, and ſent up to the regency, put an end to that matter. Thus ſtood affairs in Scotland, at the time of king George's acceſſion.

As for Ireland, the chief thing to be dreaded there, was the great number of papiſts, who are ever ready to throw off the yoke of the Engliſh. A little more conduct in king James II, and a little more aſſiſtance from France, would have endangered that kingdom. And, at the time of the queen's death, popery was in much the ſame ſituation.

Indeed there ſeemed to be no danger from any foreign power. Holland would not fail to fulfil all engagements; the king of himſelf was powerful: he had on foot a good number of troops, which, without obſtacle, could have been embarked in his own dominions. But, after all, Lewis XIV. was ſtill alive: it could not be doubted, but that it was againſt his will that he had acknowledged the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and promiſed not to diſturb it. He was aſſuredly in the ſame ſentiments ſtill, and perhaps thought himſelf more obliged to keep his word with king James, on his death bed, never to forſake his ſon, than the engagements, the neceſſity of a peace had forced him into. It may be,

[i] Ibberville the French envoy ſaid on this occaſion, 'That, as ſoon as his majeſty's leaſure would permit, he would deſire an audience, to repeat to him the aſſurances, the marquis de Chateauneuf had given his majeſty at the Hague, on the part of his moſt chriſtian majeſty.'

[k] An accident happened this day, which interrupted a little the gay humour the court was in. Charles Aldworth, member of parliament for Windſor, had imbibed, at St Germains in France, ſtrong prejudices againſt the Hanover ſucceſſion, which, at his return to England, he made no ſcruple of publiſhing, and confirmed them by frequent drinking the pretender's health. This drew upon him ſeveral quarrels, in which he met with ſome diſgraces; and, in the later end of the queen's reign, he ſet ſo great value on that merit of his, that he thought himſelf not ſufficiently taken notice of, which made him a little intractable. He took liberties in railing at the old miniſtry; and, to ingratiate himſelf with their ſucceſſors, charged it as a crime in colonel Chudleigh of the foot guards, that he had drank the duke of Marlborough's health. Colonel Chudleigh, the couſin of the other colonel, meeting unexpectedly mr. Aldworth in the preſence-chamber at St James's, expoſtulated with him about it; and, ſome by-ſtanders expreſſing their ſurprize, that men, who had publicly drank the pretender's health, ſhould dare to appear in that place, mr. Aldworth came to hard words with colonel Chudleigh, and challenged him? upon which they both went out, and fought in Marybone fields, notwithſtanding colonel Biſſet's endeavours to prevent it. Mr. Aldworth was killed on the ſpot; and the king, being told of it, expreſſed his indignation at people's quarrelling in his palace; but ſaid, that, as he came to maintain the laws, he would leave the matter wholly to their deciſion.

what he would not do directly, he might do indirectly; with money, may not troops, arms and ships soon be had? It will be seen in the course of this history, that, without any aid, the English and Scots raised such an insurrection, as caused great disturbances: and what would they have done, had they been assisted! In vain would the king have depended on his own troops; they could not be brought over without the consent of the parliament, and the English are too jealous of their liberty, to suffer any foreign forces, and it is with some sort of regret, that they bear even those of the states.

Such was the situation of the British dominions and of Europe, when king George came to the throne; and therefore it is no wonder, that, upon his arrival in England, his first proceedings expressed a dislike of the tories and the late ministry, and shewed his attachment to the whigs. The persons, he had named for the regency, were a plain proof what the friends of the late ministry were to expect. He had, even before his arrival, removed the lord Bolingbroke,[l] and appointed the lord Townshend secretary of state in his room. The day after his landing at Greenwich, he sent the new secretary to acquaint the duke of Ormond, that he had no longer occasion for his service as captain-general, but would be glad to see him at court.

These changes were followed by many others: the duke of Marlborough was made captain-general of the land-forces, colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards, and master of the ordnance. The lord Cowper was made lord chancellor, the earl of Wharton privy-seal, and the earl of Sunderland lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Devonshire was appointed steward of the household in the room of earl Paulet, and mr. James Stanhope secretary of state in the room of mr. Bromley, and the duke of Montrose in the room of the earl of Mar: the duke of Somerset was made master of the horse, the duke of St Alban's captain of the band of pensioners, and the duke of Argyle commander in chief of the forces in Scotland. Mr William Pulteney was made secretary of war, and mr. Robert Walpole receiver and pay master-general of all the guards and garrisons, and all other forces of Great-Britain, and pay-master to Chelsey-hospital, in the room of mr. How and mr. Moore. The privy-council was dissolved, and a new one declared, of which the earl of Nottingham was president.[m] Out of the privy-counsellors a cabinet council was formed, consisting chiefly of the lord chancellor, the duke of Marlborough, the earls of Nottingham, Sunderland, the lords Hallifax, Townshend, Sommers, and general Stanhope. All these had distinguished themselves by their professed opposition to the late measures, and the peace.

The governors of places were also most of them changed. General Erle was made governor of Portsmouth. There were as many alterations in Ireland as in England. Before the king's arrival, the behaviour of sir Constantine Phipps had been such, that the regency had removed him, as well as the archbishop of Armagh, from being lords-justices of that kingdom, and in their room appointed the archbishop of Dublin and the earl of Kildare, for which they had the king's letter of approbation and thanks.[n] Alan Broderick was made lord chancellor of Ireland, and William Whitshed chief justice. The privy-council was also dissolved, and another named, of which the duke of Ormond was one.[o]

All these changes were made before the coronation, which was fixed to the 20th of October. The king is by some blamed, for not having joined to the great number of whigs a few more of the tories, which they suppose would have prevented the general discontent of that party. But it was very difficult for the king not to do as he did. The inclination which the pretender had indiscreetly asserted, the queen had for him in the latter years of her life could be ascribed only to those who had the management of affairs The ministry, resolutely bent to end the war, notwithstanding the complaints of all the allies (who placed their safety in the humbling of France) and particularly, notwithstanding the repeated opposition of the duke of Hanover, they could not but be sensible, that, if he one day became their master, he would not fail to sacrifice them to his own, and the resentment of the allies, whose projects they had disappointed, and whose hopes they had confounded. It was therefore natural to think, they had taken measures to prevent any danger from him. A thousand circumstances supported these conjectures: the dowry paid to king James's queen: the small reward offered for taking the pretender: the conniving at the listing of men in his service: the suffering the revolution to be publicly talked and preached against, and doctrines to be vented, destructive of the principles on which it was built: the little care to have an eye to Scotland, to redress the grievances complained of by that nation, and which were capable of driving them to extremities: England unprovided of troops, as well as Scotland and Ireland, whilst under frivolous pretences several regiments were kept in Flanders: all this amounted to a sort of demonstration, that the queen's death alone had prevented the defeating of the protestant succession, and the destroying all that had been done for above twenty years to secure and justify the exclusion of king James and his pretended heir. Now can there be to a prince attaced in so important a point, any room for pardon or dissimulation?

Besides, there was a kind of necessity to espouse one of the two parties, who had by turns prevailed under king William and queen Anne. By that means he would be freed from the continual trouble of managing and keeping the balance even between them, and perhaps from the danger of having both turn against him. The whigs were really enemies of France and the pretender, and could not be otherwise; they had constantly declared for the protestant succession, and though, in some of their proceedings, the spirit of party no less appeared than a true zeal, yet they might be depended upon. To the whigs the court of Hanover was indebted, for obliging the French king and the duke of Lorrain not to suffer the pretender in their dominions, and for the advices of what was contriving against the interests of the protestant successor. This being the case, there was no room to deliberate which party to chuse. King William, accustomed from his youth to dissimulation, might have deliberated, or seemed to have done so: but the elector of Hanover, absolute master in his German dominions, and consequently unused to faction and party, was hardly capable of that dissimulation, so requisite in a government like that of England.

Notwithstanding all the changes and the disgrace of so many persons, no ill effects followed. Addresses from the universities, the counties, cities, boroughs, and corporations, expressed the public joy and satisfaction at the king's accession, though in a very different stile: for some insinuated that the protestant succession had not been in danger, whilst others spoke of the late ministry in very severe terms, and mentioned the utmost dread of their measures.[p]

[l] Shortly after the king's arrival, a message having been sent to the lord Bolingbroke, in the country, for his coming to town, to be present at the taking off the seals that had been put on his office; he excused himself, saying, 'The same might as well be done by one of his secretaries; but, if he could be so happy as to have the honour to kiss the king's hand, he would fly to throw himself at his majesty's feet.'

[m] The rest were: The prince of Wales, archbishops of Canterbury and York, lord chancellor Cowper, the dukes of Shrewsbury, Devonshire, Somerset, Bolton, Malborough, Argyle, Montrose, Roxburgh, Kent, Marquis of Lindsey lord great chamberlain, the earls of Wharton privy seal, Pembroke, Suffolk, Sunderland, Anglesea, Carlisle, Abington, Scarborough, Orford, viscount Townshend, Bishop of London, the lords Sommers and Hallifax, Thomas Coke vice chamberlain, James Stanhope secretary of state, sir Thomas Parker chief justice, Thomas Erle lieutenant-general of the ordnance, and Robert Walpole paymaster-general.

[n] On the 14th of Sept. the regency had advice from Dublin, that, upon the removal of sir Constantine Phipps and the archbishop of Armagh, from being lords justices of Ireland, there was an universal joy among all the friends of his majesty's succession; and that all the friends of his majesty's succession; and that some of the populace, who were filled with resentment against sir Constantine, went to his house, in order to insult him; but he had beforehand retired to the castle.

George Cholmondeley, esq. baron Newburgh.
Alan Broderick, esq. baron Broderick.
Sir George St George, baron St George.
Sir Arthur Cole, baron Ranelagh.
Sir John Percival, baron Percival.
Richard Fitz-Patrick, esq. baron Goran.
George Evans, esq. baron Carbery.

[p] The address of the university of Cambridge, after condoling the queen's death, and congratulating the king's accession, proceeds as follows:

'It would be unpardonable folly and downright infatuation, if any of your majesty's protestant subjects should turn their eyes to a popish pretender, who can never reign over us but to the certain loss of every thing, that ought to be dear to us, either as we are Britons or protestants. But then your majesty's most loyal university must be utterly incapable of a thought, so destructive to our most holy faith, so opposite to our happy constitution both in church and state, so full of ingratitude to God, and of injustice to your majesty, who, by the death of our late sovereign, hath now alone the rightful and undoubted title to the imperial crown of these realms, which receives a new lustre by your majesty's happy accession to it.

Out of a deep sense of these things, and in obedience to the just and wholesome laws of the realm, and in a conscientious regard to our repeated oaths, we most humbly presume to assure your majesty, that as our own studies and endeavours shall always be employed in the defence of your majesty's sacred person and government, and your just and rightful title to our allegiance against the pretender, and all other your majesty's enemies and opposers whatsoever; so shall it be likewise our especial care, that all those, who are educated amongst us, be instructed in the same true principles of loyalty and duty to your majesty.'

The address of the university of Oxford was in a different stile:

'The inexpressible loss, we have sustained by the death of our late sovereign of blessed memory, would have been insupportable, had not God, in his great goodness to this nation, supplied it to us by your majesty's happy and quiet accession to the throne. With the prospect of this blessing we comforted our-

The firſt time the king was preſent at the privy-council, after he had taken the oath relating to the ſecurity of the church of Scotland, he made the following declaration:

'Having, in my anſwers to addreſſes of both houſes of parliament, fully expreſſed my reſolution to defend the religious and civil rights of all my ſubjects, there remains very little for me to ſay upon this occaſion.

Yet having been willing to omit no opportunity of giving all poſſible aſſurances to a people, who have already deſerved ſo well of me; I take this occaſion alſo to expreſs to you my firm purpoſe, to do all that is in my power for the ſupporting and maintaining the churches of England and Scotland, as they are ſeverally by law eſtabliſhed; which I am of opinion may be effectually done, without the leaſt impairing the toleration allowed by law to proteſtant diſſenters, ſo agreeable to chriſtian charity, and ſo neceſſary to the trade and riches of this kingdom. The good effects of making property ſecure are no where ſo clearly ſeen, and to ſo great a degree, as in this happy kingdom; and I aſſure you, that there is not any among you ſhall more earneſtly endeavour the preſervation of it than myſelf.'

At the ſame time the prince royal was declared prince of Wales, and took his ſeat at the upper end of the board, at the king's right-hand. Soon after the treaſury was put in commiſſion, and alſo the admiralty. The commiſſioners of the treaſury were the lord Hallifax, ſir Richard Onſlow chancellor of the exchequer, ſir William St Quintin, Edward Wortley Montague, and Paul Methuen. Thoſe of the admiralty were the earl of Orford, ſir George Byng, George Dodington, ſir John Jennings, ſir Charles Turner, Abraham Stanyan, and George Bailie. John Aiſlabie was made treaſurer of the navy, and the earl of Cholmondeley was appointed treaſurer, Hugh Boſcawen comptroller, and Edmund Dunch maſter of the king's houſhold. Dr Samuel Garth was knighted, who had lately publiſhed a latin dedication, which he intended to prefix to an edition of Lucretius three years before; but it was not then thought ſeaſonable.

On the 9th of October, N. S. the two eldeſt princeſſes of Great-Britain, Anne and Amelia, ſet out from Hanover, to go, by eaſy journies, to the Hague; the youngeſt princeſs Caroline being left at Hanover, on account of a late indiſpoſition. Three days after, the princeſs of Wales ſet out for Holland, attended by the counteſs of Pickenburgh; and, on the 17th, arrived at the Hague, with the two eldeſt princeſſes her daughters. The next morning ſhe received the compliments of the ſtates-general, by deputies nominated for that purpoſe; and, the weather being fair, ſhe appeared in the afternoon in the Voorhout, attended by a very numerous train of coaches; and, in the evening, kept a drawing room, at which all the ladies and perſons of diſtinction of that place were preſent. The next day ſhe received viſits from the French embaſſador, and other foreign miniſters. The earl of Berkeley and ſir John Walter of the green cloth were come thither five days before, having left the ſquadron of men of war at Helvoet-Sluys, with orders for the yatchts to come up to Rotterdam. The princeſs being informed by the earl, that the wind was eaſterly, on the 20th of October, ſhe went on board a yatcht of the ſtates of Holland, accompanied by the earl of Albemarle, and the reſt of the deputies of that province; by the count of Hanau, and the counteſs, her ſiſter, prince William of Heſſe, and the prince of Anhault. The earl of Strafford accompanied her alſo part of her way to Rotterdam, where being arrived, ſhe embarked on board the Mary yatcht, and with the two princeſſes and their retinue, landed at Margate, October 11th, O. S. and the next evening arrived at Rocheſter. The prince of Wales, having early that day received the news of her arrival, ſet out about ſeven o'clock in the morning, accompanied by the dukes of Somerſet and Argyle, and the earl of Bridgewater lord-chamberlain to their royal highneſſes. The prince, met the princeſs beyond Rocheſter, where ſhe was attended by the counteſſes of Dorſet and Berkeley, who had been named two of the ladies of the bed-chamber. Their royal highneſſes paſſed through the city of London in a chariot with ſix horſes, followed by another in which were the two young princeſſes, and came to St James's on the 13th of October. [q]

The day appointed for the coronation drawing near, the king, as uſual on ſuch occaſions, advanced ſome of the peers to higher titles, and created ſome new ones. [r] Five days after, the coronation was performed at Weſtminſter with great magnificence. [s] There never was ſo great an appearance of lords ſpiritual and temporal, as on this occaſion, no leſs than ſeventeen archbiſhops and biſhops, though two ſees were then vacant; all the dukes in or about London, except the duke of Buckingham; ſeventy earls and viſcounts, and among them the earl of Oxford and viſcount Bolingbroke; and as many barons. The demonſtrations of joy throughout the kingdom on the coronation-day ſeemed to be general, and were in proportion as ſplendid as at Lon-ſelves, as often as we apprehended that precious life to be in danger; for knowing the ſincerity of our hearts, we never ſuſpected, that any perſons would be ſo regardleſs of their duty and of their intereſt, as not to ſupport, with the utmoſt zeal, that ſucceſſion, to which they were bound by the moſt ſolemn oaths, and on which the preſervation of our religion, laws, and liberties, did next, under God, ſo manifeſtly depend. Our expectations, our wiſhes, and our prayers, have been anſwered by that unanimity, with which your ſubjects have recognized your majeſty's undoubted right, that impatience, they have expreſſed to ſee your royal perſon in the actual poſſeſſion of your throne, and themſelves happy under the influence of your government.

The addreſſes of Orford and Gloceſter were very remarkable. In the Orford addreſs was this paſſage:

'We hope, that the univerſal approbation, with which your majeſty entered your reign, will be an happy omen of unanimity among us: all the inſinuations, as if the proteſtant ſucceſſion was in danger, muſt now appear (as they were) groundleſs, and only a contrivance of deſigning men to divide us. We can now have no ſtrife, but who ſhall ſhew the greateſt zeal for your ſacred majeſty, for our admirable church and happy conſtitution, in oppoſition to your majeſty's enemies, to popery and tchism, and to all anti-monarchical and republican principles.'

In that of Gloceſter were theſe words:

'Her late majeſty at laſt by a happy peace (which God continue to us and our children) ſecured your majeſty's quiet ſucceſſion, which ſhe had always at heart, and was careful of th ough her whole reign. Your majeſty ſucceeds in our hearts: no time, no accident, can make us otherwiſe than truly loyal. It is our principle to obey your majeſty without reſerve, for we think you accountable to none upon earth: and the ſame principles will embolden us unanimouſly to reſiſt your majeſty's enemies, and, with all that is dear to us, to defend your majeſty's juſt title to the crown you wear, againſt all perſons whatſoever. And theſe our inclinations and principles we owe to our ſteady adherence to the eſtabliſhed church of England, the glory of the reformation, truly antient, truly apoſtolical, for her ſubmiſſion and obedience to kings and governers, for her mild behaviour to thoſe, who have formerly torn out her very bowels. No church upon earth can ſhew ſo ancient a charter, ſo unlimited obedience, ſo univerſal charity: no church can boaſt ſo great a defender. May your love to each other find no bounds. May it pleaſe your majeſty, we here ſpeak the ſenſe of all your people, who are truly loyal, and are aſſured they are vaſtly more numerous than thoſe, who are but occaſionally ſo; and therefore doubt not to ſend your majeſty members of parliament, who are not of thoſe, whoſe principles are to obey no longer than they are pleaſed.'

On the contrary, in the addreſs from Nottingham, preſented by their member mr. Plumtree, it is ſaid:

'With pleaſure we now look back upon our paſt dangers, with joy we ſee thoſe intrigues and ſtratagems diſappointed, which were ſo artfully contrived by ſome ill deſigning men to effect our ruin, and from that dreadful ſtorm which lately threatened us, and which, by divine providence, and the wiſe conduct of your majeſty, is blown over, we cannot but addreſs ourſelves to your ſacred perſon, as our ſecond great deliverer, from a ſlaviſh yoke, and a popiſh impoſtor.'

In the addreſs from the county of Hereford is this paragraph:

'We are the more ſenſible of the ineſtimable bleſſing of your majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, becauſe we had very lately ſo much reaſon to apprehend, we were in danger of being deprived of it, by the deſigns of ambitious men, who, if God had not prevented them, to raiſe themſelves to power and riches, had ſacrificed their country to tyranny and ſuperſtition.'

[q] The princeſs Carolina, who was left behind, did not come to England till the 24th of May.

[r] Letters patents, Octob. 15, paſſed the great ſeal, creating

James, lord Chandos, earl of Caernarvon.

Lewis, lord Rockingham, baron of Throwley in the county of Kent, viſcount Sondes of Lees Court in the ſame county, and earl of Rockingham.

Charles, lord Oſſulſton, earl of Tankerville.

Charles, lord Hallifax, viſcount Sunbury in the county of Middleſex, and earl of Hallifax.

Heneage, lord Guernſey, earl of Aylesford in the county of Kent.

John, lord Harvey, earl of Briſtol.

Thomas, lord Pelham, viſcount Houghton in the county of Nottingham, and earl of Clare.

Henry, earl of Thomond in Ireland, viſcount Tadcaſter in the county of York.

James, viſcount Caſtleton in Ireland, baron Sanderſon of Sexby in the county of Lincoln.

Bennet, lord Sherard in Ireland, baron of Harborough in the county of Leiceſter.

Gervaſe, lord Pierrepoint in Ireland, baron Pierrepoint of Hanſlop in the county of Bucks.

Henry Boyle, baron of Carleton in the county of York.

Sir Richard Temple, baron of Cobham in the county of Kent.

Henry, lord Paget, earl of Uxbridge.

The ſame day the king appointed lieutenant-general Cadogan to be colonel of the ſecond regiment of foot-guards, in the room of general Churchill. The dukes of Bolton and Rutland, and the earls of Dorſet and Hallifax, were made knights of the garter. The lord Cobham was appointed envoy to the court of Vienna, and the earl of Stair embaſſador to the court of France. The dukes of Richmond, Grafton, and Kent, the earls of Lincoln, Dorſet, Manchester, Berkeley, Selkirk, Stair, and Orrery, and the lord Carteret, were appointed lords of the bed-chamber; and mr. Howard, brigadier Dormer brigadier Breton, colonel Ker, colonel Tyrrel, colonel Fielding, and colonel Cornwal, grooms of the bed-chamber.

[s] 'The forms were much the ſame as in former coronations; what was particular in this was as follows:

The proceſſion of the officers, and then the peers, from Weſtminſter-Hall to the abbey-church, being cloſed by two perſons repreſenting the dukes of Aquitain and Normandy, the lords, who bore the regalia, came in turn. The earl of Saliſbury, with St Edward's ſtaff; the lord viſcount Longueville, the the ſpurs; the earl of Dorſet, with the ſceepter and croſs; the earls of Sunderland, Pembroke, and Lincoln, with the three ſwords. Then garter's deputy, with his coronet between the uſher of the black-rod, and the don, ſome few places excepted, where the rabble ſhewed their hatred to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, by riots and outrages [t]. The univerſity of Oxford (who the day before, had preſented to the king by dr. Gardiner, their vice-chancellor, a book of verſes on the death of queen Anne, and the acceſſion of his majeſty to the throne) on the cornation-day, conferred unanimouſly, in a full convocation, the degree of doctor of civil law on ſir conſtantine Phipps, with all imaginable marks of honour and eſteem.

The firſt, affair the king turned his thoughts to, was the execution of an article of the treaty of Utrecht, the demolition of Dunkirk; from whence the trade of England and Holland had been greatly incommoded during the late wars. Inſtead of executing this article, the French king had entirely evaded it; and therefore mr. Prior, who was ſtill reſident at Paris, was ordered to preſent a memorial to him, preſſing the performance of the 9th article of the treaty of Utrecht [u]. The French king, who had uſed the diſtinction of the letter and ſpirit of treaties to juſtify his non-compliance with the treaty of partition, adhered to the letter of this, and pretended he had fulfilled it in the utmoſt extent [v]. His anſwer was not ſatisfactory; Prior was recalled, and mayor of London; then the lord great-chamberlain ſingle; then the prince of Wales in his robes of ſtate of crimſon velvet furred with ermin; his coronet, with precious ſtones, and cap borne by the earl of Hertford on a crimſon velvet-cuſhion, and wearing a cap of crimſon velvet turned up with ermin, by his majeſty's permiſſion: his train ſupported by Adolphus Oughton, and another groom of his bed-chamber, aſſiſted by Henry Killigrew, gentleman of his royal highneſs's robes. Then the earl of Derby, with the ſword of ſtate, between the duke of Montague, lord high-conſtable for that day, and the earl of Suffolk and Bindon, as earl-marſhal of England; the duke of Grafton, lord high-ſteward on that occaſion, with the crown, between the duke of Argyle, bearing the ſcepter with the dove, and the duke of Somerſet with the orb; the biſhop of Saliſbury with the bible, and the biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry with the patten, and the biſhop of Bangor with the chalice. Then the king in his royal robes of crimſon velvet, furred with ermin, and bordered with a rich broad gold lace, wearing the collar of the order of St George, and on his head a cap of ſtate of crimſon velvet, turned up with ermin, adorned with a circle of gold, enriched with diamonds, ſupported by the biſhops of Durham, and Bath and Wells, under a canopy borne by the barons of the Cinque-Ports. The litany was ſung by the biſhops of Litchfield and Coventry and Norwich, and the ſermon preached by dr. William Talbot, biſhop of Oxford, father to the late lord chancellor. The biſhop obſerves in his ſermon, 'queen Anne not only paſſed laws for the further eſtabliſhment of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, but by her arms, and thoſe of her allies, had, in human appearance, placed it almoſt out of danger, having, in eight campaigns, ſo glorious in the conduct, and ſo aſtoniſhing in the ſucceſs of them, as not to be paralleled in hiſtory, ſo far reduced the only power, that could interrupt it, that there was little more wanting to have compleated our ſecurity. But whether it was to correct us for ſome ſins, whereby we had provoked God to anger, or to chaſtiſe our confidence, which, it may be, we placed too much in the arm of fleſh; or to convince us, that his providence, which alone began, ſhould alone have the glory of finiſhing this great work; he was pleaſed to ſuffer us to fall into a condition, from which nothing elſe could have relieved us. Our enemy, who had ſet up a pretender to this throne, raiſed from a ſtate of aſking peace, to a condition of giving peace and princes too to Europe; our allies, ſome divided from us, others miſerably diſjointed; and we ourſelves not only unguarded, but wretchedly broken into parties and factions at home. The friends of the pretender thought theſe circumſtances ſo encouraging, that they openly avowed his title in writing and diſcourſe, and his agents as boldly inliſted ſoldiers to aſſert it with the ſword. And he muſt have been very ſanguine, who, in this view of things, could have thought, that the pretender, whom our queen's repeated inſtances could not remove from a ſituation, which her parliament thought too near us, would not, upon her majeſty's demiſe, have brought a foreign army to join his friends here, before the proteſtant heir, who was at a much greater diſtance, could have arrived, to have maintained his own juſt right, or defended his faithful ſubjects. But when that day was come, that was to put a period to that royal life, on the continuance of which alone, this threatening danger ſeemed ſuſpended; then was God pleaſed to mix ſo much mercy with the ſtroke, as by his providence to order it, that the unſettled poſture of affairs abroad would not permit the pretender's foreign friends to ſend any forces to encourage an inſurrection; and the unreadineſs of his ſurprized abettors here would not permit them to appear in ſuch a manner, as to invite an invaſion; but our king was peaceably proclaimed, to the univerſal joy of his people.'

[t] Dr Sacheverell was at that time at Sutton, near Birmingham in Warwickſhire, where he preached on the ſunday before the coronation; and above two hundred of the Birmingham people came ſo far to attend upon him, and the conſequence of it appeared a day or two after. Several of the principal inhabitants of Birmingham having reſolved in a ſuitable manner to expreſs their joy on the day of the coronation, an entertainment was prepared for them at the Caſtle-Tavern. When the night came on, a tumultuous rabble got together, broke the windows of the houſe, and forced the company to remove: all the cry was Sacheverell for ever; and down with the whigs. If any one in the ſtreet cried, God bleſs king George, he was in danger of his life. At Briſtol alſo the mob broke the windows of mr. Whiting, the under-ſheriff, who had offended them by proſecuting one guilty of perjury. They did the ſame at mr. Jeffreys's houſe: but fell in a ſtill more furious manner on mr. Stevens's, which they aſſaulted, entered, and plundered. One mr. Thomas, who perſuaded them to withdraw, was murdered; and ſeveral gentlemen inſulted, hurt, and abuſed. At Chippenham in Wiltſhire, the rabble armed with guns, piſtols, and clubs, marched with beat of drum, and abuſed the juſtices, gentlemen, and freemen, who were ſhewing their loyalty in ſolemnizing the king's coronation. The ſame kind of diſorders were committed at Norwich and Reading.

[u] The memorial was as follows:

'The under-written plenipotentiary, miniſter of the king of Great-Britain, has orders from the king his maſter to repreſent to your majeſty, that, having heard the report of the commiſſaries and engineers ſent to view the ſtate of the fortifications and port of Dunkirk, his majeſty is very much ſurprized to hear, that notwithſtanding the inſtances and repreſentations made on the part of Great-Britain, to preſs the execution of the 9th article of the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, the ſaid port is ſo little filled up, that there can ſtill to this day as great ſhips as formerly paſs by the old canal up to the hornwork of the town. So long as that canal remains, it cannot be denied, that there is ſtill at Dunkirk a port of one thouſand rods long, and conſequently able to receive many hundred ſhips. The words of the treaty are, portus compleatur (that the haven ſhall be filled up) aggeres aut moles diruantur (that the dykes which form the canal and the moles be deſtroyed). We appeal even to your majeſty's engineers, if the haven be filled up, and if the dykes be deſtroyed? The king his maſter is very much perſuaded that your majeſty, being fully informed of this fact, will give your ſtrict orders, that at laſt that ſhall be accompliſhed, which, according to the words of the treaty, ought to have been done above a year ago. The ſame miniſter has orders to repreſent to your majeſty, that the ſurprize of the king his maſter has been ſtill greater, when he was told, that notwithſtanding the ſaid 9th article, which ſays expreſly, ne dicta munimenta, portus, moles, aut aggeres denuò unquam reficiantur (that the ſaid fortifications, port, or the dykes of Dunkirk ſhall never be rebuilt) that they are actually at work in making a new port, much larger than the old canal; which, as well as the old haven, goes up to the town of Dunkirk; and that the foundation of a ſluice much greater than the former, which ſerved to clean the old haven, is laid.

It cannot be imagined, that your majeſty will make uſe of the word dicta, which is in that article, to maintain, that, ſince the ſame canal is not reſtored, the ſame materials are not made uſe of, and the ſame baſtions and courtains are not rebuilt, that your majeſty is at liberty to raiſe new works, and to make a new port better than the former. The bona fides, which ought to reign in all treaties, and which will be religiouſly obſerved by the king my maſter, will not admit of ſuch a ſuppoſition.

When ſhips can go into Dunkirk by the old canal, which is in the north, or by the new, which is on the weſt, Dunkirk will, in the ſame manner, be a port, and be equally incommodious and dangerous to the commerce of Great-Britain.

In either of theſe two caſes the treaty will be equally violated. The king of Great-Britain is reſolved, on his ſide, religiouſly to obſerve the treaty of Utrecht, and to maintain with your majeſty an amity ſo ſincere, that he deſires, above all things, to prevent all incidents, that may diſturb that good intelligence. And, as the hopes of ſeeing the entire execution of that 9th article has been to Great-Britain the principle motive for accepting the peace of Utrecht, he has ordered the under-written miniſter to make the moſt preſſing inſtances with your majeſty, that you will pleaſe to give order for the filling up the ſaid canals, &c.

[v] His anſwer was as follows;

Purſuant to the 9th article of the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, the harbour of Dunkirk, between the town and the citadel, is entirely filled up. Nevertheleſs, men are ſtill at work, carrying into it the earth, that is produced by the demoliſhing of the cavaliers of the citadel.

The words Portus compleatur, can never be applied to the old canal, which is very different from the harbour; neither, to be ſure, would the king ever have engaged entirely to deſtroy a canal of a thouſand toiſes in length.

That would have been a work immoderately great, for the only time, men could have been employed therein, would have been at low water.

On the other hand, it would have been altogether needleſs, for the ſea will ſoon carry away what remains of the dykes, that were made.

Theſe dykes and jetters ſink daily, and are waſhed away by the ſea. But it having been lately demanded, on the part of the king of Great-Britain, that, to the end they might be carried off the ſooner, the king would cauſe four coupures or outlets to be made therein, his majeſty gave orders accordingly? and, by means of this new work, the old canal will be ſo choaked up in a few days, that it will be leve with the ſtrand, and no ſhipping will be able to enter it. Nay, they will not be able to go up thither, even at high water, but as they do at all other places along the coaſt, quite from Newport to Calais.

The king has ſeveral times complained of the dilatorineſs on the part of England, in point of executing the 9th article of the peace of Utrecht. It ought not therefore to be charged upon his majeſty. This is notorious.

It is well known too, that the fortifications of Dunkirk are demoliſhed; and that the harbour is ſo filled up, that it would be impoſſible for the king to make it good again, did not his majeſty deſign (as he fully does) punctually to perform the treaty.

He has already ſeveral times anſwered the complaints, which for ſome time paſt he has received, about the work he was forced to make, to hinder a great track of land from being laid under water, which the ruining of the ſluices of Dunkirk would have effected. However he is willing to repeat once more the reaſons he has given for that proceeding.

The waters of the canals of Furnes, La Mocre, Wynoxberg, and Bourbourg, were diſcharged by the ſluices of Dunkirk. This outlet was neceſſary to keep the caſtellanies of Bourbourg, Wynoxberg, and even ſome part of that of Furnes, from being overflowed, which, without it, they muſt infallibly have been. But the king, having promiſed utterly to deſtroy the ſluices of Dunkirk, gave his orders for executing the treaty; and, in the mean while, cauſed a repreſentation to be made to the queen of Great-Britain of the inconveniencies, that would enſue upon this rigorous performance; deſiring, at the ſame time, that ſhe would ſuffer one of the three ſluices, which were to be deſtroyed, to ſtand as it did.

This was denied by that princes. So it became neceſſary to find out ſome other method for diſcharging the water of theſe four canals.

The Engliſh commiſſaries and engineers were witneſſes of the ſeveral projects, that were formed for that purpoſe. They were full well acquainted with the deſign of the canal of Mardyke, and were of opinion, it was impoſſible to be executed. It is true, it was a very expenſive one; and the king would gladly have ſaved that money, had it pleaſed the queen of Great-Britain to leave one of the ſluices of Dunkirk ſtanding, only to diſcharge the waters from the country. But, upon her refuſal, it was abſolutely neceſſary to open this canal, to receive the waters of the four other canals.

Theſe four old canals are navigable, and are together forty-eight toiſes broad; and conſequently the new canal muſt needs have a ſufficient breadth to receive all theſe waters, and diſcharge them into the ſea.

The ſluice alſo muſt neceſſarily be proportionable to the breadth of the canal, and to the quantity of waters it retains? for the point is, to hinder the tides getting into the country, and to keep in the waters of the four old canals at high tides.

The ſeaſon preſſed the finiſhing of that work; and, if the ſame had not been carried on with great diligence, what would not men have apprehended from the diſorder, which the autumn-rains might occaſion?

Theſe are the motives, which obliged the king to cauſe the new canal of Mardyke to be opened, and to haſten the accompliſhment of that work. His majeſty has no deſign, no intention to make a new harbour at Mardyke, the earl of Stair ſent in his room. who proſecuted the affair with great vigour. The court of France would not yield, and declared in expreſs terms, Mardyke was not Dunkirk, and that the treaty of Utrecht did not deprive the king of the natural right of a ſovereign, to make what works he ſhould judge proper for the preſervation of his ſubjects. The truth is, the plenipotentiaries of Great-Britain had been too negligent in the affair. In ſtipulating the demolition of Dunkirk, it was doubtleſs their intention that another and better harbour ſhould not be made on that coaſt but then it ſhould have been ſo expreſſed; otherwiſe, in ſuch articles all advantages will be taken by thoſe on whom they are impoſed.

The ſame fault had been committed in the treaty of commerce with Spain. The advantages obtained in the body of the treaty were all explained away by the ſeperate articles, and the reſult was, that the Britiſh goods and merchandizes paid ſeven per cent. more than had been paid before. King George applied himſelf alſo to redreſs this grievance. Spain in imitation of France, adhered to the letter of the treaty, and would not agree that the terms ſhould be explained according to the intentions of the queen's plenipotentiaries; and it was not till after much time and pains that this, and ſeveral other difficulties relating to the aſſiento contract, were adjuſted. So true is it, that a good negotiator is as rare and as uſeful as a great general.

The barrier treaty, which was negotiating at Antwerp between the emperor and the ſtates-general, and which was of great conſequence to the trade of England, drew alſo the attention of the new king. General Cadogan, intimate friend of the duke of Marlborough, was ſent as plenipotentiary.

In the mean time, the behaviour of the jacobite and high-church party occaſioned the publiſhing a proclamation for ſuppreſſing of riots and tumults. Seditious libels were with great induſtry diſperſed, jealouſies infuſed into weak minds, and the groundleſs clamour of the danger of the church revived [w]. In November, the dukes of Marlborough, Shrewſbury, and Argyle, the earls of Nottingham and Sunderland, the lord Townſhend, the marquis de Monteleone the Spaniſh embaſſador, the count de Noſtiz, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, received, by the mail from France, copies of a paper, printed in Engliſh, French and Latin, ſigned at the top James R, and dated at Plombiers the 20th of Auguſt, 1714, N. S. being a kind of manifeſto or declaration of the pretender, aſſerting his claim to the crown of Great-Britain. He ſays, 'The revolution ruined the Engliſh monarchy, laid the foundation of a republican government, and devolved the ſovereign power on the people.' He obſerves, 'That when he found the treaty of peace was upon the point of being concluded, without any regard to him, he publiſhed, in April 1712, his proteſtation againſt it.' He then gives the reaſon of his ſitting ſtill for ſome time paſt, in theſe remarkable words: 'Yet, contrary to our expectations, upon the death of the princeſs our Siſter (of whoſe good intentions towards us, we could not for ſome time paſt well doubt: And this was the reaſon we then ſat ſtill, expecting the good effects thereof; which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death) we found that our people, inſtead of taking this favourable opportunity of retrieving the honour and true intereſt of their country, by doing us and themſelves juſtice, had immediately proclaimed for their king a foreign prince, to our prejudice, contrary to the fundamental and inconteſtible laws of hereditary right, which their pretended acts of ſettlement can never abrogate [x].' The perſons, who received this decla-to build a place there. He has already declared, and once more repeats it, that he is only willing to ſave a country, which would be laid under water, if this was not diſcharged into the ſea.

For the reſt, the king has given good proofs of his Bona Fides in the execution of the treaties. His majeſty has given particular marks thereof to the king of Great-Britain. He ſees, with pleaſure, the aſſurances which that prince renews to him, that he will religiouſly obſerve the treaty of Utrecht, and maintain a ſincere friendſhip with him.

In caſe of thoſe happy diſpoſitions, all incidents capable of diſturbing this good underſtanding, may be eaſily avoided.

The king does not doubt but it will be perfect, when all ſuſpicions on both ſides ſhall be ſincerely cleared up, and all ſuppoſitions vaniſhed. It is for this end that his majeſty is pleaſed to repeat the reaſons contained in this memorial, and that he again orders the ſieur d'Ibbeville, his envoy extraordinary, to give an account thereof to the king of Great-Britain. The 2d of November, 1714.

[w] Some of theſe libels were, Stand faſt to the church! Where are our biſhops now? The religion of king George. No preſbyterian government. The ſtate gameſter: or, The church of England's ſorrowful lamentation. Eſop in Mourning. The duke of Ormond's Vindication. The lord Bolingbroke's Vindication. No Lord Protector: or, The duke of Marlborough's deſign defeated. The hawkers that cried theſe libels, and ſung ſeditious ballads, were, by ſir William Humphreys, lord-mayor of London, taken up and ſent to the houſe of correction, for which he had the king's approbation, in a letter from lord Townſhend, ſecretary of ſtate.

[x] Matthew Tindal, doctor of laws, publiſhed at London, 1715, in 8vo, remarks on this declaration, of both which it will be proper to give the following abſtract:

The pretender maintains, That the Revolution ruined the Engliſh Monarchy, laid the foundation of a republican government, and devolved the ſovereign power, on the people; and that we are expoſed to arbitrary power, and become a prey to foreigners. This the pretender out of his hereditary courage and goodneſs, would have prevented, and therefore ſays, We parted from our ordinary reſidence, to put ourſelves at the head of ſuch of our loyal ſubjects, as were diſpoſed to defend us and themſelves from all foreign invation.

In anſwer to this, the author of the remarks obſerves, that the European monarchies, founded on the Gothic conſtitutions, were all at firſt elective.

The pretender, after having put the nation in mind how he invaded Scotland, and boaſted, that the miſcarriage of that expedition could not be imputed to him, ſays, 'That, when he found the treaty of peace was upon the point of being concluded, without any reguard to him, he publiſhed, April 1712, his proteſtation againſt it.'

Though the princes of Europe have ſo often rejected all his pretenſions, yet he thinks to cajole them, by ſaying, 'We hope, that all chriſtian princes and potentates, who are now in peace together, will reflect on the dangerous example here given them, and the formidable effects they are threatened with from ſuch an united force, as that of England and Hanover; and that they will ſeriouſly conſider, whether the exorbitant power, that now accrues to the houſe of Brunſwick, be conſiſtent with the balance of power they have been fighting for all this laſt war; and therefore we call on them for their aſſiſtance for the recovery of our dominions, which their intereſt, as well as honour, engages them to grant us, as far as they are able.' Can any thing be more impolitic, than for this popiſh pretender, in the ſame declaration, in which he expects, that the proteſtants of Great-Britain ſhould rely on his word for the preſervation of their religion, to call on all chriſtian princes to have no regard to their moſt ſolemn engagements, but to violate their faith, by breaking that peace, which they have ſo lately concluded? And nothing can be more ridiculous than his ſuppoſing, that France, as well as the reſt of Europe, are in ſuch immediate danger, by the exorbitant power of the houſe of Brunſwick, that they are obliged, if they will preſerve themſelves, to fall upon it with their united forces. The pretender, even while he is perſuading the people of Great-Britain to take up arms againſt the king, cannot forbear telling them, that, by the union of England and Hanover, they have got that balance of power, which all Europe has been ſo long fighting for; and repreſenting their taking up arms as a moſt deſperate attempt, by reaſon of that moſt exorbitant power, which, he ſays, is now in the houſe of Brunſwick; and, as if he had a mind wholy to intimidate them, he affirms that the elector is a powerful prince, ſupported by a good army of his own people, beſides the aſſiſtance, which a neighbouring ſtate (and he might have added the king of Pruſſia) is obliged to grant him upon demand; and many thouſand of aliens refuged in England theſe thirty years paſt, who, having their dependance wholly upon him, will be ready to ſtand by him upon all occaſions.

The pretender labours to draw his loving ſubjects, as he calls them, into a civil war, by ſhewing them the miſchief of ſuch wars, and therefore ſays, What can our ſubjects expect but endleſs wars and diviſions, from ſubverting ſo ſacred and fundamental a conſtitution as that of hereditary right? Which has ſtill prevailed againſt all uſurpations, how ſucceſsful, and how long time ſoever continued; the government finding ſtill no reſt, till it returned again to its true center. But if what he calls ſucceſsful uſurpations have continued for a long time, and we may add, a much longer than his hereditary right, How can that be the true center of government? Eſpecially, if, of the nineteen ſucceſſive kings ſince the conqueſt, thirteen of them did not come to the crown by proximity of blood; and there have been more of thoſe few, that did ſo ſucceed, depoſed, than of the many, who did not, who were all of them not only looked on to have a competent authority during their lives but their proceedings (upon the validity of which moſt of the titles to our eſtates depend) have been eſteemed good in all ages.

He threatens us with other popiſh pretenders, and ſays, How can our ſubjects be ignorant of the juſt pretence of ſo many other princes, that are before the houſe of Hanover, whoſe right, after us, will be as undoubted as our own; who want neither will nor power to aſſert it in their turns; and to entail a perpetual war upon our kingdoms, with a civil waſte in our own bowels, which their diviſions will make unavoidable? The late miniſtry muſt have reduced the nation to a low condition indeed, if they dare not ſtand by their own ſettlement of the crown, leſt it offend the popiſh houſe of Savoy, or any other popiſh pretender. But have not all theſe popiſh pretenders owned the right and title, not only of king William and queen Mary, but of his majeſty, and conſequently acknowledged, that the parliament has a right to diſpoſe of the crown?

The pretender ſays, We ſhall not think ourſelves anſwerable before God and man for the pernicious conſequences, which this new uſurpation of our crowns may draw on our ſubjects and all chriſtendom. Which is in effect ſaying, we have regard to nothing but our own private intereſt; and, for the ſake of that, we care not what pernicious conſequences we draw on theſe nations and all chriſtendom. If it be lawful, after the ſucceſſion of four kings or queens, on pretence of a former indefeaſable title, to diſturb the peace of a kingdom; it muſt be lawful (ſince no time can deſtroy ſuch a title) after the ſucceſſion of four thouſand; and then what kingdom can promiſe itſelf the leaſt peace or quiet?

Though the pretender threatens a fatal war, yet he would have thoſe, whom he calls his loving ſubjects, think he has an unſpeakable kindneſs for them; and, therefore tells them, it is not our intereſt alone we are concerned for; our natural and unalterable love for our people is ſuch, that as we could not ſee without grief their blood and treaſure laviſhed in the laſt war, in oppoſition to our undoubted right; ſo we cannot now with leſs ſorrow ſee them expoſed to be ſubjected to an arbitrary power, and become a prey to foreigners. If indeed he had a natural and unalterable love for theſe nations, he would, ſince he ſlipped the opportunity of making uſe of the good intentions of the princeſs his ſiſter, rather quit his pretentions, than diſturb the peace, and involve them in endleſs wars: or, if he had any ſenſe of honour, he would never endeavour to impoſe upon them by notorious falſhoods; and what can be more ſo, than this part of his declaration, which, though dated before the king came over, or had done any one act of government, yet moſt maliciouſly charges him with deſigning to enſlave the people, and make them become a prey to foreigners, who, by the laws, of which our king has ſhewn himſelf a moſt religious obſerver, are excluded from all places of truſt and profit?

Did not the pretender, bred up in the politics of France, think every one, that could enſlave a nation, would certainly do it, he would not talk at this rate, nor think to terrify us by ſaying, the elector is a powerful prince, and abſolute in his own country, where he has never met with the leaſt contra-ration, thought it their duty to deliver it into the hands of the ſecretaries of ſtate; upon which the marquis de Lamberti, the duke of Lorain's miniſter, was forbid the court, becauſe ſuch a thing could not be done at Plombieres without the countenance of his maſter; and the following meſſage was delivered to him by the lord Townſhend:' That it was inconſiſtent with his majeſty's honour and dignity, as well as intereſt, to admit to audience the miniſter of a prince, who, at that very juncture, gave ſhelter and protection to a pretender, and an open enemy to his dominions.' The marquis tranſmitted this meſſage to the duke of Lorrain, left London; and went to Oxford, to wait his maſter's anſwer. This gave juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion, that the pretender and his friends had formed a party in that univerſity to advance his intereſt, as it afterwards appeared. The marquis having received the duke of Lorrain's anſwer, dated at Nancy, December the 6th, 1714, communicated it to the lord Townſhend. It was to this effect:

'I believe, ſir, you no ways doubt of my being extremely ſurprized to hear by the courrier, which came from you, that, when you applied to my lord Townſhend to obtain an audience, that miniſter made anſwer, that, ſince the chevalier de St George remained ſtill in my dominions, the king thought fit to forbid you the court: In caſe his majeſty ſhould continue in this diſagreeable reſolution with reſpect to me, I muſt ſubmit to his pleaſure, and you have nothing elſe to do, but to return hither as ſoon as you are able. However, you are firſt to apply to the duke of Marlborough, and to the king's miniſters, deſiring them to lay before his majeſty the unfortunate ſituation I am in, if, after having been ſo ready to let the king know the part I take in his acceſſion to the crown of England, and after having been one of the firſt to make my compliments, and ſhow my zeal on this occaſion, all Europe ſhould be acquainted. that his majeſty had ſome reaſon to be diſſatisfied with me, That I cannot conceive, whence this ſhould proceed, ſince, as to the chevalier de St George, the world knows by what means he came into this country: That every one is informed of the ſituation of my territories, which are ſurrounded and cut through on all ſides by France: That it is known how I had no ſhare in his coming into my country: That I neither invited him to come hither, nor could I force him to go away: That lately, upon the death of queen Anne, I knew nothing of his leaving Bar, till twelve hours after he was gone from thence; and I knew nothing of his return to Bar, till after he was come back, as a traveller, that goes backwards and forwards in a open country, and intermixed with other territories as mine is: As to the maneſeſto or declaration dated at Plombiers, which the chevalier de St George had got printed, I knew nothing more of it, than that he gave me one after it had been publiſhed; but that really I am much concerned to hear from you, that it has been reported, that the ſame manifeſtoes have been ſpread abroad by you, or thoſe of your retinue. I own to you, that I am extremely concerned at this, and that in ſome ſort it ſeems to be a deſign to make me uneaſy, to give out, that either I or my ſervants meddled in ſuch an affair.

Theſe are the reaſons which I have to offer, and which I would have you deſire thoſe gentlemen to lay before the king, in hopes they will convince his majeſty of my moſt reſpectful adherence to him, and that his majeſty will be pleaſed to admit you to an audience.

But if, contrary to my expectation, the king will not grant you an audience, you are to come away, having deſired the miniſters to let the king know the concern I am under; and that I hope his majeſty will pleaſe to accept of my good intentions, and the early care I took to ſhew him the inviolable zeal I have for him.'

When the marquis communicated this letter to the king's miniſters, he, at the ſame time, expreſſed his maſter's 'deep concern at this unlucky affair, which obſtructed the friendſhip and good underſtanding the had ſo early ſought with his Britannic majeſty for whom he ever entertained the higheſt eſteem and veneration.' And he likewiſe expreſſed his own particular concern, and the great mortification it was to him, to be admitted to a court, which he had ſo great a deſire to be made known to. He was anſwered, 'That it was not out of any prejudice to his perſon, nor even to the perſon of his maſter, for whom the king had a great eſteem. But that, as affairs ſtood at preſent, though his excuſes were, in ſome meaſure, allowable, yet his majeſty was the beſt judge of what was conſiſtent with his own honour and dignity; and, as his majeſty was likewiſe ſenſible of the duke's readineſs to ſeek and cultivate a friendſhip with his majeſty, ſo the king wiſhed, that the cauſes which obſtructed the ſame at preſent, might be ſpeedily removed.' The marquis finding by this anſwer, that his majeſty inſiſted on the removal of the pretender from the dominions of Lorrain, before he would admit him to an audience, took his leave of the lord Townſhend, and, on the 13th of December, ſet out on his return home. In anſwer to that part of the duke of Lorrain's letter, wherein he alledges, 'That his territories are ſurrounded and cut through on all ſides by France; and that he neither invited the chevalier de St George thither, nor could force him to go away;' a paper tranſmitted hither by mr. Prior, and delivered to him by the marquis de Torcy, was ſaid to be produced to the marquis, whereby his moſt chriſtian majeſty declared, 'That he neither did, nor would, in any manner concern himſelf with the chevalier de St George;' which declaration was directly contrary to the duke of Lorrain's allegation.

When the pretender's declaration came firſt into England and was publiſhed in the foreign prints, the jacobites and tories inſiſted upon its being a contrivance of the whigs, to reflect on the memory of the queen, and to fix an odium upon the high church party, becauſe in that declaration he ſaid 'That for ſome time paſt, he could not well doubt of his ſiſter's good intentions towards him. But they were much confounded by the duke of Lorrains letter, which owned the declaration to be genuine, and that the pretender himſelf had given him one of them.

About the latter end of November, the king advanced the ſalaries of the chief-juſtice of the king's-bench, and of the exchequer, to the ſame ſum, as was allowed the chief-juſtice of the common-pleas, being 2000l. a year, and the ſalaries of the other nine judges to 1500l. a year.

About this time addreſſes were ſet on foot in Scotland, for diſſolving the union; and it was alſo propoſed, that diction from his own ſubjects. It is ſo far true, the elector never met with the leaſt contradiction from his ſubjects; but then it is as true, he never required any thing of them, but what was for their good; and ſubjects will never think a prince's power too great, when he is always contriving how to employ it moſt for their ſervice; and thinks his greateſt happineſs conſiſts in making them happy.

The pretender ſays, The elector is a foreigner, ignorant of our laws, cuſtoms, manners, and language; but for himſelf, We are the only born Engliſhman left of the royal family. Though the pretender was born in England, yet ſince he was carried into France in his cradle, this could not qualify him to underſtand our laws, cuſtoms, and manners; and he, who ſeems to underſtand nothing but the ridiculous trumperies of the Romiſh church, muſt be an utter ſtranger to the laws and cuſtoms of the nation; nor can he have a notion of any conſtitution, but one as arbitrary as that of France. Merely being born in a country cannot create in a man the leaſt kindneſs for it: the place indeed, where one is bred (uſually the ſame where he is born) and the perſons with whom he is bred, generally prejudice a man in their favour; and conſequently the pretender ought to be accounted by the people of Great-Britain as much a Frenchman, as if he had been born there: and 'tis all grimace and French banter to talk of his natural and unalterable love for the Engliſh.

Though he would have it thought, that king George's being a foreigner renders him unfit to govern this nation; yet he will not allow it to be any manner of objection to himſelf, or any other pretender of the popiſh line.

Was not king James II. born and bred among us, and under the greateſt obligations to the church of England, and bound by the moſt ſolemn engagements to preſerve our laws and religion? And yet that did not hinder him, as ſoon as he got into the throne, from attempting the ſubverſion of both. And did not we owe the preſervation of both to a foreigner?

Was not the pretender, though born here, educated among the enemies of our country and religion? Who, from the firſt moment he was capable of underſtanding any thing, could hear nothing from thoſe diſappointed perſons about him, but reviling the Engliſh nation. And has not this early averſion been daily improved by the French, who bear an hereditary hatred to the Engliſh? And can it be thought that the Italian princeſs, who calls herſelf his mother, as well as the prieſts and jeſuits (to whoſe intereſt he is entirely devoted) have not uſed all arts to create in him a mortal averſion to thoſe they call heretics and rebels.

Add to this, that his moroſe, ſullen, and revengeful temper makes him apt to receive the worſt impreſſions: ſo that nature, education, religion, (not to mention want of underſtanding) have rendered him, of all mankind, the moſt unfit, notwithſtanding his being born here, to govern proteſtants and free-born Britons.

Could we ſuppoſe the pretender, though a papiſt, no perſecutor of proteſtants, and with his French education no hater of the Engliſh; yet, as he muſt be wholly in the power of thoſe foreign popiſh forces, with which he deſigns to invade the dominions of ſo powerful a king; ſo he could not hinder them, if they got the better, from treating the people with the utmoſt cruelty. All churchmen then, whether high or low, would, as at the Iriſh maſſacre, be involved in one common ruin. Then all that the nation is worth, could not ſatisfy the demands of France, for what they had expended in behalf of the abdicated family. 'In a word, concludes the author of the remarkes, ſince there is no ſcene of cruelty, that even the reading of the popiſh maſſacres can ſuggeſt, but what the proteſtants of theſe nations had reaſon to apprehend, if faithleſs and blood-thirſty men had prevailed; ought we not every day of our lives, to pour out our thanks to the father of all mercies, for having ſo wonderfully brought about this great deliverance; and to take the utmoſt care to avoid all ſuch diviſions, as may encourage any more attempts from this popiſh pretender? Which nothing can more effectually hinder, than the chuſing ſuch men to repreſent us in the next parliament, who no ways abetted the execrable deſigns of the late miniſtry, but are truly and heartily in the intereſt of their king and country. This, and this only, can put us upon a happy and laſting eſtabliſhment.'

none ſhould be elected members of parliament there, but ſuch as would promiſe to uſe their endeavours for that purpoſe. Many well-meaning people ſeemed at firſt inclinable to fall in with thoſe meaſures; but when they found, that the jacobites were the moſt zealous in puſhing this affair, in order to raiſe confuſion and diſcord betwixt the two nations, they refuſed to concur, and referred their grievances by the union to be conſidered, when the nation ſhould be better ſettled. But there was a quite different ſpirit among the high-church party in England, who excited riots and tumults in many parts of the kingdom, to which they had been encouraged by the pretender's declaration. To prevent theſe diſorders, a proclamation was publiſhed on the 6th of December.

Religious diſputes were at this time alſo at a great height. Dr. Samuel Clarke having, before the queen's death, publiſhed his ſcripture-doctrine of the trinity, the lower-houſe of convocation had complained of his book, as containing aſſertions contrary to the catholic faith. This complaint being laid before the biſhops, they deſired an extract to be made of ſuch paſſages, as gave greateſt offence, and were moſt liable to cenſure. Accordingly, the lower houſe made an extract, and having ſent it up to the biſhops, dr. Clarke, whilſt it was under conſideration, wrote a reply to it, which was preſented to ſome of the biſhops, but was not laid before the houſe. After this, there appeared in allmoſt the whole upper-houſe a great diſpoſition to prevent diſſenſions and diviſions, by coming to a temper in this matter, and dr. Clarke was prevailed upon to lay before them a paper, in order to put an end to the affair. [z] Dr. Clarke being apprehenſive, that, if his paper ſhould be publiſhed ſeperately without a true account of the preceding and following circumſtances, it might be liable to be miſunderſtood in ſeveral particulars, cauſed, three days after, an explanation to be delivered to the biſhop of London. [a] The ſame day, the upper houſe came to a reſolution to enter the paper and explanation in the acts of the houſe, to communicate the ſame to the lower-houſe, and to proceed no farther upon the extract. But the lower-houſe were of a different opinion, and reſolved, that the paper was no recantation of his heretical aſſertions, nor did give ſuch ſatisfaction for the great ſcandal occaſioned by his writings, as ought to put a ſtop to any further examination.

Thus ſtood the affair at the queen's death, and, the diſputes about the trinity increaſing, on the 11th of December were publiſhed directions to the archbiſhops and biſhops, for the preſerving unity in the church, and purity of the chriſtian faith, concerning the holy trinity; and alſo for preſerving the peace and quiet of the ſtate.

Theſe directions were:

I. That no preacher whatſoever, in his ſermon or lecture, do preſume to deliver any other doctrine concerning the bleſſed trinity, than what is contained in the holy ſcriptures, and is agreeable to the three creeds, and the thirty-nine articles of religion.

II. That, in the explication of this doctrine, they carefully avoid all new terms, and confine themſelves to ſuch ways of expreſſion, as have been commonly uſed in the church.

III. That care be taken, in this matter, eſpecially to obſerve the fifty-third canon of this church, which forbids public oppoſition between preachers, becauſe (as that canon expreſſes it) there groweth thereby much offence and diſquietneſs unto the people: and that, above all things, they abſtain from bitter invectives and ſcurrilous language againſt all perſons whatſoever.

IV. That none of the clergy, in their ſermons and lectures, preſume to intermeddle in any affairs of ſtate or government, or the conſtitution of the realm, ſave only on ſuch ſpecial feaſts and faſts, as are or ſhall be appointed by public authority; and then no farther than the occaſion of ſuch days ſhall ſtrictly require. Provided always, that nothing in this direction ſhall be underſtood to diſcharge any perſon from preaching in defence of the regal ſupremacy eſtabliſhed by law, as often, and in ſuch manner, as the firſt canon of the church doth require.

V. That the foregoing directions be alſo obſerved by thoſe, who write any thing concerning the ſaid ſubjects.

VI. Whereas alſo we are credibly informed, that it is the manner of ſome in every dioceſe, before their ſermon, either to uſe a collect and the Lord's prayer, or the Lord's prayer only (which the fifty-fifth canon preſcribes as the concluſion of the prayer, and not the whole prayer) or at leaſt to leave out our titles, by the ſaid canon required to be declared and recognized: we do further direct, that you require your clergy, in their prayer before ſermon, that they do keep ſtrictly to the form in the ſaid canon contained, or to the full effect thereof.

VII. And whereas we alſo underſtand, that divers perſons, who are not of the clergy, have of late preſumed, not only to talk and to diſpute againſt the chriſtian faith concerning the bleſſed trinity, but alſo to write and publiſh books and pamphlets againſt the ſame, and induſtriouſly ſpread them through the kingdom, contrary to the known y Sir Peter King, recorder of London, was appointed chief-juſtice of the Common-pleas, in the room of the Lord Trevor; and Samuel Dodd was made chief-baron of the exchequer; ſir James Montague, a baron of that court, in the room of ſerjeant Baniſter; Serjeant Prat, a judge of the king's-bench, in the room of ſir Thomas Powis; Nicholas Lechmere, ſolicitor-general, in the room of ſir Robert Raymond; Spencer Cowper, attorney-general; and John Forteſcue Aland, ſolicitor-general; to his Royal Highneſs. About the ſame time it was made public, that the ducheſs of Bolton, the ducheſs of St. Alban's, the ducheſs of Montague. the counteſs of Dorſet, the counteſs of Berkeley, and the lady Cowper, were made ladies of the bed-chamber to the princeſs of Wales; and mrs. Selwyn, mrs. Pollexſen, mrs. Howard, and mrs. Clayton, bed-chamber women to her Royal Highneſs.

It was generally reported and believed, that Robert Price, one of the Barons of the exchequer, would be laid aſide upon the demiſe of the queen, he having always ſhewn an indifference with reſpect to the proteſtant ſucceſſion: but he was continued, and it was thought he owed his continuance to his readineſs to go down to Briſtol, with ſir Littleton Powis and Robert Tracy, two other judges, and to try thoſe, who had been guilty of the riot there, on the day of the king's coronation. The cry of theſe rioters was Sacheverel and Ormond: damn all foreign governments. On the 27th of November, ſeven of the chief rioters were brought to their trials for aſſaulting and plundering mr. Stephens's houſe, and murdering mr. Thomas. During the trials mr. Hart, a tobacco-merchant, who had been made a juſtice of the peace by the laſt miniſtry, behaved himſelf with ſuch inſolence, that he was ordered to quit the bench. Another reflected ſo ſcandalouſly upon the grand-jury, that he was ordered to the bar, and bound over to anſwer for his offence. Six of the priſoners were found guilty of the riot; and one of them, upon whom mr. Stephens's wearing apparel had been found, was convicted of felony and burglary to the value of ten-pence only. All the criminals convicted of the riot were fined each twenty nobles only, to be impriſoned three months, and give ſecurity for twelve months for their good behaviour. As the proofs againſt them were plain, a houſe being plundered, and a man murdered by them, it was thought ſurprizing, that not one of them ſuffered capitally for theſe crimes. The grand-jury for the city and county of Briſtol drew up an addreſs to the king, in which they 'returned their unfeigned thanks for his great goodneſs in ſending a ſpecial commiſſion to that city, not only to protect his good ſubjects, but to prevent for the future ſuch riotous aſſemblies, which for theſe four laſt years that before happy place had been expoſed to. And they were ſorry to ſay, that theſe aſſemblies had been encouraged and abetted by ſome of their own fellow-citizens, who had from time to time notoriouſly eſpouſed their cauſe, and, as far as in them lay, had ſcreened them from juſtice.'

z The paper was as follows:

1. My opinion is, that the Son of God was eternally begotten by the eternal incomprehenſible power and will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit was likewiſe eternally derived from the Father, by or through the Son, according to the eternal incomprehenſible power and will of the Father.

2. Before my book, intitled, The ſcripture doctrine, &c. was publiſhed, I did indeed preach two or three ſermons upon this ſubject; but, ſince the book was publiſhed, I have never preached upon this ſubject: and (becauſe I think it not fair to propoſe particular opinions, where there is not liberty of anſwering) I am willing to promiſe (as indeed I intended) not to preach any more upon this ſubject.

3. I do not intend to write any more concerning the doctrine of the Trinity. But if I ſhall fail herein, and write any thing hereafter, upon this ſubject, contrary to the doctrine of the church of England, I do hereby willingly ſubmit myſelf to any ſuch cenſure, as my ſuperiors ſhall think fit to paſs upon me.

4. And whereas it has been confidently reported, that the Athanaſian creed, and the third and fourth petitions in the litany, have been omitted in my church by my direction, I do hereby declare, that the third and fourth petitions in the litany have never been omitted at all, as far as I know; and that the Athanaſian creed was never omitted at eleven o'clock prayers, but at early prayers only, for brevity ſake, at the diſcretion of the curate, and not by my appointment.

5. As to my private converſation, I am not conſcious to myſelf, that I have given any juſt occaſion for thoſe reports which have been ſpread concerning me, with relation to this controverſy.

I am ſorry that what I ſincerely intended for the honour and glory of God, and ſo to explain this great myſtery, as to avoid the hereſies in both extreams, ſhould have given any offence to this ſynod, and particularly to my lords the biſhops. I hope my behaviour for the time to come, with relation hereunto, will be ſuch, as to prevent any future complaints againſt me.

a The explanation was thus:

Whereas the paper laid before your lordſhips, on Friday laſt, was, through haſte and want of time, not drawn up with ſufficient exactneſs; ſome things therein being not ſo fully expreſſed as they might have been; and others expreſſed in ſuch a manner as may be liable to be miſunderſtood, as not explaining with ſufficient clearneſs and diſtinctneſs my whole thoughts to your lordſhips upon the ſubject therein contained; and whereas, if my preſent meaning in any part of it, ſhould now be miſunderſtood, I may hereafter be thought not to have fully and ſincerely opened myſelf to your lordſhips; I do humbly and with all ſubmiſſion beg leave to take this immediate opportunity of repreſenting to your lordſhips, that I think myſelf indiſpenſably obliged, in conſcience, to lay before your lordſhips the following explanations of the aforeſaid paper, viz.

That whereas I declared in that paper my opinion to be, that 'the Son was eternally begotten, by the eternal incomprehenſible power and will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit, &c.' I did not mean thereby to retract any thing I had written; but to declare that the opinion ſet forth at large in the book intitled, The ſcripture-doctrine of the Trinity, and in the defences of it, is, that the Son was eternally begotten, by the eternal incomprehenſible power and will, &c. Which words (the eternal incomprehenſible power and will of the Father) I deſire may be ſo underſtood, as to ſignify that God the Father alone is, and is to be honoured as being the original of all, himſelf without original.

In the Possession of Mr. Clarke

Published as the Act directs April 7. 1786.

none ſhould be elected members of parliament there, but ſuch as would promiſe to uſe their endeavours for that purpoſe. Many well-meaning people ſeemed at firſt inclinable to fall in with thoſe meaſures; but when they found, that the jacobites were the moſt zealous in puſhing this affair, in order to raiſe confuſion and diſcord betwixt the two nations, they refuſed to concur, and referred their grievances by the union to be conſidered, when the nation ſhould be better ſettled. But there was a quite different ſpirit among the high-church party in England, who excited riots and tumults in many parts of the kingdom, to which they had been encouraged by the pretender's declaration. To prevent theſe diſorders, a proclamation was publiſhed on the 6th of December.

Religious diſputes were at this time alſo at a great height. Dr. Samuel Clarke having, before the queen's death, publiſhed his ſcripture-doctrine of the trinity, the lower-houſe of convocation had complained of his book, as containing aſſertions contrary to the catholic faith. This complaint being laid before the biſhops, they deſired an extract to be made of ſuch paſſages, as gave greateſt offence, and were moſt liable to cenſure. Accordingly, the lower houſe made an extract, and having ſent it up to the biſhops, dr. Clarke, whilſt it was under conſideration, wrote a reply to it, which was preſented to ſome of the biſhops, but was not laid before the houſe. After this, there appeared in allmoſt the whole upper-houſe a great diſpoſition to prevent diſſenſions and diviſions, by coming to a temper in this matter, and dr. Clarke was prevailed upon to lay before them a paper, in order to put an end to the affair. [a] The explanation was thus:

Whereas the paper laid before your lordſhips, on Friday laſt, was, through haſte and want of time, not drawn up with ſufficient exactneſs; ſome things therein being not ſo fully expreſſed as they might have been; and others expreſſed in ſuch a manner as may be liable to be miſunderſtood, as not explaining with ſufficient clearneſs and diſtinctneſs my whole thoughts to your lordſhips upon the ſubject therein contained; and whereas, if my preſent meaning in any part of it, ſhould now be miſunderſtood, I may hereafter be thought not to have fully and ſincerely opened myſelf to your lordſhips; I do humbly and with all ſubmiſſion beg leave to take this immediate opportunity of repreſenting to your lordſhips, that I think myſelf indiſpenſably obliged, in conſcience, to lay before your lordſhips the following explanations of the aforeſaid paper, viz.

That whereas I declared in that paper my opinion to be, that 'the Son was eternally begotten, by the eternal incomprehenſible power and will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit, &c.' I did not mean thereby to retract any thing I had written; but to declare that the opinion ſet forth at large in the book intitled, The ſcripture-doctrine of the Trinity, and in the defences of it, is, that the Son was eternally begotten, by the eternal incomprehenſible power and will, &c. Which words. laws in that behalf made and enacted, and particularly to one act of parliament made in the ninth year of king William the third, intitled, An act for the more effectual ſuppreſſing of blaſphemy and profaneneſs; we taking all the matters abovementioned into our royal and ſerious conſideration, and being deſirous to do what in us lies, to put a ſtop to theſe diſorders, do ſtrictly charge and command you, together with all other means ſuitable to your holy profeſſion, to make uſe of your authority according to law, for the ſuppreſſing and reſtraining of all ſuch exorbitant practices. And, for your aſſiſtance, we will give charge to our judges, and all other civil officers, to do their duty herein, in executing the ſaid act, and all other laws, againſt all ſuch perſons as ſhall, by theſe means, give occaſion of ſcandal, diſcord, and diſturbance in our church and kingdom.

[1714-15,] On the 5th of January, a proclamation was publiſhed for diſſolving the parliament, and, on the 15th, another was iſſued for calling a new one, in the following terms:

'It having pleaſed Almighty God, by moſt remarkable ſteps of his providence, to bring us ſafe to the crown of this kingdom, notwithſtanding the deſigns of evil men, who ſhewed themſelves diſaffected to our ſucceſſion, and who have ſince, with the utmoſt degree of malice, miſrepreſented our firm reſolutions and uniform endeavours to preſerve and defend our moſt excellent conſtitution both in church and ſtate, and attempted, by many falſe ſuggeſtions, to render us ſuſpected to our people; we cannot omit, on this occaſion of firſt ſummoning our parliament of Great-Britain, in juſtice to ourſelves, and that the miſcarriages of others may not be imputed to us, at a time, when falſe impreſſions may do the greateſt and irrecoverable hurt, before they can be cleared up, to ſignify to our whole kingdom, that we were very much concerned, at our acceſſion to the crown, to find the public affairs of our kingdom under the greateſt difficulties, as well in reſpect of our trade, and interruption of our navigation, as of the great debts of our nation, which, we were ſurprized to obſerve, had been very much increaſed ſince the concluſion of the laſt war. We do not therefore doubt, that, if the enſuing elections ſhould be made by our loving ſubctjes with that ſafety and freedom, which by law they are intitled to, and we are firmly reſolved to maintain to them, they will ſend up to parliament the fitteſt perſons to redreſs the preſent diſorders, and to provide for the peace and happineſs of our kingdom, and the eaſe of our people for the future; and therein will have a particular regard to ſuch as ſhewed a firmneſs to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, when it was in danger.'

The late miniſtry foreſeeing, they ſhould be called to an account for their conduct, had frequent conſultations how to avoid the ſtorm; and ſoon after a traiterous libel was publiſhed, under the title of, Engliſh advice to the freeholders of Great-Britain. Nothing could be more full of malice and falſhood againſt the king's perſon and family; as well as againſt the whigs in general, and the preſent miniſtry; and it was artfully contrived to raiſe diſcontents among the people againſt the government, and to poſſeſs them with an opinion, that the church was in danger by his majeſty's adminiſtration. It was carefully diſperſed through the country, and great numbers of them were intercepted in the city of Exeter. [b] Upon which the government iſſued out a proclamation, promiſing a reward of one thouſand pounds for the diſcovery of the author of the libel, and five hundred pounds for the diſcovery of the printer: but to no purpoſe.

The ſame day, the miſmanagement of the late miniſtry with regard to Chelſea College, was made public by order of the privy-council; upon which, the government of that hoſpital was changed, and brigadier Stanwick appointed governor. [d]

The earl of Strafford being returned to England, an order of council was iſſued, that the lord Townſhend and mr. Stanhope, ſecretaries of ſtate, ſhould go to him, and demand the original inſtructions and orders, and all letters he had received from the late miniſtry, or any foreign prince or miniſter, and copies of all inſtructions, of which he had not the originals; and alſo of all letters writ by him to any perſon whatſoever, relating to his negotiations, from the time of his firſt being at the Hague. The earl delivered them two trunks, which, he ſaid, contained what they deſired; and orders were ſent to ſeal up his papers, that were on ſhip-board, or at the cuſtom-houſe.

On the 20th of January, the day appointed for a public thankſgiving for the king's peaceable acceſſion to the throne, his majeſty and their royal highneſſes went to St Paul's, where an elegant ſermon was preached by dr. Richard Willis, biſhop of Glouceſter.

Mr Prior, who had been deep in the meaſures of the late miniſtry, was now ordered home, the earl of Stair being arrived at Paris, where he had ſeveral conferences with the marquis de Torcy, and preſented memorials about the canal and intended port at Mardyke, and ſignified to the court of France, that he had orders not to take any character upon him, till he had a clear and poſitive anſwer to the memorials.

The elections for the new parliament were now carrying on with great warmth by both parties, but with moſt ſucceſs on the ſide of the whigs. The electors in ſome counties and cities drew up inſtructions for their repreſentatives, the moſt remarkable of which were thoſe of the city of London, wherein was this paſſage: 'We deſire and expect, that you will inquire by whoſe counſel it was, that, after God had bleſſed the arms of her late majeſty, and her allies, with a train of unparalleled ſucceſſes, ſhe was prevailed upon, contrary to the grand alliance, and her repeated promiſes from the throne to both houſes, to ſend to, or receive managers from France, to treat ſeparately of a peace, without the knowledge and conſent of our allies.'

In Scotland the tories publiſhed a circular letter, to diſſuade the Scotch lords from voting for the whigs, or, as they pretended, for the ſixteen peers, of whom the duke of Argyle had brought a liſt from England. But this letter made little impreſſion, and the following peers were elected, the dukes of Roxburgh and Montroſe; the marquiſſes of Tweedale, Lothian, and Annadale; the earls of Sutherland, Rothes, Buchan, Loudon, Orkney, Stair, Bute, Deloraine, and Ilay; and the lords Roſs and Belhaven. All theſe lords were diſtinguiſhed by their attachment to the revolution, and had contributed to the union to the utmoſt of their power. The marquis of Annandale, of the ancient family of Johnſton, had openly declared for king William, though, ſhortly after indeed, he declared for king James. But he repented of that ſtep, and for his faithful ſervices was employed in places of truſt. The marquis of Lothian was a great promoter of the revolution. He had in the reign of king James II. married a daughter of the earl of Argyle, beheaded by that prince, purely out of a principle of honour, and to ſhew his regard for a family unjuſtly perſecuted, a certain proof that he would not favour the deſigns of the pretender. The earl of Sutherland, known at the time of the revolution by the name of the lord Strathnaver, was conſtantly attached to king William, and had followed him in all his campaigns in Flanders, at the head of a regiment. He had appeared very zealous for the privileges of the Scots; and did not think the union detrimental thereto.

And whereas I declared, I did not intend to write any more concerning the doctrine of the Trinity: but if I ſhould fail herein, and write any thing hereafter, &c. I deſire it may be ſo underſtood, as not to preclude myſelf in point of conſcience from a liberty of making any inoffenſive corrections in my former books, if they ſhall come to another edition: or from vindicating myſelf from any miſrepreſentations or aſperſions, which may poſſibly hereafter be caſt upon me on the occaſion of this controverſy; but only to ſignify, that I have no preſent intention of writing any new book; and that, if hereafter I ſhall at any time write any thing which your lordſhips ſhall judge worthy of cenſure, I ſhall readily ſubmit to ſuch cenſure.

[b] They were directed to ſir John Coriton, ſir Nicholas Morrice, Jonathan Elforn, Philip Raſhleigh, Francis Seabell, John Williams, eſquires; mr. Granville Piper, mr. Welchman, mr. William Cary, mr. Prowſe, mr. Philips, mr. Tonkin, mr. Cannock Kendall, in Cornwall, and to the reverend mr. Shute, the reverend mr. Hughes, the reverend mr. Collper, and the reverend mr. Bedford, in the ſame county, and to the mayor of Weſtloe.

[c] This libel was ſuppoſed to be penned by biſhop Atterbury. The ſubſtance of it may be reduced to theſe five heads:

I. A declamation againſt the pretended arts and indirect practices of the government, in order to procure a whig houſe of commons to be elected.

II. Preſſing motives to the tories, to whom the author gives the title of the church, to exert themſelves at this critical juncture to get churchmen choſen into the enſuing parliament.

III. Articles of impeachment, or a large charge againſt the whigs, for intended criminal deſigns againſt the conſtitution in church and ſtate; ſuch as aboliſhing epiſcopacy; repealing the limitations in the act of ſettlement, and an act for triennial parliaments; renewing the war; ſetting up a ſtanding army; and inſlaving the nation.

IV. Great ſophiſtry and declamation to prove, that the church was in danger.

V. Invectives againſt the duke of Marlborough and his family; calumnies againſt the miniſtry, and all the nobility and gentry in the king's intereſt; with treaſonable reflections on his majeſty and his royal family.

This libel was anſwered in a pamphlet, intitled, Treaſon detected; and another, called, A reply to a traiterous libel, intitled, Engliſh advice, &c.

[d] A new commiſſion paſſed the great ſeal, appointing commiſſioners for the government of that hoſpital, the lord-preſident of the privy-council, the captain-general of his majeſty's forces, the firſt lord commiſſioner of the treaſury, the two principal ſecretaries of ſtate for the time being, lieutenant-general Earle, lieutenant-general Lumley, the ſecretary of war, the comptroller of the army, and the governor and lieutenant-governor of the ſaid hoſpital for the time being.

The earl of Stair was already employed by the new government as well as the dukes of Montroſe and Roxburgh, and their attachment to it was not doubted. The only one that ſeemed exceptionable in the liſt was the lord Belhaven. No man had ſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the union, and, had his advice been followed, it would never have taken place. But, finding at length all oppoſition in vain, he gave way to the torrent. There was one thing capable of making amends for all his non-compliances, and that was his ſingly oppoſing, in the preſence of the duke of York, the act of ſucceſſion paſſed by a majority of voices in favour of that prince. He was alſo a good ſpeaker, which will be always a great recommendation.

The elections for the houſe of commons were made with almoſt equal ſucceſs, and the whigs had the majority. Thus all ſeemed quiet in Scotland, though a ſtorm was then gathering there, which broke out in leſs than a year. The deſign was conducted more regularly than in England, and was better concealed. It was begun with endeavours for a remonſtrance againſt the union; and the advice of the moſt famous lawyers was aſked upon it, who declared the act of union contained ſeveral nullities, and to be very defective. The oppoſite party, to prevent a remonſtrance ſo diſagreeable to the court, were forced to conſent there ſhould be no addreſs of congratulation: and that, preſented by the kirk, had ſuffered great debates about the manner, in which king William was mentioned, and had paſſed with much difficulty. The Highlanders were ſilent, and declared not themſelves. It was only known, that they were making proviſion of powder and ball. [e]

On the 17th of March, the parliament of Great-Britain met at Weſtminſter; and, the commons proceeding to the choice of a ſpeaker, the earl of Hertford, ſon to the duke of Somerſet, ſaid, 'That, according to his majeſty's pleaſure, they were immediately to proceed to the choice of a ſpeaker: that, in order thereto, they ought, in the firſt place, to conſider, that ſcarce any parliament ever met in a more critical juncture than this, when matters of the higheſt importance were like to be laid before the houſe: that therefore they ought to fix their choice upon a perſon of known parts and abilities; and that, in his opinion, none was ever better qualified for ſo great an office than mr. Spencer Compton.' He was ſeconded by the lord Finch, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Nottingham, who inlarged on mr. Compton's abilities; upon which mr. Compton ſtood up, and modeſtly excuſed himſelf; but, his excuſes not being admitted, he was led to the chair by the earl of Hertford and lord Finch. The king approved him on the 21ſt of March, and then declared from the throne, he had ordered the lord-chancellor to ſhew the cauſes of calling this parliament. Accordingly, the lord-chancellor read to both houſes the following ſpeech, delivered into his hands by the king:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'This being the firſt opportunity, that I have had of meeting my people in parliament, ſince it pleaſed Almighty God of his good providence to call me to the throne of my anceſtors, I moſt gladly make uſe of it, to thank my faithful and loving ſubjects for that zeal and firmneſs, that hath been ſhewn in defence of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, againſt all the open and ſecret practices, that have been uſed to defeat it: and I ſhall never forget the obligations I have to thoſe, who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves upon this occaſion.

It were to be wiſhed, that the unparalleled ſucceſſes of a war, which was ſo wiſely and cheerfully ſupported by this nation, in order to procure a good peace, had been attended with a ſuitable concluſion. But it is with concern I muſt tell you, that ſome conditions, even of this peace, eſſential to the ſecurity and trade of Great-Britain, are not yet duly executed; and the performance of the whole may be looked upon as precarious, until we ſhall have formed defenſive alliances to guaranty the preſent treaties.

The pretender, who ſtill reſides in Lorrain, threatens to diſturb us, and boaſts of the aſſiſtance, which he ſtill expects here to repair his former diſappointments.

A great part of our trade is rendered impracticable. This, if not retrieved, muſt deſtroy our manufactures, and ruin our navigation.

The public debts are very great, and ſurpriſingly increaſed, even ſince the fatal ceſſation of arms. My firſt care was to prevent a further increaſe of thoſe debts, by paying off forthwith a great number of ſhips, which had been kept in pay, when there was no occaſion for continuing ſuch an expence.

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

I rely upon you for ſuch ſupplies, as the preſent circumſtances of our affairs require for this year's ſervice, and for the ſupport of the public faith. The eſtimates ſhall be laid before you, that you may conſider of them; and what you ſhall judge neceſſary for your ſafety, I ſhall think ſufficient for mine.

I doubt not but you will concur with me in opinion, that nothing can contribute more to the ſupport of the credit of the nation, than a ſtrict obſervance of all parliamentary engagements.

The branches of the revenue, formerly granted for the ſupport of the civil government, are ſo far incumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds, which remain and have been granted to me, will fall much ſhort of what was at firſt deſigned, for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown. And ſince it is my happineſs (as I am confident you think it yours) to ſee a prince of Wales, who may, in due time, ſucceed me on the throne, and to ſee him bleſſed with many children, the beſt and moſt valuable pledges of our care and concern for your poſterity; this muſt occaſion an expence, to which the nation has not of many years been accuſtomed, but ſuch, as ſurely no man will grudge; and therefore I do not doubt, but you will think of it with that affection, which I have reaſon to hope from you.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The eyes of all Europe are upon you, waiting the iſſue of this firſt ſeſſion. Let no unhappy diviſions of parties here at home divert you from purſuing the common intereſt of your country. Let no wicked inſinuations diſquiet the minds of my ſubjects. The eſtabliſhed conſtitution in church and ſtate ſhall be the rule of my government; the happineſs, eaſe, and proſperity of my people ſhall be the chief care of my life. Thoſe, who aſſiſt me in carrying on theſe meaſures, I ſhall always eſteem my beſt friends; and I doubt not but that I ſhall be able, with your aſſiſtance, to diſappoint the deſigns of thoſe, who would deprive me of that bleſſing, which I moſt value, the affection of my people.'

The addreſſes of the two houſes were agreeable to the king's ſpeech. The lords thanked him for his very affectionate expreſſions towards his people, for his aſſurances, that the eſtabliſhed conſtitution in church and ſtate ſhould be the rule of his government, and for his juſt concern for their not having obtained all the advantages promiſed by ſo ſucceſsful a war; they expreſſed their wonder, that the pretender ſhould be yet permitted to reſide ſo near his dominions; and owning themſelves ſenſible, that trade in its moſt valuable branches was rendered impracticable, they added;

'Theſe and other difficulties your majeſty hath met with on your acceſſion to the crown (and which we muſt obſerve, in juſtice to your wiſdom and foreſight, would have been prevented, had your opinion been followed) we muſt confeſs, are very great and diſcouraging. However, we do not doubt, but that your majeſty, aſſiſted by this parliament, zealous for your government, and the ſafety and honour of their country, may be able to take ſuch further meaſures, as will ſecure what is due to us by treaties, eaſe our debts, preſerve the public credit, reſtore our trade, extinguiſh the very hopes of the pretender, and recover the reputation of this kingdom in foreign parts; the loſs of which, we hope to convince the world by our actions, is by no means to be imputed to the nation in general.'

When the addreſs was read, there aroſe a great debate in the houſe, chiefly about the laſt expreſſions in the foregoing paragraph. The lord Trevor, the lord Bolingbroke, the duke of Bucks, the duke of Shrewſbury, the earl of Angleſey, the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of London and Briſtol, and ſome other peers, excepted againſt that clauſe, alledging, among other things, 'That it was injurious to the late queen's memory, and claſhed with that part of his majeſty's ſpeech, which recommended to both houſes the avoiding the unhappy diviſions of parties: and that it was unjuſt to condemn perſons, without firſt hearing them.' The lord Bolingbroke in particular was very warm on the ſubject, and moved that the words recover, &c. might be ſoftened into, maintain the reputation of this kingdom; and that the reſt of the paragraph might be left out. The earl of Strafford likewiſe excepted againſt the clauſe, becauſe it would expoſe the honour of the nation abroad, which he was ſure had ſuffered no diminution during his negotiations. Theſe and other arguments, urged on that ſide, were anſwered by the marquis of Wharton, the lord-chancelor, the earl of Nottingham, the earl of Aylesford, the duke of Devonſhire, and other peers. The lord chancellor particularly confuted the objections raiſed by the lord Bolingbroke, ſaying, 'That the addreſs did not condemn any particular perſons, but only the peace in general, becauſe they felt the ill conſequences of it. That they, who adviſed and made ſuch a peace, deſerved to be cenſured; but that the words in the addreſs being general, no private perſon was affected by them: and that the alteration of the word recover into that of maintain would ſignify no more towards the juſtification of the guilty, than the word recover towards the condemnation of the innocent.' After this debate, the addreſs was approved and preſented by the lords in a body to the king.

[e] The king having given orders for a new commiſſion of camberlainry, as they call it in Scotland, the following perſons were appointed to be of it: 'The marquis of Tweedale, lord preſident; the earls of Sutherland, Buchan, Marchmont, Bute, and Deloraine; mr. Charles Areſkine, mr. Kennedy, and mr. Hadden. Some time after Charles Warrender, of Lochend, provoſt of Edinburgh, was created a baronet.

The commons in their addreſs, after having thanked the king for his aſſurances, and expreſſed their ſenſe of the reproach brought upon the nation by the unſuitable concluſion of the war, added: 'We are under aſtoniſhment to find, that any conditions of the late peace, eſſential to the ſecurity and trade of Great Britain, ſhould not yet be duly executed; and that care was not taken to form ſuch alliances, as might have rendered that peace not precarious. And as no care ſhall be wanting in your loyal commons to inquire into theſe fatal miſcarriages; ſo we intirely rely on your majeſty's wiſdom, to enter into ſuch Alliances, as you ſhall judge neceſſary to preſerve the peace of Europe; and we faithfully promiſe to inable your majeſty to make good all ſuch engagements.

It is with juſt reſentment we obſerve, that the pretender ſtill reſides in Lorrain; and that he has the preſumption, by declarations from thence, to ſtir up your majeſty's ſubjects to rebellion. But that, which raiſes the utmoſt indignation of your commons, is, that it appears therein, that his hopes were built upon the meaſures, that had been taken for ſome time paſt in Great-Britain. It ſhall be our buſineſs to trace out thoſe meaſures, whereon he placed his hopes, and to bring the authors of them to condign puniſhment. Then, taking notice of the ill ſituation of trade, they concluded with aſſuring, that they would inable his majeſty to ſupport the dignity of the crown, and make an honourable proviſion for the royal family.'

When this addreſs was reported to the houſe, it occaſioned a warm debate, like that in the houſe of lords on the ſame occaſion. Mr Bromley, ſir William Wyndham, general Roſs, mr. Cæſar, mr. Ward, ſir William Whitelocke, mr. Hungerford, mr. Shippen, and ſome others, raiſed ſeveral objections to it, which were anſwered by mr. Robert Walpole, mr. ſecretary Stanhope, ſir Gilbert Heathcote, and mr. Pulteney. General Roſs inſiſted, 'That the condemning the peace, and cenſuring the late miniſters, was a reflection on the late queen, whoſe act the peace was; and that the reflecting on the late queen could not be agreeable to his preſent majeſty.' He was anſwered by mr. Walpole and mr. Stanhope, 'That nothing was further from their intention than to aſperſe the late queen: That they rather deſigned to vindicate her memory, by expoſing and puniſhing thoſe evil counſellors, who had deluded her into pernicious meaſures; whereas the oppoſite party endeavoured to ſcreen and juſtify thoſe counſellors, by throwing on the memory of her late majeſty all the odium of their evil counſels.' As to what was objected, that the cenſuring the late miniſters without a hearing, and condemning the peace without examining into particulars, was unjuſt and unprecedented, it was anſwered, 'That they muſt diſtinguiſh between cenſuring miniſters, and condemning the peace in general, and condemning particular perſons. That they might, in equity and juſtice, do the firſt, becauſe the whole nation is ſenſible, that their honour and true intereſt were given up by the late peace. That, in due time, they would call them to an account, who made and adviſed ſuch a peace; but God forbid they ſhould ever condemn any perſon unheard.' On this occaſion mr. Stanhope took notice of a report induſtriouſly ſpread about, 'That the preſent miniſters never deſigned to call the late managers to an account, but only to cenſure them in general terms. But he aſſured the houſe, that notwithſtanding all the endeavours, which had been uſed to prevent a diſcovery of the late miſmanagements, by conveying away ſeveral papers from the ſecretaries offices; yet the government had ſufficient evidence left, to prove the late miniſtry the moſt corrupt, that ever ſat at the helm. That thoſe matters would ſoon be laid before the houſe; and that it would appear, that a certain Engliſh general had acted in concert with, if not received orders from marſhal de Villars.' Sir William Wyndham endeavoured to prove, that the peace had been very beneficial to this kingdom, and offered to produce a liſt of goods, by which it appeared, that the cuſtoms had increaſed near 100,000 l. per annum. But he was anſwered by ſir Gilbert Heathcote, who readily owned, that ſir William might indeed produce a liſt of vaſt imports from France; but defied him to ſhew, that our exports thither, particulary of our woollen manufactures, had increaſed ſince the peace. He added, that imports, being only our conſumption, rather prove our loſs than our gain; and that the nation gets only by exports, which keep up our manufactures, employ our poor, and bring in returns of money. Sir William Wyndham made no reply; but ſir William Whitelocke having ſuggeſted, that the whigs deſigned to involve the nation in a new war, and lay ſix ſhillings in the pound, he was anſwered by mr. Walpole, that none in the preſent miniſtry were for a war, if the ſame could any ways be avoided; and that he doubted not but two ſhillings in the pound would be ſufficient towards this year's ſervice.

After theſe and ſome other ſpeeches, the addreſs was carried by a majority of two hundred and forty-four votes againſt a hundred and thirty-eight.

The conduct of the earl of Oxford and the lord Bolingbroke, the two chiefs of the late miniſtry, was at this time very remarkable. The earl ſkulked about ſometimes in town, and ſometimes in the country; affecting to appear very unconcerned, profeſſing his innocence, and boaſting what great things he had done for ſecuring the Hanover ſucceſſion. The other affected to act a more open part, appeared every where, and ſpoke in parliament with ſuch boldneſs, as if he had not the leaſt ſenſe of guilt, or dread of puniſhment. This was ſaid to be owing to the advice of the lord Trevor, who repreſented to him, 'how much their cauſe would ſuffer, if he, whoſe chief intereſt it was to ſupport it to the laſt, ſhould meanly throw it up, by abſenting himſelf. He aſſured him, no hold could be taken of his perſon till he was impeached; which he could not be, till the papers relating to the part of the adminiſtration, in which he was concerned, were examined.' However, it was obſerved, that the earl of Oxford ſold out all the ſtock he had in his own name in the South-Sea Company; and the lord Bolingbroke's heart began to fail him, as ſoon as he heard, that mr. Prior was landed at Dover, and had promiſed to reveal all he knew; which however he did not make good, though he was favourably received by the king, to whom he was introduced by the earl of Dorſet; and, the ſame day, was entertained at dinner by the lord Townſhend, together with the duke of Roxburgh, mr. ſecretary Stanhope, the earl of Dorſet, and the lord Lumley. That evening the lord Bolingbroke, who had the night before appeared at the play-houſe in Drury-Lane, and beſpoke another play for the next night, and ſubſcribed to a new Opera, that was to be acted ſome time after, went off to Dover, in diſguiſe, as a ſervant to La Vigne, one of the French king's meſſengers; and there William Morgan, who had been a captain in major-general Holt's regiment of Marines, hired a veſſel and carried him over to Calais, where the governor attended him in a coach, and carried him to his houſe, as appeared by Morgan's examination. The next day after it was publicly known, that he was gone to France, there was handed about in writing, and afterwards in print, the following letter, ſaid to be writ by him.

'My Lord, Dover, March 27

'I left the town ſo abruptly, that I had not time to take leave of you, or any of my friends. You will excuſe me, when you know, that I had certain and repeated informations from ſome, who are in the ſecret of affairs, that a reſolution was taken by thoſe, who have power to execute it, to purſue me to the ſcaffold. My blood was to have been the cement of a new alliance; nor could my innocence be any ſecurity, after it had been once demanded from abroad, and reſolved on at home, that it was neceſſary to cut me off. Had their been the leaſt reaſon to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been already prejudged, unheard by the two houſes of parliament, I ſhould not have declined the ſtricteſt examination. I challenge the moſt inveterate of my enemies to produce any one inſtance of criminal correſpondence, or the leaſt corruption in any part of the adminiſtration, in which I was concerned. If my zeal for the honour and dignity of my royal miſtreſs, and the true intereſt of my country, has any where tranſported me to let ſlip a warm or unguarded expreſſion. I hope the moſt favourable interpretation will be put upon it. It is a comfort, that will remain with me in all misfortunes, that I ſerved her majeſty faithfully and dutifully, in that eſpecially, which ſhe had moſt at heart, relieving her people from a bloody and expenſive war; and that I have always been too much an Engliſhman, to ſacrifice the intereſt of my country to any foreign ally whatſoever. And it is for this crime only, that I am now driven from thence.

You will hear more at large from me ſhortly.

Yours, &c.'

Some maintained this letter to be ſuppoſitious, but the generality of the tories owned it to be true. And it plainly appeared afterwards that he had juſt reaſons to leave the kingdom.

Notwithſtanding all the demonſtrations of the ill conduct of the late miniſtry, many of their friends ventured to juſtify them; of which the addreſs from the corporation of Wigan, in Lancaſhire, preſented by ſir Roger Bradſhaigh, was a remarkable inſtance; in which, after ſtiling the peace of Utrecht a general, ſolid and beneficial peace for the people they proceed thus: 'We take this opportunity to return our thanks for your majeſty's gracious aſſurance of protecting the epiſcopal church of England. This, with your being in full communion with that church, muſt make you dear to all the members thereof. We cannot but pleaſe ourſelves with the hopes, that, by the eſtabliſhment of your family amongſt us, the favourable conjuncture (which has been ſo long wiſhed for) is now come, to extend the epiſcopal government to the reformed churches abroad; which, as we believe, is the only foundation poſſible to unite the chriſtian world upon (if ever it muſt be ſo happy) ſo it muſt render you, above all things, glorious to the whole reformation, by being the happy inſtrument of ſo univerſal a benefit.'

About this time died dr. Gilbert Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, in the 72d year of his age. He was taken ill of a violent cold, which ſoon turned to a pleuretic fever. He was attended by his friend and relation dr. Cheyne. But the diſtemper growing to a height, which ſeemed to baffle all remedies, the aſſiſtance of ſir Hans Sloane and dr. Mead was called for, who quicly found his caſe deſperate. He bore the notice of the danger his life was in, with that calm reſignation which had always ſupported him under the ſevereſt trials. As he preſerved his ſenſes to the laſt, he employed the remnant of life in acts of devotion, and in giving the beſt advice to his family; of whom he took leave, in a manner, that ſhewed the utmoſt tenderneſs, accompanied with the firmeſt conſtancy of mind. And whilſt he was ſo little ſenſible of the terrors of death, as to embrace its approach with joy; he could not but expreſs a concern, for the grief he ſaw it cauſed in others. [f] He was ſucceeded by dr. Talbot, biſhop of Oxford, whoſe ſucceſſor was dr. John Potter, regius Profeſſor, the preſent archbiſhop of Canterbury.

What precaution ſoever had been taken about a third part of the commons were tories. This appeared as ſoon as the parliament met. Sir William Whitelock, member for the univerſity of Oxford, upon a motion in the houſe of commons, to take into conſideration the king's proclamation of the 15th of January, for calling a new parliament, made exceptions to the proclamation as unprecedented and unwarrantable; and was called upon by ſome members to explain himſelf; upon which he made an excuſe for what he had ſaid. Notwithſtanding this, ſir William Wyndham roſe up and ſaid, that the proclamation was not only unprecedented and unwarrantable, but even of dangerous conſequence to the very being of parliaments. He was called upon to juſtify his charge, which he declined, but ſaid, That, as he thought ſome expreſſions in the proclamation of dangerous conſequence, ſo he believed every member was free to ſpeak his thoughts.' He was anſwered by lord Finch, 'That not doubt every member had that liberty, freedom of ſpeech being one of their eſſential privileges. But that the houſe, at the ſame time, had both liberty and power to cenſure and puniſh ſuch members, as tranſgreſs the rules of decency, treſpaſs upon the reſpect due to the crown, and ſo abuſe the privilege of the houſe within doors, as to render it contemptible without.' ſir William being again called upon to explain himſelf, and ſtill refuſing, ſome members cried, the tower, the, tower. But mr. Robert Walpole ſpoke to this effect: , Mr ſpeaker, I am not for gratifying the deſire, which the member, who occaſions this debate, ſhews, of being ſent to the tower. It would make him too conſiderable. But as he is one, who ſets up for a warm champion of the late miniſtry, and was in all their ſecrets, I would have him be in the houſe, when we come to enquire into the conduct of his friends, both that he may have an opportunity to defend them, and be a witneſs of the fairneſs, with which we ſhall proceed againſt thoſe gentlemen; and that it may not be ſaid, that we take advantage againſt them.' After ſeveral other ſpeeches, which prolonged this debate above four hours, a motion was made, and the queſtion propoſed, 'That ſir William Wyndham, having reflected upon his majeſty's proclamation, and having refuſed to juſtify his charge, altho' often called upon ſo to do, is guilty of a great indignity to his majeſty, and of a breach of the privilege of this houſe.' This motion occaſioned a freſh debate. The houſe ſtill inſiſted, that ſir William ſhould juſtify his charge; and he as obſtinately declined to do it, ſaying, 'He was ready to undergo whatever a majority would inflict upon him.' At laſt, the queſtion being put, that he ſhould withdraw, it was carried in the affirmative by two hundred and eight voices againſt one hundred and twenty-nine: whereupon he withdrew, as did all the hundred and twenty-nine members, who had been for the negative. Then the houſe unanimouſly reſolved, that ſir William ſhould be reprimanded by the ſpeaker. This was done by the ſpeaker in the following manner:

'Sir William Wyndham,

I am to acquaint you, that the houſe has come to this reſolution, that you be reprimanded in your place by me.

You have preſumed to reflect on his majeſty's proclamation, and made an unwarrantable uſe of the freedom of ſpeech granted by his majeſty.

This houſe has made their moderation appear, and ſhewn their lenity, by laying the mildeſt cenſure your offence was capable of. I am ordered to reprimand you, and do reprimand you accordingly.'

To which ſir William replied:

SIR,

'I return you my thanks for what you have done by the duty of your office in ſo candid and ſo gentleman like a manner. As I am a member of this houſe, I very well know I muſt acquieſce in the determination of this houſe. But I am not conſcious of any indignity to his majeſty, or any breach of the privileges of this houſe; and therefore I have no thanks to give thoſe gentlemen, who, under pretence of lenity, have brought this cenſure upon me. [g]

Three days after the commons entered upon what they ſaid in their addreſs of thanks ſhould be their buſineſs, the inquiry into the conduct of the late miniſtry. General Stanhope preſented to the houſe, in fourteen volumes, all the papers relating to the late negotiations of peace and commerce, and to the ceſſation of arms, telling them, 'That

[f] His character was thus drawn by the marquis of Hallifax:

'Dr Burnet is like all men, who are above the ordinary level, ſeldom ſpoke of in a mean, he muſt either be railed at or admired; he has a ſwiftneſs of imagination, that no other man comes up to; and as our nature hardly allows us to have enough of any thing, without having too much, he cannot at all times ſo hold in his thoughts, but that at ſome time they may run away with him; as it is hard for a veſſel, that is brim-full, when in motion, not to run over; and therefore the variety of matter, that he ever carries about him, may throw out more, than an unkind critic would allow of. His firſt thoughts may ſometimes require more digeſtion, not from a defect in his judgment, but from the abundance of his fancy, which furniſhes too faſt for him. His friends love him too well, to ſee ſmall faults; or, if they do, think that his greater talents give him a privilege of ſtraying from the ſtrict rules of caution, and exempt him from the ordinary rules of cenſure. He produces ſo faſt, that what is well in his writings calls for admiration, and what is incorrect deſerves an excuſe; he may in ſome things require grains of allowance, which thoſe only can deny him, who are unknown or unjuſt to him. He is not quicer in diſcerning other men's faults, than he is in forgiving them; ſo ready, or rather glad to acknowledge his own, that from bleniſhes they become ornaments. All the repeated provocations of his indecent adverſaries have had no other effect, than the ſetting his good-nature in ſo much a better light; ſince his anger never yet went farther than to pity them. That heat, which in moſt other men raiſes ſharpneſs and ſatire, in him glows into warmth for his friends, and compaſſion for thoſe in want and miſery. As dull men have quick eyes, in diſcerning the ſmaller faults of thoſe, that nature has made ſuperior to them, they do not miſs one blot he makes; and, being beholden only to their barrenneſs for their diſcretion, they fall upon the errors, which ariſe out of his abundance; and by a miſtake, into which their malice betrays them, they think that, by finding a mote in his eye, they hide the beams, that are in their own. His quickneſs makes writing ſo eaſy a thing to him, that his ſpirits are neither waſted nor ſoured by it: the ſoil is not forced, every thing grows, and brings forth without pangs; which diſtinguiſhes as much what he does, from that which ſmells of the lamp, as a good palate will diſcern between fruit, which comes from a rich mould, and that which taſtes of the uncleanly pains, that have been beſtowed upon it. He makes many enemies, by ſetting an ill-natured example of living, which they are not inclined to follow. His indifference for preferment, his contempt not only of ſplendor, but of all unneceſſary plenty, his degrading himſelf into the loweſt and moſt painful duties of his calling; are ſuch unprelatical qualities, that, let him be ever ſo orthodox in other things, in theſe he muſt be a diſſenter. Virtues of ſuch a ſtamp are ſo many hereſies, in the opinion of thoſe divines, who have ſoftened the primitive injuctions, ſo as to make them ſuit better with the preſent frailty of mankind. No wonder then, if they are angry, ſince it is in their own defence, or that from a principle of ſelf-preſervation they ſhould endeavour to ſuppreſs a man, whoſe parts are a ſhame, and whoſe life is a ſcandal to them.'

[g] The tories took advantage of this moderation, and ſome of their writers ſecretly diſperſed, not many days after, a libel intitled, The honour and partiality of the houſe of commons, ſet forth in the caſe of ſir William Wyndham; containing bitter invectives againſt the well-affected. Annals.

nothing had been omitted, that might either anſwer the deſire they had expreſſed of being thoroughly informed of what had paſſed in thoſe important negotiations, or ſatisfy the whole world, that the preſent miniſtry acted with the utmoſt fairneſs and candour, and deſigned to take no manner of advantage over the late managers in the intended inquiries. That indeed the papers now laid before the houſe were only copies; but that the originals would be produced, if occaſion required: concluding, that, thoſe papers being too many and too voluminous to be peruſed and examined by all the members, he therefore moved, that they might be referred to a ſelect committee of twenty perſons, who ſhould digeſt the ſubſtance of them under proper heads, and report the ſame, with their obſervations to the houſe.'

The earl of Oxford being come to town the night before, his brother mr. Edward Harley, a member of the houſe, ſaid, 'That it was eaſy to ſee, that one of his neareſt relations was principally aimed at in theſe intended inquiries; but he might aſſure the houſe, that the ſaid perſon, notwithſtanding the various reports, which had been ſpread concerning him, would neither fly his country, nor conceal himſelf, but be forth-coming whenever he ſhould be called upon to juſtify his conduct. That he hoped he would be able, upon the ſevereſt trial, to make his innocence appear to all the world; but if he ſhould be ſo unhappy, as to have been guilty of the crimes, that were laid to his charge, he would think all his blood too ſmall a ſatisfaction to attone for them.' No body oppoſed mr. Stanhope's motion; only mr. Hungerford excepted againſt the number of twenty, and moved, that one more might be added; which being readily agreed to, it was reſolved, that the books and papers ſhould be referred to a committee of ſecrecy, the number to be twenty-one, who were choſen by ballot. [b]

The committee of ſecrecy met that evening, and choſe mr. Robert Walpole for their chairman. But, he being the next day taken ill, the committee choſe mr. Stanhope to ſupply his place; and, for diſpatch, ſubdivided themſelves into three committees, to each of which a certain number of books and papers were allotted. They made ſuch diſpatch, that their report was ready in two months.

On the 11th of April the earl of Oxford went to the parliament, and took his ſeat in the houſe of peers.

About this time the earl of Peterborough ſuddenly returned from his late travels to Italy and France, having met with lord Bolingbroke on the road between Paris and Calais; but it was ſaid, he did not ſpeak to him. The next day after his arrival, the earl appeared at St James's, but, whatever was the occaſion, two days after the lord Townſhend ſignified to him an order forbidding him the court.

On the 12th of April the marquis of Wharton, lord privy-ſeal, died at his houſe in Dover-Street, after an indiſpoſition of twelve days, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age. His name will be ever endeared to the friends of liberty, and to all who have a true concern for the proteſtant intereſt. Could the ſervices, which he performed for this nation and the preſent royal family be duly enumerated, they would appear beyond the beſt ſkill and abilities of any ſingle man. King Charles II. admitted him to great familiarities, and had him for a companion in many of his debauches, with a deſign to make him wholly his own. With regard to private vices, the ſucceſs was notorious; but, in what related to the public and court, he abſolutely diſappointed the king. He ſaw and heard the deſigns of a prince, to whoſe indolence and luxury the nation was obliged for its preſervation. This gave him a juſt contempt for ſuch a governor, and an abhorrence of all his views. King William was duly ſenſible of his ſervices before and at the revolution. In that reign he attained to no higher a ſtation than being comptroller of the houſhold: which muſt be aſcribed to the unhappy influence of thoſe, who hated him, and his royal maſter. He received however the utmoſt proofs of confidence and reſpect, and had the king's moſt intimate deſigns communicated to him. His probity and good affection in what concerned the government was ſo well aſſured, that it gave him great and conſtant intereſt. Many important meaſures were aſcribed to his ſecret advice. His great vigour and happy addreſs in ſerving the good cauſe, which he had ever in view, cannot fully be deſcribed. His labours were infinite with men of all ranks, and on all proper occaſions. He knew how to accommodate himſelf to every temper and inclination. What to others would have been great pain and trouble, afforded him great pleaſure and ſatisfaction. The merit of his conduct in the country, at court, and in the ſenate, was equally admirable. His enemies, who were only ſo on the account of his public zeal and uſefulneſs, have greatly aggravated his immoralities, and loaded him with crimes, from which he was wholly free. But, did he not learn the rudiments of vice under their favourite king Charles? Have not the private lives of moſt of their leaders been equally faulty? Are they excuſable for pretending to the name and noiſe of religion? lord Wharton's defects oblige us the more to admire his excellencies. In a life ſpent in a libertine manner, uſeful knowledge and learning were neglected. But an infinite fund of good ſenſe and great natural abilities ſupplied whatever was wanting. On every emergency he diſcovered what was proper, and was never at a loſs how to act. There was not only a readineſs, and propriety in his ſpeeches, but they were weighty and important. Nothing can be imagined more excellent than his ſkill and ſagacity in the management of a debate. In theſe public appearances he was greatly aſſiſted, by never engaging in the ſupport of what he did not believe to have truth and juſtice on its ſide. He lived to ſee the ſucceſs of a cauſe, for which he had laboured with zeal and integrity. But his enjoyment of the bleſſing of the ſucceſſion was very ſhort. A misfortune in his family is ſuppoſed to have produced the fatal effect. His ſon poſſeſſed ſome of his parts and abilities; but his very different uſe and application of them are well known.

On the 22d of April was the famous eclipſe of the ſun, to obſerve which the chevalier de Louville and monſieur de Montmaur, two French mathematicians, came from Paris, by the direction of the royal academy of ſciences, and were civilly entertained by the members of the royal ſociety, with whom they joined in making their obſervations.

The day following, being the anniverſary of the late queen's coronation, great diſorders were committed in the city of London, by the lower ſort of people; as was likewiſe done on the 29th of April, being the duke of Ormond's birth-day.

The general aſſembly of the church of Scotland met on the 4th of May; the earl of Rothes, lord high-admiral of that kingdom, being the king's commiſſioner; and the moſt remarkable of their acts was the confirming the ſuſpenſion of two miniſters, mr. James Maitland, of Innerkethie, and mr. John Maitland, of Fergus, his brother, who had been ſuſpended by the ſynod of Aberdeen, for not obſerving the 20th of January, the thankſgiving-day for his majeſty's acceſſion to the crowns, and not praying for king George by name. Theſe miniſters refuſing to anſwer any queſtions for removing the ſuſpicion, which they lay under, of diſaffection to the king, the aſſembly, by another vote, depoſed them from the office of the miniſtry, and appointed their churches to be declared vacant.

The aſſembly had a difficult part to act in this nice juncture; for ſeveral of the Preſbyterians had given injunctions to their deputies, to move for an addreſs to the king, that he would be pleaſed to uſe his endeavours, that the church of Scotland might be delivered from the hardſhips brought upon her in the late reign, by the unlimited toleration granted to the epiſcopal preachers, and the act for reſtoring lay patronages, which were both contrary to the treaty of union. They had alſo ſome difficulty to avoid remonſtrances againſt the union's being cotinued. But they managed their affairs with ſo much prudence, as to prevent any heats about thoſe matters in the aſſembly, and uſed their endeavours with ſucceſs to keep the honeſt part of the nation from puſhing thoſe things, ſo that they were willing to refer the redreſs of thoſe grievances to a more proper ſeaſon, when the king and the parliament might do it without interrupting the great affairs, which then lay before them. Thus the general aſſembly of the church of Scotland ended quietly, and another was appointed to meet the firſt Thurſday of May, 1716, according to cuſtom. This was a great mortification to the Jacobite party in both nations, who flattered themſelves with creating diviſions in the church of Scotland, by thoſe popular topics; but the Preſbyterians refuſed to give into their meaſures.

ſideration, ſeveral papers relating to former eſtabliſhments were read; and then the queſtion was offered, 'That it appears to this committee, that the ſum of 700,000 l. per ann. was ſettled upon king William during his life, for the ſupport of his houſhold, and other his neceſſary occaſions; and at the time of his demiſe, after the deduction of 3700 l. a week, which was applied to the public uſes, was the produce of the civil liſt revenues, that were continued and ſettled upon queen Anne, during her life.' Thoſe, who propoſed this queſtion, had two things principally in view; to vindicate the preſent miniſtry from the aſperſions caſt upon them, and induſtriouſly ſpread about, by the emiſſaries of the late managers, that the whigs deſigned to give the king a larger revenue than his predeceſſors had enjoyed: And to make good the branches of the civil liſt revenue, which had been alienated or abridged; ſo that the whole neat produce might amount to 700,000 l. per ann. The leading men among the tories being ſenſible of the firſt, and pretending to be ignorant of the conſequence of this preliminary queſtion, inſiſted a long while, 'That it was enſnaring. That what had been done by former parliaments, ought not to be a ſtanding rule for the ſubſequent: That, ſuppoſing the parliament had given king William a revenue of 700,000 l. per ann. for the civil liſt, they ought to conſider, that he was to pay out of it 50,000 l. per ann. to the late queen, then princeſs of Denmark; 15 or 20,000 l. per ann. for the late duke of Glocester; and 40,000 l. for the dowry of king James's queen. That, after the late queen's acceſſion to the throne, the parliament taking notice, that the produce of the civil liſt revenues exceeded what they had been given for, the ſum of 3700 l. per week (that is, 192,400 l. per annum) was taken out of them, and applied to other uſes; notwithſtanding which deduction, the late queen had honourably maintained her family, and ſupported the dignity of the crown; however, if the preſent revenues of the civil liſt were not ſufficient, they were ready to conſent to an addition.' It was anſwered, 'That the queſtion before them was founded upon facts, which, if denied, they were ready to prove by the records of the houſe.' But ſir William Wyndham ſtill urging, that the queſtion was enſnaring, mr. ſecretary Stanhope anſwered, 'That he would be very plain with them, and own, that, as it was notorious, that great endeavours had been uſed to alienate the affection of the people from the king and his government, by falſe ſuggeſtions, that they deſigned to plunge the nation into extraordinary expences, they thought it highly neceſſary to clear his majeſty and his miniſters from that malicious aſperſion.' To this lord Guernſey replied, 'That the diſaffection of the people, if any, did not proceed from his majeſty, but from the hardſhips his miniſters put on the tory party.' To this it was returned, 'That, as ſoon as it would be made known to the world, how the late miniſtry had uſed, not only the whigs, but the whole nation, nothing, that could be done againſt them, would then be thought a hardſhip; but, however, that neither that noble member, nor any of his family, had reaſon to complain of hardſhips.' After ſome other ſpeeches, the tories endeavoured to drop the queſtion, by moving, that the ſpeaker might reſume the chair; which being rejected, the queſtion was carried in the affirmative, and a motion made that 700,000 l. clear ſhould be granted yearly for the civil liſt. The queſtion being put upon this motion, occaſioned another great debate. Sir Thomas Hanmer, mr. Bromley, ſir William Wyndham, mr. Cæſar, mr. Hungerford, and ſome other leading tories, did not at firſt directly oppoſe the queſtion, but inſinuated, 'That, before they came to that reſolution, it would be proper, that a particular of the king's expence ſhould be laid before the houſe.' Mr Walpole, mr. ſecretary Stanhope, mr. Lechmere, and others, having exploded that propoſal, as altogether inconſiſtent with the king's honour, to have all the private expences of his family and houſhold looked into, as if he had need of a guardian; the tories then moved, that the ſum of 600,000 l. per annum, be given to his majeſty, and 100,000 l. per annum ſettled on the prince, of Wales. The court-party perceiving, that the propoſal of giving the prince of Wales a ſeparate revenue was only a deſign to divide the royal family, by leſſening the dependance of the next heir, oppoſed it, and, the queſtion being put on that motion, it was carried in the negative by a great majority. The tories having loſt theſe two points, ſome of that party more openly oppoſed the main queſtion. Among the reſt, ſir William Wyndham ſaid, he had the honour to ſerve her late majeſty, and had the opportunity to look both into her revenue and her expence; and he could aſſure the houſe, that about 500,000 l. per annum was ſufficient for the ſupport of her family and civil liſt; tho' ſhe reſerved about 50,000l. a year for the late king James's conſort.' The court-party were glad of this confeſſion; and mr. ſecretary Stanhope deſired the committee to take notice of what that gentleman had advanced, becauſe it would ſerve to confirm ſome matters, which the committee of ſecrecy had found in the papers, that were laid before them. The queſtion being put, it was carried without dividing, that 700,000l. a year clear ſhould be granted for the civil liſt during the king's life.

There was another warm debate a few days after, upon a motion for an addreſs againſt penſions. The leading tories and others exclaimed againſt the penſions given by the crown to ſeveral perſons of quality (ſome of whom they named) who had no occaſion for them. Mr Robert Walpole urged, 'That they ought not to ſtint the king's beneficence, nor debar him from the exerciſe of the moſt glorious branch of his perogative, which is to beſtow his favours on ſuch, as diſtinguiſh themſelves in his ſervice.' He was ſeconded by mr. Hampden, who obſerved, that all the penſions, about which ſo much noiſe was made, did not amount to above 25,000l. and then moved, that the chairman ſhould leave the chair; which being put to the vote, paſſed in the affirmative by three voices only, a hundred and ninety-one againſt a hundred and eighty-eight.

On the 30th of May, the houſe of peers, in a grand committee, conſidered of the bill for regulating the land forces; when there aroſe a great debate about a clauſe, for confining the ſeveral regiments to thoſe parts of his majeſty's dominions, for which they were allotted; for inſtance, the twelve thouſand men, that were on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, to Ireland. The duke of Bucks, the lord Trevor, the lord North and Grey, the biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſome others of that party, ſpoke for the clauſe. But the duke of Marlborough and ſome other lords ſhewed the fatal conſequences, with which it might be attended, in caſe of an invaſion from abroad, or an inſurrection at home, by a number of enemies, foreign or domeſtic, ſuperior to the number of forces actually on the ſpot, where either of them ſhould happen. It was further urged, 'That his majeſty having truſted his perſon and family entirely in the hands of the nation, and at the opening of this ſeſſion told the parliament, that what they ſhould judge neceſſary for their ſafety, he ſhould think ſufficient for his own; the leaſt they could do for him, was to leave to his wiſdom and diſcretion the diſpoſal of the few troops, that were kept on foot.' Some tory lords moved, that the foreign officers might be excluded from that number: but the duke of Marlborough ſpoke in their favour, and argued, 'That to exclude officers, who, like the French refugees, had, for above five and twenty years, ſerved England with diſtinguiſhed zeal and untainted fidelity, would be a piece of injuſtice unprecedented in the moſt barbarous nations.' After ſome other ſpeeches, the queſtion was put, whether the clauſe ſhould be inſerted; and it was carried in the negative by eighty-one voices againſt thirty-five. The next day, the lords read the bill the third time, which, with ſome amendments, was approved, and ſent down to the commons. [i]

On the 18th of May, ſir John Norris, with a ſquadron of twenty men of war, and a fleet of merchant-ſhips under his convoy, ſailed from the Nore to the Baltic, in order to protect the trade of his majeſty's ſubjects in thoſe ſeas. The violent proceedings of the king of Sweden in rejecting the treaty of neutrality concerted by England and Holland, and other members of the grand alliance, for preſerving the remains of his army under general Craſſau, and for the ſecurity of his German dominions, and in cauſing the ſhips of all nations whatſoever, without diſtinction, trading to the Baltic, to be ſeized and confiſcated, even ſome years before king George's acceſſion to the throne, obliged, at laſt, the king and the States-General, after having made proper inſtances for redreſs to no purpoſe, to uſe their fleets for the protection of their ſubjects in their navigation and commerce to thoſe parts. The Britiſh and Dutch miniſters had jointly, or ſeperately, made the inſtances in the moſt earneſt manner, by variety of memorials delivered yearly to the king or ſenate of Sweden, ſo long as from the year 1710, without being able to obtain the leaſt ſatisfaction. The laſt memorial of mr. Jackſon, the Engliſh reſident at the court of Sweden, before the Engliſh ſquadron was ſent, was preſented to the ſenate at Stockholm, January 14, 1714-15, complaining, that the loſs of the Engliſh merchants from the Swediſh cruiſers amounted to 65,449l. ſterling. The Swediſh regency returned an anſwer on the 8th of February, N. S. by which they referred him to the king of Sweden himſelf, who was then at Stralſund. In ſhort, though the Dutch, as well as the Britiſh miniſters, made repeated complaints of thoſe ſeizures, the king of Sweden was ſo far from regarding them, that he iſſued out new orders to his men of war and privateers, to ſeize and confiſcate all ſhips, that traded with any place conquered by his enemies; and theſe orders were ſo very ſtrict, and clogged with ſuch terms on merchant ſhips, as in a manner rendered the trade of the Baltic impracticable, without a ſufficient force to convoy the merchant-ſhips, that traded thither. [k]

[i] About this time there was a petition preſented to the lords by mrs. Mary Forreſter, maid of honour to the late queen, and now to the princeſs of Wales, ſetting forth, that about thirteen years ago, when ſhe was but twelve years of age, ſhe had been married to ſir George Downing, then about fifteen. That, ſir George going then to travel, he did, upon his return, ſhew his diſlike to the match, which had prevented their cohabitation: and therefore they prayed, that they might be ſeparated, and at liberty to marry again. Several of the lords, and particularly the biſhops ſpoke againſt allowing a divorce; and, the matter being put off till the third of May, it was, upon debate, carried by fifty againſt forty-eight, to reject the petition, the biſhops being againſt the divorce, leſt it ſhould weaken the obligations of marriage.

On the 19th of May died Charles earl of Hallifax. He was deſcended from a younger branch of the Mancheſter family, and came into the world without any advantages of fortune. But uſeful parts, and ſeveral lucky opportunities of producing them, ſoon gave him a figure in life. He had the reputation of a fine taſte, and of being maſter of polite literature. His projects and his poetry have been aſcribed to others, who ſubmiſſively beſtowed on him their thoughts and labours. It is not worth controverting, whether he was the author or the adopter of ſchemes for the ſervice of the government; ſince his merit, in the proper application of them, is undeniable. Recoining the money, and exchequer bills, delivered the nation from diſtreſſes, which ſeemed to be attended with unavoidable ruin. Many, who envied a young man the natural reputation of ſuch performances, and many others, who were enemies to the government, encumbered him with all imaginable difficulties.

His ſkill as a ſpeaker and manager muſt be unqueſtionable, which enabled him to execute ſuch great deſigns. But, when his and the nation's enemies, aided by the perverſeneſs of the times, had gained the aſcendant, his vigour and ſpirit totally failed; and he implored in abject terms their mercy, whoſe rage and inſolence were confirmed by his applications.

When the ſtaff was taken from the duke of Shrewſbury, he was placed at the head of the treaſury, and had the garter, and an addition of title, but not the ſatisfaction, which might naturally have been expected from ſo many happy events. Not finding himſelf poſſeſſed of the fulneſs of power, and the poſt of high-treaſurer, which he imagined to be his due, he entered into meaſures with the authors of the fatal ceſſation of arms, and the deſtructive peace. And though it would have confirmed the diſguſts of our allies, and been the higheſt indignity to the king's affectionate and ſincere friends, had he ſucceeded, yet he purſued his deſigns of removing thoſe, who had been fellow-labourers and fellow-ſufferers with him. The perpetual enmity of his new friends to king William, who had raiſed him from the loweſt to the higheſt ſtation in life, the ignominy of an impeachment, and the cenſures and reproaches, with which they had purſued him for many years, were all forgotten. Such are the effects of boundleſs pride and ambition! But a violent diſtemper ſpeedily put an end to his life, and all his devices.

He left behind him the fame of being an encourager of men of parts and learning; and is ſaid to have ſhewn himſelf ſuch in an agreeable and liberal manner. His performances in poetry have had their full praiſe. A poetical turn infected his proſe. Far from finding the purity and ſtrength of lord Sommers's compoſitions, we have in many of his a perpetual affectation of figurative ornaments.

The commiſſioners, appointed for building the fifty new churches, preſented an addreſs to the king, wherein they ſet forth, that, ſeveral chapels and churches being almoſt ready, they found themſelves under a difficulty how to proceed for want of a due maintainance for the miniſters, without which no biſhop could regularly conſecrate a church, nor any patron be effectually treated with. The king told them he ſhould readily comply with their deſire, being reſolved to embrace all opportunities of encouraging a work in which the honour of the church of England was ſo much concerned.

This anſwer is one, among many other inſtances of the king's care for the church of England, though the danger of it under his adminiſtration was made a principal topic to excite the people to rebel, and to raiſe mobs and tumults almoſt on every public day; for the prevention of which, the juſtices of the peace of Weſtminſter and Middleſex publiſhed an excellent order, but with ſo little effect, that, on the king's birth-day, the mob inſulted the citizens, who ſhewed their joy by bonfires, and illuminations. The care of the magiſtrates in both London and Weſtminſter, and the orders that had been given the horſe-guards, kept them in ſome awe on that day. But the next, being the anniverſary of the reſtoration of king Charles the II, they made greater illuminations, and more bonfires, than were ſeen the day before, eſpecially in the city of London, where they broke the windows of ſuch houſes, as were not illuminated, and amongſt them thoſe of the lord-mayor. They inſulted four life-guards, who were patrolling, and obliged them to cry out, as they did, High-church and Ormond. In Smithfield they burnt a print of king William. This riot being unexpected, there was not force enough at hand to ſuppreſs it immediately; but, at laſt, ſome citizens and conſtables diſperſed them, when they came to Cheapſide, and about thirty of the mutineers were ſecured and committed to priſon. The ſame evening one Bournois, a French or Iriſh ſchoolmaſter, was by ſir Charles Peers ſent to Newgate, for high-treaſon, having proclaimed in the ſtreet, that king George had no right to the crown. He was afterwards tried for it, and whipped through the city, according to ſentence; and, his conſtitution being deſtroyed by the venereal diſeaſe, he died in a few days after. It appeared, he was a popiſh prieſt, and taught French for a colour.

During theſe commotions the following accident happened, which was made uſe of to increaſe the popular ferment. On the king's birth-day, new cloathing was delivered to the firſt regiment of foot-guards; but, ſo particularly coarſe were the ſhirts, that the ſoldiers were much offended at it. There being a great number of Iriſh papiſts, and other diſaffected perſons, than in the guards, their diſcontent was eaſily improved by the enemies of the government; ſo that ſome of the ſoldiers had the inſolence to throw their ſhirts into the king's and duke of Marlborough's garden at St James's; as a detachment marched from Whitehall, through the city, to relieve the guard in the tower, the ſoldiers pulled out their ſhirts, and ſhewed them to all ſhopkeepers and paſſengers, crying out, theſe are the Hanover ſhirts, &c. The court being informed of what had paſſed, and foreſeeing the conſequences, orders were immediately ſent to the guard at Whitehall, to burn thoſe new ſhirts; which was done that very evening. [l]

[k] After Steinbock and his army were taken priſoners, count Welling concluded a treaty with the adminiſtrator of Holſtein-Gottorp, by which it was agreed, that the towns of Stetin and Wiſmar ſhould be ſequeſtered into the hands of the king of Pruſſia, and the adminiſtrator to ſecure them as well as the reſt of the Swediſh Pomerania, from the northern allies, the Poles and Muſcovites. Count Meyerfeldt, governor of Pomerania, refuſing to comply with this treaty, the northern allies marched into Swediſh Pomerania, took the iſland of Rugen, and forced Stetin to capitulate; upon this Meyerfeldt accepted the ſequeſtration, which the king of Pruſſia was prevailed upon to take upon himſelf. As the Muſcovites and Poles demanded the expences of the ſiege of Stetin, the king of Pruſſia paid them for the king of Sweden 400,000 rixdollars. The king of Sweden, after his return from Turkey, refuſed to comply with the treaty of ſequeſtration, and inſiſted, that Stetin ſhould be forthwith reſtored to him without the repayment of the 400,000 rixdollars, nor would he depart from his deſign of invading Poland and Saxony, but was reſolved (as he ſaid himſelf) to chaſtiſe his falſe friends, as well as his open enemies. This was in effect a declaration of war againſt all who would not aſſiſt him in procuring a reſtitution of what he had loſt, or would not enter into a war againſt the States, then engaged in war againſt Sweden. King George, having certain information that the king of Sweden would not fail, upon the firſt opportunity, to invade his electorate of Brunſwick, reſolved to act in concert with the kings of Denmark and Pruſſia, for ſecuring the peace of the empire, and oppoſe the deſigns of the Swede. To this end a treaty was concluded between the kings of Great-Britain and Denmark, by the third article of which it was agreed, that the dutchies of Bremen and Verden ſhould be made over to his Brittannick majeſty, his heirs and poſterity, for ever, with this proviſo, that he ſhould, the moment he took poſſeſſion of them, declare war againſt Sweden. This treaty was ratified and exchanged the 17th of July, 1715, and the dutchies were delivered up the 15th of October following, on which day a declaration of war was publiſhed by king George, in his German dominions. Preſently after 6000 Hanoverians marched into Pomerania, to join the Danes and Pruſſians, who, after having taken the iſles of Rugen and Uledon, were then attacking Wiſmar and Stralſund. The king of Sweden was himſelf at Stralſund, and, finding it impoſſible to hinder the town from being taken, embarked on board a veſſel, and arrived at Schonen on the 26th of December, after having been almoſt ſixteen years abſent from his ancient dominions. Upon his arrival, he aſſembled what troops he could, in order to paſs the Sound over the ice, and attack Copenhagen, but was diſappointed by a ſudden thaw. Notwithſtanding the earneſt intreaties of his ſiſter and the ſenate of Sweden, he declined going to Stockholm, and remained at Carleſcroon, in order to haſten his fleet, and relieve Wiſmar. Thus ſtood affairs in Sweden, at the king's return out of Turkey.

[l] The duke of Marlborough's enemies laying hold of this occaſion, to reflect on him, as if he were to bear the blame of the injuſtice done to the ſoldiers of his regiment, the following advertiſement was made public in the news-papers: 'His grace the duke of Marlborough being informed, that the undertakers for the firſt regiment of foot-guards had delivered to the ſeveral companies their cloathing, no way anſwerable to the pattern agreed for; his grace, therefore, ordered the ſaid cloathing to be viſited, who finding the ſoldiers very much abuſed in their ſhirting, his grace immediately directed the

About the middle of May, there was an intercepted letter returned from Ireland, written by captain Wight, a reformed officer of Windſor's regiment, to his friend in that country, and, by a miſtake, carried to a perſon of the ſame name, in which were theſe expreſſions, 'The duke of Ormond has got the better of all his enemies; and I hope we ſhall be able, in a little time, to ſend George home to his own country again.' A warrant was iſſued from the ſecretary's office for apprehending captain Wight, who abſconding, a reward of 50l. was offered by the government to any, who ſhould diſcover him. Not many days after, mr. George Jeffreys was ſeized at Dublin, upon his arrival there from England; and, being examined before lords juſtices, a packet was found about him, directed to dr. Jonathan Swift, dean of St Patrick's. This packet Jeffreys owned he had received from the duke of Ormond's chaplain; and, ſeveral treaſonable papers being found in it they were tranſmitted to England. Jeffreys was obliged to give bail for his appearance; of which dr. Swift having notice, and that ſearch was made after him, he thought fit to abſcond.

The bill for regulating the forces having been ſent down to the commons by the lords, the amendments made to it were, after a debate, agreed to. Mr. Shippen, formerly a commiſſioner of public accounts, having, on this occaſion, reflected on the miniſtry, as if they deſigned to ſet up a ſtanding army, and inſinuated, aſif, after all the clamour, that had been raiſed, their ſecret committee would end in ſmoke; mr. Boſcawen, the late lord Falmouth, replied, 'That he could not forbear taking notice of the inſolence of a ſet of men, who, having committed the blackeſt crimes, had yet the aſſurance to dare the juſtice of the nation: but he hoped thoſe crimes would not long remain unpuniſhed. That the committee of ſecrecy were ready to make their report, and had directed their chairman to move the houſe, that a day might be appointed for receiving it; and, in the mean time, he might venture to aſſure the houſe, that they had found ſufficient matter to impeach of high-treaſon ſeveral lords, and ſome commons.' Mr. Robert Walpole likewiſe ſaid, 'That he wanted words to expreſs the villany of the laſt Frenchified miniſter;' and mr. ſecretary Stanhope added, 'He wondered, that men, who were guilty of ſuch enormous crimes, had ſtill the audaciouſneſs to appear in public.'

The ſame day there was a debate in the houſe of lords about a bill for continuing the impriſonment of the conſpirators againſt the life of the late king William. [1] A petition having been offered in their behalf, the lord North and Grey moved, that a day might be appointed to conſider of it; and was ſeconded by the lord Trevor. They were oppoſed by the lord Townſhend, who ſaid, he wondered any members of that Auguſt Aſſembly would ſpeak in favour of ſuch execrable wretches, who deſigned to have imbrued their hands in the blood of their ſovereign; and moved, that their petition be rejected. The lord Delawar repreſented, 'That, after the death of king William, the parliament left to the diſcretion of the late queen either the continuing in priſon, or enlarging of theſe criminals. That no body doubted her late majeſty's being a princeſs of great clemency; but, at the ſame time, ſhe had ſuch a reſpect for the memory of king William, ſuch a regard to the ſafety of crowned heads, and ſuch an abhorrence for the crimes, with which theſe priſoners ſtood charged, that ſhe did not think fit to releaſe them from their confinement. That all theſe reaſons and conſiderations were now inforced by the open diſaffection, which ſome people ſhewed to his majeſty's perſon and government; and that they ought to be ſo tender; of the preſervation of ſo precious a life as his majeſty's, that, in his opinion it were neceſſary to make the act in queſtion abſolute, and not leave the confinement of the criminals to his majeſty's diſcretion, leſt his natural clemency ſhould make him overlook his own ſecurity, 'He concluded with ſeconding the lord Townſhend's motion for rejecting the petition, which was carried without dividing.

The committee of ſecrecy having finiſhed their report which was drawn up with indefatigable pains by mr. Walpole, that gentleman, as chairman, on the 9th of June, acquainted the houſe, 'That he had a report to preſent, according to their order, but was commanded by the committee to make a motion before he read it. That there were in the report matters of the higheſt importance. That, although the committee had power to ſend for perſons, papers, and records, they did not think fit to make uſe thereof, believing it to be neceſſary, in order to bring offenders to juſtice, that ſome perſons ſhould be ſecure, before it is poſſible they ſhould know what they are to be examined to; and leſt they ſhould have notice, from what ſhould be read, to make their eſcape. He was commanded, according to former precedents to move, that a warrant may be iſſued by mr. ſpeaker to apprehend certain perſons, who ſhould be named to him by the chairman of the committee; and that no members may be permitted to go out of the houſe.' The warrant being ordered, and the doors locked, ſeveral perſons were named to the ſpeaker by mr. Walpole; particularly mr. Matthew Prior, and mr. Thomas Harley, who were taken into cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms. Then mr. Walpole read the report, which laſted from one o'clock till about ſix in the afternoon, when, a motion being made by the friends of the late miniſtry, that the further conſideration of it ſhould be adjourned till the next morning, it was carried in the negative by two hundred and eighty-two voices againſt one hundred and ſeventy-one; and ordered, that the report be now read: upon which, the clerk of the houſe having read till half an hour paſt eight, the further conſideration of it was adjourned to the next day. The report conſiſted of,

1. The clandeſtine negotiation with monſieur Meſnager, which produced two ſets of preliminary articles; the one private and ſpecial for Great-Britain only; the other general for all the Allies.

2. The extraordinary meaſures purſued to form the congreſs at Utrecht.

3. The trifling and amuſements of the French plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, by the connivance of the Britiſh miniſters.

4. The negotiations about the renunciation of the Spaniſh monarchy.

5. The fatal ſuſpenſion of arms.

6. The ſeizure of Ghent and Bruges, in order to diſtreſs the Allies, and favour the French.

7. The duke of Ormond's acting in concert with the French general.

8. The lord Bolingbroke's journey to France to negotiate a ſeparate peace.

9. Mr Prior's and the duke of Shrewſbury's negotiations in France.

10. The precipitate concluſion of the peace at Utrecht.

The committee alſo offered to the houſe what they found material in the papers referred to them concerning the Catalans and the pretender, and a letter from the earl of Oxford to the queen, with an account of public affairs from Auguſt the 8th, 1710, to June the 9th 1714; and they concluded with taking notice of ſeveral glaring inconſiſtencies, which are obvious by comparing the late queen's declarations with the meaſures, which her miniſters preſumed to take in carrying on thoſe important negotiations.

The reading of this report by the clerk of the houſe of commons took up the remainder of that day, and all the next till about four in the afternoon, when ſir Thomas Hanmer moved, that the conſideration of it be adjourned till Monday ſe'nnight, and was ſecconded by the leading men among the tories, who moved alſo, that the report ſhould be printed, in order to be peruſed by all the members of the houſe. Upon which mr. Walpole ſaid, 'He could not but wonder, that thoſe gentlemen, who had ſhewed ſo great impatience to have the report laid before the houſe, ſhould now preſs for adjourning the conſideration of it. As for the committee of ſecrecy, as they had not yet gone through all the branches of their inquiry, they could have wiſhed, that ſome longer time had been allowed them to peruſe and digeſt ſeveral important papers. In order to that, they would have deferred, three weeks or a month, the laying ſhirts to be burnt, as well to puniſh as to deter ſuch undertakers from committing the like abuſes for the future; which was done accordingly, and the reſt of the cloathing has been compared with the pattern, that the ſoldiers may have juſtice done in all the other particulars. In the mean time his grace ordered two ſhirts to be made of good linen cloth for each ſoldier, in lieu of one, as likewiſe new waiſtcoats, inſtead of the waiſtcoats made by the undertakers of their old coats, and the old cloathing to remain to each ſoldier's own uſe.' And when the duke reviewed the firſt regiment of guards, on the 2d of June, he made them a ſpeech, expreſſing his concern for their juſt complaints, and his being entirely innocent of the grievance: adding, 'I have had the honour to ſerve with you a great many campaigns, and believe you will do me the juſtice to tell the world, that I never willingly wronged any of you; and, if I can be ſerviceable to any of you, you may very readily command it, and ſhall be glad of an opportunity for that purpoſe. I hope I ſhall now leave you good ſubjects to the beſt of kings, and every way entirely ſatisfied.' Upon which, the ſoldiers, with great acclamation, expreſſed their ſatisfaction.

Mr William Churchill, the contractor for the cloathing, laid the blame upon mr. Brookſbank, the woollen draper, who threw it on mr. Heron the linen-draper, by whom an advertiſement was alſo publiſhed in his own defence.

[1] Theſe were Blackburn, Caſſils, Bernardi, Meldrum, and Chambers, committed in 1696 for conſpiring againſt king William. Several acts had paſſed from time to time for continuing their impriſonment, but all of them expired at the queen's death.

their report before the houſe, but, that ſome gentlemen having reflected on the pretended ſlowneſs of the committee, ſince the report was now before them, muſt e'en go through with it.' Mr Stanhope added, 'That for his own part, he would readily agree to give thoſe gentlemen all the time they could deſire to conſider of the report; but that, ſince themſelves had precipitated this affair, he was of, opinion, they ought to proſecute it with vigour, leſt, by ſtopping on a ſudden, they ſhould fortify the nation, which the friends of the late miniſtry had, with great induſtry, propagated among the people, that the report of the committee of ſecrecy would vaniſh into ſmoke; the rather, becauſe theſe malicious inſinuations had raiſed the ſpirits and inſolence of the diſaffected, and were the principal cauſe of the preſent ferment among the giddy multitude. That he agreed with the member, who had moved the printing of the report, that not only the houſe, but the whole world might be convinced of the fairneſs and impartiality of their proceedings. But that the crimes of ſome perſons named in the report were ſo obvious to every body, that they ought, in oppinion, immediately to proceed to the impeaching of them.' The tories ſtill endeavoured to put it off, and ſome propoſed the adjourning of the debate till that day ſe'nnight; and others would have been contented to defer it for three days only. But the whigs were firm againſt all delays; and, the queſtion being put about ſeven o'clock in the evening on the motion made by ſir Thomas Hanmer, it was carried in the negative by two hundred and eighty againſt one hundred and ſixty. This point being gained, mr. Walpole ſaid, 'That he made no queſtion, that, after the report had been twice read, the whole houſe was fully convinced, that Henry lord viſcount Bolingbroke was guilty of high-treaſon, and other high crimes and miſdemeanors. That therefore he impeached him of thoſe crimes, But, if any member had any thing to ſay in his behalf, he doubted not but the houſe was ready to hear him.' After a ſilence of ſome minutes, mr. Hungerford roſe up and ſaid, 'That, in his opinion, nothing was mentioned in the report in relation to the lord Bolingbroke, that amounted to high-treaſon.' And general Roſs added, 'He wondered no body ſpoke in favour of my lord Bolingbroke: that, for his own part, he had nothing to ſay at preſent, but reſerved to himſelf to ſpeak in a proper time.' The reſolution for the impeachment then paſſed; and, candles being brought in, according to order, the lord Coningſby ſtood up, and ſaid, 'The worthy chairman of this committee has impeached the hand, but I impeach the head: he has impeached the clerk, and I the juſtice: he has impeached the ſcholar, and I the maſter. 'I impeach Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer of high-treaſon, and other high crimes and miſdemeanors.' Mr auditor Harley, brother to the earl, made a long ſpeech, wherein he endeavoured to juſtify his brother, as having done nothing but by the immediate commands of the late queen; urging, that the peace was a good one, and approved as ſuch by two parliaments; concluding, that the facts mentioned in the report, and which were charged on the earl, could not be conſtrued to amount to high-treaſon, but only, in ſtrict rigour, to miſdemeanors.' He was ſupported by mr. auditor Foley, the earl's brother-in-law, who complained of the hardſhip put upon that nobleman, in charging him with high-treaſon, before they had examined the report. But what was yet more favourable for the earl, was ſpoke by ſir Joſeph Jekyll, one of the committee of ſecrecy, who ſaid, 'That as to the lord Bolingbroke, they had more than ſufficient evidence to convict him of high-treaſon. But, as to the earl of Oxford, he doubted whether they had either ſufficient matter or evidence to impeach him of treaſon.' But another member of the committee of ſecrecy having aſſured the houſe, that, beſides what had appeared before them, and was mentioned in the report, they had other evidence, viva voce, it was likewiſe reſolved to impeach him without a diviſion. After which the further conſideration of the report was adjourned to that day ſe'nnight; and the report with the appendix were ordered to be printed, and copies to be ſent to the ſheriffs and returning officers of every city and borough.

The next morning the earl of Oxford went to the houſe of peers, and at firſt appeared undiſturbed; but, finding that moſt members avoided ſitting near him, and that even earl Powlet was ſhy of exchanging a few words with him, he retired out of the houſe.

It was moved by mr. Walpole, from the committee, that the perſons taken into cuſtody ſhould be examined in the moſt ſolemn manner. Accordingly, mr. Prior and mr. Harley were ordered to be examined by ſuch of the committee as were juſtices of the peace for Middleſex; and two days after, mr. Walpole told the houſe, that, during a long examination, there appeared matters of ſuch importance, that he was directed to move the houſe for mr. Prior's being cloſely confined, and no perſon ſuffered to come to him; which was agreed to.

This order occaſioned various reports: ſome affirmed, that the earl of Oxford, or ſome of his friends, had been in cloſe conference with mr. Prior, and ſo effectually tampered with him, that he was more reſerved in anſwering queſtions than he had been before. However that be, it is certain, mr. Prior did prevaricate.

After theſe impeachments, that of the duke of Ormond became the principal ſubject of diſcourſe. The high-church party made his name the ſignal for their tumults, threatening the government and parliament too, if they proceeded againſt him. His zeal for the church was their chief topic to exite the mobs to appear for him; and his noble birth, and the ſervices of his anceſtors, and of himſelf in Flanders during king William's reign, were inſiſted upon. Nor was his generoſity, or rather profuſe way of living, omitted, to prepoſſeſs the people in his favour; but all ſignified nothing; for though the king, at his firſt arrival, ſhewed more lenity and reſpect to him, than his conduct deſerved, and ſeemed willing to paſs by his miſcarriages, while general, as far as poſſible, the behaviour of the duke and his friends was ſuch, as made it impracticable; for inſtead of diſcouraging the mobs, who were taught to cry out, An Ormond, in oppoſition to king George, he plainly countenanced them, and took a great deal of pride to be the idol of the rabble. He affected to have people of quality appear at his levee, and frequent his houſe; and, inſtead of behaving himſelf ſubmiſſively, had the vanity to juſtify his conduct in a printed piece, which in reality expoſed him more to cenſure. About the middle of June, the following advertiſement was diſperſed with great induſtry: 'On Tueſday, the 7th of this month, her grace the ducheſs of Ormond, in her return from Richmond, was ſtopped in her coach, by three perſons, well mounted, and well armed, in diſguiſe, who inquired, if the duke was in the coach, and ſeemed to have a deſign upon his life, if he had been there. It has been obſerved, that many perſons, armed and diſguiſed in like manner, have been watching by day and by night upon that road, on each ſide of the water, and it is not to be doubted, with a deſign to aſſaſſinate him.'

This being evidently calculated to excite the fury of the populace againſt the duke's ſuppoſed enemies, the reſt of his conduct could not but alarm the government, and, perhaps provoked the houſe of commons to proceed againſt him ſooner, and with more vigour, than they would otherwiſe have done. On the 21ſt of June, the day appointed for the further conſideration of the report, mr. ſecretary Stanhope ſtood up, and ſaid, 'He wiſhed he were not obliged to break ſilence on that occaſion; but, as a member of the ſecret committee, and of that great aſſembly, which ought to do the nation juſtice, he thought it his duty to impeach James duke of Ormond of high-treaſon, and other high crimes and miſdemeanors.' He was ſeconded by mr. Boſcawen, but mr. Archibald Hutchinſon, one of the commiſſioners of trade, made a long ſpeech in behalf of the duke, wherein he ſet forth his noble birth and qualifications, and the great ſervices, which both he and his anceſtors had performed to the crown and nation; urged, that in the whole courſe of his late conduct he had but obeyed the late queen's commands; and concluded, that, if all, that was alledged againſt him in the report, could be made out, it would, in the rigour of the law, amount to no more than high miſdemeanors. This ſpeech made a great impreſſion on the houſe; and mr. Hutchinſon was ſeconded by general Lumley, who ſaid, among other things, 'That the duke of Ormond had, on all occaſions, given ſignal proofs both of his affection and love for his country, and of his perſonal bravery and courage, particularly at the battle of Landen, where he was wounded and taken priſoner; and that the late king William was extremely ſatisfied with his gallant behaviour. That he had generouſly expended the beſt part of his eſtate in the wars, living in a moſt noble and ſplendid manner, for the honour of his country. That therefore, in conſideration both of his great ſervices, and his illuſtrious relations, if he had of late been ſo unfortunate, as to fail in any part of his conduct, they ought not to proceed againſt him with the utmoſt rigour of the law; the rather, becauſe he ever meant well, and was drawn into ill meaſures by crafty miniſters.' Sir Joſeph Jekyll ſpoke likewiſe in his favour: he ſaid, 'That if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be ſhewn to that noble, generous, and courageous peer, who, for many years, had exerted thoſe great accompliſhments for the good and honour of his country. That, if of late he had the misfortune to deviate from his former conduct, the blame ought not, in justice and equity, to be laid to him, but to them principally, who, abusing his affection, loyalty, and zeal for the service of his royal mistress, had drawn him into pernicious counsels. That therefore, as the statute of 25 Edw. III, on which the charge of high-treason against him was to be grounded, had been mitigated by subsequent acts, the house ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act against the duke, but only impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanors.' Sir Joseph added, in the course of this debate, 'That some persons endeavoured to aggravate the duke of Ormond's faults, by charging upon him the riots and tumults, which the populace committed daily in many places: but that he durst aver, that he did no ways countenance those disorders; and if the disaffected made use of his name, unknown to him, he ought not to suffer for it.' General Ross laid great stress upon sir Joseph Jekyll's opinion, and said all he could in his commendation, and the duke's defence. Sir William Wyndham, mr. Onslow, mr. Ward, mr. Hungerford, and some other members of both parties, spoke also on the same side. But mr. Lyddal, mr. Hampden, and mr. Thompson, recorder of London, strongly supported mr. Stanhope's motion; answered all that had been said in the duke's favour; and, among other things, represented, 'That his grace ever affected popularity: that he could not be ignorant of the tumults and riots, of which his name was the signal, and that since he did not publicly disown them, who made use of his name, his silence was a tacit approbation of their proceedings, and seemed to summon the people to a general insurrection.' Sir Edward Northey, attorney-general, did not disown, but that in the report of the committee of secrecy there were some matters, on which an impeachment of high-treason might be grounded against the duke of Ormond; but did not think it proper to explain himself further on that occasion.

Mr Lechmere, sollicitor-general, spoke plainer, and mentioned a case parallel to the duke's, which had been adjudged treason. The debate lasted till about half an hour after ten, when the question was put, and resolved by a majority of two hundred and thirty-four voices against one hundred and eighty-seven, 'That this house will impeach James duke of Ormond of high-treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors.'

It was the general opinion, that the rash unadvised behaviour of the duke's pretended friends, of whom bishop Atterbury was chief, greatly promoted this vote. It was said upon very good grounds, that a relation of the duke's had prevailed upon him at that time to write a submissive letter to the king, desiring a favourable interpretation of his former actions, and imploring his majesty's clemency; which had so good an effect, that he was to have been privately admitted to the king in his closet, to confirm what he had written. But, before the time came, bishop Atterbury had been with him, and the consequence was, that he left England abruptly, and never returned to it more.

The commons resuming the consideration of the report, mr. Aislaby took notice 'of the general concern, that had appeared the day before in the house, for the noble person, who was impeached, because they were persuaded, it was rather through weakness than malice, that he had followed pernicious counsels. But that, in his opinion, few, if any, would speak in favour of another lord, whom he was to impeach. That the person he meant was Thomas earl of Strafford, one of the plenipotentiaries of Great-Britain at the congress at Utrecht, whose conduct had been vastly different from that of his collegue, the present bishop of London. That this good and pious prelate seemed to have been put at the head of that negotiation, only to palliate the iniquity of it under the sacredness of his character; but was little more than a cypher in the absence of the earl of Strafford. That the bishop, not being in the secret, had acted with reserve and caution, and would do nothing without the queen's special commands; whereas the earl of Srafford not only was forward to venture and undertake any thing (as he expresses himself in one of his letters) to be the tool of a Frenchified ministry, but in many instances had gone beyond his instructions, and advised the most pernicious measures. That, having impartially weighed the different conduct of these two ministers, he was glad, that nothing could be charged upon the bishop, which gave them an opportunity to convince the world, that the church is not in danger; but moved, that Thomas earl of Strafford be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr Aislaby inlarged upon this charge, which he reduced to three principal heads, '1. The earl of Strafford's advising the fatal suspension of arms; which was soon after attended with several misfortunes, that befel the allies, and at last forced them to the necessity of submitting to the terms of an unsafe dishonourable peace. 2. Advising the seizing of Ghent and Bruges, in order to distress the allies, and favour the enemy. And, 3. The insolence and contempt, with which he had treated the most serene house of Hanover, and their generals and ministers.' Mr Baillie of Jerviswood having seconded mr. Aislaby, sir William Wyndham endeavoured to justify the earl of Strafford, as to the first head, by saying, 'That the peace, which was but the sequel and necessary consequence of the suspension of arms, had been approved as such by two successive parliaments, and declared advantageous, safe, and honourable.' Mr Shippen, mr. Ward, and mr. Snell spoke also in favour of the earl of Strafford, as did likewise mr. Hungerford, who, among other things, said, 'That, though the bishop of London had an equal share with the earl of Strafford in the negotiation of peace, he was, it seems, to have the benefit of the clergy.' General Ross having likewise said something to excuse the suspension of arms, general Cadogan answered him, and shewed, 'That, considering the situation of both armies, the confederates lost the fairest opportunity they ever had in Flanders to destroy the enemy's army, and to penetrate into the very heart of France.' But added, 'That nothing less could be expected from a princess and a ministry, who had entirely delivered themselves into the hands of France.' Sir James Campbel spoke also against the earl of Strafford; but the member, who distinguished himself most in this debate, was sir James Dalrymple, who, with great clearness and solidity, summed up what had been said on both sides; and having illustrated the present case by parallel instances, and proper observations, shewed, that, both by the civil and statute laws, the earl of Strafford was, at least, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. Upon this the question was put, and, by two hundred and sixty-eight against a hundred, it was resolved, 'That Thomas earl of Strafford be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors'

The articles of impeachment against the earl of Oxford being prepared by the committee of secrecy, they were read, on the 8th of July, before the house of commons, and the first ten were upon the question severally agreed to.[m] The eleventh article which was voted high-treason was to this effect:

Whereas the states-general were, in September or October 1712, in possession of Tournay, and the French king had (during the private, separate, and traiterous negotiation between the earl of Oxford and others, and the ministers of France) signified his consent that Tournay should remain to the states as part of their Barrier: And whereas the queen, in her instructions of Dec. 23, 1711, to her plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, had expresly directed them to

[m] The substance of the articles was: 1. He had entered into a negotiation with France without the allies, and agreed it should be kept secret. 2. He advised the queen to permit the coming of Mesnager, treated with him, and assumed, without authority, the royal power. 3. He had prepared preliminaries signed by Mesnager, and sent them to Holland, when a private treaty was by his advice concluded with France. 4. He had not regarded the representations of Buis, the Dutch minister, but declared the queen had made no such treaty, nor would do so without the consent of the states. 5. He had ordered the Bishop of London to insist upon Spain, though, by the preliminaries, the duke of Anjou was acknowledged as king, and though he had persuaded the queen not to insist upon the restitution of Spain. 6. He had not procured satisfaction for the allies, but acted in concert with France. 7. He had advised the queen to accept the duke of Anjou's renunciation, though Torci had declared it to be null and void by the fundamental laws of France. 8. He had with others advised, that the duke of Ormond should be ordered to engage in no battle or siege to the ruin of the affairs of the allies, and afterwards sent an order to the bishop of London, to declare, that the queen looked upon herself to be then under no obligations whatsoever to the states. 9. He had advised that the duke of Ormond, with all the troops in the queen's pay, should separate themselves from the army of the allies, and not to pay the arrears due to those that refused. 10. He had advised the fatal suspension of arms, and the sending of lord Bolingbroke to France to settle the terms. 11. He had treacherously advised the enemy how to gain Tournay. 12. He had advised and assisted in giving up Spain and the West-Indies to the duke of Anjou. 13. He had treacherously advised the 9th article of the treaty of commerce with France, and the giving to the French the liberty of fishing, and drying fish on Newfoundland. 14. He had taken Sicily from the house of Austria, and given it the duke of Savoy, without any application from the duke. 15. He had caused the queen to make several speeches and declarations to the parliament, wherein the terms of peace and commerce were falsely represented. 16. He had as far as in him lay destroyed the independency of the house of lords, by causing the queen to create twelve peers at once to serve his ends. To these were afterwards added the six following articles. 17. He had not (as prime minister) advised the queen against the destructive expedition to Canada. 18. He had procured a warrant for 13000l. for his own use. 19. He had procured a warrant for 5560l. to his relation Thomas Harley. 20. He had paid a large sum of money to king James's queen. 21. He had received Patrick Lilesh (alias) Lawless, an Irish papist, as a foreign minister, and caused several sums of money to be paid him. 22. He had with others caused the Catalans to be exposed to the fury of an enraged, revengeful prince, against whom the late queen had engaged then to take arms.

inſiſt with thoſe of France, that, towards forming a ſufficient barrier, Tournay ſhall remain to the ſtates, and did afterwards declare herſelf conformably thereto, in her ſpeech to both houſes on the 6th of June 1712: And whereas for ſeveral years before, and till the months of September and October, in 1711, there was open war between the late queen and the French king, the earl of Oxford, then high-treaſurer, did, during the war, falſely, maliciouſly, wickedly and traiterouſly aſſiſt and adhere to the French king, and did counſel and adviſe him in what manner Tournay might be gained from the ſtates, contrary to his allegiance, and the laws of the realm.

A great debate aroſe upon the queſtion, Whether this article was high-treaſon? Sir Robert Raymond, formerly ſollicitor-general, mr. Bromley, ſir William Wyndham, the auditors Harley and, Foley, mr. Ward and mr. Hungerford, (who had already ſpoke in favour of the earl of Oxford) maintained the negative, and were ſtrongly ſupported by ſir Joſeph Jekyll. Sir Joſeph ſaid, among other things; 'That it was ever his principle to do juſtice to every body from the higheſt to the loweſt, being perſuaded, that it was the duty of an honeſt man never to act by a ſpirit of party. That he hoped he might pretend to have ſome knowledge of the laws of the kingdom; and as, in the committee of ſecrecy, he had taken the liberty to differ from his collegues, he would not ſcruple to declare now to the whole houſe, that, in his judgment, the charge in queſtion did not amount to high-treaſon.' Moſt of the other members of the committee of ſecrecy were offended at this ſpeech, which both revealed and cenſured their proceedings; and mr. Walpole anſwered with ſome warmth, 'That there were both in and out of the committee of ſecrecy ſeveral perſons, who did not in the leaſt yield to the member, that ſpoke laſt, in point of honeſty; and who, without derogating from his merit, were ſuperior to him in the knowledge of the laws; but who, at the ſame time, were ſatisfied, that the charge ſpecified in the eleventh article amounted to treaſon.' Mr Walpole was ſeconded by mr. Stanhope, the lord Coningſby, general Cadogan, mr. Boſcawen, and mr. Aiſlaby: And, the article being amended, was agreed to by a majority of two hundred and forty-ſeven votes againſt one hundred and twenty-ſeven. Mr auditor Harley endeavoured to juſtify his brother, firſt, by urging, that he ever acted by the late queen's poſitive commands; to prove which he offered to produce two letters from her: and, ſecondly, the neceſſity of making a peace; and he having upon this occaſion advanced, that the Dutch prolonged the war, and that their deputies in the army had often prevented the giving the enemy a deciſive blow; general Cadogan anſwered him with great force, and ſhewed, 'that the Dutch were more concerned than any prince or ſtate in the grand alliance to put an end to the war; and undertook to prove, that there had not been any campaign in Flanders, except that, in which the duke of Ormond commanded, that was not marked and famous to all poſterity for ſome ſignal and glorious event, to the advantage of the common cauſe.' The reſt of the articles being agreed to, the lord Coningſby, attended by moſt of the members who voted for the impeachment, went up to the lords, and at the bar of the houſe impeached the earl of Oxford of high-treaſon. &c. The commons, at the end of the articles, prayed and demanded, that he might be ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to ſafe cuſtody.

As ſoon as lord Coningſby and the members were withdrawn, a tory lord moved for adjourning the conſideration of the articles, and was ſeconded by ſeveral of the peers of that party, particularly by the biſhop of Rocheſter, who urged, 'That this accuſation was of ſo extraordinary a nature, and ſo very important, both in itſelf and its conſequences, that the houſe ought to proceed on it with the utmoſt caution and deliberation.' But he was anſwered by the duke of Argyle, who, among other things, ſaid, 'It was well known, that the prelate, who ſpoke laſt, had of late ſtudied politics more than divinity, and was thoroughly acquainted with the ſubject-matter of the articles, that lay before them; and therefore he did not doubt, but his lordſhip was now as ready to ſpeak to them, as he could ever be, if he had more time to conſider of them.' After a debate of about an hour and a half, the articles were voted to be read by a majority of eighty-ſix againſt fifty-four; which being done, a motion was made for conſulting the judges, whether the charge amounted to high-treaſon. The lords Trevor and Harcourt, the dukes of Shrewſbury and Leeds, Earl Powlet, the lord north and Grey, the biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſome other peers of the ſame ſide, were for conſulting the judges; but the lord-chancellor, the dukes of Argyle and Montroſe, the earls of Nottingham, Sunderland, Dorſet, and Ilay; the lord viſcount Townſhend, and ſome other lords ſpoke againſt it. The lord Trevor having gone ſo far, as to declare his opinion, that none of the articles amounted to high-treaſon, he was anſwered by the lord Cowper, who ſhewed the contrary, and challenged all the lawyers in England to diſprove his arguments. The other ſide ſtill inſiſting on conſulting the judges, the earl of Nottingham repreſented to them, 'That inſtead of favouring thereby the noble perſon, who had the misfortune to be impeached, as undoubtedly they meant it, they might, on the contrary, do him a great prejudice. For if, upon conſulting the judges, they declared the charge to amount to treaſon, he would ſtand prejudged, before he was brought to his trial.' After ſome other ſpeeches, the negative was carried by eighty-four voices againſt fifty-two. And then it was moved, that the earl of Oxford ſhould be committed to ſafe cuſtody; which occaſioned another debate; and the earl himſelf made a ſpeech, wherein he took notice of 'his having had the honour to be placed at the head of the late miniſtry; and muſt now, it ſeems, be made accountable for all the meaſures, that were then purſued. But that it was a very great comfort to him under this misfortune, that he had the honour to be a member of that auguſt aſſembly, which always ſquares their proceedings and judgments by the rules of honour, juſtice, and equity, and is not to be biaſſed by a ſpirit of party. That the whole accuſation might be reduced to the negotiation and concluſion of the peace. That the nation wanted a peace (ſays he) nobody will deny; and, I hope, it will be as eaſily made out, that the conditions of this peace are as good, as could be expected, conſidering the circumſtances, wherein it was made, and the backwardneſs and reluctancy, which ſome of the allies ſhewed to come into the queen's meaſures. This is certain, that this peace, as bad as it is now repreſented, was approved by two ſucceſſive parliaments. It is indeed ſuggeſted againſt this peace, that it was a ſeparate one. But I hope, my lords, it will be made appear, that it was general; and that it was France, and not Great-Britain, that made the firſt ſteps towards a negotiation. And, my lords, I will be bold to ſay, that, during my whole adminiſtration, the ſovereign upon the throne was loved at home, and feared abroad. As to the buſineſs of Tournay, which is made a capital charge, I can ſafely aver, that I had no manner of ſhare in it; and that the ſame was wholly tranſacted by that unfortunate nobleman, who thought fit to ſtep aſide. But I dare ſay in his behalf, that, if this charge could be proved, it would not amount to treaſon. For my own part, as I always acted by the immediate directions and commands of the late queen, and never offended againſt any known law, I am juſtified in my own conſcience, and unconcerned for the life of an inſignificant old man. But I cannot, without the higheſt ingratitude, be unconcerned for the beſt of queens; a queen, who heaped upon me honours and preferments, though I never aſked for them; and therefore I think myſelf under an obligation to vindicate her memory, and the meaſures ſhe purſued, to my dying breath. My lords, if miniſters of ſtate, acting by the immediate commands of their ſovereign, are afterwards to be made accountable for their proceedings, it may one day or other be the caſe of all the members of this auguſt aſſembly. I do not doubt, therefore, that, out of regard to yourſelves, your lordſhips will give me an equitable hearing; and I hope, that, in the proſecution of this inquiry, it will appear, that I have merited, not only the indulgence, but likewiſe the favour of this government. My lords, I am now to take my leave of your lordſhips, and of this honourable houſe, perhaps for ever! I ſhall lay down my life with pleaſure, in a cauſe favoured by my late dear royal miſtreſs. And when I conſider, that I am to be judged by the juſtice, honour, and virtue of my peers, I ſhall acquieſce, and retire with great content. And, my lords, God's will be done.'

Before the queſtion for committing him was put, the duke of Shrewſbury acquainted the houſe, that the earl was at preſent very much indiſpoſed with the gravel; and therefore he hoped they would not immediately ſend him to the tower, but ſuffer him to be two or three days in cuſtody of the black-rod, at his own houſe; which met with no oppoſition.

When the earl of Oxford went home, he was attended by a mob, that cried out high church Ormond, and Oxford for ever. However of twenty biſhops, who were in the houſe that day, ſix only were for him. [o]

The earl of Oxford being brought the next day to the bar of the houſe, and having received a copy of the articles, he repreſented, 'That the ableſt men in the nation had been many weeks in drawing up thoſe long articles againſt him; and therefore he hoped the houſe would allow him a proportionable time to anſwer them.' He took that occaſion 'to thank them for their great humanity in not ſending him to the tower, and, as he ſtill laboured under the ſame indiſpoſition, he humbly deſired them to permit him to continue ſome few days more at his own houſe under the cuſtody of the black-rod.' The earl being withdrawn, the lords reſolved to allow him a month to anſwer the articles of impeachment; and dr. Mead one of his phyſicians, being conſulted, and having made a kind of affidavit, 'That if the earl was ſent to the tower, his life would be in danger;' a motion was made, 'That he might continue in his houſe till the monday following.' But this was oppoſed, and after a warm debate it was carried by eighty-one againſt fifty-five, that he ſhould be ſent to the tower on Saturday the 16th of july.

During the courſe of this debate, the earl of Angleſey having ſaid, 'That it was to be feared, theſe violent meaſures would make the Scepter ſhake in the king's hands;' moſt of the lords were offended at this ſuggeſtion, and ſome cried, to the tower, and others only to order. The earl of Sutherland ſtanding up ſaid, 'He trembled with indignation to hear ſuch words pronounced in that noble aſſembly. That, if they had been ſpoke any where elſe, he would call the perſon, that ſpoke them, to an account. But all he could do there was to move, that he might explain himſelf.' The earl of Sutherland was ſeconded by the duke of Roxburgh, who, among other things, ſaid, 'That the ſcepter was ſo well riveted in the king's hand, that, inſtead of ſhaking, it would cruſh all his majeſty's enemies.' Upon theſe, and ſome other ſpeeches, the earl of Angleſey ſaid, 'It was but too manifeſt by the riots, that were daily committed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, that the nation in general was againſt theſe impeachments; for his own part, he was ſo far from approving thoſe tumultuous aſſemblies, and diſorders, that he rather wiſhed a ſtop might be put to them by exemplary puniſhments. He had on ſeveral occaſions, given ſufficient proofs of his zeal and affection for the revolution and the proteſtant ſucceſſion. What he had now advanced, was the reſult of the ſame zeal for the peace and proſperity of his majeſty's reign. However, if he had been ſo unhappy, as by any unguarded or paſſionate expreſſion to give offence to that auguſt aſſembly, he was very ſorry for it.' Notwithſtanding this apology, ſome members were inclined to have him ſent to the tower; but the very words, he had ſpoken, not having been taken down in writing his explanation was admitted. It is obſervable, that on this occaſion, beſides the ſix biſhops, before mentioned, thoſe of Bath and Wells, and St David's voted for the earl of Oxford; and that the earl was by many blamed for putting off his going to the tower, which, they ſaid, did not correſpond with that firmneſs he had hitherto ſhewn. It is certain, as he came in his own coach to the houſe of lords, he might with as much eaſe have been carried to the tower, either by water, or in a ſedan, and have had there the ſame attendance of his friends and phyſicians. The houſe having met on Friday, the 15th of July, they adjourned to the Monday following, to avoid, as it was generally ſurmiſed, any freſh motion, which the earl of Oxford's friends might make for deferring his being ſent to the tower, where he was carried by the black rod on the day appointed about eight o'clock in the evening in his chariot, attended by two hackney-coaches, in which were his lady, his ſon the lord Harley, and ſome other of the earl's relations and ſervants. Though theſe three coaches went from his houſe near St James's palace up St James's ſtreet, and then through Piccadilly, Gerard-ſtreet, Monmouth-ſtreet, and Holbourn, with deſign to avoid a crowd yet were they attended by a great many of the common people, whoſe numbers being much increaſed in their return from the tower, they raiſed a tumult in the ſtreets, with their cry of high church, Ormond and Oxford for ever, upon which three or four of the mutineers were by the conſtables carried to the round houſe.

Theſe riots and tumults were not confined to London, but were ſpread through the kingdom. The day before the earl of Oxford was ſent to the tower, the houſe of commons received information of their tumultuous proceedings in Staffordſhire, where ſeveral meeting-houſes had been pulled down by the mob. Upon this the commons unanimouſly reſolved to addreſs the king, that the laws might be put in a ſpeedy and moſt vigorous execution againſt the rioters, and an account be taken of ſuch juſtices, as failed in the diſcharge of their duty; and that the ſufferers, by theſe riots, may have a full compenſation for their damages, which they would inable his majeſty to make good, out of the next aids granted by parliament. The king, in his anſwer, promiſed an immediate compliance with their requeſt, and hoped, by their ſeaſonable aſſiſtance, to ſuppreſs the ſpirit of rebellion, and eſtabliſh peace and proſperity.

For the more effectual prevention of riots, the king came to the houſe of peers on the 20th of July, and, among others, gave the royal aſſent to the proclamation-act, as it is commonly called, by which act, if any perſons, to the number of twelve, being unlawfully aſſembled, to the diſturbance of the peace, and being required by a juſtice of peace or other officer, by proclamation in the king's name, to diſperſe themſelves, ſhall riotouſly continue together one hour after the proclamation, it ſhall be felony without benefit of the clergy [p]. After paſſing this and the reſt of the acts, the chancellor read the following ſpeech delivered into his hands by the king:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The zeal you have ſhewn for preſerving the peace of my kingdoms, and your wiſdom in providing ſo good a law to prevent all riotous and tumultuous proceedings, give me great ſatisfaction. But I am ſorry to find, that ſuch a ſpirit of rebellion has diſcovered itſelf, as leaves no room to doubt but theſe diſorders are ſet on foot and encouraged by perſons diſaffected to my government, in expectation of being ſupported from abroad.'

'The preſervation of our excellent conſtitution, and the ſecurity of our holy religion, has been, and always ſhall be my chief care; and I cannot queſtion but your concern for theſe invaluable bleſſings is ſo great, as not to let them be expoſed to ſuch attempts, as I have certain advice are preparing by the pretender from abroad, and carrying on at home by a reſtleſs party in his favour.'

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

'In theſe circumſtances I think it proper to aſk your aſſiſtance, and make no doubt but you will ſo far conſult your own ſecurity, as not to leave the nation under a rebellion actually begun at home, and threatened with an invaſion from abroad, in a defenceleſs condition. And I ſhall look upon the proviſion you ſhall make for the ſafety of my people, as the beſt mark of your affection to me.'

The king, as appears by this ſpeech, had received ſome intelligence of the rebellion forming againſt him. Though the diſaffected in England vented their fury in riots, and tumults, in breaking windows, and demoliſhing meeting-houſes, the caſe was very different in Scotland, where the deſigns of the jacobites were carried on with more ſecrecy and order, and very probably would have ſucceeded, had they been ſupported by their friends in England as will hereafter appear.

The commons in their addreſs of thanks aſſure the king, that they will, with their lives and fortunes, ſtand by and ſupport him againſt all his open and ſecret enemies; and deſire him immediately to give directions for fitting out ſuch a number of ſhips, as may effectually guard the coaſts, and to iſſue out commiſſions for augmenting his forces by land; promiſing, without loſs of time, effectually to enable him to raiſe and maintain ſuch a number of forces, both by ſea and land, as ſhall be neceſſary for the defence of his ſacred perſon, and for the ſecurity of his kingdoms.' [q]

An addreſs with the offer of their lives and fortunes was

[o] Sir William Dawes, archbiſhop of York,
Dr John Robinſon, biſhop of London,
Dr Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter,
Dr George Smalridge, biſhop of Briſtol,
Dr Francis Gaſtrel, biſhop of Cheſter,
Dr Nathaniel Crew, biſhop of Durham,

[p] The proclamation muſt be in theſe words:
Our ſovereign lord the king chargeth and commandeth all perſons, being aſſembled, immediately to diſperſe themſelves, and peaceably depart to their habitations, or to their lawful buſineſs, upon the pains contained in the act made in the firſt year of king George, for preventing tumults and riotous aſſemblies.

This act is to be read at every ſeſſions and leet.

Other acts paſſed at this time were: 1. For continuing the impriſonment of the conſpirators againſt king William. 2. For the quakers affirmation inſtead of their oath. 3. An act for regulating the forces. 4. The malt-tax. Laſtly, An act to explain the act of 12 Will. III, for the further limitation of the crown, &c.

[q] When the motion was made for this addreſs, the lord Guernſey, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Ayleſbury, ſaid, 'It was well known he had, on ſeveral oc-alſo preſented by the lords. The ſame day the convocation waited on the king with an addreſs, wherein, having thanked him for his meſſage to the commons, about the maintenance for the miniſters of the fifty new churches, they proceed: 'After all the declarations your majeſty has been pleaſed to make in favour of our eſtabliſhed church, and the real proofs you have given for the concern of its intereſt; we hope, that none will be found ſo unjuſt, as to doubt of your affection to it. And we do moſt humbly aſſure your majeſty, that we will take all opportunities to inſtil into thoſe, who are under our care, the ſame grateful ſenſe, that we ourſelves have of your majeſty's goodneſs; and that at this time more eſpecially, when the quiet of your realms is diſturbed by inſurrections at home, and the nation threatened with an invaſion from abroad, we will put them in mind of thoſe ſtrict obligations of conſcience, whereby they are engaged to defend and ſupport your majeſty's government; and will earneſtly exhort them to exemplify, by a ſuitable practice, thoſe principles of obedience and loyalty, which the church of England has always thought it her duty to profeſs.' All theſe addreſſes met with a very gracious reception.

The parliament paſſed an act to impower the king to ſecure ſuſpected perſons, and to ſuſpend the Habeas Corpus act in that time of danger. A clauſe was added to a money-bill for the reward of 100,000l. to ſuch as ſhould ſeize the pretender dead or alive. Upon a motion of mr. Walpole, the commons ordered an addreſs for giving full pay to ſuch half-pay officers as were not provided for. Sir George Byng ſet out for the Downs to take upon him the command of the fleet, and general Erle went to his government of Portſmouth to put that place in a poſture of defence. General Cadogan marked out a camp in Hyde-Park for the foot-guards. Lord Irwin was made governor of Hull, in the room of brigadier Sutton, who with the generals Roſs, Webb, and Stewart, the lord Windſor, colonel Deſcanay, and other officers were either diſmiſſed the ſervice or ordered to ſell.

Purſuant to the commons addreſs, the king ordered thirteen regiments of dragoons, conſiſting of three thouſand men, and eight of foot, conſiſting of four thouſand, to be raiſed. He left the nomination of the officers to the dukes of Marlborough and Argyle, and the generals Stanhope and Cadogan. [r] The trained-bands were alſo ordered to be in a readineſs to ſuppreſs riots and tumults. Upon this, the ſeveral bodies concerned in theſe orders came to court with addreſſes, expreſſing their abhorrence of all ſeditious and tumultuous aſſemblies, and their reſolution to do their duty in preſerving the public peace, and to ſtand by and aſſiſt his majeſty with their perſons and eſtates. Theſe addreſſes were from the common council of the city of London, [t] from the lieutenancy of the ſame city, and from the earl of Clare, who was lord-lieutenant of the county of Middleſex, with the deputy-lieutenants and juſtices of the peace. Theſe were followed by ſeveral others, particularly from the biſhop of London and his clergy; the univerſity of Cambridge, the diſſenting miniſters of London and Weſtminſter, the commiſſion of the general aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland, and the univerſity of Oxford; but the members of that univerſity, when they preſented their addreſs, were told, 'That, as they had ſhewn an open diſreſpect to his majeſty's perſon and government in their late conduct, his majeſty expected they ſhould ſatisfy him better of their loyalty by their future behaviour, before they attempted it by words.' Nor was it a ſmall part of the reaſon of the public diſpleaſure, and of the repulſe, which the univerſity of Oxford met with on that occaſion, that at the very time it was to be preſented, an account came to court by expreſs, that ſome of the king's officers, who, were beating up for volunteers for a new regiment of dragoons, were attaced by ſome of the ſcholars, and hardly eſcaped being killed.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the commons added ſix articles more againſt the earl of Oxford; and, two days after, the articles of impeachment againſt the lord Bolingbroke were agreed to, and delivered by mr. Walpole at the bar of the houſe of lords, where he impeached him. The next day, the articles againſt the duke of Ormond being read, there aroſe a warm debate, in which ſeveral remarkable ſpeeches were made. Among the reſt, a member of a conſiderable eſtate, and who had all along voted with the tories, ſaid, That the report of the committee of ſecrecy had begun to open his eyes; and that the duke of Ormond's flight had fully convinced him, that the heads of the tory party were a ſet of knaves and villains, who deſigned to have ruined their country, and made it a province to France.' The lord Stanhope, the eldeſt ſon of the earl of Cheſterfield, who ſpoke for the firſt time on this occaſion, ſaid, 'He never wiſhed to ſpill the blood of any of his countrymen, much leſs of any nobleman: but that he was perſuaded, that the ſafety of his country required, that examples ſhould be made of thoſe, who betrayed it in ſo infamous a manner.' The lord Finch, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Nottingham, ſpoke alſo on the ſame ſide; and, after ſome other ſpeeches, the firſt article was agreed to by a majority of a hundred and ſeventy-ſeven voices againſt ſeventy-eight; and then the other articles alſo were ſeverally agreed to by the houſe. The firſt article charged the duke with correſponding with marſhal Villars, the French general, while he commanded the Britiſh army in Flanders. The ſecond, That he wicedly promiſed and engaged, that he would not attac the French army, nor engage in any ſiege againſt France. The third, That he did falſly, maliciouſly, wicedly, and traiterouſly adhere to the French king; and in purſuance of a wiced promiſe he had ſecretly made with the marſhal de Villars, he endeavoured to perſuade the generals of the confederate army to raiſe the ſiege of Queſnoy; and, when he could not prevail, marched off with the queen's troops, and gave the enemy's general advice of it. The other articles are in effect his conduct in Flanders reduced into a charge. And, both he and the lord Bolingbroke having fled from juſtice, bills were brought in to ſummon them to render themſelves by the 10th of September, and, in default thereof, to attaint them of high-treaſon; which paſſed both houſes, and recieved the royal aſſent.

On the 8th of Auguſt, the houſe of commons was called over, and among ſeveral abſent members, who were not excuſed, ſir Michael Wharton, mr. Corbet Kynaſton, and mr. Lewis Pryſe were ordered into cuſtody. The two former were immediately diſcharged; but mr. Pryſe declining to take the oaths, and having never attended the houſe, for that and other reaſons, and being not found by the meſſengers, was afterwards expelled.

On the 31ſt of Auguſt the articles againſt the earl of Strafford were agreed to by the commons, and carried by mr. Aiſlaby to the lords. The articles being read in the houſe of lords, the earl of Strafford made a long ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he complained of the hardſhips which had been put upon him by ſeizing his papers in an unprecedented manner; that he deſigned to have drawn up and printed an account of all his negotiations; whereby he did not doubt he ſhould have made it appear to all the world, that he had done nothing but in diſcharge of his duty, and of the truſt repoſed in him. That if, either in his letters or diſcourſes, while he had the honour to repreſent the crown of Great-Britain, he had dropped any unguarded expreſſions againſt ſome foreign miniſters, he hoped the ſame would not be accounted a crime by a Britiſh houſe of peers. He concluded with deſiring, that a competent time might be allowed him to anſwer the articles now brought againſt him; and that he might have duplicates of all the papers, that either had been laid before the committee of ſecrecy, or were ſtill in the hands of the government, which might be for his juſtification.' The lord Townſhend ſaid, 'That his complaint about the taking his papers from him was altogether groundleſs and unjuſt: that infinite inſtances of the like proceedings might be produced: that no ſtate could be ſafe without it; and, in ſhort, that extraordinary caſes juſtify extraordinary methods. As to the earl's demand to have duplicates of all the papers, that had been laid before the commons, he (the lord Townſhend) thought it unreaſonable, and made with no other deſign than to gain time, and make the commons loſe the opportunity of bringing him to his trial. That thoſe papers were ſo voluminous (conſiſting of thirteen or fourteen volumes in folio) that they could not be copied out in many weeks; and as the earl might have had caſions, differed from ſome members in that houſe; but being now convinced, that our liberty, religion, and all that is dear to Engliſhmen, were aimed at, he would (laying his hand on his ſword) rather die with his ſword in his hand, than ſurvive the pretender's coming in, though he were to enjoy the greateſt honours and preferments under him.'

[r] The thirteen colonels of the dragoons were:

Wynne,	Honeywood,
Pepper,	Bowles,
Gore,	Munden,
Dormer.	Rich,
Newton,	Moleſworth,
Churchill,	Stanhope,
Tyrrel.

The eight colonels of the foot were:

Stanwix,	Pocock,
Hotham,	Lucas,
Grant,	Chudley,
Dubourgay,	Handaſyde.

[t] The common-council in their addreſs tell the king, 'They fear the intended invaſion has been too much encouraged by perſons of antimonarchial and republican principles.'

acceſs to them, ever ſince they were laid before the parliament, ſo he was ſtill at liberty to peruſe them, and extract out of them what he thought proper for his own defence.' The duke of Devonſhire and the lord-chancellor Cowper ſeconded the lord Townſhend; on the other hand, the late lord chancellor Harcourt and the biſhop of Rocheſter ſpoke for the earl of Strafford; but what availed the latter moſt, was ſaid by the earl of Ilay, who repreſented, 'That, in all civilized nations, all courts of judicature, except the inquiſition, allowed the perſons arraigned all that was neceſſary for their juſtification; and that the houſe of peers of Great-Britain ought not, in this caſe, to do any thing contrary to that honour and equity, for which they are ſo juſtly renowned throughout all Europe.' Upon this it was reſolved, 'That the earl of Strafford ſhould have copies of all ſuch papers, as were in the ſecretary's and other offices, which he ſhould think proper for his defence: that he ſhould have free acceſs to the papers, that had been laid before the commons: and that a month's time be allowed him, to anſwer the articles of impeachment againſt him.'

On the 3d of September the earl of Oxford cauſed his anſwer to the common's impeachment to be delivered to the houſe of lords, who tranſmitted it to the commons, where it occaſioned a ſmall debate. Mr Walpole, among other things, ſaid, 'he had not yet had time to examine that anſwer; but he now heard it read with a great deal of attention and in his opinion, it contained little more than what had been ſuggeſted in vindication of the late meaſures, in a pamphlet intitled, The conduct of the allies, and repeated over and over in the papers called the Examiner. That the main drift of this anſwer ſeemed to prove theſe two aſſertions: Firſt, that the earl of Oxford had no ſhare in the adviſing and managing the matters mentioned in the articles againſt him; but that the late queen did every thing: And, ſecondly, that the late queen was a wiſe, good, and pious princeſs. That, if the ſecond propoſition were not better grounded than the firſt, the reputation of that excellent princeſs would be very precarious; but as every body muſt own her to have been a good and pious queen; ſo it was notorious, that the earl of Oxford, as prime miniſter, was the chief adviſer, promoter, and manager of the matters charged upon him in the articles. And therefore his anſwer was a falſe and malicious libel, laying upon his royal miſtreſs the blame of all the pernicious meaſures he had led her into againſt her own honour, and the good of his country. That he hoped the earl's endeavouring to ſcreen himſelf behind the queen's name would avail him nothing: That it is indeed a fundamental maxim of our conſtution. That kings can do no wrong; but, at the ſame time, it is no leſs certain That miniſters of ſtate are accountable for their actions: Otherwiſe a parliament would be but an empty name; the the commons would have no buſineſs in that place; and the government would be abſolute and arbitrary. That though the earl had the aſſurance to aver, that he had no ſhare in the management of affairs, that were tranſacted, while he was at the helm, yet he pretended to juſtify the late meaſures. And therefore, in that reſpect, his anſwer ought to be looked upon as a libel on the proceedings of the commons, ſince he endeavoured to clear thoſe perſons, who had already confeſſed their guilt by flight.' Mr Shippen, a creature of the earl of Oxford, ſaid, It would not become him to defend the earl's anſwer, ſince, as a member of that honourable aſſembly, he was become one of his accuſers; but he could not forbear wiſhing, this proſecution might be dropped, and that the houſe would be ſatisfied with the two late acts of attainder. That this wiſh of his was the ſtronger, becauſe one of the principal reaſons, that induced the commons to impeach the earl of Oxford, ſubſiſted no longer than the affairs of Europe having received a ſudden turn from the death of the French king, whereby the renunciation of king Philip began to take place in the advancement of the duke of Orleans to the abſolute regency of France.' Mr Aiſlaby anſwered, 'He hoped it was to little purpoſe, that the gentleman, who ſpoke laſt, endeavoured to move the pity and compaſſion of the houſe, and perſuade them to drop this proſecution. That this was not a proper time to examine and reply to the earl of Oxford's anſwer; and therefore he would content himſelf with ſaying in general, that it was a contexture of the ſhifts, evaſions, and falſe repreſentations containing in the three parts of the hiſtory of the white ſtaff. As to what had been ſuggeſted concerning the event, which ſeemed to have ſtrengthened the renunciation, he did not deny, there might be ſomething in it, which was manifeſt from the great joy the well-affected to the government had ſhewn on this occaſion, and from the mortification and deſpair, that appeared in the faces of a certain party. But, after all, it could not yet be aſcertained that the renunciation was in force: That there was a vaſt difference between the regency and the crown; that time only could decide that matter; but even ſuppoſing, that, by the concurrence of unforeſeen events, king Phillip's renunciation ſhould at laſt take place, yet the ſame would not juſtify the miniſters, who propoſed and laid it as the foundation of the late peace, ſince they, with whom they treated were ſo frank and ſo ſincere as to tell them, that it could never be valid by the fundamental laws of France.' After ſome other ſpeeches, it was ordered, 1. That the anſwer of Robert earl of Oxford be referred to the committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment, and prepare evidence againſt the impeached lords. 2. That the committee prepare a replication to the anſwer. Accordingly a replication was prepared, and being agreed to was ſent to the lords.

The next day, a report from the ſame committee, concerning the ſtate and circumſtances of mr. Prior's commitment, was made to the houſe in the following manner:

That, in the peruſal and examination of the ſeveral books and papers referred to the committee of ſecrecy, mr. Prior appeared, through the whole progreſs of the ſeperate and pernicious negotiations, carried on between the miniſters of Great-Britain and France, to have been principally concerned as an agent and inſtrument of thoſe evil and traiterous counſellors, ſome of which are already attainted, and others ſtand impeached of high-treaſon, and other high crimes and miſdemeanors: And the committee conceiving there were matters contained in the firſt general report, from which crimes of a very high nature ought to be juſtly charged and imputed to mr. Prior, whenever the houſe ſhould think proper to enter into that conſideration; as likewiſe that mr. Prior, was able to give great lights into all thoſe dark and ſecret tranſactions, when he ſhould be called upon by the great council of the nation or any committee appointed by them, to give an account of the negotiations, in which he was concerned as a public miniſter; the houſe, upon a motion from the committee for that purpoſe, was pleaſed to order, before the report was made that mr. Prior ſhould be taken into cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms, to prevent his making his eſcape, upon notice of what was contained in the report.

That this method of confining mr. Prior not only agreeable to former precedents upon the like occaſions but neceſſary and eſſential to that great duty and privilege of the houſe of commons, of redreſſing grievances, and bringing great offenders to juſtice.

That the committee did, ſome time after, purſuant to the powers given them by the houſe, proceed to examine mr. Prior concerning ſeveral matters, of which there can be no doubt but he was fully appriſed and acquainted with; in which examination mr. Prior did behave himſelf with ſuch contempt of the authority of parliament, and prevaricate in ſo groſs a manner, as moſt juſtly to deſerve the higheſt diſpleaſure of the houſe.

But finding at laſt, after an examination of ſeveral hours, that it was impoſſible for him to diſguiſe or conceal ſome facts, that were before the committee, he was induced to declare upon oath ſome truths, which will be very material evidence upon the trials of the impeached lords.

And the committee having notice, that mr. Prior had, during his firſt confinement, met and conferred with the earl of Oxford, and his neareſt relations and dependants, which mr. Prior confeſſed to be true, thought it their duty to move the houſe, that mr. Prior might be committed to cloſer cuſtody.

From this ſhort ſtate of the proceedings relating to mr. Prior, the committee ſubmits it to the wiſdom of the houſe, whether his behaviour has ſo far merited the favour and mercy of the houſe, as to make that confinement more eaſy to him, which his contempt of the commons of Great-Britain, and his notorious prevarication, moſt juſtly brought him into. And it ſeems worthy of conſideration, how far it may be thought adviſeable for the houſe of commons to ſet at liberty a perſon in their cuſtody, and committed according to the antient methods and practice of parliament; who is a material evidence againſt high offenders, under proſecution of the commons of Great-Britain, and who, there is reaſon to apprehend, would immediately withdraw himſelf, and, as far as in him lay, defeat the juſtice of the nation.'

After the reading of this report, the commons ordered, 'That the committee be empowered to ſit, notwithſtanding any adjournment of the houſe.'

The time for the duke of Ormond and the lord viſcount

Bolingbroke to render themſelves being expired, the houſe of lords ordered the earl Marſhal to raze out of the liſt of peers their names and coats of arms. Inventories were likewiſe directed to be taken of their perſonal eſtates; and the atchievement of the duke, as knight of the garter, to be taken down from St George's chapel at Windſor.

On the 30th of Auguſt, an act received the royal aſſent, for encouraging loyalty in Scotland. By this act every vaſſal that holds lands of any ſuperior guilty of high-treaſon, by abetting the pretender, and continues peaceable, ſhall be inveſted with the ſaid lands in fee and heritage for ever. In like manner, if any ſubject of Great-Britain, holding lands of a ſuperior in Scotland, ſhall be guilty of ſuch high-treaſon, his lands ſhall return into the hands of the ſuperior, and be conſolidated with the ſuperiority. All entails and ſettlements of eſtates, ſince the 1ſt of Auguſt 1714, in favour of children, with a fraudulent intent to avoid the puniſhment of the law due to the offence of high-treaſon, by abetting the pretender, ſhall be null and void. Beſides theſe and other particulars, this act had a clauſe in it, for ſummoning any ſuſpected perſon in Scotland to appear at Edingburgh, or where it ſhould be judged expedient, to find bail for his good behaviour, with certification, that, if they did not appear at the time appointed, they would be denounced rebels. Purſuant to this clauſe, all the heads of the jacobite clans, and other ſuſpected perſons, were ſoon after ſummoned to appear at Edingburgh, and not obeying the ſummons, they were declared rebels.

By this time the court had received certain information, that an open rebellion was broke out in Scotland, under the direction of the earl of Mar, which was to be ſupported by a great conſpiracy in England. The earl of Mar, at the death of queen Anne, was ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, and had been one of the firſt who made profeſſions of their loyalty and affection to king George, as appears by a letter he wrote the king before his arrival. [t] The earl had alſo taken the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. But, not meeting the encouragement he expected, the earl, about the 8th of Auguſt 1715, embarked with major-general Hamilton colonel Hay, and two ſervants, at Graveſend, on board a collier, and, arriving at Newcaſtle, hired a veſſel belonging to one Spence of Leith, which in eight days landed them at Elie in Fife. They immediately went to the houſe of John Bethune of Balfour, where they ſtaid all night, and from thence rode to the lord Kinnoul's. The next day they proceed to Craigie-Hall; and colonel Hay conveyed the earl of Mar about three miles, and went to the lord Nairn's; and the earl and general Hamilton proceeded to the Laird of Invercald's at the Brae of Mar. Colonel Hay, the lord John Drummond, the marquis of Tullibardine, Strowen Robertſon, and ſeveral other Highland gentlemen, and particulary the Lairds of Glenbuket, Glenderule, Abergeldy, Dalmere, Auchindrain, and John Paterſon, who had been a clerk in the ſecretary's office, came to the earl of Mar; who, having ſtaid at Invercald's, houſe about eight days, went to Glenbucket's, and from thence to Aboyne, where he held a conſultation with the marquiſſes of Huntley and Tullibardine, the earls of Southeſk and Mareſchal, the Lairds of Glenderule, Glengary, Glenbucket, Tutor of Aboyne, general Hamilton, and general Gordon; but Invercald and Abergeldy, who were at Aboyne, were not admitted to the conſultation. The earl of Mar, the marquis of Tullibardine, general Hamilton, and mr. Paterſon returned to Invercald, where they ſtaid about eight days; during which the earl ſent ſeveral letters, and received others; and in that time there were gathered together about five hundred of his own men, three hundred of whom, being well armed, went to Caſtletoun with him and general Hamilton; and Innerey (who came to Invercald the day before) and the remaining two hundred went a way, till they ſhould be provided with better arms, and then were to follow under the command of Innerey. At Caſtletoun they proclaimed the pretender; whoſe ſtandard was ſet up by the earl of Mar at Brae-Mar, on the 6th of September.

Upon the news of the earl's being in the Highlands, and the report of his having drawn together a body of men, orders were immediately diſpatched to Edingburgh, for apprehending ſeveral ſuſpected perſons; purſuant to which, the earls of Hume, Wigtoun, and Kinnoul, and the lord Deſkford. Mr Lockhart of Carnwath, and mr. Hume of Whitefield, were committed priſoners to the caſtle. Orders were alſo ſent to major-general Whetham, commander in chief in Scotland, forthwith to march with all the regular troops, that could be ſpared, to form a camp near Sterling, to ſecure the bridge over the forth, and to quarter the half-pay officers in ſuch a manner, that they might be in a readineſs to command the militia. About this time, the court received intelligence of ſeveral veſſels ready to ſail for Scotland, from the port of Havre de Grace, laden with arms and ammunition for the uſe of the pretender; and, notwithſtanding all the precauſions uſed by the government, on the 29th of Auguſt, the lord juſtice clerk had advice from Montroſe, that one of thoſe ſhips was arrived at Arboth in the North, where ſhe was immediately unladen by the Highlanders, ſent thither for that purpoſe, who carried the arms and ammunition to the country of Brae-Mar. A few days after, another ſhip landed ſeveral officers, who went to join the earl of Mar, and gave him, and the lords with him aſſurences, that the pretender would ſoon be in perſon amongſt them. But the news of the death Lewis XIV of France, on the 1ſt of September, N. S. ſo alarmed the rebels, and ſtruck ſuch a general damp upon their ſpirits, that their chiefs held a conſultation, whether they ſhould ſtand out any longer, in expectation of the pretender's coming according to his promiſe, or whether they ſhould give over their enterprize. They divided upon the queſtion; ſome were for going home, and not ſtirring till the pretender landed; but the majority, depending upon a general inſurrection in England, were for perſiſting, at leaſt, till they had news from the pretender; to whom they all agreed to ſend meſſengers immediately, to preſs his coming over. Purſuant to this reſolution, the earl of Mar aſſumed the title of lieutenant-general of the pretender's forces, and as ſuch publiſhed a declaration, which he ſent, with a letter, to the baillie of Kildrummie, to exhort the people to take arms. [u] A few days after, a manifeſto was alſo publiſhed, ſetting forth the reaſons of their

[t] The earl of Mar's letter was as follows:

SIR,

'Having the happineſs to be your majeſty's ſubject, and alſo the honour of being one of your ſervants, as one of your ſecretaries of ſtate, I beg leave by this to kiſs your majeſty's hand, and congratulate your happy acceſſion to the throne; which I would have done myſelf the honour of doing ſooner, had I not hoped to have had the honour of doing it perſonally e're now. I am afraid I may have had the misfortune of being miſrepreſented to your majeſty; and my reaſon for thinking ſo is, becauſe I was, I believe, the only one of the late queen's ſervants, whom your miniſters did not viſit, which I mentioned to mr. Harley, and the earl of Clarendon, when they went from hence to wait on your majeſty: and your miniſters carrying ſo to me was the occaſion of my receiving ſuch orders, as deprived me of the honour and ſatisfaction of waiting on them, and being known to them. I ſuppoſe, I had been miſrepreſented to them by ſome here upon account of party, or to ingratiate themſelves by aſperſing others, as our parties here too often occaſion; but I hope your majeſty will be ſo juſt, as not to give credit to ſuch miſrepreſentations. The part I acted in the bringing about and making the union, when the ſucceſſion of the crown was ſettled for Scotland on your majeſty's family, where I had the honour to ſerve as ſecretary of ſtate for that kingdom, doth, I hope, put my ſincerity and faithfulneſs to your majeſty out of diſpute. My family hath had the honour, for a great tract of years, to be faithful ſervants to the crown, and have had the care of the king's children (when kings of Scotland) intruſted to them. A predeceſſor of mine was honoured with the care of your majeſty's grandmother, when young, and ſhe was pleaſed afterwards to expreſs ſome concern for our family in letters, which I ſtill have under her own hand. I have had the honour to ſerve her late majeſty, in one capacity or other, ever ſince her acceſſion to the crown. I was happy in a good miſtreſs, and ſhe was pleaſed to have ſome confidence in me, and regard for my ſervices. And ſince your majeſty's happy acceſſion to the crown, I hope, you will find, that I have not been wanting in my duty, in being inſtrumental in keeping things quiet and peaceable in the country, to which I belong, and have ſome intereſt in. Your majeſty ſhall ever find me as faithful and dutiful a ſubject and ſervant, as ever any of my family have been to the crown, or as I have been to my late miſtreſs, the queen. And I beg your majeſty may be ſo good not to believe any miſrepreſentation of me, which nothing but party hatred, and my zeal for the intereſt of the crown doth occaſion; and I hope I may preſume to lay claim to your royal favour and protection. As your acceſſion to the crown hath been quiet and peaceable, may your majeſty's reign be long and proſperous, and that your people may ſoon have the happineſs and ſatisfaction of your preſence among them, is the earneſt and fervent wiſhes of him, who is, with the humbleſt duty and reſpect,

SIR,

Your Majeſty's moſt faithful,
Moſt dutiful, and moſt obedient,
Subject and ſervant.

Whitehall, Auguſt 30, 1714. MAR.

[u] The declaration ran thus:

'Our rightful and natural king James VIII, by the grace of God, who is now coming to relieve us from our oppreſſions, having been pleaſed to intruſt me with the direction of his affairs, and the command of his forces in this his ancient kingdom of Scotland; and ſome of his faithful ſubjects and ſervants met at Aboyne, viz. the lord Huntley; the lord Tullibardine, the earl Marſhal, the earl of Southeſk, Glangary from the clans, Glanderule from the earl of Broadalbin, and gentlemen of Argyleſhire, mr. Patrick Lyon of Auchterhouſe, the laird of Auldbair, lieutenant-general George Hamilton, major-general Gordon, and myſelf, having taken into our conſideration his majeſty's laſt and late orders to us, that as this is now the time, that he ordered us to appear openly in arms for him; ſo it ſeems to us abſolutely neceſſary for his majeſty's ſervice, and the relieving of our native country from all its hardſhips, that all his faithful and loving ſubjects and lovers of their country, ſhould, with all poſſible ſpeed, put themſelves into arms.

Theſe are therefore, in his majeſty's name and authority, and by virtue of the power aforeſaid, and by the king's ſpecial order to me thereunto, to require and impower you forthwith to raiſe your fencible men, with their beſt arms; and you are immediately to march them to join me, and ſome other proceedings, the grievances the nation lay under, with assurances of redressing them. [v]

Besides these measures, a conspiracy was formed at Edingburgh to surprize the castle, on the 8th of September, between eleven and twelve at night; which, by the care and vigilance of sir Adam Cockburn, the lord justice Clerk, who had early notice of it, was prevented. The design was to mount the wall by the West-side of the castle, by rope-ladders provided for that purpose, which were to be pulled up by lines let down from within by some soldiers belonging to the garrison, who had been corrupted. The conspirators came to the castle-wall at the time appointed; and a rope was let down and fixed to one of the ladders. But, the lord justice Clerk having sent intimation of this design to colonel Stuart, lieutenant-governor of the castle, he ordered the officers under him to double their guards, and to make diligent rounds. As lieutenant Lindsey was going the round in obedience to these orders, he found one of the soldiers, who had been corrupted, drawing up the ladder, in order to fix it to the top of the wall; and commanded the centinel next him to fire, which giving the alarm, the conspirators dispersed. But a party of the town guard, which, at the request of the lord justice Clerk, the provost had sent out to patrol, with some resolute Volunteers, coming up, found captain Maclean, formerly an officer under the lord Dundee, lying on the ground, bruised with a fall from the wall, whom they secured, with three others of his accomplices. They likewise found the ladders and about a dozen of firelocks and carbines, which the conspirators had left behind. One serjeant, one corporal, and two private soldiers of the garrison were also secured; and, by the confessions of the persons seized, it appeared, that the numbers engaged in this attempt were about eighty, of whom one half were Highlanders: that one mr. Arthur, formerly an ensign in the castle, engaged the soldiers in this conspiracy, by promising the serjeant a lieutenant's commission; the corporal an ensign's; and by giving one of the soldiers eight guineas, and the other four; that the lord Drummond was to be governor of the castle, as being the contriver of the design: and that, upon the success of it, the conspirators were to fire three rounds of the artillery in the castle; which by the communication of fires to be kindled at convenient distances, was to be a signal to the earl of Mar, immediately to march towards Edingburgh with his forces, to improve the consternation, and heighten the terror, which such an accident would have caused in the city.

The Duke of Argyle, being appointed commanded in chief of the forces in Scotland, set out on the 9th of September for that kingdom; and, about the same time, the earl of Sutherland offered his service to go and raise the highland clans in the most northern counties of Scotland, which was readily accepted; and the Queenborough man of war was appointed to transport him thither. Several other Scots peers, particularly the duke of Roxburgh, the marquisses of Annandale and Tweedale, the earls of Selkirk, Loudoun, Rothes, Haddington, and Forfar, the lords Torpichen and Belhaven, &c. readily embraced this opportunity to shew their loyalty to king George, and their zeal for their country.

By this time a dangerous conspiracy was discovered and prevented in England. On the 2d of September, lieutenant-colonel Paul, who had a company in the first regiment of foot-guards, was secured, and the next day committed prisoner to the gate-house, being charged with inlisting men for the pretender's service, and other treasonable practices. The titular Duke of Powis, a Roman catholic, was committed to the tower for high-treason; and the lords Lansdown and Dupplin were also taken into custody; and a warrant issued out to apprehend the earl of Jersey. At the same time, mr. secretary Stanhope acquainted the commons, 'That he was commanded by the king to communicate to them, that his majesty, having just cause to suspect that sir William Wyndham, sir John Packington, mr. Edward Harvey, senior of Combe, mr. Thomas Forster, junior, Mr John Anstis, and mr. Corbet Kynaston, were engaged in a design to support the intended invasion of this kingdom, had given orders for apprehending them: And desired the consent of the house, to his causing them to be committed and detained, if he should judge it necessary so to do;' which was unanimously agreed to by an address to that purpose.

Upon this, warrants were issued out for apprehending the six members, two of whom, Harvey an Anstis, happening to be in town, were immediately secured. Mr Harvey stabbed himself some few days after with a knife, in two or three places of his breast; but the wounds proved not mortal. As to the rest, mr. Forster stood out in defiance of justice, and with two Romish lords raised a rebellion in Northumof the king's forces at the Inver of Brae-Mar, on Monday next, in order to proceed in our march to attend the king's standard, with his other forces.

The king intending, that his forces shall be paid from the time of their setting out, he expects, as he positively orders, that they behave themselves civilly, and commit no plundering, nor other disorders, upon the highest penalties, and his displeasure; which it is expected you will see observed.

Now is the time for all good men to shew their zeal for his majesty's service, whose cause is so deeply concerned, and the relief of our native country from oppression, and a foreign yoke too heavy for us and our posterity to bear; and to endeavour the restoring, not only of our rightful and native king, but also our country to its ancient, free, and independent constitution under him; whose ancestors have reigned over us for so many generations.

In so honourable, good, and just a cause, we cannot doubt of the assistance, direction, and blessing of Almighty God, who has so often rescued the royal family of Stuart, and our country, from sinking under oppression.

Your punctual observance of these orders is expected: for the doing of all which this shall be to you, and all you employ in the execution of them, a sufficient warrant. Given at Brae-Mar the 9th of September, 1715.

To the Baillie and the rest of the Gentlemen of the Lordship of Kildrummie. MAR.

The Earl's letter to the Baillie was in these terms:

Jockie, Invercald, Sept. 9. at night, 1715.

'Ye was in the right not to come with the hundred men ye sent up to night, when I expected four times the number. It is a pretty thing, when all the highlands of Scotland are now rising upon their king and country's account, as I have accounts from them since they were with me, and the gentlemen in most of our neighbouring Lowlands expecting us down to join them, that my men should be only refractory. Is not this the thing we are now about, which they have been wishing these six and twenty years? And now when it is come, and the king and country's cause at stake, will they for ever sit still, and see all perish? I have used gentle means too long, and so I shall be forced to put other orders I have in execution. I have sent you inclosed an order for the lordship of Kildrummie, which you are immediately to intimate to all my vassals. If they give ready obedience, it will make some amends; and if not, ye may tell them from me, that it will not be in my power to save them (were I willing) from being treated as enemies by those, who are ready soon to join me: and they may depend on it, that I will be the first to propose and order their being so. Particularly, let my own tenants in Kildrummie know, that, if they come not forth with their best arms, I will send a party immediately to burn what they shall miss taking from them: and they may believe this not only a threat, but by all that is sacred I will put it in execution, let my loss be what it will that it may be an example to others. You are to tell the gentlemen, that I will expect them in their best accoutrements on horseback, and no excuse to be accepted of. Go about this with all diligence, and come yourself, and let me know your having done so. All this is not only as you will be answerable to me, but to your king and country.

Your assured friend and servant,

To John Forbes of Increran,
Baillie of Kildrummie. MAR.

[v] Manifesto and declaration by the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, who dutifully appear at this time in asserting the undoubted right of their lawful sovereign James the VIIIth, by the grace of God, king of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. and for relieving this his ancient kingdom of Scotland from the oppression and grievances it lies under.

'His majesty's right of blood to the crown of these realms is undoubted, and has never been disputed nor arraigned by the least circumstance of authority whatsoever.

By the laws of God, by the ancient constitution of these nations, and by the positive unrepealed laws of the land, we are bound to pay his majesty the duty of faithful subjects. Nothing can absolve us from this our duty of subjection and obedience. The laws of God require our allegiance to our rightful king: the laws of the land secure our religion, and other interests; and his majesty, giving up himself to the support of his protestant subjects, puts the means of securing to us our concerns religious and civil into our own hands.

Our fundamental constitution has been entirely altered and sunk amidst the various shocks of unstable faction, which, in searching out new experiments pretended for our security, has produced nothing but daily disappointments, and has brought us and our posterity under a precarious dependance upon foreign counsels and interests, and the power of foreign troops.

The late unhappy union, which was brought about by the mistaken notions of some, and by the ruinous and selfish designs of others, has proved so far from lessening and healing the differences betwixt his majesty's subjects of Scotland, and England, that it has widened and increased them; and appears by experience so inconsistent with the rights, interests, and privileges of us, and our good neighbours and fellow-subjects of England, that the continuance of it must inevitably ruin us, and hurt them: nor can any way be found to relieve us, and restore our ancient independent constitution, but by restoring our rightful and natural king, who has the only undoubted right to reign over us. Neither can we hope that that party, who chiefly contributed to bring us into bondage, will at any time endeavour to work our relief, since it is known how strenuously they opposed in two late instances the efforts, that were made by all Scotsmen but themselves, and supported by the best and wisest of the English, towards so desirable an end, as they will not adventure openly to disown a dissolution of the union to be.

Our substance has been wasted in the late ruinous wars; and we see an unavoidable prospect of having wars continued on us and our posterity, so long as the possession of the crown is not in the right line.

The hereditary rights of the subjects, though confirmed by conventions and parliaments, are now treated as of no value nor force; and past services to the crown and royal family are now looked upon as grounds of suspicion.

A packed assembly, who call themselves a British parliament, have, so far as in them lies, inhumanly murdered their own and our sovereign, by promising a great sum of money as the reward of so execrable a crime. They have proscribed, by unaccountable and groundless impeachments and attainders, the worthiest patriots of Edgland; for their honourable and successful endeavours to restore trade, plenty, and peace to these nations. They have broke in upon the sacred laws of both countries, by which the liberties of our persons were secured. They have impowered a foreign prince (who, notwithstanding his expectations of the crown for fifteen years, is still unacquainted with our manners, customs, and language) to make an absolute berland. Sir John Packington was brought up to London from his houſe in Worceſterſhire, and being examined before the council, and nothing appearing againſt him, was honourably diſcharged. Mr Kynaſton made his eſcape, and colonel Huſke, a captain in the foot-guards, was ſent down with a meſſenger to apprehend ſir William Wyndham, at his houſe in Somerſetſhire. where they arrived between four and five in the morning. The door being opened, they appeared to be in haſte to ſee ſir William; but the porter told them, he was in bed, and could not yet be ſpoke with. The colonel told him, he came expreſs, and the perſon with him had a pacet of letters of ſuch conſequence that his maſter muſt needs be immediately informed of it This convinced the man, and ſir william preſently leaped out of bed, and came in his gown to the colonel, who told him he was his priſoner, the meſſenger, at the ſame time, ſhewing the badge of his office. Sir William ſaid, he frighten his lady, who was with child. Then they entered a chamber, where the colonel ſeeing ſir William's coat and waiſtcoat lie, told him, he had orders to ſeize all his papers; and that he muſt take leave to ſearch his pockets, wherein he found a bundle of papers, which he ſecured. Sir William would have diverted him, by offering him very frankly the keys of his eſcrutore, to ſearch; but the colonel happened to ſecure the moſt important papers, as he had reaſon to gueſs, by the great diſorder and confuſion in ſir William's looks, when he took the bundle out of his waiſtcoat pocket. Sir William deſired the colonel to ſtay till ſeven o'clock, and he would order his own coach and ſix horſes to be ready, which would carry them all; telling the colonel, he would only go in, and put on his cloaths, and take leave of his lady, and then would wait on him. Out of deference to that lady's noble relations, who, beſides their high rank, had deſerved it by their zeal and affection for the preſent government, the colonel had particular directions to uſe him with decorum, and readily complied with his requeſt, looking on it as his parole to return: But he ſoon found himſelf miſtaken in the perſon, whoſe honour he had truſted to; for, tho' the colonel had cauſed two doors of ſir William's bed-chamber to be ſecured, yet, there being a third, he made his eſcape through it. The colonel, having directed the meſſenger to ſtay at the houſe till further orders, returned with ſpeed to London, to acquaint the government with what had paſſed; whereupon the king in council thought fit to ſign a proclamation, with a reward of a thouſand pounds, for apprehending ſir William.

One of the papers found in ſir William's pocket was ſaid to be a liſt of the principal perſons, who had joined in an aſſociation to favour an invaſion, and to advance the pretender to the throne; which aſſociation was tranſmitted to him by the lord Lanſdown. Be that as it will, it is certain a great many notorious jacobites, who by this time had got together at Bath, in order to head the intended inſurrection in Somerſetſhire, were extremely alarmed at the coming down of the king's meſſengers, and left that place with great precipitation, in a very ſtormy night. Sir William Wyndham, being purſued by the proclamation, and ſeveral meſſengers, thought a clergyman's habit the beſt diſguiſe, and ordered one of his ſervants to write a letter to a gentleman in Surrey, deſiring him to give his maſter refuge in his houſe; or, if he would not venture ſo far, to get him a lodging in the miniſter's houſe, where he would come in a habit, that would beſpeak him reſpect from a clergyman. This letter being brought to the gentleman's houſe while he was abroad, his lady opened it; and being frightened with the thought of the danger, which her huſband might incur in harbouring a perſon charged with treaſon, ſhe thought fit to ſend it to the earl of Aylesford, who failed not immediately to communicate it to the government. Sir William rightly judging, by the miſcarriage of the letter, that he could hardly eſcape, thought it prudent to ſurrender himſelf. In order to which, having croſſed the Thames near Thiſtleworth, he went firſt to Sion-houſe belonging to the duke of Somerſet, his father-in-law, and, coming from thence to London the 3d of October, he put himſelf into the hands of the earl of Hertford his brother-in-law, captain of one of the troops of life-guards; who having given notice of it to mr. ſecretary Stanhope, a meſſenger was ſent to take ſir William into cuſtody. Three days after, he was examined at the council board, where he flatly denied he knew any thing of a plot. However, an order was made for his commitment to the tower. It was then ſtrongly reported, the duke of Somerſet offered to be his bail; which the council did not think fit to accept. But whether the duke bore this denial impatiently, and expreſſed ſome reſentment upon it too warmly, it is certain, he was removed from his place of maſter of the horſe.

While theſe things were tranſacting, the king came, on the 21ſt of September, to the houſe of lords, and, having paſſed the bills that were ready, ordered the lord chancellor to deliver the following ſpeech to both houſes. [w]

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I AM perſuaded you are all by this time very deſirous of ſome receſs, and that it cannot be deferred longer without great inconvenience to your private affairs.

But, before I can part with you, I muſt return you my moſt ſincere thanks, for your having finiſhed, with ſo much wiſdom and unanimity, what I recommended to your care; and particularly I thank you gentlemen of the houſe of commons, for the proviſions you have made, as well for the ſupport of the honour and dignity of the crown, as for the other neceſſary occaſions of the public; eſpecially for your having done it by means ſo little burdenſome to my people; which, I aſſure you, recommends the ſupplies to me above any other circumſtance whatſoever.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The open and declared rebellion, which is now actually begun in Scotland, muſt convince all, who do not wiſh to ſee us given up into the hands of a popiſh pretender, of the conqueſt, if not timely prevented, of the three kingdoms, by inveſting him with an unlimited power, not only of raiſing unneceſſary forces at home, but alſo of calling in foreign troops, ready to promote his uncontroulable deſigns. Nor can we be very hopeful of its being otherwiſe, in the way it is in at preſent, for ſome generations to come; and the conſequences of theſe unexampled proceedings has been already ſo fatal to great numbers of our kinſmen, friends, and fellow-ſubjects of both kingdoms, that they have been conſtrained to abandon their country, houſes, wives, and children, or to give themſelves up priſoners, and perhaps victims to be ſacrificed at the pleaſure of foreigners, and a few hot-headed men of a reſtleſs faction, whom they employ. Our troops abroad, notwithſtanding their long and remarkable good ſervice have been treated ſince the peace with neglect and contempt; as particularly in Holland: and it is not now the officers long ſervice, merit, and blood they have loſt, but money and favour, by which they can obtain juſtice in their preferments.

So that it is evident, that the ſafety of his majeſty's perſon and loyal ſubjects, the rights of his people, and independency of his kingdoms call loudly for immediate relief and defence.

The conſideration of theſe unhappy circumſtances, with the due regard we have to common juſtice, the peace and quiet of us and our poſterity, our duty to his majeſty, and his commands, are the powerful motives, which have engaged us in our preſent undertaking, which we are firmly and heartily reſolved to puſh to the utmoſt, and ſtand by one another to the laſt extremity, as the only ſolid and effectual means of putting an end to ſo dreadful a proſpect, as by our preſent ſituation we have before our eyes, and with faithful hearts, true to our only rightful king, our country, and our neighbours. We earneſtly beſeech and expect (as his majaſty commands) the aſſiſtance of all our true fellow-ſubjects to ſecond theſe our juſt attempts, declaring hereby our ſincere intentions:

That we will promote and concur in all lawful means for ſettling a laſting peace to theſe lands under the auſpicious government of our native-born rightful ſovereign, the direction of our own domeſtic counſels, and the protection of our own native force and troops.

That we will in the ſame manner concur and endeavour to have our laws, liberties, and properties, ſecured by free parliaments of both kingdoms.

That, by the wiſdom of ſuch parliaments, we will endeavour to have ſuch laws enacted, as ſhall give an abſolute ſecurity to us, and future ages, for the true proteſtant religion, againſt all efforts of arbitrary power, popery, and all its other enemies. Nor have we any reaſon to be diſtruſtful of the goodneſs of God, the ſolitude of our holy religion, or the known excellency of his majeſty's judgement, as not to hope, that in due time, good example, and converſation with our learned divines, will remove theſe prejudices, which we know that his education in a popiſh country has not riveted in his royal diſcerning mind: And we are ſure, that, as juſtice is a virtue of all religious profeſſions, the doing of it to him will not leſſen his good opinion of ours.

That, as the king is willing to give his royal indemnity for all that is paſt, ſo we will chearfully concur in paſſing general acts of oblivion, that our fellow ſubjects, who have been miſled, may have a fair opportunity of living with us in the ſame friendly manner we deſign to live with them.

That we will uſe our endeavours for redreſſing the bad uſage of our troops abroad, and bringing the troops at home to be on the ſame foot and eſtabliſhment of pay as thoſe in England.

The peace of theſe nations being thus ſettled, and we thus freed from foreign dangers, we will uſe our endeavours to have the army reduced to the uſual number of guards and garriſons, and will concur in ſuch laws and methods, as ſhall relieve us of the heavy taxes and debts now lying upon us, and, at the ſame time, will ſupport the public credit in all its parts.

And we hereby faithfully promiſe and engage, that every officer, who joins with us in our king and country's cauſe, ſhall not only enjoy the ſame poſt he now does, but ſhall be advanced and preferred according to his rank and ſtation, and the number of men he brings off with him to us: and each foot ſoldier ſo joining us, ſhall have twenty ſhillings ſterling gratuity, beſides his pay; and each trooper or dragoon, who brings his horſe and accoutrements along with him, the ſum of twelve pounds ſterling.

And, in general, we will concur with all our fellow-ſubjects in ſuch meaſures, as ſhall make us flouriſh at home, and be formidable abroad, under our rightful ſovereign, and the peaceable harmony of our ancient fundamental conſtitution, undiſturbed by pretenders intereſts, counſels from abroad, or by reſtleſs factions at home.

In ſo honourable, good, and juſt a cauſe, we doubt not of the aſſiſtance, direction, and bleſſing of Almighty God, who has ſo often reſcued the royal family of Stuart and our country from ſinking under oppreſſion.'

dangers to which we have been and are ſtill expoſed.

I thought it incumbent on me to give you the earlieſt notice of the deſigns of our enemies; and I cannot ſufficiently commend the zeal and diſpatch, with which you impowered me, at a time when the nation was in ſo naked and defeneeleſs a condition, to make ſuch preparations, as I ſhould think neceſſary for our ſecurity. You ſhall have no reaſon to repent of the truſt and confidence you repoſe in me, which I ſhall never uſe to any other end than for the protection and welfare of my people.

It was ſcarce to be imagined, that any of my proteſtant ſubjects, who have known and enjoyed the benifits of our excellent conſtitution, and have heard of the great dangers they were wonderfully delivered from by the happy revolution, ſhould by any arts and management be drawn into meaſures, that muſt at once deſtroy their religion and liberties, and ſubject them to popery and arbitrary power. But ſuch has been our misfortune, that too many of my people have been deluded, and made inſtrumental to the pretender's deſigns, who had never dared to think of invading us, or raiſing a rebellion, had he not been encouraged by the ſucceſs his emiſſaries and adherents have already had in ſtirring up riots and tumults, and by the further hopes they entertain of raiſing inſurrections, in many parts of my kingdoms.

The endeavouring to perſuade my people, that the church of England is in danger under my government, has been the main artifice employed in carrying on this wiced and traiterous deſign. This inſinuation, after the ſolemn aſſurances I have given, and my having laid hold on all opportunities to do every thing that may tend to the advantage of the church of England is both unjuſt and ungrateful. Nor can I believe ſo groundleſs and malicious a calumny can make any impreſſion upon the minds of my faithful ſubjects, or that they can be ſo far miſled, as to think the church of England is to be ſecured, by ſetting a popiſh pretender on the throne.

My Lords and Gentlemen.

The proofs this parliament has given of their unſhaken duty and affection to me, and of their love and zeal for the intereſt of their country, will recommend you to the good opinion and eſteem of all, who have their religion and liberty truly at heart, and has laid a laſting obligation upon me; and I queſtion not, but by your further aſſiſtance in the ſeveral countries, to which you are going, with the bleſſing of Almighty God, who has ſo frequently interpoſed in favour of this nation, I ſhall be able to diſappoint and defeat the deſign of our enemies.

Our meeting again to do buſineſs, early in the next winter, will be uſeful on many accounts, particularly, that the ſitting of parliaments may be again brought into that ſeaſon of the year, which is moſt convenient; and that as little delay may be given as is poſſible to your judicial proceedings; and I ſhall at preſent give ſuch orders to my lord chancellor, as may not put it long out of my power to meet you on any ſudden occaſion.'

When the king's ſpeech was ended, the parliament adjourned to the 6th of October, and afterwards, by ſeveral adjournments, to the 9th of January.

Purſuant to the king's ſpeech, orders from the privy-council, with a letter from the ſecretary of ſtate, were ſent to all the lords-lieutenants of the counties in England, to cauſe the militia to be put in ſuch a poſture, as to be ready to march when required; and alſo to give the neceſſary directions to the proper officers, to ſeize the perſons and arms of all papiſts, nonjurors, and others, whom they ſhould have reaſon to ſuſpect.

The deſigned inſurrection in the Weſtern counties was ſo deeply concerted, and the conſpirators ſo potent and numerous, that the jacobites at Bath, depending on their majority, openly talked, that the affair of Scotland was only a diverſion to draw the king's troops that way; but that the effectual attempt would be made in the Weſt very ſpeedily. But the government having received information of the ſecret proceedings of the diſaffected, took ſuch meaſures, as defeated all their deſigns. And firſt, to prevent the intended ſurprizal of Briſtol, in order to make it a place of arms, the earl of Berkeley, lord lieutenant of the county, and governor of that city, repaired thither with all ſpeed, and took all neceſſary precautions to ſecure that important place. Several perſons were apprehended, and, amongſt the reſt, mr. Hart, a merchant, who was charged with having collected great quantities of warlike ſtores for the uſe of the conſpirators. beſides part of Lumley's regiment of horſe, and the two battalions of Stanwix and Pocock who were already in Briſtol, colonel Chudleigh's regiment of foot marched thither, about the beginning of October. At the ſame time, the lord Windſor's regiment of horſe, and Rich's dragoons, under the command of major-general Wade, marched to Bath, which place was both the rendezvous, and one of the arſenals of the conſpirators. Upon ſtrict ſearch, the king's officers found and ſeized there eleven cheſts of fire-arms, a hogſhead full of baſket-hilt ſwords, and another of cartouches, and three pieces of cannon, one mortar, and moulds to caſt cannon, which had been buried under ground. There were about two hundred horſes ſeized; and the following perſons, were apprehended, captain Lanſdon, captain Doyle, captain Sinclair, ſir George Brown, mr. Mackarty, mr. Dun, mr. Macdonnel, and William Hibbort. They were all brought to London by a party of brigadier Bowles's regiment, on the 18th of October.

The behaviour of the univerſity of Oxford gave likewiſe reaſon to ſuſpect them. They had lately choſe the earl of Arran their chancellor, in the room of his brother the duke of Ormond, by a great majority over the earl of Pembroke, who was put up in competition with him. On the 26th of September, the earl of Arran was ſworn and inſtalled into that office with the uſual ſolemnity; and the vice-chancellor made a long ſpeech, 'wherein he enumerated and extolled the eminent virtues of the family of Butler, and took notice of the great obligations they had at different times laid on that ſeminary of learning; ſuggeſting withal, that, the duke of Ormond having, before his withdrawing beyond ſea, thought fit to reſign the place of chancellor of that univerſity, they could not better expreſs their gratitude, both to his grace and his noble anceſtors, than by chuſing his brother, the earl of Arran, in his grace's room.' The univerſity concluded this demonſtration of their diſaffection, by conferring the degrees of doctor of laws on ſir John Everard, a nonjuror, and on ſir William Gifford, late governor of Greenwich Hoſpital. Not many days after, a letter from a young gentleman at Oxford to his friend in London falling into other hands, by reaſon of a ſimilitude of names, the following particulars were found in it: 'I think myſelf very happy in being ſettled in this ſo loyal a place, and only want your good company to complete it; for here we fear nothing, but drink James's health every day. The prince thought to have been made chancellor, and by that to have been a biſhop, but, thank God, he was diſappointed.'

The government being informed of all that paſſed at Oxford, and in particular, that colonel Owen, with ſome other broken officers, Iriſh papiſts, and ſeveral notorious jacobites, having taken ſanctuary in that place, fomented the ſpirit of rebellion, drinking publicly and uncontrolled the pretender's health; and it being juſtly ſuſpected, that they deſigned an inſurrection, in order to act in conjunction with the diſaffected at Briſtol and Bath, with whom they held intelligence, it was reſolved to ſecure their perſons. Major-general Pepper, being charged with this commiſſion, ſent one of his officers, diſguiſed in a countryman's habit, to Oxford, to get intelligence and view the avenues and principal poſts in the town; and then began to move himſelf, with his own regiment of dragoons and a detachment of Tyrrel's, bending his march towards Bath and Briſtol. But, on the 5th of October, being come within ſeven or eight miles of Oxford, inſtead of reſting, he marched all night, and entered the city very early in the morning.

* When the ſpeaker preſented the three bills for ſettling a revenue on the princeſs of Wales, for enlarging the capital ſtock of the South-Sea company, and for making proviſion for the miniſters of the fifty new churches, he made a ſpeech with great ſpirit and eloquence, wherein, among others, were the following paſſages.

'Your commons could not ſee, without the utmoſt indignation, the glories of her late majeſty's reign tarniſhed by a treacherous ceſſation of arms; the faith of treaties violated; that ancient probity, for which the Engliſh nation had been juſtly renowned throughout all ages, expoſed to ſcorn and contempt, and the trade of the kingdom given up by inſidious and precarious treaties of commerce, whilſt the people, amuſed with new worlds explored, were contented to ſee the moſt advantageous branches of their commerce in Europe loſt or betrayed.

Such was the condition of this kingdom, when it pleaſed the Divine Providence to call your majeſty to the throne of your anceſtors, under whoſe auſpicious reign, your commons, with pleaſure, behold the glory of the Plantagenets, your majeſty's royal anceſtors, revive, and have an unbounded proſpect of the continuance of this happineſs even to the lateſt poſterity, in a race of princes lineally deſcended from your majeſty.

And that nothing may be wanting on the part of your commons, to eſtabliſh your majeſty's throne on ſolid and laſting foundations, they have applied themſelves with unwearied diligence to vindicate the honour of the Britiſh nation, and to reſtore a mutual confidence between this kingdom and its ancient and faithful allies, by detecting the authors of thoſe pernicious counſels, and the actors in thoſe treacherous deſigns, in order to bring them to juſtice, by the judgment of their peers, according to the law of the land, and the uſage of parliament, &c.'

Having cauſed his men to alight, and fix their bayonets in the muzzles of their fuzees, he immediately ſecured all the avenues and the gates of every inn and public houſe; and then ſent one of his officers to the vice-chancellor and the mayor of the town, to deſire to ſpeak with them. They having readily obeyed the ſummons, general Pepper delivered to them a letter from mr. ſecretary Stanhope, and, in a few words, acquainted them with his orders to ſeize ſixteen or eighteen ſuſpected perſons; adding, 'That their concurring aſſiſtance would be very acceptable to the government; otherwiſe, that he muſt be obliged to proceed to ſuch methods, as ſhould beſt execute his orders.' The vice-chancellor and the mayor, ſurprized at this unexpected ſight of ſoldiers, readily promiſed the general all the aſſiſtance in their power, and offered to provide him quarters for his men; which was not accepted, becauſe their ſtay was to be very ſhort. The vice-chancellor in particular, who ſome days before had boldly delivered a long oration in praiſe of a nobleman attainted by act of parliament, now trembling, and in the utmoſt confuſion, made large profeſſions of loyalty and affection to his majeſty. General Pepper told him, the only proof of thoſe profeſſions, which he deſired at preſent, was, that he ſhould keep the fellows and ſcholars quiet in their colleges; declaring to him, at the ſame time, that if any diſturbance happened, or if any perſons aſſembled in the ſtreets, above the number allowed by the act of parliament againſt riots, he would cauſe his men to fire upon them. The vice-chancellor promiſed all, and even more than was deſired; ſo the officers appointed by general Pepper began to ſearch for the men, whom they had orders to apprehend. But the chief of them, colonel Owen, who lay that night at the Grey-hound inn having timely notice from the oſtler of the arrival of the king's troops, leaped over a wall in his night-gown, and got into Magdalen-College, where general Pepper did not think proper to ſearch for him, rightly judging, it would be in vain. Of the other ſuſpected perſons, ten or eleven were taken; the principal of whom were mr. Gordon, mr. Ker, mr. Dorrel, mr. Wilſon, captain Halſtead, mr. Spelman of Norfolk, Lloyd, the famous jacobite coffee-man at Charing-Croſs, (who had formerly followed the ſame employment at Dublin) and one, who pretended to be a poſtman, in the lining of whoſe coat were found letters, which he was bringing from the conſpirators at Bath to their correſpondents at Oxford. They alſo ſeized two horſes, with fine furniture, belonging to colonel Owen, which were ſaid to have formerly been the duke of Ormond's; as likewiſe the horſes and warlike accoutrements of ſeveral others. As ſoon as the officers had made what ſearch they thought proper, and refreſhed their men, general Pepper cauſed them to mount, and marched out of town with his priſoners towards Abingdon. It might have been expected, that the univerſity and city of Oxford would have taken warning from this ſhort military viſit; but upon information, that the diſaffected there perſiſted in their diſreſpectful behaviour towards the king's perſon and government, and even that a traiterous deſign was carrying on to ſeize that city for the pretender, for which purpoſe a regiment was to be formed of the young ſtudents, under proper officers, who ſecretly reſorted to Oxford; the court thought fit to order Handaſyde's regiment of foot to be quartered there. Accordingly, they marched thither on the 28th of October; and their arrival was the more ſeaſonable, as, the very night before, the rabble had the inſolence to proclaim the pretender, and to commit ſeveral outrages againſt the well-affected.

The deſign upon Briſtol having miſcarried, a project was laid to ſeize on Plymouth. But this was alſo prevented by timely ſecuring ſeveral ſuſpected perſons, particulary ſir Richard Vivian, who was brought to London the 8th of October in cuſtody of a meſſenger.

The common people in Cornwall were at this time ſo ripe for rebellion, that ſix or ſeven of them ventured to proclaim the pretender at St Colombe, two of whom were ſeized, and a reward of 100l. each was offerred by the government for apprehending the reſt. However, by the great care and vigilance of mr. Boſcawen, comptroller of the houſhold, all things were kept quiet in thoſe parts.

The diſaffected in the North of England were more ſucceſful than their brethren in the Weſt. There had been meaſures concerted at London by the pretender's friends ſome time before the inſurrection in Northumberland broke out; which received great aſſiſtance from captain John Shaftoe, an half-pay officer, afterwards executed at Preſton, and captain John Hunter, of North Tyne in Northumberland, who had a commiſſion from queen Anne to raiſe an independent company, but did not. Beſides theſe, there was one captain Robert Talbot, an Iriſhman, and a papiſt, formerly in the French ſervice, who, being acquainted with the deſign in Auguſt, 1715, took ſhipping at London, and went to Newcaſtle. By Talbot the reſolutions, taken at London, were firſt communicated to their friends in the North of England, and means uſed to perſuade and prepare thoſe, who had been engaged by them, to be ready to riſe upon warning given.

A correſpondence and intelligence were now ſettled with all the conſpirators in the ſeveral parts of Britain. But, as this was a correſpondence of too much importance to be carried on by the ordinary conveyance of letters, there were ſeveral gentlemen from ſundry parts in the kingdom riding from place to place as travellers, under pretence of ſeeing the country, and thereby carrying intelligence, diſcourſing with perſons, and ſetling and appointing their buſineſs. The principal men intruſted with theſe negotiations were colonel Oxburgh, mr. Nicholas Wogan, mr. Charles Wogan, and mr. James Talbot, all Iriſh papiſts. A ſecond claſs of agents conſiſted of mr. Clifton, brother of ſir Gervaſe Clifton, and mr. Beaumont, both gentlemen of Nottinghamſhire, and mr. Buxton, a clergyman of Derbyſhire. All theſe rid like gentlemen, with ſervants and attendants, and were armed with ſwords and piſtols. They kept always moving, and travelled from place to place, till things ripened for action. The firſt ſtep towards appearing in arms was, when, about the latter end of September, the earl of Derwentwater had notice, that there was a warrant out from the ſecretary of ſtate to apprehend him, and that the meſſengers were come to Durham, who were to take him. The earl went to the houſe of one mr. B——n in his neighbourhood, a juſtice of the peace, who, if he had been well-affected to the government, or had regarded that lord's real intereſt, might have honourably enough taken him, or at leaſt perſuaded him to ſurrender; which, it is preſumed, would not have been a difficult matter. Hence the earl is ſuppoſed to have gone to the houſe of one Richard Lambert, which was thought more private, and leſs ſuſpected. Mr Thomas Forſter junior, knight of the ſhire for Northumberland, againſt whom a warrant was likewiſe iſſued out, having notice of it, went from place to place, till at laſt he came to the houſe of mr. Fenwick of Bywell. The meſſenger in purſuit of him was come within half a mile of that place; but, ſtaying to call for a conſtable to his aid, mr. Forſter found time to eſcape. Upon this there was a full meeting of the parties concerned in Northumberland; where conſidering all the circumſtances of their friends, and of the intereſt they were imbarked in, they judged that, as there was no longer any ſafety in ſhifting from place to place, in a few days they ſhould all be ſecured and confined in priſons, or conveyed to London; that, as they ſhould be ſeparately confined, ſo they ſhould be ſeparately examined, and none could ſay what the other ſhould anſwer; ſo that, for fear of betraying one another they ſhould be really brought to do it; that now was the time to ſhew their loyalty to their king, ſince, if this opportunity were loſt, they had no room to hope for another; and therefore they boldly reſolved immediately to appear in arms. Purſuant to this reſolution an appointment was made, and notice of it ſent to all their friends, to meet the next morning, at a place called Green-rig. Accordingly mr. Forſter, with ſeveral gentlemen, in number at firſt about twenty, met at the rendezvous, but made no ſtay, thinking the place inconvenient, but rode immediately to the top of a hill called the Waterfalls; from whence they might diſcover any, that came either to join, or oppoſe them. They quicly diſcovered the earl of Derwentwater, who came that morning from his ſeat at Diliton, with ſome friends, and all his ſervants, mounted upon his coach horſes, and all very well armed. In coming from Dilſton-Hall, they all drew their ſwords as they marched along Corbridge. They halted at the ſeat of mr. Errington, where ſeveral other gentlemen according to appointment came to the lord Derwentwater. When they had joined mr. Forſter and his company, they were in all about ſixty horſe, moſt gentlemen and their attendants. They called a ſhort council, and it was concluded to march towards the river Coquett, to a place called Plainfield, here they were joined by others, and, having made ſome ſtay, they reſolved to go that night to Rothbury, a ſmall market-town. They ſtaid there all night; and next morning, being the 7th of October, their number ſtill increaſing, they marched to Warkworth, another market-town upon the ſea coaſt, of a ſtrong ſituation. Here they continued till Monday, during which time, nothing material happened, except that on Sunday morning mr. Forſter, who now ſtiled himſelf general, ſent mr. Buxton their chaplain to mr. Ion, the miniſter of the pariſh, with orders for him, 'to pray for the pretender as king, and in the litany, for Mary queen-mother, and all the dutiful branches of the royal family;' which mr. Ion declining, mr. Buxton took poſſeſſion of the church, read prayers, and preached. In the mean while mr. Ion went to Newcaſtle to conſult his own ſafety, and acquaint the government with what had happened. The next thing they did, was openly to proclaim the pretender as king of Great-Britain, &c. It was done by mr. Forſter in diſguiſe, and by ſound of trumpet, and all the formality, that the circumſtances and place would admit. On Monday the 10th of October they marched to Morpeth, having been joined at Felton-Bridge by ſeventy Scots horſe, or rather gentlemen from the borders. They had been conſiderably increaſed before, in their march from Warkworth, at Alnwick, and other places, ſo that, at their entering Morpeth, they were three hundred ſtrong, all horſe, for they would entertain no foot; otherwiſe their number would have been very large: but, as they neither had nor could provide arms for thoſe they had mounted, they gave the common people good words, and told them, they ſhould ſoon be furniſhed with arms and ammunition, and then they would liſt regiments to form an army. This was upon the expectation of ſurprizing Newcaſtle, in which caſe they did not queſtion to have as many foot as they pleaſed. Here mr. Forſter received an account, that mr. Lancelot Errington and ſome others had ſurprized the caſtle in Holy Iſland, which is a ſmall fort guarded by a few ſoldiers ſent weekly from the garriſon at Berwick. Errington undiſcovered took boat and went to ſea, and with his companions landed under the cover of the wall, and got into the fort by ſurprize; though he kept the poſſeſſion but a very ſhort time, for the governor of Berwick, having an immediate account of the action, and reſolving, if poſſible, to recover the place before Errington could be ſupplied with men and proviſions, detached a party of thirty men of his garriſon, with about fifty volunteers of the inhabitants, who, marching over the ſands at low-water-mark, attaced the fort, and took it ſword in hand: Errington himſelf attempting to make his eſcape, was wounded and taken priſoner, with ſeveral others; but he with his brother afterwards eſcaped out of Berwick in diſguiſe. The deſign of taking this fort was to give ſignals to any ſhips, that ſeemed to make to the coaſt to land ſoldiers; for, by the aſſurances they had from their friends beyond ſea, they expected them to land on that coaſt with ſupplies of arms and officers; but they came not till they were gone for Scotland; and then two ſhips appeared off at ſea, and made their ſignal, but, having no anſwer from the ſhore, they ſailed northward.

The rebellion was now formed, and they were all in a body at Morpeth, promiſing themſelves great things at Newcaſtle. Several Gentlemen joined them, and ſome of the country people offered to liſt; but they ſtill refuſed them, and prepared to march to newcaſtle. Before they went on, mr. Buxton the Clergyman, taking on himſelf the office of a herald, proclaimed the pretender. Having ſent a party to ſeize Felton Bridge, they marched towards Newcaſtle, and to their great diſappointment found the gates ſhut againſt them. Upon this, they turned to the weſtward, and marched to Hexham, where they were joined by ſome more Scots horſe. From Hexham they all went three miles diſtant, to a heath or moor adjoining to Diliton, the earl of Derwentwater's ſeat, and there made an halt, with deſign, as it was thought, to go and ſurpriſe Newcaſtle; but they ſoon returned to their former quarters, having certain intelligence from their friends in Newcaſtle, that, even before any regular forces entered the town, the magiſtrates and deputy-lieutenants, having had firſt ſome ſuſpicion, and ſoon after poſitive intelligence of the deſign of the rebels, had affectually prevented a ſurprize, and taken all imaginable precaution for their ſecurity, raiſing immediately what men they could, ſeizing all papiſts and ſuſpected perſons, arming the inhabitants for their own defence; and taking into the town the militia, who, about that time, were ordered to muſter at Killingworth. The earl of Scarborough, lord-lieutenant of Northumberland, repaired likewiſe with his friends to Newcaſtle and the gentry of thoſe parts, after his example, mounted their neighbours and tenants; ſo that the town was full of horſes and men, both townſmen and countrymen unanimouſly declaring for king George. However, the chiefs of the rebels having great intereſt in that place, the inhabitants were not altogether without fear; nor were the high-party in the town without the folly of diſcovering their affection for the rebels at Hexham, and even uſing ſome threatening expreſſions. This was, perhaps, partly the occaſion of laying aſide the former diviſions and prejudices between the well-affected inhabitants as church-men and diſſenters. The latter chearfully offering, and the former freely accepting the offer, an aſſociation was entered into by both, for the mutual defence of their lives and eſtates; and a body of ſeven hundred volunteers were armed by the town for their immediate guard without diſtinction. The keelmen, being moſtly diſſenters, offered a body of ſeven hundred more, to be always ready at half an hour's warning; which was alſo accepted. In the midſt of this hurry, a battalion of foot, and part of a regiment of dragoons, having been ordered out of Yorkſhire for the ſecurity of the town, came to Newcaſtle; and then all the fears of the inhabitants vanquiſhed. A few days after, lieutenant-general carpenter having been ſent by the government in purſuit of the rebels with Hotham's regiment of foot, and Cobham's, Moleſworth's and Churchill's dragoons, arrived alſo at Newcaſtle the 18th of October, and began to prepare for attacing the rebels at Hexham. In the mean time the the rebels, who ſtaid but three days at Hexham, ſeized all the arms and horſes they could meet with, and, the night before they left the town, they all drew up round the croſs in the market-place, and proclaimed the pretender. They had received advice, that the lord viſcount Kenmure, the earls of Nithiſdale, Carnwarth, and Wintoun, who had taken arms in Nithiſdale, Dumfries-ſhire, and other places in the Weſt of Scotland, were entered England to join them, and were come to Rothbury. The lord kenmure, the only nobleman in that part of Scotland capable of commanding, was ſollicited by the earl of Mar to take up arms for the pretender, and to command ſuch forces, as would join him on that ſide the Forth. He at firſt refuſed this offer, but, being importuned by the jacobites in that country, was at laſt prevailed with to ſet up the pretender's ſtandard at Moffat in Annandale on the 12th of October. The next day the body, who joined him, marched towards Dumfries, with deſign to ſurprize that town; but the marquis of Annandale, whom they had followed the day before, having none but his ſervants with him, entered the town, and conſerted ſuch meaſures, as diſappointed their deſign. This obliged the rebels to alter their route, and after great diſputes they agreed at laſt to march to Loughmaben, were they ſet up their ſtandard, and proclaimed the pretender. On the 14th they marched to Achelfechen, and on their march, being in all near two hundred horſe, they were formed into a regiment, divided into two ſquadrons, the chief command remaining with the lord Kenmure, and each ſquadron under the earls of Wintoun and Carnwarth. Hence they marched regularly, and ſent their quarter-maſter-general mr. Calderwood to take up quarters for them. Next day they came to Langholm, and ſo on to Hawick, their numbers increaſing in the way. At this place they were alarmed; which raiſed ſome diſputes, whether they ſhould proceed. They agreed at laſt to return; but receiving an expreſs from mr. Forſter about two miles from Hawick towards Langholm, inviting the lord Kenmure and his followers to meet him at Rothbury, they faced about, and marched that night to Jedburgh. Here they received intelligence of Mackintoſh's croſſing the forth, and the duke of Argyle's reſolution to attac them. In their march to Jedburgh, they were extremely alarmed; for, being late, their advance guard was ſurprized by the ſhouts, of one, who called out, that the grey horſe were ready to fall upon them, and cut the quarter-maſter, and thoſe with him, to pieces. They, who were acquainted with the quarter-maſter, aſſuring the lord Kenmure, he would by no means be ſo eaſily enſnared, they continued their march, and entered the town without oppoſition. Here, as in moſt others towns they proclaimed the pretender; and the next day proceeded to Rothbury; and from thence diſpatched mr. Burnet of Carlips to Hexham to mr. Forſter, to know, whether he would come towards them, or they ſhould advance? Forſter returned an expreſs, that he would join them. Upon this, and the news that general Carpenter was preparing to attac them, the Northumberland rebels marched out of Hexham on the 19th of October, and making a long march joined the Scots that night, and all of them next day marched to Wooller. Being informed there by mr. Errington, that the Highlanders, who had croſſed the forth under Mackintoſh, were coming to join them, they marched to Kelſo in Scotland.

During theſe proceedings of the Engliſh rebels the principal perſons, who were either in rebellion with the earl of Mar, or juſtly ſuſpected of being diſaffected to the government, were, purſuant to the late act, ordered, as has been ſaid, to appear at Edingburgh, and ſurrender themſelves. [x] Of all that were ſummoned, only two ſurrendered themſelves; ſir Alexander Erſkine and ſir Patrick Murray, who were both ſecured in the caſtle of Edingburgh. The reſt not appearing were denounced rebels. The duke of Argyle arrived at Edingburgh the 14th of September. He went, the next day, and viewed the caſtle, and appointed Brigadier Grant to command it, till the arrival of Brigadier Preſton the deputy-governor.

The earl of Mar and his party, after having proclaimed the pretender at Kirk-Michael, on the 9th of September, continued there four or five days, and then proceeded to Moulin, another ſmall market-town in Perthſhire, where they likewiſe proclaimed the pretender, and reſted fourteen days, conſiderably increaſing their numbers. From hence they marched to Logaret, another market-town, where they were reckoned to be a thouſand men well armed. From Logaret they marched to Dunkeld, which they made their head-quarters; and here their numbers greatly increaſed again, for they were joined by two thouſand men from the Highlands, by the marquis of Tullibardine, by the earl of Broadalbin's men, and ſeveral others. Finding themſelves thus ſtrengthened, they reſolved to extend their quarters; and the earl of Mar having intelligence, that the earl of Rothes and the Gentlemen of Fife (who were up in arms for the king) were advancing to poſſeſs themſelves of Perth, which commands the paſſage over the Tay, reſolved to prevent them; and detached mr. John Hay, brother to the earl of Kinnoul, with a ſtrong party, with orders to poſſeſs himſelf of that place, which he performed effectually. As this was a great diſappointment to the king's troops, ſo it was a very great advantage to the earl of Mar, as it gave him the command of all Fife, the moſt fruitful, rich, and, for the convenience of the ſea-coaſt, the moſt commodious to him of any Shire in that part of Scotland; and as it gave a conſiderable reputation both to his conduct and to his party, who, upon this ſucceſs, made preparations in all parts to join him. And now they began to have the face of a formidable army, making this city their chief garriſon and head-quarters. A great many lords, chiefs of Clans, and other gentlemen from all quarters flocked to them, with their followers, and ſome of them in very good order, and well armed, particularly the marquis of Huntley, the earl of Seaforth, the Mackintoſhes, the earl Mariſchal, and with them ſo many, that their number was ſaid to be about twelve thouſand men, very well appointed, both horſe and foot.

From thence extending their quarters, they performed an exploit at Brunt-Iſland, which ſtill added to their reputation. They not only ſurprized the town, being ſtrong by ſituation, and a ſea-port on the Firth of Forth, in view of the city of Edingburgh; but, manning out ſome boats in the harbour, they ſeized a ſhip loaden with arms, ammunition, and other warlike ſtores, which lay in the Firth, bound to the north, for the uſe of the earl of Sutherland.

After this, they made themſelves maſters of all the towns upon the coaſt, even to the mouth of the Firth, the earl of Rothes, and the gentlemen with him, being obliged to ſeparate, or retire to Stirling, to the king's army.

The rebellion being come to this height, the earl of Mar reſolved, in conſert with his confederates (who began by this time to appear likewiſe in other places) to make an attempt upon the ſouth parts of Scotland, by a method, which at that time was thought almoſt impracticable. He ſent a ſtrong detachment to croſs the Firth of Forth, and land on the Lothian ſide, in order to be joined by their friends, whom they expected to riſe about Haddington, and on the borders of England. On their march to the ſea-coaſt they were covered by ſome horſe under the command of ſir John Areſkin of Alva, the maſter of Sinclair and ſir James Sharp, grandſon to archbiſhop Sharp, who, was murdered in his coach by the old cameronians. This body was commanded by the laird of Barlum, better known by the name of brigadier Makintoſh, and conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred men well armed. Orders had been given for all the boats on that ſide to be ready to carry them over. The king's ſhips in the Firth either ſeeing them, or having notice of the deſign, prepared to intercept them, if they ſhould attempt the paſſage; but the rebels made ſeveral countermarches to amuſe them till night came on; when, drawing down to the ſhore, ſeveral imbarked that night, and others the next, making directly over to the ſouth ſhore, the men of war not being able to prevent them. However one boat was taken with fifty men. Others were forced back to Fife again; among whom lord Strathmore, and his lieutenant-colonel Walkinſhaw of Barrowfield, and many were driven into the Iſle of May. Of the two thouſand five hundred deſigned for this deſcent upon the Lothians, only one thouſand five hundred of them landed; for the men of war being come down made it impracticable for the reſt to paſs; ſo they were obliged to ſtay till the next night, and then return to Criel on the ſhore of Fife. The others landed at North-Berwick, Aberlady, and other places on that coaſt, and quartered at Haddington, and Tranent the firſt night. This was certainly a bold attempt, for men in open boats to croſs an arm of the ſea ſixteen or ſeventeen miles broad, in ſight, and in defiance of three men of war, among whom they fell, but received no damage from them, but rather an advantage; for the lights of the ſhips, ſhewed them how to row to the ſhore. On the other hand, the government omitted nothing, that might prevent this attempt; no care was wanting to diſappoint them of veſſels for the undertaking: the magiſtrates of Edingburgh, and of the other towns on the Edith, having had notice from the duke of Argyle of this deſign, had cauſed all the boats that could be got, to be brought to Leith; and beſides the three ſhips of war, that lay in the road, ordered three cuſtom-houſe ſmacks, either to burn or bring over from Fife all the boats and veſſels they could find, to prevent the rebels coming over. But all theſe precautions proved ineffectual: the rebels, being maſters of all the ſea-ſhore from Cromarty to the Forth of Edingburgh, eaſily found means to get boats for their purpoſe; nor did they fail of all neceſſary policy in the management of the deſign; for, whilſt ſome of them amuſed the kings ſhips about Brunt-Iſland, as if they would paſs above Leith-Road, their main body embarked on the other ſide, under the conduct of brigadier Mackintoſh, quite out of ſight of the ſhips; and by that means came ſafe aſhore.

While this deſign was executing, the earl of Mar made a feigned march from Perth towards Dumblain, as if he intended to croſs the Forth at Stirling-Bridge, in order to divert the duke of Argyle from falling upon thoſe, who had croſſed the Firth. Nor did this prove ineffectual; for it obliged the duke of Argyle to return to ſtirling with the utmoſt expedition.

The Highlanders, who had thus croſſed the Firth, having refreſhed themſelves but one night at Haddington, marched directly towards Edingburgh, where they cauſed more terror than there was real danger; for, unleſs their number had been greater, it was impoſſible for them to force that city. It was indeed ſuppoſed, they expected to be joined by the rabble, and ſome tumult would be raiſed in their favour. In the mean time the duke of Argyle received letters from all hands, that, if he did not ſend a detachment of troops to Edingburgh, the town would certainly fall into the enemies hands. And therefore, though it had always been entirely againſt his opinion to divide the ſmall number of troops he had with him, he was obliged to comply, and went himſelf with a detachment of three hundred dragoons, and two hundred foot, mounted on country horſes for expedition, and arrived at Edingburgh in the night. The rebels who were then within four miles of the city, hearing of the arrival of this detachment, altered their reſolution of going directly to Edingburgh (which they would have infallibly taken) and marched into the citadel of Leith. [y] The next morning the duke of Argyle inveſted the town with the cavalry, and marched his two hundred foot with three hundred and fifty volunteers from Edingburgh, and the like number of lord Polwarth's militia, down to the ſea-ſhore, where, at a large breach in the old rampart, he judged it eaſy to enter; but, taking a near view of the place, he found, that, to come at the breach, the men muſt march at leaſt five hundred paces under a flank-fire; that the rebels had made a barricade along the breach; and that a garden-wall on the inſide flanked it. Theſe things made the duke unwilling to expoſe his few regular troops, though they ſhewed a great eagerneſs to aſſault. The rebels, in the citadel were about one thouſand two hundred; and the reſt, that paſſed the river, been in Eaſt Lothian, the duke thought fit to delay any attempt, and conſider of ſome proper method to diſlodge them. But in the middle of the night they abandoned the place, and retired into Seaton-houſe, a large, old, and ſtrong caſtle, ſeven miles from Edingburgh, leaving behind them ſome baggage and ammunition. Thirty-ſix of their men, and two officers, were taken by a detachment under colonel Dubourgay.

[x] The perſons ſummoned were:

The marquis of Huntley, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Gordon; the earls of Seaforth, Wintoun, Carnwarth, Southeſk, Nithſdale, Linlithgow, Mar, Kinnoul, Panmure, Mariſchal, Broadalbin; the viſcounts of Kenmure, Stormount, Kilſyth, Kingſton, Strathallen; the lords Ogilvie, Rollo, Drummond, Nairn, Glenorchy; ſir James Campbel of Auchenbrech, ſir Duncan Campbel of Lochnel, ſir Donald Macdonald, ſir Patrick Murray of Auchtertyre, ſir Hugh Paterſon of Bonnokburn, ſir Alexander Erſkine, lord Lyon, ſir John Maclean; lieutenant-general George Hamilton; the maſter of Stormount, the maſter of Nairn, mr. Alexander Mackenzie of Fraſerdale, James Stirling of Keir, Robert Stuart of Appin, John Campbel of Aſtrabalder, William Murray, junior of Auchtertyre, Alexander Robinſon of Strowan; the lairds of Mackinnan, Clanronold, Glenghary, Keppoch, William Drummond, ſervant to the lord Drummond, mr. Seaton of Touch, lieutenant Allen Cameron, Rob Roy, alias Mac-Gregor, mr. Stuart of Ard, mr. Francis Stuart, brother to the earl of Murray, John Cameron of Lochiell, mr. John Fullerton of Greenhall, Mackintoſh, junior of Borlam, James Malcolm, mr. Henry Maul, brother to the earl of Panmure, John Walkingſhaw of Barrowfield, Colin Campbel of Clenderule, ——Graham of Bucklivy, George Hume of Whitfield, mr. John Drummond, brother to the lord Drummond, Lyon of Auchterhouſe, colonel Balfour, the maſter of Balfour, and Bethune of Balfour.

Whilſt the rebels were in Seaton-houſe, ſeveral of the king's forces, joined by the well-affected gentlemen of the country, came from Edingburgh, and appeared near Preſton-Pans; which gave an alarm to the Highlanders; upon which a party marched out, and formed themſelves in order to receive thoſe, who appeared againſt them. But thoſe from Edingburgh, having made a halt, retired; and the rebels returned into their garriſon at Seaton-houſe. The next day, the earl of Rothes, with three hundred gentlemen volunteers, and the lord Torpichen with two hundred dragoons, left by the duke of Argyle, marched to Seaton-Houſe; but found the rebels ſo ſtrongly poſted, that it was impoſſible to diſlodge them without artillery. This animated the rebels; and, a good body of them advancing, ſome ſhot were exchanged, but at too great a diſtance to do any harm on either ſide; and the king's troops, ſeeing nothing could be done, retired.

The duke of Argyle having received intelligence from Stirling, that the earl of Mar, and the rebels under his command, were marching from Perth, he returned to Stirling to obſerve their motions, leaving a party to protect the people of Edingburgh from the inſults of the rabble. This was a feigned march of the earl of Mar, to draw the duke of Argyle from attempting any thing upon the Highlanders, who had croſſed the Forth. He gave out, that he would paſs the Forth with his whole army, either at Stirling, or at the bridge of Down. They began their march in the night of October the 17th, and advanced in three bodies; but upon notice, that the duke of Argyle was returned from purſuing the enemy, he marched back to Perth. All this was an amuſement, which indeed ſucceeded; for he broke the meaſures of the duke, who had reſolved to attac Seaton-houſe. But the earl was determined not to croſs the Forth till he had drawn all the clans together, and reduced the earl of Sutherland, whom if he ſhould leave in his rear, it might prove fatal to his deſigns, and expoſe all he had gained without oppoſition to be recovered by that lord.

The Highlanders ſtill continued at Seaton-Houſe, and ſent out parties to bring in proviſions, of which they procured great plenty, as cows, ſheep, meal, &c. They gave out, they reſolved to fortify themſelves, and make the houſe a magazine, while they raiſed an army, as well from the adjacent country and from Edingburgh, and from other friends to their deſign in the Weſt part of Scotland, who were preparing to join them, as from the borders of England, where by this time numbers were riſen in Northumberland.

While they ſtaid here, they diſcovered aboat at ſea, making towards the ſhore from the Fife-ſide of the Forth. The men of war fired very briſkly at her; but, the boat keeping to the windward at a diſtance, ſhe got ſafe to ſhore. This boat had been ſent by the rebels from Leith to the earl of Mar, and now brought back news concerning the proceedings of their friends at Perth, and orders to march towards England, to join the Northumbrians. Immediately after the receiving of theſe orders, two gentlemen brought them an account of the inſurrection in Northumberland under the command of mr. Forſter, and of the Southern Scots gentlemen under the lord Kenmure. Upon this they altered their reſolution of continuing at Seaton-Houſe; and having alſo received an expreſs from mr. Forſter, inviting them to meet him at Kelſo on the borders, they reſolved to march the next day towards him. Accordingly they ſet out in the morning for Lonformachus, a ſmall town ſeventeen miles from Seaton-Houſe. During this day's march, ſeveral of the Highlanders deſerted. As ſoon as major-general Wightman received intelligence of their motion, he marched from Edingburgh with eighty dragoons, fifty of the militia, and ſome volunteers, to attac their rear; but returned in the evening without ſucceſs, having only taken ſome of the deſerters, whom he made priſoners, and left fifty foot in Seaton-Houſe, where they had left a great deal of their ſpoil, Mackintoſh and his men marched from Lonformachus, towards another ſmall town in the Mers called Dunſe, where they drew up in order of battle, whilſt the pretender was proclaimed, retiring afterwards to their quarters in that town. The next morning they marched towards Kelſo, where the Engliſh and Scots horſe from Northumberland and Nithiſdale entered the ſame evening. The next day they proclaimed the pretender, and continued there till the 27th of October. [z] It will now be proper to ſee what was doing in other parts of Scotland.

The ſynods of Glaſgow, Air, Perth, Stirling, Merſe,

[y] This citadel is a ſquare fort, with four demi-baſtions, built in Oliver Cromwell's time, with a large dry ditch about it, never entirely demoliſhed.

[z] Mr Patten gives the following account of the ſtate of the rebels, at their junction at Kelſo.

The lord viſcount Kenmure had the chief command whilſt in Scotland. He was a grave, full-aged gentleman, of a very ancient family, and of great experience in political buſineſs, but of little or none in military affairs. He was of a ſingular good temper, but too mild and calm for ſuch a poſt. He had a troop of gentlemen with him, which, as he was general, was called the firſt troop, the command of which he gave to the honourable Bazil Hamilton of Beldoun, ſon to the lord Bazil Hamilton, brother to the late duke Hamilton, a very promiſing youth, and who behaved himſelf with a great deal of courage in the action at Preſton, though but very young.

The ſecond troop was called the Merſe troop, commanded by the honourable James Hume, eſq. brother to the earl of Hume, who, at that time, was priſoner in Edinburgh caſtle. This youth is of a good temper, but not very capable of having the command of a troop, as well on account of his age, as other incapacities. He was tried at the Marſhalſey, and found guilty.

The third troop, called the earl of Wintoun's troop, and commanded by himſelf. This earl is of a very ancient family, wants no courage, and has more capacity than his friends find it for his intereſt to ſuggeſt, as appears by the counſel he gave. He oppoſed the ſcheme of the Northumbrian gentlemen to march into England, and preſſed them to leave Edingburgh and Stirling to their fate, and go and join the Weſtern clans, attacing in their way the towns of Dumfries and Glaſgow, and then to open a communication with the earl of Mar. Had this advice been followed, it would, very probably, have proved very advantageous. The command of his troop he aſſigned, under himſelf, to captain James Dalziel, brother to the earl of Carnwarth, who had been in king George's ſervice formerly, and continued an half-pay officer for ſome time; but, upon engaging in the rebellion, he threw up his commiſſion; which piece of policy was the ſaving of his life, and prevented his being ſhot to death at Preſton, by ſentence of the court-martial, among the half-pay officers. He was a very bold and brave young gentleman, and ſhewed it upon all occaſions.

The fourth troop belonged to Robert Dalziel, earl of Carnwarth: this nobleman was brought up under the tuition of one, who made it his ſtudied care to inſtil the principles of hereditary-right, paſſive-obedience, and non-reſiſtance, into his mind. He ſtudied ſome time at Cambridge, and there ſucked in an entire affection for the liturgy and worſhip in uſe of the church of England, of which he was a ſincere devotee. He is ſingularly good in his temper, and of an agreeable affability, and delivers himſelf very handſomely in his diſcourſe. The command of this troop he gave over to his uncle James Dalziel, eſq. This gentleman had a very good character, and gave ſufficient demonſtrations of his affections to the pretender's intereſt, by his courage and conduct.

The fifth troop was under the command of captain Lockhart, brother to mr. Lockhart of Carnwarth; he was a half-pay officer in the lord Mark Ker's regiment, and as ſuch tried at Preſton, by a court-martial; by which being found guilty of deſertion, he, with three more, were ſhot to death there.

Theſe troops were well manned, and indifferently armed; but many of their horſes ſmall: beſides theſe, there were many volunteers, who were not formed into any regular troop.

The ſix regiments deſigned to croſs the Forth were:

Firſt, the earl of Strathmore's; but he and his lieutenant-colonel Walkinſhaw of Barrowfield were forced back in their paſſage by the king's men of war, with ſeveral others, and obliged to go on ſhore in the iſle of May. This regiment was not in Highland-dreſs, as the others were. This lord was a hearty friend of the pretender's, and had ſome time before this rebellion broke out, given it under his hand, that he would be ready, the firſt opportunity, to riſe and aſſiſt to eſtabliſh him upon the throne. This paper, which was ſigned by ſeveral others, was lodged in the hands of colonel Hookes, to be by him tranſported into France.

The ſecond regiment was the earl of Mar's, which came not entire over the Forth; for only major Forbes, with three captains and three lieutenants, were taken at Preſton, the reſt were driven back by the men of war.

The third, Logie Drummond's. This regiment came not entire over the Forth, being driven back on the Fife ſide, with many more; for, of the two thouſand five hundred deſigned to croſs the Firth, the better half were prevented. He that had the command of this regiment was one of thoſe that ſigned an anſwer to monſieur de Torcy's queſtions, which gave a diſtinct reſolution to each query, containing a full account of the ſtate of affairs; particularly an account of the inclinations of the people, to venture all for the chevalier's ſervice: this was when the people of Scotland were diſſatisfied about the union, in the year 1707. This paper was likewiſe lodged in the hands of colonel Hookes, to be by him tranſported into France.

The fourth, lord Nairn's, brother to the duke of Athal; but by marrying an heireſs, according to the cuſtom of Scotland, changed his own name for her's: he came over the Forth with a good many of his men. He is a gentleman well beloved in his country, and by all that had the advantage to be acquainted with him: he had formerly been at ſea, and gave ſignal inſtances of his bravery: he was a mighty ſtickler againſt the union. His ſon, who was lieutenant-colonel to lord Charles, took a great deal of pains to encourage the Highlanders by his own experience, in their hard marches, and always went with them on foot through the worſt and deepeſt ways, and in Highland-dreſs.

and Tiviotdale had very early publiſhed earneſt admonitions to perſons of all ranks, to animate them to the defence of king George and the conſtitution.

On the 28th of September, mr. James Murray, ſecond ſon of the lord viſcount Stourmont arrived incognito at Edingburgh from France, by way of England, croſſing the Firth at Newhaven above Leith, got undiſcovered into Fife, and ſo to the earl of Mar at Perth. He gave the rebels large promiſes of aſſiſtance both from France and England, and came with the character of Secretary of ſtate to the pretender for Scotland.

About this time a ſtrong party of the Macdonalds, Macleans, and Camerons, attempted to ſurprize the fortreſs of Inverlochy, and ſucceeded ſo far, as to take three redoubts at ſome diſtance from it; in one of which there was an officer with twenty men, and in another a ſerjeant with five; but, the main garriſon being on their guard, the rebels were diſappointed, and marched towards Argyleſhire.

On the 20th of October, an account was brought from the North to Edingburgh, that the earl of Sutherland, with the lord Rea and mr. Monzoe of Foulis, having drawn together about eighteen hundred men, advanced, on the 18th, to Alneſs, in order to attac the earl of Seaforth, who had aſſembled the clans of the Mackenzies, Macleods, and others; but that, upon a near view of the rebels, they appeared to be much ſuperior in number; and therefore it was judged proper for the earl of Sutherland to retire, which he did in good order, and without any loſs, to his own ſhire, where he was augmenting his forces, and preparing to come forward again, being aſſured of aſſiſtance from the Grants and Roſſes of Culraick, and other parts, and from ſome of the Fraſers.

Theſe motions of the earl of Sutherland kept the earl of Seaforth from joining the earl of Mar; the rebels under whom committed great ravages and diſorders in Fife. A party coming to Leſly, the chief ſeat of the earl of Rothes, after ſearching the houſe for arms, they forced open the church-doors, and, finding no arms there, broke into the burial-place of the family of Rothes, and, diging up the ground, tore open the coffins in a moſt ſhocking manner.

On the 20th of October a body of Weſtern Highlanders, conſiſting of two thouſand three hundred men, commanded by general Gordon, came before Inverary, the chief town in Argyleſhire; and, having that night viewed the place, marched back to a mill about half a mile from the town. Next day being reinforced by three hundred of the earl of Brodalbin's men, they viewed the town a ſecond time, and again returned to their former quarters. On the 22d they drew up a third time, and ſent detachments to cut faſcines, as if they deſigned to attac the town; but finding, that the earl of Ilay, who commanded in it, was ready to receive them, they thought fit once more to retreat to their quarters; and on the 24th left the place, and marched through Glenorches, in their way to join the earl of Mar. This preſervation of the town of Inverary was, at that juncture, a very conſiderable ſervice; for, had the rebels been maſters of that paſs, they might have poured in their men, either towards Glaſcow, or into the ſhire of Air, and ſo have joined the rebels in the North of England.

On the 23d of October the duke of Argyle received advice, that a party of rebels, conſiſting of two hundred foot, and one hundred horſe, were marching by Caſtle Campbel towards Dumferling; upon which he ſent away a detachment of dragoons under the command of colonel Cathcart, who came up with the rebels on the 24th at five in the morning; and, after having killed and wounded ſeveral of them, took ſeventeen priſoners, and amongſt them the following gentlemen, mr. Murray, brother to the laird of Aberkernie; mr. Hay, ſon to Arbath; mr. Patrick Gordon, Aberlour's eldeſt ſon; Alexander Forbes, ſon to Buſlie; William Robertſon, brother to Donſhils; mr. Kenlock, a phyſician; Alexander Smith; mr. Alexander Gordon; Francis Gordon, of Craig; mr. Hamilton, of Gibſtown in Strabogie; and George Gordon, of the mill of Kincardine. The ſame evening colonel Cathcart returned to the camp at Stirling with his priſoners, having had only one of his dragoons wounded.

About this time the earl of Mar received three letters, which had been intercepted by mr. Forſter one from lord Townſhend to the duke of Argyle; one from the earl of Nottingham to the duke of Roxburgh; and one from the prince of Wales to the duke of Argyle; of which we have an account in the following letter of the earl of Mar to the earl of Brodalbin, which gives a view of the ſtate of the rebels affairs at that time:

The fifth regiment was commanded by lord Charles Murray, a younger ſon of the duke of Athol: he had been a cornet of horſe beyond ſea, and had gained a mighty good character for his bravery, even temper, and graceful deportment. Upon all the marches, he could never be prevailed with to ride, but kept at the head of his regiment on foot, in his Highland-dreſs, without breeches: he would ſcarce accept of a horſe to croſs the rivers, which his men, in that ſeaſon of the year, forded above mid thigh deep in water. When the rebels ſurrendered at Preſton, he was tried for a deſerter, being a half-pay officer, and ſhot.

The ſixth regiment was called Mackintoſh's battalion, a relation of the brigadier's, who is chief of that clan. He is of an ancient family, deſcended from the old Thanes of Fife. His name, in the Iriſh, or Highland language, diſcovers his deſcent; for Toſh ſignifies Thane, and Mac ſon. His motto to his coat of arms is comical as well as remarkable, Touch not the cat without your glove; which coat of arms is ſupported by two wild cats, and has a cat for the creſt. The earl of Weems is deſcended from the ſame Thane of Fife; and it is diſputed whether he or mackintoſh are elder, though certain it is, that the earl of Weems retains a conſiderable part of Thane's eſtate. Whether Mackintoſh be elder or younger, he left Fife, and made a purchaſe in the North, where his ſucceſſors have lived for ſeveral hundreds of years in a handſome and ſplendid manner, and married the heireſs of Clancattau, whereof Mackintoſh became the head and chief; which has a great many tribes or followers, viz. the Macphersons, the Farquarſons of Brae-Mar, the Macgilwroys, the Shaws, Macbeans, Macqueens, Smiths and Clarks, &c. which joined together, make a numerous clan. The Macphersons would not on this occaſion follow their chief, but formed a ſeparate body for the pretender. This regiment came entire over the Firth. Mackintoſh is a gentleman that few people expected in the rebellion, having always appeared on the other ſide; but the perſuaſions of the brigadier prevailed with him. He is a handſome brave young gentleman, of a very conſiderable intereſt in his own country; for he can bring into the field upon any occaſion one thouſand ſtout, hardy, and well armed men.

The Engliſh were not ſo well regulated, or ſo well armed as the Scots. The troops were: Firſt, the earl of Derwentwater's, commanded by his brother Charles Radcliffe, eſq. and captain John Shaftoe. That earl being a papiſt, and a relation of the pretender's, having it ſeems had the opportunity of being perſonally acquainted with him, all theſe circumſtances unhappily concurred to draw him into this ſnare, to his deſtruction, and the utter ruin of the moſt flouriſhing family in that part of Britain.

It was thought, however, that this lord did not join either ſo heartily or ſo premeditately in this affair as was expected; for there is no doubt but he might have brought far greater numbers of men into the field than he did; the great eſtate he poſſeſſed, the money he could command, his intereſt among the gentlemen, and which is above all, his being ſo well beloved as he was, could not have failed to have procured him many hundreds of followers more than he had, if he had thought fit; for his concerns in the lead-mines in Alſtone-Moor are very conſiderable, where ſeveral hundreds of men are employed under him, and get their bread from him, whom, there is no doubt, he might eaſily have engaged: beſides this, the ſweetneſs of his temper and diſpoſition, in which he had few equals, had ſo ſecured him the affection of all his tenants, neighbours, and dependants, that multitudes would have lived and died with him: the truth is, he was a man formed by nature to be generally beloved; for he was of ſo univerſal a benificence, that he ſeemed to live for others, as he lived among his own people, there he ſpent his eſtate, and continually did offices of kindneſs and good neighbourhood to every body, as opportunity offered. He kept a houſe of generous hoſpitality and noble entertainment, which few in that country do, and none come up to. He was very charitable to poor and diſtreſſed families on all occaſions, whether known to him or not, and whether papiſt or proteſtant. His fate will be ſenſibly felt by a great many, who had no kindneſs for the cauſe he died in, and who heartily wiſh he had not forwarded his ruin, and their loſs, by his indiſcretion in joining this mad as well as wicked undertaking. If the warrant from the ſecretary's office for apprehending him had been made a greater ſecret than it was, he might have been taken, and ſo his ruin have been prevented. His brother is young and bold, but too forward: He has a great deal of courage, which wants a few more years, and a better cauſe to improve it; there is room to hope he will never employ it in ſuch an adventure again.

The ſecond troop was the lord Widdrington's commanded by mr. Thomas Errington of Beaufront. This Errington is a gentleman of a very antient family in Northumberland, a younger brother of the family of Errington: He has very good natural parts, and had been formerly an officer in the French ſervice, where he had got the reputation of a good ſoldier. It is believed he would not have engaged in this rebellion, had not the many obligations he lay under to the earl of Derwentwater prevailed with him.

The third troop was commanded by captain John Hunter, born upon the river North-Tyne in the county of Northumberland: He had obtained a commiſſion in the latter end of queen Anne's reign to raiſe an independent company, but never received any pay, nor liſted any men, but when he made uſe of that commiſſion now in the rebellion. He was famous for running uncuſtomed goods out of Scotland into England. He behaved with great vigour and obſtinacy in the action at Preſton, where he took poſſeſſion of ſome houſes during the attac, and galled that brave regiment of brigadier Preſton's, making a great ſlaughter out of the windows: He has ſince made his eſcape out of Cheſter-Caſtle, and, as is ſaid, got over into Ireland, and from thence to France.

The fourth troop was commanded by Robert Douglas, brother to the laird of Finland in Scotland: He ſignalized himſelf upon ſeveral accounts; for going ſo often, ſo privately, and expeditiouſly betwixt England and the earl of Mar. He was the man who brought mr. Forſter his commiſſion, and the manifeſtoes and declarations of the pretender. He was indefatigable in ſearching for arms and horſes, a trade, ſome were pleaſed to ſay, he had followed out of the rebellion as well as in it. He was alſo very vigorous in the action at Preſton; where he with his men were poſſeſſed of ſeveral houſes, and did a great deal of harm to his majeſty's forces from the windows. He alſo made his eſcape when a priſoner, either at Liverpool or Cheſter.

The fifth troop was commanded by captain Nicholas Wogan, an Iriſh gentleman, but deſcended from an antient family of that name in Wales; he joined the rebels at their firſt meeting. He is a gentleman of a moſt generous mind, and a great deal of bravery, unwearied to forward the good of his cauſe: His bravery was made known by ſeveral inſtances in the action at Preſton: His generoſity, as well as courage, was moſt remarkable in bringing off priſoner captain Preſton, of Preſton's regiment of foot, who was mortally wounded through the body by a bullet from the rebels, and juſt at the point of being cut in pieces; he hazarded his life among his own men, if poſſible, to ſave that gentleman, though an enemy, and was wounded in doing it. Beſides theſe there were many volunteers not formed into any troop, and the whole amounted to about two thouſand horſe and foot.

My dear Lord,

'I had the pleaſure of your lordſhips of the 13th laſt night. I have now ſent one hundred bolls of meal, and what quantity of ammunition we could ſpare, for the uſe of the army under general Gordon; all which is ſent under an eſcort of forty men to Taymouth, and from thence your lordſhip will take care to tranſport it to your army.

You aſk for news, and I can tell you a good deal pretty agreeable. Moſt of our Fife detachment are got over to the other ſide, and proclaimed the king yeſterday at Haddington. I have now a letter from mr. Forſter, with three letters they had intercepted; one from lord Townſhend to duke of Argyle; one from lord Nottingham to duke of Roxburgh, and one from prince Hopeful to duke of Argyle, of which I ſend your lordſhip a copy, and by that you will judge pretty well of the ſituation of our enemies. By Hopeful's letter it will ſeem, that the duke of Ormond is in England by this time. Mr. Forſter's letter is three days after his laſt to me. He was then three hundred horſe, and was to be joined next day by all the border, and go ſtrait to New-caſtle, which they were ſure of, and of getting good numbers of the beſt foot in the North of England to join them. By them and our men on the South ſide, all correſpondence betwixt London and the duke of Argyle will be ſtopped. I have heard nothing yet of theſe four battalions, and if Evans's dragoons from Ireland to duke Argyle be come: but, if the news we had of the commotions in that country be not true, they will certainly be with him ſoon; and by that your lordſhip will eaſily ſee the neceſſity of Gordon's finiſhing his buſineſs in Argyleſhire without delay, and marching Weſt. Tom. Forſter thinks and preſſes my attacing duke of Argyle before that enforcement join him; which I wiſh heartily to do; but that muſt be as things happen. The affair of Argyleſhire being finiſhed by your lordſhip and Gordon, is of great conſequence to this, as well as other things. Therefore I am ſure your lordſhip and he will loſe no time in it.

By lord Nottingham's to duke of Roxburgh, I perceive your lordſhip has had the honour of a letter from his grace; to which I have no doubt of your giving a ſuitable anſwer. The paragraph of the letter is this; Not having time to ſend you the whole; and beſide, it ſignifies little. Though what you writ to my lord Brodalbin was in itſelf very proper; yet, I doubt it will have little effect upon him, unleſs he were convinced of the folly of this attempt, from ſome aſſurance, that not only the preparations againſt them would be ſufficient to ſuppreſs them; and that all their expectation of aſſiſtance from abroad, or by an inſurrection in England, would certainly fail them.

Theſe are the words of the letter; and it is dated the 3d of this month. That of Hopeful to duke of Argyle is of the 7th, by which they then knew of duke Ormond's leaving Paris, which they had not when Nottingham wrote his letter. And, now that they muſt know of the inſurrection in England being far from failing us, I leave your lordſhip to judge what they are not thinking at London of their condition. I have read moſt of Hopeful's letter to the company here: What I have not read is the firſt paragraph; and that I think your lordſhip had beſt not ſhew to any body ſave to general Gordon.

I juſt now hear from Monteith, that the earls Ilay and Bute are certainly in Argyleſhire; and that there are two men of war come into Clyde, who were ſending their long-boats to retake the boats on Lochlomond, which Glyngill has ſeized. I wiſh, with all my heart, this could be prevented, and that theſe folks were driven from Inverary, which I am ſure your lordſhip and general Gordon will loſe no time in doing. I am ſorry for more in that country's following Lawer's example; and particularly, I am ſurprized exceedingly with Lochnell's behaviour, which I knew ſome days ago; but I hear they have uſed him as he deſerves. One near Stirling wrote to me two days ago, that the duke of Argyle had ſent him priſoner to Edingburgh, which, I wiſh, may be true. I hope it will not be in the power of thoſe rogues to do us much hurt, eſpecially when your lordſhip's being heartily in the cauſe of your king and country is known to them: and I aſſure your lordſhip, thoſe vaſſals of your's, who miſbehave, ſhall be uſed as you deſire.

I have ſent to Aberdeen for the printing-preſs, and we have lawyers here, with whom I adviſe as your lordſhip recommends.

Theſe men of Glenlyon's, you mentioned, were in Fife, and are gone over: So I have ſent a party of Macphersons with the meal and ammunition to Taymouth, who are to return from that; and your lordſhip will take care of it from thence. I have recommended it to your doers there, in caſe of your abſence; and I ſend this by an expreſs, that you may have it ſooner than that party can march.

I'll long to hear from your lordſhip, and that you will ſend me ſome good news from your parts in return for all this.

The thing I am moſt in pain about is our friends, who are gone over to the other ſide, becauſe of mr. Forſter's marching towards Newcaſtle; and nothing could ſo much prevent the duke of Argyle's ſending a detachment that way, as your clearing Argyleſhire ſoon, and marching Weſtwards, as Gordon has orders.

I am, my dear Lord,
Your Lordſhip's moſt obedient and moſt humble ſervant,

Soon after, two letters from the earl of Mar were intercepted, and the pretender cauſed a declaration to be drawn up. [a]

The rebellion being thus kindled as well in England as Scotland, it was thought proper to demand in form of the ſtates-general the ſix thouſand men, which by the treaty of guarantee they were engaged to ſend over when required. The ſtates immediately complied with the demand, and preparations were made for tranſporting them. At the ſame time, general Cadogan repreſented to the ſtates, that the king, having received advice that the pretender, James Butler late duke of Ormond, Henry St John late viſcount Boling-

[a] The letters and declaration were as follow

To the Lord Viſcount Kenmure.

My Lord,

'I long extremely to hear from you, you may be ſure, ſince I have not had the leaſt accounts almoſt of your motions, ſince I ſent the detachment over. I hope all is pretty right again; but it was an unlucky miſtake of brigadier Mackintoſh in marching from Haddington to Leith. I cannot but ſay though, that it was odd your lordſhip ſent no orders or intelligence to him, when you had reaſon to expect that party's coming over every day. His retreat he made from Leith, and now from Seaton, with the help of the movement I made from this, makes ſome amends for that miſtake; and I hope that party of men with him will be of great uſe to you, and the cauſe. I wiſh you may find a way of ſending the incloſed to mr. Forſter, which I leave open for your lordſhip to read; and I have little further to ſay to you, than what you will find in it. I know ſo little of the ſituation of your affairs, that I muſt leave to yourſelve what is fit for you to do, as will moſt conduce to the ſervice; and I know you will take good advice.

My humble ſervice to all friends with you, particularly brigadier Mackintoſh, lord Nairn, lord Charles Murray, and Mackintoſh, who, I hope, are joined you long e'er now; and indeed they all deſerve praiſe for their gallant behaviour. I muſt not forget Kinackin, who I hear ſpoke ſo reſolutely to the duke of Argyle from the citadel; and I hope Innereal and all my men with him are well; and their countrymen long to be at them, which I hope they and we ſhall ſoon. I have ſent another copy of the incloſed to mr. Forſter by ſea; ſo it will be hard, if none of them come to his hands.

I know your lordſhip will endeavour to let me hear from you as ſoon as poſſible, which I long impatiently for; and I hope you will find a way of ſending it ſafe. In one of my former either to your lordſhip, or to ſome body to ſhew you, I told, that a part of the army would be about Dumbarton. But now you would not rely on that, for, till I hear from general Gordon, I am uncertain, if they hold that way. I have ſent your lordſhip a copy of my new commiſſion, which perhaps you have not ſeen before. I have named the ſeveral general officers, and your lordſhip has the rank of a brigadier of the horſe.

I am told earl Wintoun has been very uſeful to our men we ſent over. I ſuppoſe he is now with your lordſhip, and I beg you may make my compliments to his lordſhip; and I hope the king will ſoon thank him himſelf.

I will trouble your lordſhip no farther now; but all ſucceſs attend you and may we ſoon have a merry meeting. I am with all reſpect,

My Lord,

To Mr. Forſter General of the King's forces in Northumberland.

Sir,

'I wrote to you of the 17th from Auchterardre: which I hope you got. I marched the ſame night the horſe to Dumblain, within four miles of Stirling, and the foot ſome miles ſhort of that place. Next morning I had certain intelligence of the duke of Argyle's returning from Edinburgh with moſt of the troops he had carried there, and was on their march towards Stirling. I alſo had account of Evans's regiment landing in the weſt of Scotland from Ireland, and were on their way to Stirling. I had come away from Perth before the proviſions were ready to go with us; and I found all the country about Sterling, where we were to paſs the Forth, was entirely exhauſted by the enemy, ſo that there was nothing for us to ſubſiſt on there. I had no account from general Gordon, as I expected; and the ſooneſt I could expect him at the heads of Forth was two days after that; and I could not think of paſſing Forth till I had been joined by him. Under thoſe difficulties, and having got one of the things I deſigned by my march, the duke of Argyle's withdrawing from our friends in Lothian, I thought fit to march back to Auchterardre, which was a better quarter, though not a good one neither. Next morning I got intelligence of the duke of Argyle's being come to Stirling the night before, and that he had ſent an expreſs to Evans's dragoons to haſten up. I had a letter alſo that morning from general Gordon, telling me, that ſome things had kept him longer than he expected that it would be that day e'er he could be at Inverary; and that he could not poſſibly join me this week. Upon this I thought it better to return here, which is a good quarter, and wait his coming up, and the lord Seaforth's, than continue at Auchterardre, ſince it would not a bit retard my paſſing the Forth, when I ſhould be in a condition to do it; and in the mean broke, and other traitors, deſigned to paſs through their dominions in order to go to Great-Britain and join the rebels, deſired them to give orders to all the governors of the places under their dominion, to ſtop and examine all the king's ſubjects that ſhould paſs out of Germany, Lorrain, or France, and alſo to all the captains of ſhips not to take any ſuch on board. This memorial was readily agreed to, and orders were iſſued accordingly.

As it would be ſome time before the Dutch could be embarked, Pitt's regiment of horſe, and Sabine's, Preſton's, and Vane's of foot, had been ſent for from Ireland, and had landed at Cheſter the beginning of October. Aſſociations were alſo entered into throughout the kingdom, for the defence of the king's perſon and government; and the lords-lieutenants of the counties were empowered to form into troops or companies ſuch as ſhould be willing to aſſociate, and to grant commiſſions to them in the king's name.

The archbiſhop publiſhed a declaration, ſigned by himſelf and thirteen of his ſuffragans, teſtifying their abhorrence of the rebellion. But dr. Atterbury biſhop of Rocheſter, and dr. Smalridge biſhop of Briſtol, refuſed to ſign this declaration; and, a few days after, Smalridge was removed from the poſt of lord Almoner to the king, in which he was ſucceeded by dr. Wake biſhop of Lincoln.

On the 25th of October, lieutenant-general Carpenter, who was appointed to go againſt the Northumberland rebels, ſet out from Newcaſtle with Hotham's regiment of foot, Cobham's, Moleſworth's, and Churchill's dragoons; and, time I could be getting proviſions ready to carry along with me in my march, which as I have been told, are abſolutely neceſſary about the heads of Forth: So I came home laſt night.

I very much regret my being obliged to this for many reaſons, particularly becauſe of its keeping me ſo much the longer from joining you; but you eaſily ſee it was not in my power to help it. However, I hope my ſtay here ſhall be very ſhort, and you may depend upon its being no longer than it neceſſarily muſt. The paſſage over the Forth is now ſo extreme difficult, that it is ſcarce poſſible to ſend any letters that way; and within theſe two days there were two boats coming over with letters to me, that were ſo hard purſued, that they were obliged to throw the letters into the ſea; ſo that I know very little of our friends on that ſide, and leſs of you, which is no ſmall loſs to me. I heard to day by word of mouth, that the detachment I ſent over are marched and joined our friends in the ſouth of Scotland; ſo I hope they may be yet uſeful; but I hope you know more of them than I do. I have now writ to lord Kenmure, but it is ten to one, if it comes to his hands. I know not what he is doing, where he is, or what way he intends to diſpoſe of his people; whether he is to march into England, or towards Stirling, to wait my paſſing Forth; and, in the ignorance I am in of your affairs beſouth the river, I ſcarce know what to adviſe him. If you be in need of his aſſiſtance in England, I doubt not but you have called him there; but if not, certainly his being in the rear of the enemy when I paſs Forth, or now that the duke of Argyle is reinforced, ſhould he march towards me before I am, it would be of great ſervice. I amforced in a great meaſure, to leave it to himſelf to do as he finds moſt expedient.

I am afraid the duke of Ormond is not as yet come to England; elſe I ſhould have had the certainty of it one way or other before now. I cannot conceive what detains him, nor the king from coming here. However, I am ſure it is non of their fault; and I hope they will both ſurprize us agreeably very ſoon.

I believe I told you in my laſt of the lord Strathmore, and two hundred of the detachment, that were going over Forth, and drove into the Iſland of May by three men of war, being got ſafe aſhore on this ſide, and are now joined us again. There were but two of all the boats taken; and I hear ſome of the men, that were in them, who were made priſoners in Leith, were relieved by our men, when they came there; but that their officers were ſent to Edingburgh-caſtle; ſo I want ſome repriſals for them, which I hope to have e're long.

Though brigadier Mackintoſh's miſtake in going to Leith was like to be unlucky to us and them, yet it has given the duke of Argyle no little trouble; and our march obliging him to let them ſlip, has, I am apt to believe, vexed him.

I beg you will find ſome way to let me hear from you. Ever ſince my detachment were in Fife, all the men of war, that cruiſed on the North coaſt, betwixt Peterhead and the Firth, have been in the Firth, and, I believe, will continue there to prevent my ſending more over that way; ſo that all that coaſt is clear, which I wiſh to God the king knew; and you may eaſily ſend a boat here any where with letters from England. I hear there is one of the regiments of foot come from Ireland to Stirling.

When you write to me, if by ſea, pray ſend me ſome news-papers, that I may know what the world is a doing; for we know little of it here theſe eight days. Succeſs attend you: and I am, with all truth and eſteem,

SIR,

Your moſt obedient Humble ſervant,
MAR.'

From the camp at Perth, October 12, 1715.

'The pretender's declaration was in the following terms:

James R.

'James VIII, by the grace of God, of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to all our loving ſubjects of what degree or quality ſoever greeting. As we are firmly reſolved never to omit any opportunity of aſſerting our undoubted title to the imperial crown of theſe realms, and of endeavouring to put ourſelf into the poſſeſſion of that right, which is devolved upon us by the laws of God and man; ſo muſt we, in juſtice to the ſentiments of our own heart, declare, that nothing in this world can give us ſo great ſatisfaction, as to owe, to the endeavours of our loyal ſubjects, both our and their reſtoration to that happy ſettlement, which can alone deliver this church and nation from the calamities, which they lie at preſent under, and from thoſe future miſeries, which muſt be the conſequences of the preſent uſurpation. During the life of our dear ſiſter of glorious memory, the happineſs, which our people enjoyed, ſoftened in ſome degree the hardſhip of our own fate: and we muſt further confeſs, that when we reflected on the goodneſs of her nature, and her inclinations to juſtice, we could not but perſuade ourſelf, that ſhe intended to eſtabliſh and perpetuate the peace, which ſhe had given to theſe kingdoms, by deſtroying for ever all competition to the ſucceſſion of the crown, and by ſecuring to us at laſt the enjoyment of that inheritance, out of which we had been ſo long kept, which her conſcience muſt inform her was our due, and which her principles muſt lead her to deſire, that we might obtain.

But, ſince the time when it pleaſed Almighty God to put a period to her life, and not to ſuffer us to throw ourſelf, as we then fully purpoſed to have done, upon our people, we have not been able to look on the preſent condition of our kingdoms, or to conſider their future proſpect, without all the horror and indignation, which ought to fill the breaſt of every Scotſman.

We have beheld a foreign family, aliens to our country, diſtant in blood, and ſtrangers even to our language, aſcend the throne.

We have ſeen the reins of government put into the hands of a faction; and that authority, which was deſigned for the protection of all, exerciſed by a few of the worſt, to the oppreſſion of the beſt and greateſt number of our ſubjects. Our ſiſter has not been left at reſt in her grave; her name has been ſcurrilouſly abuſed; her glory, as far as in theſe people lay, inſolently defaced, and her faithful ſervants inhumanly perſecuted. A parliament has been procured by the moſt unwarrantable influences, and by the groſſeſt corruption, to ſerve the vileſt ends. And they, who ought to be the guardians of the liberties of the people, are become the inſtruments of tyranny. Whilſt the principal powers engaged in the late wars enjoy the bleſſings of peace, and are attentive to diſcharge their debts, and eaſe their people; Great-Britain, in the midſt of peace, feels all the load of a war. New debts are contracted; new armies are raiſed at home; Dutch forces are brought into theſe kingdoms; and by taking poſſeſſion of the duchy of Bremen, in violation of the public faith, a door is opened by the uſurper to let in an inundation of foreigners from abroad, and to reduce theſe nations to the ſtate of a province, to one of the moſt inconſiderable provinces of the empire.

Theſe are ſome few of the many real evils, into which theſe kingdoms have been betrayed, under pretence of being reſcued and ſecured from dangers purely imaginary. And theſe are the conſequences of abandoning the old conſtitution, as we perſuade ourſelves, very many of thoſe, who promoted the preſent unjuſt and illegal ſettlement, never intended.

We obſerve, with the utmoſt ſatisfaction, that the generality of our ſubjects are awakened with a juſt ſenſe of their danger; and that they ſhew themſelves diſpoſed to take ſuch meaſures, as may effectually reſcue them from that bondage, which has, by the artifice of a few deſigning men, and by the concurrence of many unhappy cauſes, been brought upon them.

We adore the wiſdom of the Divine Providence, which has opened a way to our reſtoration, by the ſucceſs of thoſe very meaſures, that were laid to diſappoint us for ever. And we moſt earneſtly conjure all our loving ſubjects, not to ſuffer that ſpirit to faint or die away, which has been ſo miraculouſly raiſed in all parts of the kingdom; but to purſue, with all the vigour and hopes of ſucceſs, which ſo juſt and righteous a cauſe ought to inſpire, thoſe methods, which the finger of God ſeems to point out to them.

We are come to take our part in all the dangers and difficulties, to which any of our ſubjects, from the greateſt down to the meaneſt, may be expoſed on this important occaſion, to relieve our ſubjects of Scotland from the hardſhips they groan under on account of the late unhappy union, and to reſtore the kingdom to its ancient, free, and independant ſtate.

We have before our eyes the example of our royal grandfather, who fell a ſacrifice to rebellion; and of our royal uncle, who, by a train of miracles, eſcaped the rage of the barbarous and blood-thirſty rebels, and lived to exerciſe his clemency towards thoſe, who had waged war againſt his father and himſelf; who had driven him to ſeek ſhelter in foreign lands, and who had even ſet a price upon his head.

We ſee the ſame inſtance of cruelty renewed againſt us by men of the ſame principles, without any other reaſon than the conſciouſneſs of their own guilt, and the implacable malice of their own hearts. For, in the account of ſuch men, it is a crime ſufficient to be born their king. But God forbid, that we ſhould tread in theſe ſteps, or that the cauſe of a lawful prince and an injured people ſhould be carried on like that of uſurpation and tyranny, and owe its ſupport to aſſaſſins. We ſhall copy after the patterns abovementioned, and be ready, with the former of our royal Anceſtors, to ſeal the cauſe of our country, if ſuch be the will of Heaven, with our blood. But we hope for better things: We hope, with the latter, to ſee our juſt rights, and thoſe of the church and people of Scotland, once more ſettled in a free, independent Scots parliament, on their antient foundation. To ſuch a parliament (which we will immediately call) ſhall we entirely refer both our and their intereſts, being ſenſible, that theſe intereſts, rightly underſtood, are always the ſame. Let the civil as well as religious rights of all our ſubjects receive their confirmation in ſuch a parliament. Let conſciences truly tender be indulged. Let property of every kind be better than ever ſecured. Let an act of general grace and amneſty extinguiſh the fears even of the moſt guilty. If poſſible, let the very remembrance of all, which have proceeded this happy moment, be utterly blotted out, that our ſubjects may be united to us, and to each other, in the ſtricteſt bonds of affection as well as intereſt.

And that nothing may be ommitted, which is in our power to contribute to this deſirable end, we do, by theſe preſents, abſolutely and effectually, for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, pardon, remit, and diſcharge all crimes of high-treaſon, miſpriſion of treaſon, and all other crimes and offences whatſoever, done or committed againſt us, or our royal father, of bleſſed memory, by any of our ſubjects, of what degree or quality ſoever, who ſhall, at or after our landing, and before they engage in any action againſt us, or our forces, from that time, lay hold of mercy, and return to that duty and allegiance, which they owe to us, their only rightful and lawful ſovereign.

By the joint endeavours of us and of our parliament, urged by theſe motives, and directly by theſe views, we may hope to ſee the peace and flouriſhing eſtate of this kingdom in a ſhort time reſtored; and we ſhall be equally forward to concert with our parliament ſuch further meaſures, as may be thought neceſſary for leaving the ſame to future generations.

And we hereby require all ſheriffs of Shires, ſtewarts of ſtewarties, or their deputies, and magiſtrates of burghs, to publiſh this our declaration, immediately after it ſhall come to their hands, in the uſual places and manner, under pain of being proceeded againſt for failure thereof, and forfeiting the benefit of our general pardon.'

Given under our ſign manual and privy ſignet, at our court of Commercy, the 25th day of October, and in the fifteenth year of our reign.

on the 27th, lay at Wooller, intending, the next day, to face Kelſo, where the rebels were. The lord Kenmure, who commanded them while on the South-ſide of the Tweed, having notice of this, called immediately a council of war, wherein it was conſidered what courſe they ſhould take. The lord Wintoun preſſed them earneſtly to march into the Weſt of Scotland; but the Engliſh oppoſed, and prevailed againſt that opinion. Then it was propoſed to paſs the Tweed, and attac the king's troops, taking advantage of the weakneſs and wearineſs of general Carpenter's men, who were indeed extremely fatigued, and not above nine hundred men in number, whereof two regiments of dragoons were new raiſed, and had never ſeen any ſervice. But this advice was alſo rejected, and the rebels decamped from Kelſo, and, taking a little to the right, marched to Jedburgh. Upon this march they were all alarmed, by miſtaking a party of their own men for ſome of general Carpenter's forces. The party appearing at a diſtance, Captain Wogan, deſirous to know who they were, went off towards the river's ſide, which parted them, and left mr. Patten to ſtand at a convenient diſtance from him, whilſt he rid up to make a diſcovery. If they proved enemies, he was to fire a piſtol; if friends, to toſs up his hat. At the ſame time ſome of the party, wanting to know who he was, and, galloping towards him, he fired a piſtol; ſo the alarm was taken; but the diſorder was not great, the matter being ſoon diſcovered. Then they continued their march towards Jedburgh. The horſe having entered the town, word was brought them, that general Carpenter had fallen upon the foot, who had not as yet reached the town. This put them into the utmoſt conſternation. However, not being diſcouraged ſo as to abandon their fellows, they all mounted their horſes, and marched out to relieve their friends. This miſtake was likewiſe occaſioned by another party of their own men, who had taken a different route; and, this being alſo diſcovered, they all returned to their quarters, and ſtaid at Jedburgh two days.

As they had now a fair opportunity to ſlip general Carpenter, who was ſome marches behind them, it was reſolved, purſuant to the advice of the Engliſh, to croſs the mountains, and march into England. Accordingly, captain Hunter, who was well acquainted with the country, was ordered, with his troops, to go in the North Tynedale, and there provide quarters for them, who would follow. But here began a mutiny; the Highlanders could not be perſuaded to paſs the borders: and, though many perſuaſions were uſed with them, they would not ſtir. Upon this, the firſt reſolution was altered, and orders were ſent after captain Hunter to countermand him. They were joined in this town by mr. Ainſley of Blackhill, and ſome others. From Jedburgh they marched to Hawick, a ſmall market-town, belonging to the ducheſs of Bucclugh, at whoſe houſe the Engliſh lords, with their relations, and mr. Forſter, took up their quarters. The Highlanders ſtill ſuppoſing, that the march for England was reſolved on, ſeparated themſelves in diſguſt, and went to the top of a riſing ground on Hawich moor, and, reſting their arms declared, they would fight, if they were led on to the enemy; but would not go into England; adhering to lord Wintoun's advice, that they would go through the weſt of Scotland, join the clans there, and either croſs the Forth ſome miles above Stirling, or ſend word to the earl of Mar, that they would fall upon the duke of Argyle's rear, whilſt he fell on his front. Whilſt they were in this humour, they would allow none to come and ſpeak with them but the earl of Wintoun, who had tutored them in this project, by aſſuring them, if they went to England, they would be all cut to pieces, or taken and ſold for ſlaves. [b] After a diſpute oftwo hours they were at laſt brought to this, that they would keep together as long as they ſtaid in Scotland; but upon any motion of going for England, they would return back: So they continued their march to Hawick, where they were extremely ſtraitened for quarters. Here the Highlanders, who had always the guard, and did all the duty after they joined the horſe, diſcovered from their advanced guard a party of horſe (who were patroling in their front) and, taking them for enemies, gave the alarm at midnight; and all ran immediately to arms. The moon ſhone, and the night was very clear; ſo the whole body formed themſelves in very good order to oppoſe any attac, that ſhould be made. But in the end this proved another falſe alarm; and they all returned to their quarters. It was ſaid, that this alarm was deſigned to try the Highlanders, and to ſee how they would behave, and whether they would ſtand chearfully to their arms, if an enemy appeared.

The next day, they marched to Langholme, another ſmall market-town, belonging to the ducheſs of Bucclugh. From hence there was a ſtrong detachment of horſe ſent in the night to Ecclefechan, with orders to block up Dumfries, till they ſhould come up and attac it. Dumfries is a rich town, ſituated very commodiouſly upon the mouth of a navigable river on the Iriſh ſea, and maintains a conſiderable trade with England and the weſt of Scotland. Had the rebels been ſteady in their reſolutions, they might very eaſily have made themelves maſters of that town, there being no regular forces in it, but only train-bands, militia, and townſmen, who would not have been able to hold out, nor any fortifications to aſſiſt them in the defence of it. Here the rebels alſo might have furniſhed themſelves with arms, money, and ammunition, which were much wanted, and opened a paſſage to Glaſgow, one of the beſt towns in Scotland. Here likewiſe they might have joined the Highland clans, from the weſt, beſides a great many country gentlemen, who, on ſuch an appearance, would have come in to them; by which means they might have ſoon formed a conſiderable army, and have received ſuccours from France and Ireland, no men of war being in all thoſe ſeas at that time. They were, moreover, aſſured, that in Glaſgow there were a great many arms in the talbooth ready for all occaſions, and a conſiderable quantity of gun-powder in the tron-ſteeple. As to the duke of Argyle, he was in no condition to have diſturbed them; but, on the contrary, would have ſcarce thought himſelf ſafe in Stirling, his troops not exceeding two thouſand men; for he had not then been reinforced by the troops from Ireland, nor the Dutch from England. But all theſe arguments were in vain; the Engliſh gentlemen were poſitive for an attempt upon their own country, pretending to have letters from their friends in Lancaſhire, inviting them thither, and aſſuring them, that there would be a general inſurrection upon their appearing; and that twenty thouſand men would immediately join them. Whether they had any ſuch letters or no, is ſtill a queſtion; but they affirmed it to their army, and urged the advantages of a ſpeedy march into England with ſuch vehemence, that they turned the ſcale, and ſent an expreſs after the party of horſe they had ordered to Ecclefechan, for to return and meet them at Langtown in Cumberland. Thus the deſign of continuing in Scotland was abandoned. But the Highlanders, whether dealt with privily by the earl of Wintoun, or being convinced of the advantages they were going to throw away, and the uncertainties the were bringing upon themſelves, halted a ſecond time, and would march no farther. However, their leaders were again prevailed with to march by promiſes, and diſtributing money to the men. But many of them were ſtill poſitive, and that to ſuch a degree that they ſeparated, and about five hundred of them went off in bodies, chuſing rather, as they ſaid, to ſurrender themſelves priſoners, than to go forward to certain deſtruction. All imaginable means were uſed to prevent this deſertion; but nothing could prevail with them to alter their reſolutions; for they retired in parties over the mountains. The earl of Wintoun went off likewiſe with part of his troop, very much diſſatisfied at the meaſurs, an declaring they were taking the way to ruin themſelves. However, in a little time he returned and joined the body, though not at all ſatisfied with their proceedings; and was never after called to any council of war, which incenſed him extremely againſt the reſt of the lords and commanding officers. They left the ſmall pieces of cannon, which they had brought from Kelſo, at Langholme, having nailed them up and made them unfit for ſervice. Then they marched that night to Langtown, about ſeven miles from Carliſle, which was a very long and fatiguing march. Here they had intelligence, that brigadier Stanwix, with a party of horſe from Carliſle, had been there that day to get intelligence of their numbers and motions; but that, upon notice of their coming towards him, he had retired to his garriſon, which then conſiſted of very few men, having made mr. Graham of Inchbrachy a priſoner. This night the party ordered to Ecclefechan returned and joined the rebels. Next day they entered England, and marched to Brampton, a ſmall market-town, belonging to the earl of Carliſle. Here they proclaimed the pretender, and mr. Forſter opened his commiſſion (brought by mr. Douglas from the earl of Mar) to act as general in England. From this time the Highlanders had ſixpence per day paid them, to keep them in good order, and under command. The rebels halted one night at Brampton, to refreſh the men, having marched above one hundred miles in five days. On the 2d of November they advanced to Penrith, where they expected to have met with ſome friends to join them; for it was reported, that mr. Dacre of Abbeylanner-Coaſt, a papiſt, had promiſed to raiſe forty men; but he was prevented by a fever. As they drew near Penrith, they had notice, that the ſheriff, with the lord Lonſdale, and the biſhop of Carliſle, had drawn together the whole poſſe of Cumberland, amounting to about twelve thouſand men, in order to oppoſe their progreſs. The firſt part of this was very true, that the poſſe was drawn together; nor was their number much leſs. But they gave the rebel army no occaſion to try, whether they would ſtand or not; for, upon notice of the approach of the rebels, they ſhamefully diſperſed, leaving the lord Lonſdale, with about twenty men beſides his own ſervants, who continued on the ſpot till the rebels appeared, and then he retired. A party was ſent to Lowther-Hall to ſee for him, but he was not to be found. This retreat animated the rebels, who made ſome booty, taking ſeveral horſes and a great many arms. Having ſtaid at Penrith that night, they marched next day to Appleby, where they halted again. On the 5th of November they marched to Kendal, and on the 6th to Kirby-Lonſdale, a ſmall market-town in Weſtmoreland, where ſome few papiſts and their ſervants from Lancaſhire joined them. [c] From this place they marched to Lancaſter on the 7th, where the famous colonel Chartres and another officer happened to be. Upon the news of their approach, the colonel propoſed to blow up a fine bridge, over which they were to paſs, to obſtruct their entry into the town; but the inhabitants would not agree to it. The colonel therefore thought it adviſeable to leave the town, after having ordered ſome barrels of powder to be thrown into a well, to prevent their falling into the hands of the rebels. The rebels, having entered Lancaſter without oppoſition, performed the uſual ceremonies of proclaiming the pretender, and levying the public revenue. It was thought they would have continued here till they had received the promiſed ſuccours, the place being eaſily made tenable againſt a greater force than the government could command on a ſudden: but they were in a great hurry to meet their fate, and left Lancaſter on the 9th, carrying with them ſix pieces of cannon, which they found there. They directed their march towards Preſton, where the horſe arrived that night, but the foot halted half way. The horſe entered Preſton without any oppoſition; Stanhope's regiment of dragoons, and a regiment of militia, having thought proper to retire on the approach of the rebels, which did not a little animate them to ſee the royal troops thus fly before them. At Preſton they were joined by a conſiderable number of gentlemen and their followers, all papiſts; which very much diſguſted the Scots gentlemen and Highlanders, becauſe they were made to believe, that all the high-church party would join them. The rebels had once reſolved to march out of Preſton the next day, in order to enter Mancheſter, where they expected to meet with a conſiderable reinforcement, and to poſſeſs themſelves of Warrington-Bridge, which would have made them maſters of the rich town of Liverpool. But this deſign, like all others, that had any ſhew of prudence, was laid aſide for two days, by which time they found themſelves otherwiſe employed.

[b] During the conteſt, the horſe ſurrounded the foot, in order to force them to march Southwards, upon which the Highlanders cocked their firelocks, and ſaid, 'If they were to be made a ſacrifice, they would chuſe to have it done in their own country.'

It is now time to obſerve what motions the king's troops made to oppoſe the rebels, who had thus given general Carpenter the ſlip.

While it was yet uncertain which way the rebels would direct their march, the duke of Argyle ſent a detachment from his ſmall army at Stirling, to hinder their paſſing the head of Forth, if they ſhould attempt that way to join the earl of Mar. A ſquadron of dragoons, and one battalion of foot of this detachment, were quartered at Falkirk, and two hundred dragoons at Kilſyth.

General Carpenter, upon intelligence, that the rebels were in full march towards Lancaſter, reſolved to purſue them with the dragoons only, for the greater expedition; not doubting but he ſhould be joined by the king's troops in the Weſt, in which he was not miſtaken; for general Willes, who had been ſent down ſome days before to command in the Weſt, having intelligence at Cheſter, that the rebels were advancing towards Lancaſter, gave orders for all the troops, quartered in thoſe parts, to aſſemble at Warrington, on the borders of that county. When he arrived there, he found only Preſton's regiment. With that he ſet out, on the 8th of November, and, the ſame day, arrived at Mancheſter, where he had intelligence that general Carpenter was on his march from Durham to Lancaſter, to whom he ſent an expreſs, to acquaint that general of his own motions, that they might act in concert. He marched from Mancheſter the 11th, with the regiments of dragoons of Wynne, Honeywood, Munden, and Dormer, and Preſton's regiment of foot, and advanced directly to Wiggan, where Pitt's horſe and Stanhope's dragoons were quartered. Underſtanding here, that the rebels were ſtill in Preſton, he gave orders for the troops to be ready to march towards that place next morning, by break of day. He formed the horſe into three brigades, Wynne's and Honeywood's, under the command of brigadier Honeywood: Munden's and Stanhope's, under the command of brigadier Munden; Pitt's and Dormer's, under the command of brigadier Dormer.

On the 12th of November, the troops began their march in the following order: a captain and fifty men of Preſton's foot, ſuſtained by a captain and fifty dragoons, formed the van-guard: Preſton's regiment followed brigadier Honeywood's brigade; next Dormer's; and Munden's in the rear; and the baggage in the rear of all. In this order they marched to the bridge of Ribble, where we ſhall leave them, to obſerve what preparations were made for their reception by the rebels.

The ſame morning general Forſter gave orders for his army to march, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting the king's troops, and the deſtruction of all their hopes, were ſo near at hand. He had depended on the intelligence from the Lancaſhire gentlemen, who had promiſed, that none ſhould advance within forty miles without his knowledge; but it ſeems, they diſappointed him; ſo that he was under the greateſt ſurprize, when he was informed from all hands, that General Wills was within ſight of him. He went out with a party of horſe to view the poſture of the king's troops; and, upon finding they were in full march towards him, he returned to the town to prepare for their reception.

His men were no ways diſcouraged, but chearfully ſet about the preparations for their defence. They barricaded the avenues, and poſted their men in the ſtreets and by-lanes and ſuch houſes, as were propereſt for galling their enemies. The gentlemen volunteers were poſted in the church-yard, under the command of the earls of Derwentwater, Wintoun, and Nithiſdale, and the lord Kenmure. General Forſter formed four main barriers; the firſt a little below the church, commanded by brigadier Mackintoſh, and ſupported by the gentlemen-volunteers in the church-yard, the ſecond was ſituated at the end of a lane leading to the fields, and commanded by lord Charles Murray. The third Barrier was near a wind-mill, and commanded by the laird of Mackintoſh. And the fourth was in the ſtreet leading to Liverpool, commanded by major Millar, and mr. Douglas. They threw up ſeveral intrenchments in an inſtant, and did all in their power to make a ſtout reſiſtance; but were guilty of one capital error, which diſcovered their ignorance, or rather infatuation. For in the morning, upon the firſt intelligence of general Willes's approach, they had detached Macpherſon of Innercal, lieutenant colonel of the earl of Mar's regiment, with an hundred choſen men, to take poſt at the bridge of Ribble, which was the only paſs the king's troops could enter on that ſide, the river being fordable only in two places, the one below, and the other above the bridge, and theſe fords eaſily made unpaſſable. The bridge terminates a long narrow lane, where, in ſome parts, not above two can ride abreaſt. This is the famous lane, where Oliver Cromwell met with a ſtout reſiſtance, from the king's troops, who having rolled down ſeveral large ſtones from the height upon him and his men, one of them came ſo near, that he eſcaped only by making his horſe jump into a quick-ſand. But mr. Forſter, inſtead of making advantage of this paſs, which he might have done to the deſtruction of the king's troops, (whom he might have very much annoyed by the help of his cannon, while they lay expoſed without any cover) ordered this detachment to return to the town, and left the paſs free for general Willes.

When general Willes came up to the bridge in the forementioned order, he expected to have met with great difficulties in forcing the paſs; but, finding it abandoned, he was much ſurprized, and ſuſpected ſome ſtratagem; and therefore reſolved to proceed with caution. Having viewed the hedges, and laid open the ways for the cavalry to enter, he found all clear, and not the leaſt appearence of an enemy. This made him conclude, they had abandoned the place, and were endeavouring, by long marches, to return to Scotland; but in this he was likewiſe miſtaken. For, upon his advancing near the town, he found them in a poſture to give him a warm reception, in a place, where he could eaſier come at them, than he could at the bridge of Ribble. He immediately prepared for an attac, and diſpoſed his troops in ſuch a manner, as he might beſt annoy them in the town, and prevent their making an eſcape.

[c] It is to be obſerved, there were no papiſts of any account had yet joined them in their march; for all the papiſts on that ſide of the country had been ſecured in the caſtle of Carliſle, as mr. Howard of Corbee-caſtle, mr. Warwick of Warwick-hall, mr. James Graham of Inchbrachy, and mr. Henry Curwen of Workington.

The general having viewed the diſpoſition of the enemy, and finding all the evenues leading to the town ſtrongly barricaded, and two pieces of cannon planted on each; he reſolved to make two attacs. For the attac of the avenue, that leads to Wiggan, a captain and fifty dragoons were draughted out of each of the five regiments, with a major and lieutenant-colonel to command them, and ordered to diſmount to ſuſtain Preſton's regiment commanded by the lord Forreſter their lieutenant-colonel; and Honeywood's regiment was ordered to remain on horſeback, to ſuſtain the whole; and the brigadier of that name had the direction of that attac.

The regiment of Wynne and Dormer, and a ſquadron of Stanhope's, were ordered to diſmount under the command of brigadier Dormer, while the regiments of Pitts and Munden, and the remaining ſquadron of Stanhope's ſuſtained them in the attac of the avenue that leads to Lancaſter, lying on that ſide of the town oppoſite to the attac of the avenue leading to Wiggan. By the diſpoſition of the king's forces, the four chief barricades of the enemy were eaſily attaced, but not with deſired ſucceſs.

The firſt attac was upon that barricade below the church, commanded by the old brigadier Mackintoſh, who received the king's troops very gallantly; and with a terrible fire both from the barricade and the houſes, obliged them to retire to the end of the town; at the ſame time the lord Forreſter, lieutenant-colonel of Preſton's foot, entered the avenue of Wiggan, and took poſſeſſion of two large houſes within fifty yards of the barricade, where he poſted his men, finding it impracticable to force the barricade; but from theſe houſes, which overlooked the whole town, he very much anoyed the enemy; and from thence, it is ſaid, they received moſt of the damage they ſuſtained during the action. Theſe houſes had been poſſeſſed by the Highlanders, when the barricade was commanded by Mackintoſh; but they were called off by him to ſupport that barricade, which gave the king's troops an eaſier poſſeſſion of them, and perhaps ſaved the remains of that regiment, which ſuffered very much in that bold attac. General Honeywood ordered the houſes between thoſe he poſſeſſed and the barricade to be ſet on fire; which was not done without the loſs of men on both ſides. He likewiſe ordered breaſt works to be thrown up, both to ſecure his men, and prevent the rebels from eſcaping at that quarter of the town.

The other barricades were attaced with great reſolution, but without any ſucceſs; the king's troops being obliged to retire to the ends of the town, and remain ſatisfied till they could renew their attempts the next day; for by this time night hindered their farther approaches. Thus far the rebels appeared to have acted with courage, and to have acted with courage, and to have had the advantage, ſince they had, in all the attacs, repulſed their enemies with little or no loſs on their ſide, and a conſiderable ſlaughter on the king's. But they did not long continue in this diſpoſition; for having intelligence next morning, that general Carpenter had arrived with more troops to ſurround them, their reſolution failed them, and from that moment they acted with great confuſion and deſpair.

General Carpenter arrived at Preſton on the 13th, at ten in the morning, with three regiments of dragoons, lord Cobham's, Churchill's, and Moleſworth's, accompanied by the earl of Carliſle, lord Lumley, and colonel Darcy; ordering Moleſworths to the Mancheſter ſide, and marching the other two to the Lancaſter ſide. He found, that the rebels had been attaced the day before, without ſucceſs, and that moſt part of the king's horſe and dragoons were crouded in a deep narrow lane near the end of the town, ſo incommodious, that it was impoſſible to draw up above three or four in front; and, going to view the ground toward the river, he ſaw there were no troops poſted at the end of Fiſher-gate-ſtreet, to block up that part of the town, where ſeveral of the rebels were ſaid to have eſcaped the night before. This ſtreet leads to a marſh or meadow, which joins to that part of the river Ribble, where there are two good fords, being the high road towards Liverpool; and, towards the end of the ſame ſtreet, there was another barricade with two pieces of cannon. General Carpenter therefore ordered colonel Pitt to poſt his two ſquadrons on that marſh; and going back to the end of the town, he ordered communication to be made for the troops to aſſiſt each other in caſe of a ſally. The rebels, being thus inveſted on all ſides, and being now ſenſible, though too late, of their condition, began to conſider what was to be done. The Highlanders were for ſallying out upon the king's forces, and dying, as they called it, like men of honour, ſword in hand; but they were over ruled, and not allowed to ſtir. Nor was the motion communicated to the whole body; but general Forſter (prevailed upon by lord Wriddrington, colonel Oxburgh, and ſome few others,) reſolved upon a capitulation, flattering themſelves with obtaining good terms from the kings officers. Colonel Oxburgh, pretending acquaintance with ſome of them, made an offer to go out, and treat of a ſurrender. Accordingly he went with a trumpet to general Willes, and offering to lay down their arms, and ſubmit themſelves, hoped he would recommend them to the king's mercy. The general told the colonel he would not treat with rebels; for they had killed ſeveral of the king's ſubjects, and they muſt expect to undergo the ſame fate. The colonel ſaid, as the general was a man of honour, and an officer, he hoped he would ſhew mercy to people, who were willing to ſubmit. The general replied, All he would do for them, was, that, if they laid down their arms, and ſubmitted priſoners at diſcretion, he would prevent the ſoldiers from cutting them in pieces till he had farther orders; and he would give them but an hour to conſider of it. Colonel Oxburgh returned into the town, to acquaint mr. Forſter with this; and, before the hour was expired, there came out mr. Dalziel, brother to the earl of Carnwarth, who wanted terms for the Scots. The general's anſwer was, that he would not treat with rebels, nor give them any other terms than what he had before offered them. Upon which the general was deſired to grant farther time till ſeven o'clock next day, to conſult the beſt method of delivering themſelves up. The general agreed to grant them the time deſired, provided they threw them up no new intrenchments in the ſtreets, nor ſuffered any of their people to eſcape, and ſent out the chief of the Engliſh and Scots as hoſtages for the performance. The general ſent in colonel Cotton to bring them out, who accordingly brought out the earl of Derwentwater and Brigadier Mackintoſh. The next day, about ſeven in the morning, Mr Forſter ſent out to let the general know, that they were willing to give up themſelves priſoners at diſcretion, as he had demanded. Brigadier Mackintoſh, being preſent when this meſſage was brought, ſaid, He could not anſwer, that the Scots would ſurrender in that manner; for that they were people of deſperate fortunes; and he had been a ſoldier himſelf, and knew what it was to be a priſoner at diſcretion. Upon this the general ſaid, 'Go back to your people again; and I will attac the town, and the conſequence will be, I will not ſpare a man of you.' The brigadier went back, but came running out immediately again, and ſaid, 'The lord Kenmure, and the reſt of the noblemen, with his brother would ſurrender in like manner with the Engliſh.'

General Carpenter entered one ſide of the town, and general Willes the other, with all their troops, with trumpets ſounding, drums beating, and colours diſplayed. They both met in the middle of the town, where the Highlanders were drawn up under arms. The noblemen and gentlemen were firſt ſecured in ſeveral inns, and the Highlanders then laid down their arms in the place where they were ſtanding; and they were next ſecured under a ſufficient guard.

General Carpenter, finding the place too narrow to contain all the horſe that was with him, ſent part of them to Wiggan the ſame day, and went away himſelf the next, leaving general Willes to command in his abſence.

Mr Forſter was by moſt people blamed for the ſurrender, without obtaining better terms for thoſe, whom he had drawn into his enterprize. His want of ſkill was acknowledged on all hands, and this was what he could be leaſt blamed for, ſince he was made general, as the only proteſtant of note of the party. But, though he was nominal general, he depended moſtly upon the conduct of colonel Oxburgh, who had gained in foreign ſervice, the reputation of an experienced officer. Others did not ſcruple to charge mr. Forſter with treachery as well as want of capacity, and pretend to ſay, that, if the king's general had not been ſure of him beforehand, he would have granted more generous terms to the rebels; and they bring his eſcape out of Newgate, as a proof of this ſurmiſe; ſuppoſing that a priſoner of his diſtinction would have been better looked after, if the government had not been under an obligation to connive at his eſcape. But there ſeems to be little ground for ſuch a ſuſpicion, eſpecially as the pretender himſelf did not credit it, but held mr. Forſter afterwards in great eſteem and confidence.

In the attac upon Preſton, brigadier Honeywood received a contuſion on the ſhoulder, by a muſket-ſhot, and major Bland a ſlight one in the arm; and his horſe was ſhot through the neck. There were killed at brigadier Honeywood's attac, two captains, one enſign, and twenty-eight private ſoldiers; wounded, lord Forreſter, major Lawſon, two captains, one lieutenant, four enſigns, and fifty private men. At brigadier Dormer's attac there were nine men killed; wounded, the brigadier, one captain, one lieutenant, one cornet, and thirty-nine men. [d]

Upon the very day, the rebels agreed to ſurrender themſelves at Preſton, was fought the battle of Dublain. The earl of Mar, being now joined by all the power he could expect from the earl of Seaforth, and all his Northern clans, and by the troops under general Gordon, thought himſelf ſtrong enough to put his deſign in execution of paſſing the Forth, joining his Southern friends, and marching into England. To this purpoſe he ſummoned a general council of war, where all their meaſures were concerted for this enterprize. Accordingly, he left colonel Balfour governor of the town of Perth with a guard ſufficient; and, being furniſhed with proviſions, artillery, and all other neceſſaries for a long march; he ſet out on the 10th of November, for Auchterarder, there to draw his army together, of which he made a general review that day at that place, and reſted the 11th.

The duke of Argyle, having intelligence of the motion of the enemy, was at no uncertainty what to do. He knew, if he was to diſpute their paſſage over the Forth at the heads of that river, his horſe on which he placed his whole dependance, would be of no ſervice to him in that place. He choſe therefore to engage the earl on the grounds about Dumblain, where he might employ all his forces. [e] He likewiſe had intelligence, that on the 12th at night the enemy deſigned to incamp at Dumblain. Therefore, judging it of importance to poſſeſs that place, on the 12th in the forenoon he ordered his whole army to paſs the river at Stirling bridge, and incamped that night with his left at Dumblain, and his right towards Sheriff-Moore. The enemy advanced the ſame night within two miles of the royal army; and having received intelligence, that the duke with his whole army was in poſſeſſion of Dumblain, they drew up in order of battle, and remained in that poſture under arms till break of day.

On the 13th in the morning both armies were in motion, and the duke of Argyle advanced to a riſing ground, to take a view of the rebel army, which he could eaſily diſcern in full march towards him. But another hill on his left intercepted his view of the whole extent of their left wing; for which reaſon it was impoſſible for him to gueſs at the true extent of their line, or how far they out-flanked him.

The duke's army amounting to three thouſand five hundred men, of which one thouſand two hundred were dragoons, was drawn up upon the heights above Dumblain to the North-Eaſt of that place, which lay about a mile and a half from his left, and a wet boggy moraſs, called Sheriff-Moor, on his right.

The order of the royal army was thus: The firſt line was compoſed of ſix battalions of foot in the centre, with three ſquadrons of dragoons upon the right and left. The ſecond line was compoſed of two battalions of foot, and two ſquadrons of dragoons on each wing. The duke commanded the right; general Witham the left; and major-general Wightman the main battle or centre.

The earl of Mar's army, amounting to about nine thouſand men, were drawn up in the following order: The firſt line was compoſed of ten battalions of foot, conſiſting of the clans commanded by the captain of Clanronald, Glengary, ſir John Maclean, and Campbell of Glen-Lyon on the right; there were three ſquadrons of horſe, the Stirling ſquadron, which carried the pretender's ſtandard, and two of the marquiſs of Huntley's: On the left were drawn up the Perthſhire and Fifeſhire ſquadrons. The centre of the ſecond line was compoſed of three battalions of the earl of Seaforth's, two battalions of the marquiſs of Huntley's, battalions of the earl of Panmure, marquiſs of Tullibardine, lord Drummond and Strowan, all commanded by their reſpective chiefs, except that of Drummond, commanded by the viſcount of Strathallan and Logie-Almond. The earl of Mariſchal's ſquadron was on the right, and that of Angus on the left.

[e] On the 23d of October, the duke of Argyle had notice that a party of the rebels, conſiſting of two hundred foot and a hundred horſe, were marching by Caſtle-camp-bell towards Dumferling. Upon this intelligence, his grace immediately ſent off a detachment of dragoons, under the command of colonel Cathcart, who came up with the rebels the 24th, at five o'clock in the morning; and, after having killed and wounded ſeveral of them, took ſeventeen priſoners; amongſt them the following gentlemen:

The earl of Mar, who knew that his number far exceeded the duke's, extended his lines as far as poſſible, with a deſign to take him in flank, and marched up to him in this diſpoſition.

The duke of Argyle, who till now ſuppoſed that the moraſs of Sheriff-Moor was unpaſſable, ſaw, that the two or three nights froſt had made it capable of bearing; and the rebels coming down the Moor with intent to flank him, having their right much extended beyond the point of his left; he found himſelf obliged to alter the diſpoſition of his front, to prevent his being ſurrounded; which, on account of the ſcarcity of general officers, was not done ſo expeditiouſly, as to be all formed again before the rebels begun the attac.

The left wing of the duke's ſmall army fell in with the centre of theirs, which conſiſted, eſpecially the firſt line, of the flower of the rebel army.

They begun the action by a general diſcharge of their fire-arms, and received the firſt fire of the royal troops without ſhrinking; but the captain of Clanronald, who led them on in chief, was killed, which had like to have ſtruck a damp upon them. But Glengary, who ſucceeded him, ſtarting from the lines, waved his bonnet, and cried three or four times revenge, which ſo animated the men, that they followed him cloſe up to the muzzles of the muſkets, puſhed aſide the bayonets with their targets and with their broad ſwords did great execution.

The three battalions of foot, on the left of the duke's centre, behaved gallantly, and made all the reſiſtance they could; but, being unacquainted with this way of fighting, they were forced to give ground, fell in among the horſe, and helped the enemy to put them in confuſion; ſo that a total rout of that wing of the royal army enſued. General Witham, with ſome of the horſe, riding full ſpeed to Stirling, gave out that all was loſt; but the general was miſtaking in that, as well as in the opinion he formed of the men he run from that morning before the engagement.

Upon the right wing of the king's army, the duke of Argyle commanded in perſon, and at the head of Stair's and Evans's dragoons, attaced the enemy's left, conſiſting chiefly of horſe, with ſuch intrepidity, that, notwithſtanding the rebels ſhewed they wanted neither courage nor inclination to ſtand, yet were obliged to give way, and were put into confuſion. The duke purſued them towards the river Allan, which he was forced to do, in regard that, tho' the diſtance is not above two miles, yet in that ſpace they attempted to rally again above ten times; and, whenever the ground afforded them any advantage, endeavoured to make a full ſtop; ſo that the duke having to do with troops of that diſpoſition, who likewiſe out-numbered him, was obliged to follow his blow, leſt he ſhould have loſt the advantage he had gained. Nor was it in his power to ſuccour the left, the rout of that wing happening ſo ſuddenly, and the officer, who commanded, leaving the field, almoſt at the firſt fire of the rebels, there was no opportunity to rally the broken troops a ſecond time.

Brigadier Wightman followed cloſe after the duke with three battalions of foot, and ran a very great riſque of faring in the ſame manner with the reſt, if the rebels had but had common prudence; for, no ſooner their right underſtood the diſaſter of their left, than they formed again, and returned bac to the field, following cloſe on the rear of Wightman's battalions, to the number of five thouſand. Some ſay, that body was led on by general Gordon, others by general Hamilton, others by both; and others, (and indeed with more probability) ſay, they were headed by Glengary; and that he, upon being ordered to attac theſe battalions, returned for anſwer, that the clans had done enough; and that he would not hazard them to do other people's work, (meaning the horſe) and remained upon a hill, where he ſeemed to form his men, as if for ſome new action.

The duke, having by this time intirely broke their left, and puſhed them over the river Allan, returned to the field; and Wightman, facing again to the right, took poſſeſſion of ſome incloſures and mud walls, which would ſerve for a breaſt-work, in caſe they were attaced, as they judged by the countenance and number of the enemy they ſhould. In this poſture both armies ſtood looking at one another, but neither caring to engage; when towards evening the duke drew off towards Dumblain, and the enemy towards Ardoch, without moleſting one another. [f]

The day after the engagement, the duke of Argyle

[f] This is the account of the duke of Argyle's hiſtorian; to which it may be proper to add thoſe which were ſpubliſhed by a kind of authority on all ſides. The firſt is colonel Harriſon's account, who was ſent expreſs to the king by the duke of Argyle:

The duke of Argyle being informed, on the 12th, that the rebels had come to Auchterardire with their baggage, artillery, and a ſufficient quantity of bread for a march of many days, found he was obliged either to engage them on the grounds near Dumblain, or decamp, and wait their coming to the head of the Forth. He choſe the firſt on many accounts, and, amongſt others, that the grounds near Dumblain were much more advantageous for his horſe, than thoſe at the head of the river: and beſides this, by the froſts then beginning, the Forth might become paſſable in ſeveral places, which the ſmall number of his troops did not enable him to guard ſufficiently. He likewiſe received advice, that the 12th at night the rebels deſigned to incamp at Dumblain; upon which, judging it of importance to prevent them by poſſeſſing that place, he marched the 12th in the forenoon, and incamped with his left at Dumblain, and his right towards Sheriff-Moor. The enemy ſtopped that night within two miles of Dumblain. Next morning his grace, being informed by his advanced guard, that the rebels were forming, rode to a riſing ground, where he viewed the enemy diſtinctly, and found, as they pointed their march, they deſigned ſtrait upon his flank. The Moor to our right, was the preceding night unpaſſable, and guarded us from being flanked on that ſide; but by the froſt was become paſſable. His grace therefore ordered his troops to ſtretch to the right in the following order; three ſquadrons of dragoons upon the right and left in the front line, and ſix battalions of foot in the centre. The ſecond line was compoſed of two battalions in the centre, and one ſquadron upon the right, and another upon the left, and a ſquadron of dragoons behind each wing of horſe in the firſt line. As the right of our army came over againſt the left of the rebels, which they had put to a moraſs, his grace, finding they were not quite formed, gave orders immediately to fall on, and charged both their horſe and foot. They received us very briſkly, but, after ſome reſiſtance, were broke through, and were purſued above two miles by five ſquadrons of dragoons, the ſquadron of volunteers, and five battalions of foot. When we came near the river Allan, by the vaſt numbers of rebels we drove before us, we concluded it an intire rout, and reſolved to purſue as long as we had day-light. The purſuing to the river Allan had taken up a long time, by reaſon of the frequent attempts they made to form in different places, which obliged us as oft to attac and break them, when they were in part paſſed, and others paſſing the Allan. Major-General Wightman, who commanded the five battalions of foot, ſent to acquaint the duke of Argyle that he could not diſcover what was become of our troops on the left; and that a conſiderable body of the rebels, horſe and foot, ſtood behind him. Upon that his grace halted, formed his troops, and marched towards the hill, on which the rebels had poſted themſelves.

Hereafter his grace extended his right towards Dumblain, to give his left an opportunity of joining him. There we continued till it was late, and, not finding our left come up, his grace marched ſlowly towards the ground he had formed on in the morning. So ſoon as it was dark, the rebels, who continued undiſperſed on the top of the hill, moved to Ardoch. About an hour after our troops, which had been ſeparated from the duke of Argyle, joined his grace. Our dragoons on the left, in the beginning of the action, charged ſome of the horſe on the right, and carried off a ſtandard; but at the ſame time the rebels preſſed ſo hard on our battalions on the left, that they were diſordered, and obliged to fall in among the horſe. The rebels, by this means cut of the communication betwixt our left and the other body; and they being informed, that ſome of the rebels were endeavouring to get to Stirling, the troops on our left retired beyond Dumblain, to poſſeſs themſelves of the paſſes leading there. We have, as yet, no certain account of the numbers killed; but it is reconed they may be about eight hundred, among whom there are ſeveral perſons of diſtinction. The quality of the priſoners is not yet fully known; only that the viſcount of Strathallan, two colonels, two lieutenant colonels, one major, nine captains, beſides ſubalterns, are brought to Stirling. We have likewiſe carried off fourteen colours and ſtandards, four pieces of cannon, tumbrels with ammunition, with all their bread-waggons. This victory was not obtained without the loſs of ſome brave men on our ſide. The earl of Forfar's wounds are ſo many, that his life is deſpaired of. The earl of Ilay, who came half an hour before the action, received two wounds, the one in his arm, the other in his ſide; but, the bullet being cut out of his ſide, it is hoped he is paſt danger. General Evans received a cut in his head. Colonel Hawley was ſhot through the body, but there is hopes of his recovery. Colonel Lawrence is taken. Colonel Hummers and captain Armſtrong, aid de camp to the duke of Argyle, are killed. The courage of the king's troops was never keener than on this occaſion, who, though the rebels were three times their number, yet attaced and purſued them with all the reſolution imaginable. The conduct and bravery of the generals and inferior officers contributed much to this ſucceſs; but, above all, the great example of the duke of Argyle, whoſe preſence not only gave ſpirit to the action, but gained ſucceſs as often as he led on. The troop of horſe volunteers, which conſiſted of noblemen and gentlemen of diſtinction, ſhewed their quality by the gallantry of their behaviour; in a particular manner the duke of Roxburgh, the lords Rothes, Haddington, Lauderdale, Loudoun. Belhaven, and ſir John Shaw.

Major-General Wightman's account was as follows:

Stirling, Nov. 14, 1715, at eleven at night.

'Laſt Friday I arrived from Edingburgh, where I had finiſhed all the works and barricadoes, that I had orders to do for the ſecurity of that town; and, as ſoon as I came to his grace the duke of Argyle, he told me he was glad to ſee me, and that, as he intended to make a march towards the enemy the next morning, he had ſent an expreſs to Edingburgh for me. Accordingly, on Saturday the 12th inſtant our whole army marched over the bridge of Stirling towards the enemy, who lay at a place called Ardoch, about ſeven miles from this place; and in the evening our army came within three miles of the enemy's camp. We lay all that night on our arms, and the next morning, being Sunday, I went with his grace where our advanced guard was poſted, and had a plain view of the rebels army all drawn up in line of battle, which conſiſted of nine thouſand one hundred men. They ſeemed to make a motion towards us; upon which the duke ordered me immediately bac to put our men in order; and ſoon after his grace ordered them to march to the top of a hill againſt the enemy: but before all, or not above half of our army was formed in line of battle, the enemy attaced us. The right of their line, which lay in a hollow way, vaſtly outwinged us, which was not perceived by us, nor poſſible for us to know it, the enemy having poſſeſſion of the brow of the hill; but the left of their army was very plain to our view, the moment we got to the top of the hill. Not half our men were come up, or could form. The enemy, that were within little more than piſtol-ſhot, began the attac with all their left upon our right. I had the command of the foot; the enemy were Highlanders, and, as it is their cuſtom, gave us fire, and a great many came up to our noſes ſword in hand: but the horſe on our right, with the conſtant fire of the platoons of foot, ſoon put the left of theirs to the rout; the duke of Argyle purſuing, as he thought, the main of their army, which he drove before him above a mile and a half over a returned to the field of battle, and carried off the wounded, and four pieces of cannon left by the rebels, to Stirling, where he retired with all his army.

The priſoners of moſt note taken by the king's forces were the lord Strathallan, the lairds Barrowfield, Logie Drummond, mr. Murray of Auchtertyre, the viſcount of Strathallan's brother, mr. Drummond of Drumquhany, mr. Roſs, ſon to the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, colonel Mackenzie of Keldin, &c. with ſeveral captains, ſubaltern officers, and private men, amounting in all to the number of about eighty.

The earl of Forfar, the laird of Glenkindy, and lieutenant-colonel Lawrence, were all the men of note, who were mentioned to be taken priſoners by the rebels, who took likewiſe ſeveral captains and ſubaltern officers; and, according to them, about two hundred private men.

The number of the killed and wounded, on the ſide of the rebels, is ſaid to have amounted to eight hundred, and river. As I marched after him as faſt as I could with a little above three regiments of foot, I heard great firing on our left, and ſent my aid de camp to ſee the occaſion of it, and found, that the right of the enemy's army, that lay in the hollow way, and were ſuperior to that part of the army, which we had beaten, was fallen upon our left with all the fury imaginable; and as our men were not formed, they cut off juſt the half of our foot, and the ſquadrons on our left. The duke, who purſued the enemy very faſt, was not appriſed of this; and, as he had ordered me to march after him as faſt as I could, I was obliged to ſlacken my march, and ſend to his grace, to inform him of what had happened. I kept what foot I had in perfect order, not knowing but my rear might ſoon be attaced by the enemy, that had beat our left, which proved to be the flower of our army. At laſt when the duke had put to flight that part of the rebel army he was engaged with, he came back to me, and could not have imagined to ſee ſuch an army as was behind us, being three times our number; but, as I had kept that part of our foot, which firſt engaged, in very good order, his grace joined me with five ſquadrons of dragoons, and we put the beſt face on the matter, to the right about, and ſo marched to the enemy, who had defeated all the left of our army. If they had had either courage or conduct, they might have intirely deſtroyed my body of foot; but it pleaſed God to the contrary. I am apt to conjecture their ſpirits were not a little damped by having been witneſſes ſome hours before of the firm behaviour of my foot, and thought it hardly poſſible to break us. We marched in a line of battle till we came within half a mile of the enemy, and found them ranged on the top of a hill, on very advantageous ground, and above four thouſand in number. We poſted ourſelves at the bottom of the hill, having the advantage of ground, where their horſe could not well attac us; for we had the convenience of ſome earth walls or ditches about breaſt high, and as evening grew on, we inclined with our right towards the town of Dumblain, in all the order that was poſſible. The enemy behaved like civil gentlemen, and let us do what we pleaſed; ſo that we paſſed the bridge of Dumblain, poſted ourſelves very ſecurely, and lay on our arms all night. This morning we went with a body of dragoons to the field of battle, brought off the wounded there, and came to this town in the evening. General Webb's late regiment, now Moriſon's, is one of the unfortunate regiments that was not formed, and ſuffered moſt. Major Hanmer is killed, with young Hillary, and many other officers. General Evans and I had the good fortune to be on the right wing with the duke. General Evans had his horſe ſhot dead under him, and eſcaped very narrowly as well as myſelf.

P. S. Our whole army did not conſiſt of above one thouſand dragoons, and two thouſand five hundred foot; and but a little more than half of them engaged. However I muſt do the enemy that juſtice to ſay, I never ſaw regular troops more exactly drawn up in line of battle, and that in a moment; and their officers behaved with all the gallantry imaginable. All I can ſay is, it will be of the laſt danger to the government if we have not force to deſtroy them ſoon. The loſs on both ſides I leave for another time, when we have a more exact account.'

The following account (given by the earl of Mar or his party, of the engagement on Sheriff-Moor near Dumblain, Nov. 13, 1715, was publiſhed by mr. Freebairn, the pretender's printer at Perth:

'There being various and different reports induſtriouſly ſpread abroad, to cover the victory obtained by the king's army over the enemy, the beſt way to ſet it in a clear light, is to narrate the true matter of fact, and leave it to the world to judge impartially thereof.

Thurſday, Nov. 10, the earl of Mar reviewed the army at Auchterardire. Friday 11, reſted.

Saturday 12, the earl of Mar ordered lieutenant-general Gordon, and brigadier Ogilvie, with three ſquadrons of the marquiſs of Huntley, and the maſter of Sinclair's five ſquadrons of horſe, and all the clans, to march and take poſſeſſion of Dumblain, which was ordered to be done two days before, but was delayed by ſome interruptions: and all the reſt of the army was ordered, at the ſame time to parade upon the Moor of Tullibardine very early, and to march after general Gordon. The earl of Mar went to Drummond-Caſtle to meet with my lord Broadalbin, and ordered general Hamilton to march the army. Upon the march, general Hamilton had intelligence of a body of the enemy's having taken poſſeſſion of Dumblain; which account he ſent immediately to the earl of Mar. A little after general Hamilton had another expreſs from general Gordon, who was then about two miles to the Weſtward of Ardoch, that he had intelligence of a great body of the enemy's being in Dumblain: Upon which general Hamilton drew up the army ſo, as the ground at the Roman camp near Ardoch would allow. A very little after the earl of Mar came up to the army, and not hearing any more from lieutenant-general Gordon, who was marched on, judged it to be only ſome ſmall party of the enemy to diſturb our march, ordered the guards to be poſted, and the army to their quarters, with orders to aſſemble upon the parade any time of the night or day, upon the firing of three cannon. A little after the army was diſmiſſed, the earl of Mar, had an account from lieutenant-general Gordon, that he had certain intelligence of the duke of Argyle's being at Dumblain with his whole army. Upon which the general was ordered to halt till the earl ſhould come up to him, and ordered the three guns to be fired; upon which the army formed immediately, and marched up to lieutenant-general Gordon at Kinbuck, where the whole army lay under arms, with guards advanced from each ſquadron and battalion till break of day.

Sunday the 13th, the earl of Mar gives orders for the whole army to form on the Moor, to the left of the road that leads to Dumblain, fronting to Dumblain. The general perſons were ordered to their poſts. The Stirling ſquadron, with the king's ſtandard, and two ſquadrons of the marquiſs of Huntley's, formed the right of the firſt line of horſe. All the clans formed the right of the firſt line of foot. The Perthſhire and Fifeſhire ſquadrons formed the left of the firſt line of horſe; the earl Mariſchal's ſquadron on the right of the ſecond line; three battalions of the marquiſs of Seaforth's foot, two battalions of my lord Huntley's, the earl of Panmure's, the marquiſs of Tullibardine's, the battalions of Drummond, commanded by the viſcount of Strathallan and Logie Almond, the battalion of Strowan, and the Angus ſquadron of horſe, formed the ſecond line. When the army was forming, we diſcovered ſome ſmall number of the enemy on the height of the Weſt end of the Sheriff-moor, which looks into Dumblain; from which place they had a full view of our army. The earl of Mar called a council of war, conſiſting of all the noblemen, gentlemen, general officers, and heads of the clans, which was held in the front of the horſe on the left, where it was voted to fight the enemy nemine contradicente. Upon which the earl of Mar ordered the earl Mariſchal major-general of the horſe, with his own ſquadron, and ſir Donald Macdonald's battalion, to march up to the height, where we ſaw the enemy, and diſlodge them, and ſend an account of their motions and diſpoſitions. No ſooner the earl Mariſchal began his march, but the enemy diſappeared, and the earl of Mar ordered the army to march up after them. By the other generals orders the lines marched off the right, divided in the centre, and marched up the hill in four lines. After marching about a quarter of a mile, the earl Mariſchal ſent back an account, that they diſcovered the enemy forming their line very near him, to the South of the top of the hill; upon which the army, particularly the horſe, was ordered to march up very quicly, and form to the enemy; but, by the breaking of their lines in marching off, they fell in ſome confuſion in the forming, and ſome of the ſecond line jumbled into the firſt, on or near the left, and ſome of the horſe formed near the centre; which ſeems to have been the occaſion, that the enemy's few ſquadrons on the right were not routed as the reſt.

The earl of Mar placed himſelf at the head of the clans, and finding the enemy only forming their line, thought fit to attac them in that poſture. He ſent colonel William Clepham, adjutant general to the marquis of Drummond, lieutenant-general of the horſe on the right, and to lieutenant-general Gordon on the right of the right of the foot, and major David Erſkine, one of his aids de camp, to the left, with orders to march up and attac immediately: And upon their return, pulling off his hat, waved it with a huzza, and advanced to the front of the enemy's formed battalions: Upon which all the line to the right, being of the clans, led on by ſir Donald Macdonald's brothers, Glengary, captain of Clanronald, ſir John Maclean, Glenco Campbell of Glenlyon, colonel of Broadalbin's, and brigadier Ogilvie of Boyne, with colonel Gordon of Glenbucket, at the head of Huntley's battalions, made a moſt furious attac; ſo that in ſeven or eight minutes we could perceive neither the form of a ſquadron or battalion of the enemy before us. We drove the main body and left of the enemy in this manner for about half a mile, killing and taking priſoners all that we could overtake. The earl of Mar endeavoured to ſtop our foot, and put them in ſome order to follow the enemy, which we ſaw making off in ſome ſmall bodies from a little hill below towards Dumblain, where the earl of Mar reſolved to follow them to compleat the victory. When an account was brought him, that our left, and moſt of our ſecond line had given way, and the enemy was purſuing them down the back of the hill, and had taken our artillery, immediately the earl of Mar gave orders for the horſe to wheel; and having put the foot in order, as faſt as could be, marched back with them. When he was again near the top of the hill, two ſquadrons of the enemy's grey dragoons were perceived marching towards us. When they came near the top of the hill, and ſaw us advancing in order to attac them, they made much faſter down the hill than they came up, and joined at the foot of the hill to a ſmall ſquadron or two of the black-dragoons, and a ſmall battalion of foot, which we judged had marched about the weſt end of the hill, and joined them. At firſt they again ſeemed to form on the low ground, and advanced towards us; but, when they ſaw us marching down the hill upon them, they filed very ſpeedily to Dumblain. The earl of Mar remained poſſeſſed of the field of battle, and our own artillery, and ſtood upon the ground till ſunſet; and then conſidering that the army had no cover or victuals the night before, and none to be had nearer than Braco, Ardoch, and the adjacents, whereby his lordſhip expected the left to rally, and the battalions of the lord George Murray, Innernyhe, Macpherſon, and Macgregor, to join him, reſolved to draw off the artillery, and march the army to that place, where were ſome proviſions. There were two carriages of the guns broke, which we left on the road. But theſe battalions did not join us till the next day afternoon, before which the enemy was returned to Stirling.

We took the earl of Forfar, who was dangerouſly wounded, colonel Lawrence, and ten or twelve captains and ſubalterns, and about two hundred ſerjeants and private men, and the laird of Glenkindy, one of the volunteers, four colours, ſeveral drums, and about fourteen or fifteen hundred ſtands of arms. We compute, that there lay killed in the field of battle about ſeven or eight hundred of the enemy: And this is certain, that there lay dead upon the field of battle above fifteen of the enemy to one of ours. Beſides, the number of the wounded muſt be very great.

The priſoners taken by us were very civily uſed, and none of them ſtripped. Some are allowed to return to Stirling upon their parole, and the officers have the liberty of the town of Perth. The few priſoners, taken by the enemy on our left, were moſt of them ſtripped and wounded after taken. The earl of Panmure being firſt of the priſoners wounded after taken, they having refuſed his parole, he was left in a village, and by the haſty retreat of the enemy, upon the approach of our army, was reſcued by his brother and his ſervants, and carried off.

Monday 14, the earl of Mar drew out the army early in the morning on the ſame field, at Ardoch, they were on the day before. About eleven o'clock, we perceived ſome ſquadrons of the enemy on the top of the hill, near the field of battle, which marched over the top of the hill, and a little after we had an account of their marching to Stirling. Upon which the earl of Mar marched back with his army, who continued about Auchterardire.

Tueſday, 15, reſted. Wedneſday 16, the earl of Mar left general Hamilton with the horſe to canton about Duplin, and lieutenant-general Gordon with the clans, and the reſt of the foot about Forgan and adjacents, and went into Perth himſelf to order proviſions for the army: the want of which was the reaſon of his returning to Perth.

Thurſday 17, the earl of Mar ordered general Hamilton to march with the horſe, and ſome of the foot, to Perth, and lieutenant-general Gordon with the clans, to canton about that place.'

After writing the former narrative, we have account from Stirling, that the enemy loſt twelve hundred men; and, after inquiry, we cannot find above ſixty of our men in all killed; among whom where the earl of Strathmore, and the captain of Clanronald, both very much lamented. Auchterhouſe is miſſing. Very few of our men are wounded.'

on the king's ſide to five hundred; but they never agreed in the accounts of their ſeveral loſſes [g].

It was reported, that mr. Drummond, an officer in the duke of Argyle's army, went to Perth under the pretence of being a deſerter, and was made aid de camp to the lord Drummond; and at the battle of Dumblain he attended the earl of Mar to receive his orders. When the earl thought that his right wing was like to defeat the duke of Argyle's left, he diſpatched this mr. Drummond to general Hamilton (who commanded the left of the earl of Mar's army) with orders to attac the enemy briſkly, ſince he was like to have the advantage on the right. But mr. Drummond, inſtead of delivering that order, gave the direct contrary orders to general Hamilton, and told him, that the earl of Mar was worſted on the right, and deſired him to retire with all haſte with as good order as poſſible. Upon which general Hamilton gave order to halt, which was obeyed. Then, the right of the duke of Argyle's army approaching them, moſt part of them gave way without firing a gun; and thoſe that ſtood were chiefly gentlemen and officers, who were ſo galled by the duke of Argyle's right wing, that many of them were killed on the ſpot, and others taken priſoners. And it is ſaid, mr. Drummond, after he gave the abovementioned orders to general Hamilton, deſerted to the duke of Argyle's ſide. But this is only report.

There was another thing very obſervable that day; mr. Robert Roy Macgregor, Alias Campbell, a gentleman eminent formerly for his bravery and courage, was with his men very near the earl of Mar's army; and being deſired by a gentleman of his own party to go and aſſiſt his friends, he refuſed, and ſaid, if they could not do it without him, they ſhould not do it with him.

The engagement being over, news was brought to the rebels of the ſurrender of the important paſs of Inverneſs to the king, on the ſame day the battle was fought. This ſervice was performed by Simon Frazer of Beaufort, lord Lovat, chief of the Frazers, who had hitherto appeared in the intereſt of the pretender. He came before Inverneſs on the 10th of November, where he was little expected in that manner, having been all his life of a contrary party. Sir John Mackenzie, who held the town as governor for the earl of Seaforth, had only three hundred men with him. With theſe he retired to a kind of caſtle or citadel, out of which he made his retreat on the 12th, and gave free poſſeſſion to the king's new friends. The ſecuring Inverneſs was a great blow to the rebels in theſe parts, for by it a free communication was opened between the earl of Sutherland and the well-affected in the counties adjacent to Inverneſs; and by this means the earl of Seaforth and the marquiſs of Huntley were not only drawn from the rebel-army to defend their own territories, but were induced ſoon after to make their ſubmiſſion; and a good number of the Frazers, who followed Frazerdale before, upon the change of diſpoſition in their chief, the lord Lovat, left the rebels, and increaſed the number of the king's friends under him.

The marquiſs of Tullibardine left the earl of Mar likewiſe, in order to cover his own country; and many of the clans, not ſeeing any likelihood of coming to an action, returned to their homes; it being the cuſtom with theſe people never to remain long in the field, unleſs they are kept in conſtant employ.

On the 12th of November arrived at Whitehall captain Williamſon, aid de camp to general Cadogan, with the news of the barrier treaty being ſigned, bringing with him a duplicate of the treaty itſelf for the king to ratify. This treaty had been a long while in hand, and had met with many difficulties and delays; and it was very much doubted by ſome, whether the imperial court intended to conclude it at all. But, after great diſputes, it was at laſt finiſhed at Antwerp, and ſigned by the plenipotentiaries of the emperor, the States-general, and the king of Great-Britain, by which the bounds of the imperial dominions in the Netherlands, as alſo of the States-general, were adjuſted, and the emperor became guarantee of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great-Britain, as the States-general were before.

Three days after, general Cadogan arrived at London from Flanders, and the ſame day three thouſand of the Dutch auxiliaries came up the Thames; and having refreſhed themſelves for ſome days in their quarters in the tower-hamlets, and Southwark, marched by land towards Scotland, and the other three thouſand were ordered to follow by ſea. But the winds being contrary, they were forced to put into Harwich and other places. Theſe troops not being uſed to ſea, ſuffered ſo much, that they deſired to land, and march wherever the king ſhould think fit. Accordingly they were ordered alſo to proceed by land to Scotland; and their march, with that of the three thouſand from London, was ſo regulated, as to arrive at Edinburgh about the ſame time.

A reſolution being taken to diſlodge the rebels from Perth, general Cadogan, by the king's command, ſet out on the 29th of November for Scotland; and brigadier Petit, with ſix engineers under him, was ordered to march thither with all ſpeed. A conſiderable train of artillery was alſo ſhipped off at the tower, and ſent to Scotland for this expedition.

About the ſame time colonel Stern's regiment arrived in the Thames from Ghent, where they had been garriſoned, and brought priſoners with them the lord Clermont, ſon to the earl of Middleton, who, in the year 1708, was taken priſoner in the pretender's expedition to Scotland, and mr. Murray, who by the name of Gordon, had lately been with the earl of Mar, and who were both taken in Flanders. The lord Clermont was committed to the Tower, and the other to Newgate.

With regard to the priſoners taken at Preſton, ſome half-pay officers being found among them, a court martial was held at Preſton on the 28th of November, to try the following perſons as deſerters; the lord Charles Murray, a younger ſon of the duke of Athol, major Nairn, and captain Lockhart, brother to Lockhart of Carnwarth, the author of the memoirs of Scotland. Nairn and Lockhart had belonged to lord Mark Ker's regiment; captain Shaftoe to colonel Frank's; enſign Erſkine to Preſton's; and enſign Dalziel to lord Orkney's. The five firſt were found guilty, and ſentenced to be ſhot; but Dalziel was acquitted as to the crime of deſertion, upon his proving, that he had reſigned his commiſſion ſome time before he engaged in the rebellion. The lord Charles Murray was reſpited till further orders; but the others were, on the 4th of December, executed. About five hundred of the inferior priſoners were ſent to the caſtle of Cheſter, and a great number to Liverpool; but all the noblemen and moſt conſiderable perſons amongſt them were ſent to London, where they arrived on the 9th of December, being guarded from Highgate by major-general Tatton, lieutenant-colonel of the firſt regiment of guards, at the head of a detachment of about three hundred foot guards, and a hundred and twenty horſe-grenadier guards. They were brought ſo far by brigadier Panton, lieutenant-colonel of Lumley's regiment of horſe, under a guard of one hundred of his troopers. At Highgate every one of the priſoners had his arms tied with a cord coming croſs his back; and, thus pinioned, they were not allowed to hold the reins of the bridle, but had their horſes led by a foot-ſoldier. In this poſture they were ranged in four diviſions, according to the four different priſons to which they were allotted; the noblemen to the tower; Forſter and Mackintoſh to Newgate; others to the Marſhalſea; and others to the Fleet; each diviſion being placed between a party of horſe-grenadiers, and a platoon of foot-guards. In this manner general Tatton ſet out from Highgate about noon, and proceeded to London through innumerable crouds of ſpectators of all ages and conditions; his drums beating all the way a triumphal march. The ſame day two of them, mr. Richard Gaſcoigne and mr. Thomas Butler, one of the duke of Ormond's natural ſons, were carried to the Cock Pit, where they were examined before a committee of the prive-council, and afterwards committed to the cuſtody of a meſſenger. The next day, the lord Kenmure, mr. Forſter, and brigadier Mackintoſh were carried to the Cock pit, where they were ſeverally examined by a committee of council, and then remanded, the firſt to the tower, and the others to Newgate. The ſame day likewiſe, mr. Gaſcoigne and mr. Butler were examined a ſecond time, and then committed to Newgate. On Monday, the 12th of December, the earls of Derwentwater, Nithſdale, Carnwarth, and Wintoun, the lord Widdrington, and ſome others of the principal rebels, were alſo ſeverally examined, and afterwards ſent back to their reſpective priſons.

The rebellion in England being totally ſuppreſſed, the king's houſhold troops broke up their camp in Hyde-Park, the day after the priſoners were brought to London, and the artillery was ſent to the tower. However, for the greater ſecurity of London and Weſtminſter, an extraordinary horſeguard was placed in ſeveral inns between St. James's and Whitehall, with orders to patrole all night.

On the 22d of December, the pretender landed at Peterhead in the North of Scotland, with only ſix gentlemen in his retinue; among whom was the marquiſs of Tinmouth, ſon to the duke of Berwick. The pretender had imbarked at Dunkirk on board a ſmall ſhip, which had formerly been a privateer of eight guns. The firſt night he lay at Peterhead; the ſecond at Newburgh, a ſeat of the earl Mariſchal's. He paſſed through Aberdeen incognito (he and all that were with him being in the habit of ſea-officers) to Fetteroſſe, the chief ſeat of the earl Mariſchal. Here he was met by the earl of Mar, the earl Mariſchal, and about thirty noblemen and gentlemen of the firſt quality, who had left Perth with a party of horſe, on the firſt notice of his landing, which they received by an expreſs from Peterhead. At this place he appeared in public, and, aſſuming his pretended quality, permitted the noblemen and gentlemen to kiſs his hand. Whilſt he remained at Fetteroſſe, which was till the 27th, he formed a court, appointing all the officers of ſtate and houſhold, and made ſome peers, and ſeveral knights. He was proclaimed with great ſolemnity before the door of the houſe, and then publiſhed his declaration, dated at Commercy in Lorrain, on the 25th of October. It was printed at Perth by Robert Freebairn, who ſtiled himſelf printer to his majeſty, and was ſent to all the magiſtrates, miniſters, and juſtices of the peace within the rebel-quarters; many of whom, eſpecially in the North, publiſhed it according to the order ſent with it.

At Fetteroſſe, the pretender received alſo the homage of his eccleſiaſtical and lay epiſcopal ſubjects of the dioceſe of Aberdeen by addreſſes from each of them. [h]

During the pretender's ſtay at Fetteroſſe, he was attaced by an aguiſh diſorder; but he ſoon recovered, and, on the 2d of January, arrived at Briechen, where he continued two days; and, on the 3d, went and lay at Kinaird. The next day he arrived at Glames, and lay there that night. Next morning he made his public entry into Dundee, with the earl of Mar on his right, and the earl Mariſchal on his left hand, being followed by about three hundred gentlemen on horſeback. At the deſire of his friends he remained about an hour on horſeback in the market-place, allowing the people to perform the ceremony of kiſſing his hand. He then went and dined at Stuart of Garantully's, where he lodged that night. Next day he left Dundee, and dined at Caſtle-Lyon, a ſeat of the earl of Strathmore's, and lay that night at ſir David Tripplin's, and, on the 7th of January, arrived at the palace of Scoon, the ancient place of the coronation of the kings of Scotland, where he ſeemed reſolved to ſtay till that ceremony was performed.

On the 9th of January, about noon, he made his public entry on horſeback into Perth, and reviewed ſome of the troops, that were drawn out on purpoſe. He expreſſed great ſatisfaction at the appearance of the men, and was much pleaſed with the Highland dreſs, which he had never ſeen before. In the evening he returned to Scoon, where he began to form a regular council, and to perform ſeveral acts of ſtate. He publiſhed ſix proclamations; for a general thankſgiving for his ſafe arrival; for praying for him in churches; for the currency of all foreign coins; for ſummoning the meeting of the convention of eſtates; for ordering all fencible men, from ſixteen to ſixty, to repair to his ſtandard; and for his coronation on the 23d of January.

On the 16th of that month, a grand council was held, at which all the chiefs of the rebels were preſent. At the opening of it, the pretender delivered himſelf in a ſet ſpeech to this effect:

'I am now, on your repeated invitation, come among you. No other argument need be uſed of the great confidence I place in your loyalty and fidelity to me, which I entirely rely on. I believe you are already convinced of my good intentions to reſtore the ancient laws and liberties of this kingdom: if not, I am ſtill ready to confirm to you the aſſurance of doing all, that can give you ſatisfaction therein.

The great diſcouragements, which preſented, were not ſufficient to deter me from coming to put myſelf at the head of my faithful ſubjects, who were in arms for me, and whatſoever ſhall enſue, I ſhall leave them no room for complaint, that I have not done the utmoſt they could expect from me. Let thoſe, who forget their duty, and are negligent of their own good, be anſwerable for the worſt that may happen. For me, it will be no new thing, if I am unfortunate. My whole life, even from my cradle, has ſhewn a conſtant ſeries of misfortunes; and I am prepared (if ſo it pleaſe God) to ſuffer the threats of my enemies, and yours. The preparations, which are making againſt us, will, I hope, quicken your reſolution, and convince others, from whom I have aſſurances, that it is now no time to diſpute what they have to do: if, otherwiſe, they ſhall by their remiſſneſs be unmindful of their own ſafety, I ſhall take it as my greateſt comfort, that I have acquitted myſelf of whatever can be expected from me. I recommend to you what is neceſſary to be done in the preſent conjuncture; and, next to God, rely on your council and reſolution.'

This ſpeech was diſperſed with great induſtry; but the council ſoon came to a reſolution to abandon the whole enterprize, the firſt opportunity they ſhould have to do it decently. They were not in circumſtances to ſtand the attac of the royal army, which was now reinforced with ſix thouſand Dutch: but it was neceſſary to conceal this reſolution from their own people, till the proper meaſures were concerted to have them all diſperſed with the greateſt ſafety, without expoſing them to the inſults of the royal army. Had the reſolution been made public, it would have had this conſequence, that the common people would be ſo diſpirited, as not to be capable of taking care of their ſafety; and ſome of them perhaps might have had thoughts of revenging upon their leaders the danger, into which they had been drawn. For this reaſon the council gave out, they reſolved to fight the king's troops; and, accordingly, made all the preparation neceſſary for ſuch an undertaking, as if they had really intended it.

Expreſſes were ſent to the earl of Seaforth, the marquiſs of Huntley, and many others of their friends, to return ſpeedily to the army at Perth. Their head-quarters were fortified in

[h] The addreſs of the clergy, dated December 29, was as follows:

SIR,

'We your majeſty's moſt faithful and dutiful ſubjects, the epiſcopal clergy of the dioceſe of Aberdeen, do, from our hearts, render thanks to Almighty God for your majeſty's ſafe and happy arrival in this your antient kingdom of Scotland, where your royal preſence was ſo much longed for, and ſo neceſſary to animate your loyal ſubjects, our noble and generous patriots, to go on with that invincible courage and reſolution, which they have hitherto ſo ſucceſsfully exerted for the recovery of the rights of their king and country, and to excite many others of your good ſubjects to join them, who only wanted this great encouragement.

We hope and pray, that God may open the eyes of ſuch of your ſubjects, as malicious and ſelf-deſigning men have induſtriouſly blinded with prejudices againſt your majeſty, as if the recovery of your juſt rights would ruin our religion, liberties, and property, which by the overturning of theſe rights have been highly incroached upon; and we are perſuaded, that your majeſty's juſtice and goodneſs will ſettle and ſecure thoſe juſt privileges, to the conviction of your moſt malicious enemies.

Almighty God has been pleaſed to train up your majeſty from your infancy in the ſchool of the croſs, in which the divine grace inſpires the mind with true wiſdom and virtue, and guards it againſt thoſe falſe blandiſhments, by which proſperity corrupts the heart. And as this ſchool has ſent forth the moſt illuſtrious princes, as Moſes, Joſeph, and David; ſo we hope the ſame infinitely wiſe and good God deſigns to make your majeſty, not only a bleſſing to your own kingdoms, and a true father of them, but alſo a great inſtrument of the general peace and good of mankind.

Your princely virtues are ſuch, that, in the eſteem of the beſt judges, you are worthy to wear a crown, though you had not been born to it; which makes us confident, that it will be your majeſty's care to make your ſubjects a happy people, and ſo to ſecure them in their religion, liberties, and property, as to leave no juſt ground of diſtruſt, and to unite us all in true chriſtianity, according to the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, and the practice of the primitive Chriſtians.

We adore the goodneſs of God, in preſerving your majeſty amidſt the many dangers, to which you have been expoſed, notwithſtanding the helliſh contrivances formed againſt you, for encouraging aſſaſſins to murder your ſacred perſon; a practice abhorred by the very Heathens. May the ſame merciful providence continue ſtill to protect your majeſty, to proſper your arms, to turn the hearts of all the people towards you, to ſubdue thoſe who reſiſt your juſt pretenſions, to eſtabliſh you on the throne of your anceſtors, to grant you a long and happy reign, to bleſs you with a royal progeny, and at laſt with an immortal crown of glory. And as it has been, ſtill is, and ſhall be our care, to inſtil into the minds of the people true principles of loyalty to your majeſty: ſo this is the earneſt prayer of, &c.

The city of Aberdeen, who were moſtly of the epiſcopal communion, followed the example of their paſtors, in the following addreſs;

We your ever loyal and dutiful ſubjects, the magiſtrates, Town-council, and other your majeſty's loyal ſubjects, citizens of Aberdeen, do heartily congratulate your arrival to this your native and hereditary kingdom. Heaven very often inhances our bleſſings by diſappointments and your majeſty's ſafe arrival, after ſuch a train of difficulties, and ſo many attempts, makes us not doubt but God is propitious to your juſt cauſe.

As your majeſty's arrival was ſeaſonable, ſo it was ſurprizing. We were happy, and we knew it not: We had the bleſſing we wiſhed for, yet inſenſible till now, that your majeſty has been pleaſed to let us know, that we are the happieſt, and, as ſo, we ſhall always endeavour to be the moſt loyal of, &c.

the beſt manner; and people of all ranks were zealous in promoting the work. Nothing was to be ſeen till the very day they abandoned the place, but the greateſt induſtry in throwing up intrenchments, raiſing batteries, planting guns, with all the other preparations of war. The pretender even iſſued out an order, for the burning of the village of Auchterardire, to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy. [i]

According to this order, ſeveral towns, as Auchterardire, Blackford, Dunning, and Muthell, and other villages, were burnt to the ground; by which the poor inhabitants, being only old infirm men, women, and children (the reſt being forced from their homes) were expoſed to the ſevereſt ſeaſon of the year, in one of the coldeſt winters that had been known for many ages. In the account publiſhed at Paris of the pretender's conduct in Scotland, it is affirmed, that, upon his leaving that kingdom, he had depoſited a ſum of money in the hands of general Gordon, for the uſe of the ſufferers by the execution of this order; which money was to be delivered by that general, with a letter from the pretender to the duke of Argyle. Whether this was publiſhed to take off the ill impreſſion that order ſeemed to leave upon the minds of the people, or whether there was any truth either in that or the letter, depends only on the credit of the account written by the earl of Mar at Paris. [k]

During theſe tranſactions, the duke of Argyle, in conjunction with the lord Cadogan, took meaſures to diſlodge the rebels from Perth, and remove the pretender from Scotland.

A number of the rebels having poſſeſſion of the town of Brunt-Iſland, on the other ſide of the road of Leith, the duke of Argyle ordered the men of war, then on duty in

[i] The order was as follows:

James R.

'Whereas it is abſolutely neceſſary for our ſervice, and the public ſafety, that the enemy ſhould be as much incommoded as poſſible, eſpecially upon their march towards us, if they ſhould attempt any thing againſt us or our forces; and ſeeing this can be by no means better effected than by deſtroying all the corn and forage, that can ſupport them in their march, and burning the houſes and villages, which may be neceſſary for quartering their enemy; which nevertheleſs it is our meaning ſhould be only done in caſe of abſolute neceſſity, concerning which we have given our full inſtructions to James Graham younger of Braco: Theſe are therefore ordering and requiring you, how ſoon this order ſhall be tranſmitted to you by the hands of the ſaid James Graham, forthwith, with the garriſon under your command, to burn and deſtroy the village of Auchterardire with all the houſes, corn, and forage within the ſaid town, ſo as they may be rendered intirely uſeleſs to the enemy; for the doing whereof this ſhall be to you, and all you ſhall employ in execution thereof, a ſufficient warrant.

Given at our court of Scoon this ſeventeenth day of January, in the fifteenth year of our reign, 1715-16.

By his majeſty's command,

M A R.'

To colonel Patrick Graham, or the commanding officer for the time, of our garriſon of Tullibardine.

[k] This account at large was as follows:

SIR,

'You ſeem ſurprized at the ſudden change our affairs here have taken, from what you expected by the accounts you had from ſome of our friends at Edingburgh, before our leaving Perth, and even after we were gone from thence. I will therefore, for your ſatisfaction, give you a true account of that whole matter.

It is plain enough, that it was our buſineſs to repreſent our affairs then to the public, to be in ſuch a poſture, as might encourage our friends every where, and diſcourage our enemies, and ſtop them from marching againſt us, until we were in a better condition to receive them; which we had reaſon to expect ſoon to be, by our friends joining us, as they daily promiſed to do and until we ſhould receive the money, arms, and ammunition we were every day expecting, as we had been for a long time.

But, that time being now over, I may freely own to you, and it is fit you ſhould know, that a month before the chevalier landed, the reſolution was taken of abandoning Perth, as ſoon as the enemy ſhould march againſt it. And, though this reſolution was known to a good number in our army, yet the ſecret was ſo well kept, that it never came to the public; ſo that the enemy, believing that we ſhould ſtand our ground, thought themſelves obliged to delay their march for a long time, until they had made great preparations of artillery, &c. as if they had been going to beſiege a fortified town: But, in reality, our condition was then ſuch, as obliged us to take that reſolution, having neither a ſufficient number of men, ammunition, nor arms.

Upon the chevalier's arrival, we expected that our friends would then have certainly joined us; both thoſe, who had formerly been with us, and were gone home, and thoſe, who before had given the chevalier, not being come, as the only reaſon of their not joining the army; and alſo that thoſe, to whom the reducing of Inverneſs, the lord Sutherland, and thoſe with him, was committed, would have vigorouſly performed that ſervice, and then have joined us; and we had no reaſon to doubt, but money, ammunition, and arms would immediately be ſent after the chevalier.

But, to our great misfortune, we were diſappointed in all theſe our hopes, though never ſo well grounded in appearance.

The rigour of the ſeaſon, and the great fall of the ſnow on the hills, kept in ſome meaſures the reſt of the Highlanders from joining us. Moſt of thoſe, who before had excuſed themſelves upon the chevalier's not being come, kept ſtill at home, now that he was come, waiting perhaps to ſee how his affairs were like to ſucceed. Thoſe employed for reducing of Inverneſs were ſo far from acting with vigour, that they made, what they called it, a ceſſation of arms with the enemy. Some gold was ſent to us in Lingo's; but the ſhip, in which it came, was ſtranded, and the gold itſelf loſt. Several ſhips came with officers, but neither arms nor ammunition in any of them. So that our condition, after the chevalier's arrival, was no ways bettered, except by the new life his preſence gave to the ſmall number we at that time had got together. Even in that weak condition, the chevalier would gladly have maintained Perth, or ventured a battle. But when the enemy, with all their great preparations, and an army of above eight thouſand effective regular troops were actually in march, and advanced near to the place, it was found impracticable to defend the town, and unadviſeable to enter into a battle with a ſmall number of men, that were in it, for a great many reaſons too long to be here mentioned. But in ſhort we had not above four thouſand, both horſe and foot; and of theſe, for want of arms, and for other reaſons, not above two thouſand five hundred to be relied upon as good fighting men. The town is little better than an open village at any time; and at this the river on one ſide, and a kind of foſſe or ditch on the other, were frozen up, ſo that it was eaſy to be entered on all quarters. The long continued froſt had kept the mills from going; ſo that there was not above two days proviſions in the town. The enemy being then in poſſeſſion of the moſt part of Fife, where the coal-pits are, there were no coals to be got; and, the wood being ſcarce in the country, there happened to be almoſt no fuel at all. Beſides this, the Highlanders are not uſed to defend towns; nor had they wherewithal to defend this.

On the other hand, to have gone out to fight the enemy, when there was no advantageous poſt or paſs to be defended, had been expoſing our men to viſible deſtruction; the enemy being provided with every thing, and thrice our number of fighting men, might have ſurrounded us on all ſides, and prevented all poſſibility of retreat. All this put us into an abſolute neceſſity of leaving Perth, and retiring northwards, which we did in good order, and came in two days to Montroſe, and Brechin. Neither of theſe places are tenable, though we had been provided, as we were not, with a ſufficient number of men, ammunition, and proviſions. But, Montroſe being a good harbour, where we expected our ſuccours from abroad, we were unwilling to quit it, ſo long as we could remain ſafe in it. We thought indeed, that the enemy would have made a halt at Perth, and not have marched ſo quickly after us, as we ſoon found they did, they being within a few miles of us before we had certain intelligence of it, though great pains had been taken to be informed of their motions. The earl of Panmure, not being recovered of the ſevere wounds he had received at the battle of Sheriff-Moor, was not in a condition to march along with the army, which otherwiſe he would have done; upon which the chevalier adviſed him, as he paſſed Dundee, to endeavour to get off in the firſt ſhip he could find; and, by accident finding a little bark at Arboth, went off in it for France.

Before this time ſeveral people had very ſeriouſly repreſented to the chevalier the deplorable circumſtances, in which his affairs now were on all ſides; that, being overpowered in Scotland, no appearence of any riſing in England, nor any news of the ſuccours he expected from abroad, he had no courſe at preſent to take, that was conſiſtent with what he owed to his people in general, to thoſe, who had taken arms for him in particular, and to himſelf upon their account, but by retiring beyond ſea, to preſerve himſelf for a better occaſion of aſſerting his own right, and reſtoring them to their antient liberties.

It was indeed hard to bring him to think of this; but thoſe about him found it now high time to preſs the matter more than ever, the enemy being within three miles upon their march towards us. They therefore again repreſented to him the impoſſibility of making a ſtand any where, till they ſhould come to the moſt inacceſſible places of the mountains, where in that ſeaſon of the year, there being ſo much ſnow on the ground, there could be no ſubſiſtance for any body of men together, and where no ſuccour could come to them. That, when his ſmall army was divided in leſſer bodies, they could not avoid being cut off by the enemies troops, who would then be maſter of all the low countries, and eſpecially by the gariſons they had in Inverlochy and Inverneſs, which they would reinforce. That, as long as they knew he was in the kingdom, they would purſue him, even with the hazard of their whole army, his perſon being the chief object of their purſuit, as his deſtruction was the only thing, that could ſecure their uſurpation; whereas if he were gone off, they would not purſue with that eagerneſs, nor would they find their account in haraſſing their army in the ſnow, and exceſſive cold of the mountains, to purſue the ſcattered remains of the loyal party, who might ſkulk in the hills, till providence ſhould open a way for their relief, or that they ſhould obtain terms from the government. That his perſon being with them would defeat even theſe faint hopes; and that in ſhort, whilſt he was in the kingdom, they could never expect any terms or capitulation but by abandoning him, or giving him up; which rather than ever conſent to, they would be all to the laſt man cut in pieces.

Though the chevalier was ſtill extremely unwilling to leave his loyal people, who had ſacrificed their all with ſo much zeal and alacrity for his ſervice; yet when he conſidered, that, as things then ſtood, his preſence, far from being a help and ſupport to them, would rather be an occaſion of haſtening their ruin, he was ſenſibly touched to find himſelf, for their ſakes, under a neceſſity of leaving them; there was no anſwering their reaſons, nor any time to be loſt, the danger increaſing every moment. He therefore at laſt told them, that he was ſorry to find himſelf obliged to conſent to what they deſired of him; and I dare ſay, no conſent, he ever gave, was ſo uneaſy to him as this was.

In the mean time freſh alarms coming of the enemy's approaching, orders were given for the army's marching towards Aberdeen, and the reſolution was taken for his going off in the evening. It happened very providentially, that there was juſt ready in the arbour a ſmall ſhip that had been deſigned to carry a gentleman he was then to have ſent to a foreign court. This ſhip was now pitched upon to tranſport him: ſhe was but a ſmall one, and could carry but a few paſſengers; and therefore, to avoid confuſion, he himſelf thought fit to name thoſe, who ſhould attend him. The earl of Mar, who was the firſt named, made difficulty, and begged he might be left behind; but the chevalier being poſitive for his going, and telling him, that in a great meaſure there were the ſame reaſons for his going as for his own; that his friends would more eaſily get terms without him than with him; and that, as things now ſtood, he could be no longer of any uſe to them in that country, he ſubmitted.

The chevalier likewiſe ordered the marquiſs of Drummond to go along with him. This lord was then lame by a fall from his horſe, and not in a condition to follow the army, and was one of the four with the earl of Mar, lord Tullibardine, and lord Lithgow, againſt whom there was then a bill of attainder paſſing. The chevalier would have willingly carried with him the two other lords; but it happened, that they were both then at a diſtance; lord Tullibardine at Brechin with a part of the foot, and lord Lithgow at Bervil with the horſe. Lord Mariſchal, gentleman of his bed-chamber, was alſo ordered to go, though he ſeemed very deſirous to ſtay, and ſhare in the that road, to ſtand over; and throw ſome ſhot into the town. The captain had thrown but few, when the rebels abandoned the town, fearing as they ſaid, the captain, after his cannonading, would attempt to land; and their number was not ſufficient to defend the place. Upon notice of the rebels abandoning Brunt-Iſland, where they had left behind them ſix pieces of cannon, ſome arms, and a great quantity of proviſions, a detachment of Scots and Dutch troops were ſent over the Firth, to take poſſeſſion of the town, under the command of ſir James Montgomery. Upon this the fate of his countrymen. Lieutenant-general Sheldon, vice-chamberlain, had the ſame orders; as had alſo colonel Clepham, who had left the enemy. Lord Edward Drummond, who was alſo gentleman of his bed-chamber, happened to be with lord Tinmouth, at five miles diſtance, and ſo could not go with the chevalier, as he intended they both ſhould; but he wrote to them to follow in a ſmall ſhip, that was then in the harbour; but the maſter of this ſhip was frightened, and went away without carrying any body.

The chevalier then ordered a commiſſion to be drawn for lieutenant-general Gordon to command in chief, with all neceſſary power inſerted; and particularly one, to treat and capitulate with the enemy. He left alſo the ſaid general the reaſons of his leaving this kingdom, and all the money that was in the pay-maſter's hands, or that he had himſelf (ſave a ſmall ſum for defraying his own and company's charges) and left orders for a ſum of money (if there ſhould be any left after paying the army) to be given to the poor people, who ſuffered by the burning of Auchterardire, and ſome villages about it, which had been thought neceſſary to be done, to prevent the enemy's march, though very much againſt his inclination; which made him delay from time to time, until the enemy was actually on their march; and the chevalier left a letter with general Gordon for my lord Argyle to be delivered when the ſaid money ſhould be given, deſiring, that it ſhould be diſtributed accordingly.

About nine o'clock the chevalier went on board the ſhip, which was about a mile at ſea. Lord Mariſchal and colonel Clepham came ſome time after to the ſhore; but by accident found no boat, and ſo could not go off; though, as the boat-man, who carried the chevalier, aſſured us, he ſtaid for them till near eleven o'clock, but could ſtay no longer becauſe of the nine men of war, that were cruiſing thereabouts: and it was great good luc, that the ſhip having ſtaid ſo long, got out of their reach before it was day-light.

As ſoon as the chevalier parted, we marched, and we are now a good way advanced towards the Highlands; for there was no ſtand could be made at Aberdeen; nor could we think of going to Inverneſs, that being ſtill in the enemies hands. Some went to Peterhead, and thought to have got off in a ſhip they found there; but we hear they were ſoon forced bac by a man of war: ſo it is like they may join us again, if they are not intercepted by the enemy.

I muſt add here one thing, which however incredible it may appear, is, to our coſt, but too true; and that is, that, from the time the earl of Mar ſet up the chevalier's ſtandard to this day, we never received from abroad the leaſt ſupply of arms and ammunition of any kind; though it was notorious in itſelf, and well known, both to friends and enemies, that this was what from the beginning we mainly wanted; and, as ſuch, it was inſiſted upon by the earl of Mar, in all the letters he writ, and by all the meſſengers he ſent to the other ſide. Several ſhips came with officers, and ſome ſmall ſums of money, after the battle of Sheriff-moor; and three or four ſhips more came after the chevalier's arrival. But, even when he was with us in perſon, no powder was ſent, nor a ſword nor muſket; ſo that, when we marched from Perth, we had not three hundred weight of powder for the whole army, nor ſhould we have wanted men, had we had arms to put into their hands. How the main point came to be ſo intirely neglected by thoſe, who had the management of the chevalier's affairs in their hands, on the other ſide, is yet a myſtery to us; and it ſurprizes us the more, that thoſe, who came lately over, aſſure us, that both arms and ammunition might have been gotten from private hands, without having the obligation to any foreign prince. So whether this unaccountable omiſſion proceeded from mere negligence, want of money, or from a jealouſy in ſome, who were perhaps unwilling that we ſhould be the inſtruments of this great work, and that it ſhould ſucceed in our hands, or ſome other by-reaſons, is what time may diſcover.

Thus I have given you true matter of fact, and a ſincere account of our unfortunate condition. Whatever may now be our fate, we have ſtill one ſolid ground of comfort, that the chevalier hath (as we hope) got ſafe out of the reach of his enemies; for in the ſafety of his perſon is all our hopes of relief; and we look on him as the inſtrument reſerved by God, and he now ſeems the only one in the ordinary courſe of Providence to reſcue theſe nations in due time from their oppreſſion, and the lawleſs dominion of E——.

Now if we look bac a little, and conſider our affairs from the beginning of this laſt attempt, I believe it will be found, that no nation in our circumſtances, and ſo deſtitute of all kind of ſuccour from abroad ever made ſo brave a ſtruggle for reſtoring their prince and country to their juſt rights. And when it comes to be known to the world (as ſome time or other it may) what encouragements there were at home and abroad, reaſonably to make us expect and hope for ſucceſs in this great, good, and neceſſary work, it will not appear a chimerical, raſh, or illgrounded undertaking; and its not proving ſucceſsful, as plainly appears by what has been already ſaid, and what follows, is not owing to the chevalier, or his faithful friends on this ſide.

When the earl of Mar, by the chevalier's command, came down to Scotland, he found the people there more forward to take arms than his inſtructions allowed him to conſent to; and it was not without difficulty that we could allay their firſt heat. But the chevalier not going into England, nor the duke of Berwick coming to Scotland, as was generally expected, abated very much of that forwardneſs; ſo that, when the government ſummoned thoſe they ſuſpected to appear, and give bail for their good behaviour, many of them ſeemed inclined to comply. The earl of Mar, in purſuance of his inſtructions, found it then high time, for preventing this ſtep, to appear openly; and it was not without difficulty, that he could perſuade ſome to join with him, they apprehending great uncertainty of ſucceſs in this affair, by no account being come of the chevalier, or the duke of Berwick's arrival, nor of money, arms, ammunition, or officers, though others were all along very forward. Upon the reſolution of taking arms, he ſent a gentleman to give the chevalier an account of it.

It was near a month after the earl of Mar ſet up the ſtandard before he could procure a commiſſion; and it is no ſmall proof of the people's zeal for their country, that ſo great a number followed his advice, and obeyed his orders, before he could produce one. It muſt be owned, and it is the leſs to be wondered at, that, his authority being thus precarious, ſome were not ſo punctual in joining him, and others performed not ſo effectually the ſervice they were ſent upon; which had they done, not only Scotland, but even part of England, had been reduced to the chevalier's obedience before the government had been in a condition to make head againſt us. But, as it was, moſt of thoſe who had promiſed, and ſome who had not, joined the chevalier's ſtandard at Perth about the end of October; at which time the earl of Mar ſent two gentlemen, to give the chevalier an account of the condition they were in, of what they had, and what they wanted, and to haſten his own, the duke of Ormond's, and the duke of Berwick's coming into Britain.

About this time there was a riſing of ſome noblemen and gentlemen in the South of Scotland, who, marching over the borders, were joined by ſome in the north of England; and they all marching bac into Scotland, the earl of Mar ſent over the Firth of Forth fifteen hundred foot to join them. This occaſioned the duke of Argyle's leaving Stirling, and going with a part of his army to Edingburgh. Now had the Scots and Engliſh horſe, who were then in the ſouth of Scotland, come and joined the fifteen hundred foot as was expected; had the highland clans performed as they promiſed, the ſervice they were ſent upon in Argyleſhire, and marched towards Glaſgow, as the earl of Mar marched towards Stirling, he had then given a good account of the government's army, the troops from Ireland not having yet joined them, nor could they have joined them afterwards. But, all this failing by ſome croſs accidents, lord Argyle returned with that part of his army to Stirling; and the earl of Mar could not, with the men he then had, advance farther than Dumblain; and for want of proviſions there, was ſoon after obliged to return to Perth.

But immediately after we had got proviſions, and that the clans and my lord Seaforth had joined us, we marched again towards the enemy; and, notwithſtanding the difficulties the earl of Mar had upon that occaſion with ſome of our people, he gave the enemy battle; and, as you ſee in our printed accounts of it, had not our left wing given way, which was occaſioned by miſtake of orders, and ſcarcity of experienced officers, that being compoſed of as good men, and marched as cheerfully up to the field of battle as the other, our victory had been complete; and, as it was, the enemy, who was advanced on this ſide the river, was forced to retire bac to Stirling.

Amongſt many good qualities, the Highlanders have one unlucky cuſtom, not eaſy to be reformed; which is, that generally after an action they return home. Accordingly a great many went off after the late battle of Sheriff-moor; ſo that the earl of Mar not being in a condition to purſue the advantage he had by it, was forced to return to Perth, waiting there, not without impatience, both for the return of the Highlanders, and for money, arms, and ammunition, he had ſo often aſked, and ſtill expected from abroad. But the Highlanders, hearing nothing of the chevalier, or the duke of Berwick's coming, nor of the ſupplies, did not return to the army, as they had promiſed: and the gentlemen of the army, who had been long from home, living ſtill at their own charges, which they could not well longer ſupport, went alſo moſtly home, ſome without leave, and others after a leave, which the earl of Mar ſaw well enough would be to no purpoſe to refuſe. Some indeed never thought of quitting the army, and others returned ſoon to it; but our number was never again near ſo great, as it had been before the battle. About this time we had the news of the fatal affair at Preſton, which was no ſmall diſcouragement to the army; ſo that ſome, who had been caballing privately before, began then to ſpeak openly of capitulating with the enemy, and found others more eaſy to join with them.

We had, at the ſame time, another piece of bad news; which was, that Simon Frazer of Beauford (by ſome called lord Lovat) had joined lord Sutherland; and that they, with the help of ſome other diſaffected people thereabouts, had retaken Inverneſs. Upon this news, moſt of the name of Frazer, who had joined the chevalier's army with Frazerdale, went now away, and joined Beauford, or lord Lovat, their chief.

This obliged the earl of Mar to ſend lord Seaforth North to get his men together, who had moſtly returned home after the battle, and in conjunction with the chevalier's friends in that country, to endeavour to recover Inverneſs.

In the mean time thoſe who were for capitulating with the enemy, preſſed the earl of Mar ſo hard to conſent to it, that to prevent ſome people's making private ſeparate treaties, which he found they were about, he was at laſt forced to comply ſo far with them, as to ſend a meſſage from the whole army to my lord Argyle, to know, if he had power to treat with them? That lord returned with great civility this anſwer, that he had no ſufficient power to treat with them in a body, but that he would write to court upon the ſubject. To which it was replied, that, when he ſhould let them know he had ſufficient power, they then would make their propoſitions. By which the affair was put off at that time, and we were ſince informed, that the lord Argyle never received thoſe powers; and that even his former powers, which he ſent up to be inlarged, were never returned to him.

Much about this time the marquiſs of Huntley having for ſome time preſſed his going home with his horſe, the earl of Mar conſented to it, and gave him a commiſſion, in conjunction with my lord Seaforth, for reducing of Inverneſs, and thoſe who oppoſed the chevalier's intereſt in that country, which we then hoped would be ſoon done.

After this ſome, though but few, were diſcovered to have private dealings with the enemy; and ſome others went home, and never returned to the army; but a good number of the noblemen and gentlemen, and all the heads of the clans, ſtill remained with the army at Perth.

We had about this time the long wiſhed-for news of the chevalier's being landed; and that put an end for the preſent to any further talking of capitulations.

I have now given you a true, and, I hope, a ſatisfactory account of the condition we have been in, ever ſince our firſt taking arms; of the bad condition in which the chevalier found us at his arrival; and of the reaſons that obliged him at laſt to leave us.

There remains yet to anſwer one queſtion, which you may naturally aſk, as moſt people do, on this ſubject; and that is, Why the chevalier delayed his coming ſo long?

To anſwer this queſtion to your ſatisfaction, I muſt tell you, that I have what I ſhall here relate, from perſons of unqueſtionable veracity, who were then upon the place, eye and ear witneſſes of what paſſed; and ſo you may ſafely rely upon it.

You have certainly heard, what was generally ſaid, of the chevalier's ſiſter's inclinations towards him, whilſt ſhe was in poſſeſſion of his throne. But, whatever there was of truth in that, what I am well aſſured of is, that he was at laſt ſo little ſatisfied with what was ſaid to him from thence, that he was fully reſolved, whilſt ſhe was yet alive, to have gone into Scotland; and in order to that, had already prepared a declaration, or manifeſto, to have been there publiſhed upon his arrival. How he was hindered from putting this deſign in execution by ſome real friends, that were themſelves impoſed upon, and by other pretended friends, who were at the bottom real enemies, is a myſtery, which time may diſcover.

Upon the firſt news of his ſiſter's death, he immediately took poſt, and rebels quitted all the towns on the north ſide of the Firth; by which means the navigation to and beyond Leith was not ſo much interrupted, as in the beginning of the winter.

There happened ſome ſkirmiſhes between the detachments ſent to poſſeſs theſe towns, and ſome parties of the rebels; but none of any conſequence. The moſt remarkable ſkirmiſh was about the 2d of January, when the earl of Rothes, with a good company of volunteers, and a detachment of fifty Dutch, attempted to poſſeſs themſelves of the palace of Falkland, a royal foundation but now gone to decay. The rebels, having intelligence of the earls deſign, threw a party of their men into the place, and ſent another body to ſurround him in a village, near Falkland. The volunteers, to the number of thirty, found means to make their eſcape; but the Dutch foot were made priſoners.

To reſtrain the incurſions of the enemy upon the duke's new acquiſitions on the coaſt of Fife, three battalions of Dutch foot were ordered to paſs the Firth at the Queen's-Ferry, and take quarters about Innerkeithing, Dumferling, and the towns in that neighbourhood, which proved a ſufficient chec upon the rebels during their ſtay at Perth.

About this time the earl of Seaforth and the marquis of Huntley had capitulated with the earl of Sutherland, after many threatnings between them, which never came to blows. The earl of Seaforth afterwards involved himſelf again in the rebellion; but the marquis of Huntley ſtrictly obſerved the terms of his capitulation.

The duke of Argyle had now got all the ſupplies he expected. The ſix thouſand Dutch auxiliaries, under the command of major general Vanderbeck, had joined him; as Newton's and Stanhope's dragoons had likewiſe from England. But he was in great want of a train of artillery, which he had long expected from England, and which had been ſhipped for this ſervice; but the ſtormy weather and eaſterly winds continuing, the duke grew impatient of waiting any longer for them, and ordered general Cadogan to go to Berwick with a guard of five hundred men, and fifteen hundred carriage horſes, to bring thence ten pieces of cannon and four mortars, with their carriages and ammunition, which, with fourteen pieces, that he had already with him, was thought a ſufficient train for this expedition. The train being now ready, he was as much at a loſs for gunners to manage it, having few or none in his army; but the fleet, on board of which the train and ammunition had been ſhipped, arrived in the road of Leith on the 28th of January, colonel Borgard, who commanded the engineers and gunners ſent with theſe ſtores, arrived at Stirling on the 29th, ſo that now all things were ready for the intended attac of the enemy, which was reſolved in a council of war, notwithſtanding the rigour of the ſeaſon.

On the 21ſt, two hundred dragoons were ſent, under the command of general Gueſt, to view the road, and diſcover ſome of the diſpoſitions of the rebels. This party, though only ſent to reconnoitre, put the rebels into the utmoſt confuſion at Perth. Some country people, whoſe fear magnified the number of the detachment, carried news to the town, that the duke of Argyle and all the army was within a few hours march. This ſtruc the whole rebel army with the greateſt conſternation; and the panic continued, till parties, ſent out as far as Tullibardine to view the country, returned with the report of the falſhood of the rumour.

Colonel Gueſt being returned, acquainted the duke of Argyle, that the roads were ſo covered with ſnow, that it would be impoſſible for the army to paſs, eſpecially the artillery and heavy carriages, except the ſnow was removed; upon which ſeveral thouſand people from the country were ſummoned in to clear the roads.

On the 24th, the duke and general Cadogan went out with a party to view the country, and haſten the workmen employed in clearing the roads. This likewiſe alarmed ſome of the enemy's advanced poſts, but did not, as the other, reach Perth.

The day before and that day it thawed ſuddenly; and the thaw was followed by a great fall of ſnow, which hindered the workmen employed in clearing the roads, who had now all their work to do over again, and rendered the deſigned march almoſt impracticable. This inclined moſt of the generals to defer the march of the troops till the ſeaſon was more moderate, none of them having ſeen a campaign in ſo cold a climate: but the duke was reſolute in the meaſures taken, eſpecially as he had poſitive orders from above, to attac the rebels without loſs of time.

On the 26th, the duke ordered two regiments of dragoons, and five hundred foot, to advance to Dumblain, with directions to poſt a ſtrong party at the demoliſhed bridge of Down.

On the 29th, the army begun their march, and proceeded to Dumblain; the troops, which were there before, advancing at the ſame time, to the old caſtle of Braco, expecting ſome reſiſtance, but they found it abandoned. The next morning the ſame party, with two pieces of cannon advanced upon the road to Tullibardine, to cover the workmen, who were clearing the way, and to prevent their being inſulted by the garriſon of Tullibardine. That day the army marched to Auchterardire; that is, to the place where it ſtood, for the rebels had burnt the village to the ground, ſo that the men were obliged to lie in the open air in as violent a cold night, as ever was known in thoſe parts. The next morning early they marched to Tullibardine, the garriſon of which place had retired, except fifty men, who were made priſoners. Here the duke of Argyle received intelligence, that the pretender and his army had abandoned Perth the day before, and retired towards Dundee. This was very agreeable news to the whole army, who had lain in the ſnow for two nights ſucceſſively. But, as it was four o'clock in the afternoon before the duke had the intelligence, they could not reach Perth that night. However the duke took reſolved to endeavour at any rate, to get into ſome part of his dominions; but was ſtopped by thoſe, who had power to do it effectually. Being then forced bac to Lorrain, he made and publiſhed his proteſtation, which it is likely you have ſeen, and which, I can aſſure you, was drawn intirely by himſelf.

From that time, as before, he had nothing in his thoughts, but how, and when, he could aſſert his own right, and deliver his people. He ſaw little ground to hope for ſuccour from any foreign prince, and had only the affections of his people, and the advice of his friends on this ſide the water, to rely upon. Their intereſt ſeemed now more than ever linked to his; and they being upon the place, and conſequently beſt able to judge of the fitteſt time for his coming to them, it muſt be allowed, that it had been no ways prudent nor adviſeable in him to act contrary to their opinion: And yet it is moſt certain, that it was only by following their advice, contrary to his own judgment and inclination, that ſo much time was loſt. Some of them in England inſiſted upon having a certain number of regular troops to make head at firſt, without which, they ſaid, nothing was to be attempted: and though he ſent them word over and over, that, after all the endeavours he could uſe, he found it abſolutely impoſſible to obtain any troops; yet they inſiſted for ſeveral months in this opinion, and by that means the moſt favourable time, he ever had, was loſt. Other friends there pretended, that the diſpoſition of the people would ſtill grow more favourable towards him; and that there was no danger, but advantage, by delaying.

Thus, though he had ſeveral times fixed a day for his departure, he was ſtill forced to delay, that he might not act contrary to the advice of his friends; and at another time, becauſe he found, that his enemies had diſcovered his deſign, and taken infallible meaſures to intercept him. But as ſoon as his friends began to ſee and own the miſtakes they had been in, he without any regard to the many dangers he had to go through, ſet out from commercy the 28th of October, and went incognito through a great part of France to the coaſt of Bretagne; and to avoid falling into the hands of many, who were placed upon the common road to intercept him, he was obliged to croſs the country through bye-ways, with only three people with him. His deſign was to go to England, if things appeared favourable there; or, if they did not, to go to Scotland.

When he arrived at St. Malo's, he found the duke of Ormond returned from the coaſt of England, to which he had gone ſome days before, in hopes to have found friends ready to join him; but that having failed by ſome accidents of diſcoveries, he was forced to return. Upon this he reſolved to go into Scotland; and it not being thought ſafe for him to go through the Britiſh channel, he had been adviſed to go round Ireland; and by a meſſage from his friends in Scotland, it was propoſed to him to land at Dunſtaffnage, which was at that time in their poſſeſſion; but ſoon after the enemy came to be maſters of it, by the clans not performing what they were charged with in Argyleſhire, as is aforementioned. His friends immediately informed him of this change by a ſecond meſſage; and this confirmed him in the reſolution he had himſelf before taken, of changing, all his meaſures, and in place of taking that long tedious way, which was indeed the ſafeſt, to take a much ſhorter, though a more dangerous way for being intercepted by the enemies ſhips. He ſent therefore immediately to prepare a ſmall ſhip privately for him at Dunkirk; which was accordingly done, though not without difficulty.

He was a ſecond time obliged to traverſe a great part of France, and that on horſeback, in the very coldeſt time of this hard and ſevere winter; expoſed to greater danger than in the Forth, from the greater number of thoſe, who lay in wait for him on all the great roads, which obliged him to travel by unfrequented roads where there was accommodation bad enough; and yet all this time, in that terrible cold, he never had the leaſt ailment or indiſpoſition.

It was about the middle of December (our ſtyle) before he could reach Dunkirk. He was there informed, that there was a man of war then lying in that very road; and that there were a great many more cruizing on the coaſts of France, England and Scotland, all of them in waiting for him: but he without any regard to theſe dangers, went immediately on board this ſmall ſhip with only three ſervants, and conducted by good providence, arrived ſafe at Peterhead, where he landed the 22d of December, O. S.

Having, I hope, fully ſatisfied your curioſity, I have only to add, that though it hath pleaſed God to permit, that this attempt, though never ſo juſt, had not the wiſhed for ſucceſs; we have ſtill reaped by it one great advantage, which is, that we have ſeen with our own eyes, and perſonally known our lawful ſovereign, and to our unſpeakable ſatisfaction, diſcovered in him all the great and good qualities, that are neceſſary for making a people every way happy.

The time may, and I hope will yet come, when God in his mercy, will open the eyes, and turn the hearts of thoſe nations to a ſenſe of their duty, and not permit ſo accompliſhed a perſon to be always unfortunate. But however it ſhould pleaſe providence to diſpoſe of him, this I can aſſure you, and you may rely upon it, that as his right is indefeaſible, he is firmly reſolved, by the help of Almighty God, to aſſert it, whenever he finds a fit opportunity, and never to depart from it but with his life.

with him four ſquadrons of dragoons, and two battalions of foot, and marched that evening to take poſſeſſion of the town, where he arrived about two o'clock in the morning with the horſe; but the foot, through the length and deepneſs of the road, did not arrive till ten the next morning, very much harraſſed by their march. Had the rebels had any intelligence, that the duke was detached with ſo ſmall an attendance, from the main of the army, he might have been in ſome hazard; for the groſs of the army did not arrive at Perth from Tullibardine till late in the evening, the 1ſt of February.

The pretender and his party had now got two days march before the royal army. It was neceſſary therefore to purſue them without intermiſſion, that they might have no reſt. Accordingly the 2d of February the duke of Argyle continued his purſuit at the head of ſix ſquadrons, two battalions, and eight hundred detached foot; lay that night at Errol, and on the 3d arrived at Dundee, though the main army, which made more eaſy marches, did not come up till the 4th. Here the duke's intelligence made him judge, that the rebel army, which had now proceeded to Montroſe, would make ſome ſtop there, as that place was more tenable than Perth, and a ſea-port where they might expect ſupplies from abroad. Therefore he reſolved not to allow them to fortify themſelves, but ſent two detachments to Montroſe by two different roads: two thouſand foot and fifty dragoons went by the way of Aberbrothick, and three hundred more, and fifty dragoons, marched by the way of Briechen; but the ſnow was ſo deep, that the march proved very tedious to thoſe detachments, ſince they were obliged to ſummon in the country people, to clear the roads. On the 5th, the whole army marched; the duke with the cavalry, and train, by the road of Briechen, and the infantry, with general Cadogan, by the way of Aberbrothick.

In this day's march, they had intelligence that the pretender had made his eſcape, both from his own people and the king's army, the morning before, on board a French ſhip, called the Maria-Tereſa of St. Malo, then lying in the road of Montroſe.

It has been already obſerved, that the abandoning Perth, and diſperſing the rebel army as ſoon as they could get out of the reach of the king's army, had been reſolved ever ſince, if not before, the pretender's arrival in Scotland; but that it was neceſſary to conceal this deſign from the groſs of the army, as well as that the pretender, and ſome of the chief leaders of this undertaking, intended to make their eſcape to France the firſt opportunity. However, the army's abandoning Perth ſo precipitately, as to leave their waggons and artillery behind them, and then pointing their march to the ſea-ſhore, eſpecially to Montroſe, where it was known that ſeveral French ſhips lay, raiſed jealouſies in the heads of the army of what was really their intent, and produced conſiderable murmurings, which the earl of Mar could not appeaſe, but by countenancing the march from Montroſe to Aberdeen, where he gave out they deſigned to make a ſtand. The army was made to believe that the pretender was to go along with them; and, to amuſe them, his horſes and ordinary body-guard were drawn up before the door of the houſe where he lodged. This removing all jealouſy, the army became tractable again, and proceeded on their march. But the pretender, inſtead of going on with them, left his attendance in their uſual waiting, ſlipped out of a back-door, and went on foot to the earl of Mar's quarters, and from thence to the water-ſide, where a boat waited for them, and carried them on board with only three ſervants. The ſame boat returned, and took in the earl of Melfort, the lord Drummond, lieutenant-general Buckley, Sheldon, and others, to the number of ſeventeen in all, being perſons of the firſt rank, either in his houſhold or army, or originally privy to his deſign.

When they were all on board, the veſſel ſet ſail, ſteering to the coaſt of Norway, to keep clear of the Engliſh cruiſers. They had a freſh gale at Weſt-South Weſt, and made land the next evening; and, coaſting along the German and Dutch ſhores, they arrived in five days at Gravelin in France; and the ſame ſhip returned in twelve days from her firſt ſetting out, both to give intelligence of the pretender's ſafe landing, and to take in another party of gentlemen, which was done about Frazerburgh, after the main of the army was diſperſed in the hills.

The earl Mariſchal and the lord Tinmouth, ſon of the duke of Berwick, were about five miles from Montroſe, when the pretender imbarked; and ſo were left to ſhift for themſelves with ſeveral others. But it will appear from the ſequel, that both the earl Mariſchal and general Gordon were in the ſecret, though they pretended to make the army believe otherwiſe, to ſecure themſelves from their reſentment, and only ſtaid behind to conduct the army to a place, where they could with ſafety diſperſe them: which they did ſo effectually, that though the duke of Argyle uſed his utmoſt endeavours to come up with them, yet he could never overtake one party of them, and did not, in all the purſuit, from Perth to the Highlands, take a hundred priſoners. They kept ſo cloſe together, and marched with ſuch expedition into the mountains, that it was in vain for the duke to purſue them any farther.

When the pretender went away, he appointed general Gordon to command in chief. When that general arrived in the army at Aberdeen (where they were but coldly received, in compariſon of their former reception) he produced a paper of inſtructions which he had from the pretender, and which, he ſaid, he was commanded not to open till he came to that city. In this paper the pretender complains chiefly of diſappointments from abroad; and mentions the neceſſity he was under, for his own preſervation, to leave the country. He thanks them for their ſo chearfully undertaking ſo hazardous an enterprize, which, he ſays, would not have been liable to the preſent diſappointments, if their endeavours had been as well ſeconded by others, who had, by large promiſes, flattered him with their aſſiſtance. He recommends to them to conſult their own ſafety, and to keep together till they arrived at ſuch places, where they might ſeparate without becoming a prey to the enemy, and promiſes to let them hear from him ſhortly.

It was the 6th of February when they arrived at Aberdeen, the third day after the pretender imbarked. Here they ſtaid but one night, and in that interval procured three veſſels to carry over about two hundred gentlemen, who deſigned to make their eſcape that way. Theſe veſſels received private orders to meet them to the north of Aberdeen, about Peterhead, Buchan, Roſs, and other parts, where they took in their intended cargo; but one of them, falling in with the king's cruiſers, put in for the ſhore, where the gentlemen landed again, and followed the rebel army through by-ways. The other two veſſels, with about a hundred and forty gentlemen, arrived ſafe in France.

On the 7th, the rebels reſolved to leave Aberdeen, and began their march early in the morning, and had evacuated the place by two in the afternoon. General Gordon, with the foot, formed the van, and the earl Mariſchal, with about a thouſand horſe, formed the rear to prevent ſurprize. They marched to the left directly weſt through Strath-Spey, and Strath-Down, to the hills of Badenoch, where they quietly diſperſed the common people, moſtly to their homes, but with a reſolution to be ready to take up their arms on the firſt notice they ſhould have from general Gordon.

About this time ſeveral gentlemen, who had betaken themſelves to the hills about Lochaber, received advice, that two French frigates lay at the Orkneys in Pentland Frith, till they ſhould come aboard. Upon this the lord Duffus, ſir George St. Clair, and lieutenant-general Eclin, with about one hundred and ſixty gentlemen more on horſeback well armed and mounted, made a ſally from the hills, and croſſing in a body the ſhire of Murray, came down to the ſea-coaſt, near a place called Bruch. Here they quitted their horſes to their ſervants; and ſuch, as they had no uſe for, they killed to prevent their falling a prey to the king's forces; then went on board ſome ſmall boats to purſue their way to the Orkneys; but finding theſe boats too ſmall and dangerous for that boiſterous ſeaſon of the year, they put in again at Dumbeth; where they hired two large barks, in which ſixty of them got ſafe to the frigate of twenty-ſix guns. The others preſſed another Scots veſſel to carry them to the other frigate. When they arrived off that coaſt, the country people were alarmed, and afraid, that they were come with a deſign to plunder them, and ſeemed inclinable to fall upon them. But, the French ſhip coming in to their aſſiſtance, the people were ſoon ſet right as to their miſtake, and aſſiſted them in getting on board the French ſhip. Both the ſhips ſet ſail, and landed them at Gottenburgh, in the king of Sweden's dominions, who was then ſetting out with an army on his expedition to Norway, and received their offer of entering into his ſervice very courteouſly. But the lord Duffus, going to Hamburgh, was there ſeized at the ſuit of the Britiſh envoy.

In the mean time, the duke of Argyle was on his march to Montroſe, where he arrived on the 6th of February; and at Aberdeen, with five hundred men, on the 8th; but the reſt of the army not being come up, the purſuit could not be continued; only he diſpatched general Evans with two hundred dragoons to harraſs their rear, or endeavour to divide their horſe from the foot; and at the ſame time, to give chace to the two hundred gentlemen, who had ſeparated from the reſt, to take ſhipping at Frazerſburgh but the general ſucceeded in neither.

While the duke of Argyle was in chaſe of the rebel army by land, the men of war were as induſtrious to annoy them by ſea, and hinder their eſcape. But they had not the fortune to meet with one ſhip belonging to the rebels; though they were not remiſs in their duty.[l]

With all this diligence both on ſea and land, it was ſtrange that any eſcaped: but it was much more ſo, that not one of them ever fell into the hands of their purſuers, but arrived every man ſafe in France; where they were hunted by the earl of Stair, the Britiſh ambaſſador at the French court, whoſe intelligence was ſo good, that there was ſcarce one ſtep taken by the pretender, or any of his moſt ſecret friends, without his knowledge; by which means he diſappointed the pretender of the greateſt part of the ſupplies he expected from France, and watched his perſon ſo narrowly, that he kept him a conſiderable time on that ſide of the water, to the general diſappointment of the rebels. By his repeated memorials to the regent of France, he kept him in conſtant obſervance of the treaty of Utrecht; at leaſt any violations, that were made, were only by connivance; in which caſes the earl was never ſilent, as appears by two memorials; the one writ while the pretender was in Scotland, and the other after he had abandoned it.[m]

The facts contained in the firſt memorial were too well vouched for the regent to deny them; and it was difficult to find any evaſion to reconcile them to the engagements of the court of France in the treaty of Utrecht; for which reaſon he did not incline to give any anſwer. But the affairs of the pretender taking a different turn, and he being obliged to leave Scotland, and being again arrived in France ſome days after the firſt memorial was delivered, the earl of Stair preſented a ſecond, to prevent his, or any of his adherents being ſheltered in that court [n].

The pretender, upon his return to France from Scotland,

'Feb. 22. The Royal Ann galley, Pearl, Port-Mahon, Deal-Caſtle, and Phenix are returned from cruiſing. It appears from the journal of captain Stewart, that he had intelligence early of the pretender's having put to ſea from Montroſe in a clean tallowed French ſnow, which rowed out of the harbour, and cloſe in a long ſhore, a good while with her ſails furled.

'The Port-Mahon lay all that night within two leagues of the harbour's mouth; but it was ſo very dark, there was no ſeeing a ſhip at a quarter of a mile diſtance. Captain Stewart and the Pearl were off Aberdeen; and when the rebels marched out of that town, having notice of their marching northward, and that lord Tinmouth and others were contriving to make their eſcape from Peterhead or Frazerſburgh, he immediately diſpatched away the Pearl and Phenix to lie off theſe places, which effectually diſappointed them. He lay himſelf at Aberdeen, till the duke of Argyle arrived there. The winds afterwards blowing hard ſoutherly, he diſpoſed the ſhips moſtly on the ſouth coaſt of the Murray-Firth; ſent by the Deal-Caſtle a letter to the earl of Sutherland, to appriſe him of the flight of the rebels, and to prepare to receive them, in caſe they ſhould make a puſh at Inverneſs; and traced lord Tinmouth and his aſſociates as far as Port-Sary; where ſeeing a ſhip of war ready to intercept them, they deſpaired of ſucceſs on the coaſt, and therefore they joined the clans on the 10th inſtant, and took to the mountains. All the ſhips kept the ſea diligently, when wind and weather would permit, and obſerved the motions of his majeſty's army ſo carefully, that the duke of Argyle did not paſs through any ſea-port town without finding ſome ſhip ready to put in execution any ſervice his grace might have had to propoſe. On the 21ſt ſir John Jennings had advice from my lord Lovat, that a veſſel with the pretender's plate, and other effects on board, and a conſiderable ſum of money for his uſe, had lately put into the Lewis; and that many of the chiefs of the rebels were making off towards the Iſle of Skie, and other north-weſt iſlands: whereupon he immediately ordered the Drake ſloop thither, with inſtructions to cruiſe about the Orkneys, if the wind ſhould then be contrary; and by expreſs, directed captain Stewart of the Aldborough, to diſpatch the Happy-Sloop thither, and to cruiſe himſelf with the Lively, for fourteen days about the iſlands of Iſlay, Mull, and Canna, to endeavour to intercept the rebels, or any veſſels for their relief.'

[m] The firſt memorial, dated in January 1715-16, was in the following terms:

'The underwritten earl of Stair, miniſter of the king of Great-Britain at the court of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, repreſents to his royal highneſs the duke of Orleans, regent of France, that although his royal highneſs has ſeveral times aſſured the ſaid earl, that he would faithfully and punctually obſerve the treaty of peace concluded with Great-Britain at Utrecht, and that he would not ſuffer any arms, ammunition of war, officers or ſoldiers, to ſail from any harbour in France, for the ſervice of the pretender; and that his royal highneſs had accordingly ſent ſtrict orders to all the harbours in the kingdom for that purpoſe; it is nevertheleſs apparent, that things of this nature are daily embarked, and ſhipped off in the ports of France, without any oppoſition on the part of the officers commanding there. The late duke of Ormond and the pretender have frequently gone on board ſhips at St. Malo that were known to be loaden with arms and ammunition for the ſervice of the pretender; and that with ſo little circumſpection, that they have been attended with a whole troop of horſe, with their officers of the regiment of Nugent, all of them in their regimental cloaths, arms, and accoutrements, without meeting with any oppoſition from the commanding Officers of the moſt chriſtian king at St. Malo. The pretender finding it not adviſeable to venture to embark there, ſet out through Normandy to embark at Dunkirk; and the late duke of Ormond, not finding it ſafe to land in England, returned to Morlaix. During his abſence his royal highneſs did the earl of Stair the honour to tell him, that he would cauſe the ſaid troopers of the regiment of Nugent to be puniſhed as deſerters, if they returned to France; and the marſhal d'Uxelles aſſured him that he would cauſe them to be hanged. They are now returned, and have joined their regiments: The ſieur Beſach and his company, the arms and ammunition, which the late duke of Ormond had with him for his enterprize, are ſtill at Morlaix, and have been removed only from one ſhip to another. The commanding officer is ſo far from commanding thoſe arms to be ſtopped, that he refuſed to cauſe the ſhips to be ſearched, though he was deſired to do ſo by captain Campbell, commander of the Engliſh man of war lying in Morleix.

Several ſhips, with arms, ammunition, money, and officers for the ſervice of the pretender, are ſailed, within theſe ſix weeks paſt, from Dieppe and Havre de Grace, which are actually arrived in Scotland. And laſtly, a ſhip ſailed the 17th of this month from Havre de Grace, in ſight of an officer of the king of Great-Britain, who having repreſented to the marquiſs de Roveray, that there were twenty officers, both at Havre and Harfleur, ready to go on board to follow the pretender to Scotland; and deſired the marquiſs to give orders to prevent their embarkation, the marquiſs anſwered, That what he ſaid might poſſibly be true; but that he could not hinder the officers from going on board, having no orders from court ſo to do. The earl of Stair has ſeveral times repreſented to his royal highneſs the regent, and to the marſhal d'Uxelles, that ſeveral generals, colonels, and other officers, who are actually in the ſervice of France, deſigned to go over to Scotland, and join the rebels, and even has given a liſt of them to the marſhal; which generals, colonels, and officers are ſtill at Boulogne, Calais, Dunkirk, and other places thereabouts, ready to embark for Scotland, having been detained only by the contrary winds and great froſts; the commanders of the ſaid places alledging, that they have no orders from court to hinder the ſaid officers from embarking. The earl of Stair finds himſelf obliged to repreſent theſe things to his royal highneſs, that he may ſee, whether his orders have been punctually executed, and conſider whether Great-Britain has reaſon to believe, that the treaty of Utrecht is faithfully executed. His royal highneſs is deſired at the ſame time, to caſt an eye on the ſaid treaty. Furthermore, the ſaid earl of Stair finds himſelf obliged to notify to his royal highneſs, that the ſaid late duke of Ormond, and ſeveral other conſpirators againſt their king and country, ſet out ſome days ſince towards Bourdeaux and Bayonne; and that they have aſſembled on the coaſt of Gaſcoigne a great quantity of arms and ammunition, with ſhips to make a deſcent (as the court of St. Germain's give out) in Ireland, and cauſe a rebellion there, which that court flatters themſelves will not only be ſupported with money, but alſo with troops from France. The earl of Stair, who has ſo ardently deſired to eſtabliſh and maintain a good, ſincere friendſhip between the king his maſter and his royal highneſs, finds himſelf very uneaſy to have repreſentations to make about matters of ſo great importance, which are of ſo nice a nature, and tend to alienate the affection of the two nations from each other, and provoke them ſo far, that diſmal conſequences may enſue thereupon, if ſpeedy care is not taken to prevent them.'

[n] The ſecond memorial ran thus:

'The earl of Stair, miniſter to the king of Great-Britain, to his moſt chriſtian majeſty, by expreſs order from the king his maſter, notifies to his royal highneſs, the duke of Orleans, regent of France, the flight of the pretender, and the diſperſion of the rebels in Scotland, which his majeſty is perſuaded will be very acceptable to his royal highneſs, by reaſon of their near relation, and the ſtrict friendſhip which his majeſty has carefully cultivated with his royal highneſs.

The treaty of Utrecht being ſo lately concluded, the king thought himſelf ſure, that his royal highneſs, regent, would have taken proper meaſuers to hinder the pretender from ſetting foot again in France. But ſince the pretender has found means to return thither, his majeſty perſuades himſelf that his royal highneſs will oblige him, as ſoon as he has notice of it, to quit the kingdom.

His royal highneſs has two much reaſon and penetration, not to ſee the whole weight and juſtice of this demand. Great-Britain cannot be either ſafe or quiet ſo long as perſons, who have conſpired and undertaken with an armed force the ruin and ſubverſion of their country, are received and ſupported in its neighbourhood; nor can France itſelf be ſure, that they ſhall not be again expoſed to bear the blame of their evil practices.

The king of Great-Britain and the nation thought themſelves very ſafe on the ſide of France by the ſolemn treaty of Utrecht, which for ever excludes the pretender from France, and obliges France to give him no ſuccours, nor ſhips, nor arms, nor ammunition, nor money, nor officers, nor ſoldiers, nor councils, directly or indirectly. Theſe gentlemen came over, and demanded refuge and protection in France, where they are no ſooner arrived, but, taking advantage of the conveniency of the neighbourhood, and the facility of correſpondence by letters, they plot and contrive a blac and deteſtable treaſon againſt their country, which, upon the faith of the treaty, was diſarmed and defenceleſs. And, notwithſtanding the treaty, they find means to get entrance for the pretender into France, and by their intrigues procure him ſhips, arms, ammunition, officers, ſoldiers and money; with which aſſiſtance the pretender did actually invade Britain, where he occaſioned infinite damage to the nation.

His royal highneſs may imagine, whether Great-Britain can be eaſy in a ſituation ſo troubleſome as they would find themſelves in, having theſe rebels in their neighbourhood, ready to carry fire and ſword into the heart of their country. In this ſituation, Great-Britain would be obliged to keep always in arms, tormented with continual ſuſpicions and inquietudes; a condition much worſe than an open war. For a people, which love to live in peace with all their neighbours, and is jealous of the preſervation of their laws and liberties, his royal highneſs may ſee by the unanimous addreſſes of both houſes of parliament to the king, with what an eye the nation beholds this boiſterous and unſettled ſituation. The king hath the happineſs of his ſubjects too much at heart, not to come with eagerneſs into their ſentiments and intereſts; and he flatters himſelf, that upon this account his royal highneſs will not refuſe him ſo juſt a proof of his friendſhip, and of the deſire he hath to maintain a good underſtanding between the two nations.

For the ſame reaſons, the king of Great-Britain hopes, that his royal highneſs will be pleaſed to join effectual inſtances with thoſe of his majeſty, to the duke of Lorrain, to the end the ſaid duke may not permit the pretender to return into his dominions.

The earl of Stair is ordered likewiſe to put his royal highneſs in mind of the declaration he made, that the officers in the ſervice of France, who ſhould follow the pretender in the invaſion of Great-Britain, ſhould be broke; and the king is perſuaded, that his royal highneſs will not ſuffer the general officers, colonels, and others, who have followed the pretender in the rebellion, ever to be employed again in the ſervice of France; and that if it happen, that ſome of the ſaid officers ſhould return, or be being perſuaded, that the lord viſcount Bolingbroke (who had entered into his ſervice as ſecretary of ſtate to him, and continued in France, in order to ſend ſupplies to him into Scotland,) had been faulty in the execution of his office, ſent the duke of Ormond to him for the ſeals, and removed him from all the employments under him. This occaſioned a controverſy (under his direction) by letters between his ſecretary mr. Brinſden, and mr. James Murray, afterwards made earl of Dunbar by the pretender. °

During theſe proceedings, Lewis XIV. of France died at Verſailles on the 1ſt of September, N. S. 1715, in the 77th year of his age almoſt compleated (having been born already returned into France, his royal highneſs will puniſh them in ſuch a manner, that it may appear his royal highneſs and this government do loudly diſapprove of their proceeding, formally contrary to the treaty of Utrecht.

To the end there may be no miſtake in ſo nice and important a matter, the earl of Stair hath orders to demand an anſwer in writing to his memorial, which he is earneſtly deſirous may be ſuch, as may contribute towards the reſtoring of a good underſtanding between the two nations.'

The regent's anſwer to this memorial was as follows:

'His royal highneſs, being unfeignedly deſirous of advancing the glory and proſperity of the king of Great-Britain, heard with ſo much the greater pleaſure of the ſucceſs of his arms in Scotland, becauſe at the ſame time that this event ſecures the tranquility of the kingdom of Great-Britain, it will put a ſtop to the falſe reports that have been ſpread without foundation by the enemies of the public peace, with, deſign to alter the truth and friendſhip, which the king is deſirous to preſerve with the king of Great-Britain, and which hath always been one of the principal objects of his royal highneſs's views. And as he will punctually fulfil the treaty of Utrecht, he hath already employed the authority he is intruſted with, to make the chevalier de St. George depart the kingdom, and will continue to make uſe of the ſame authority to oppoſe his coming into it again at any time, or under any pretence whatſoever.

As for the fugitives, who are come into this kingdom from England, or who may hereafter come over, though no body is ignorant what the laws of refuge are in foreign ſtates, his royal highneſs being deſirous to convince the king of Great-Britain how far the king is from ſuffering any perſon whatſoever to abuſe the ſanctuary of his kingdom, as to maintain in Great-Britain an intelligence capable of diſturbing her tranquility, he will in concert with the king of Great-Britain, enter into any meaſures, which ſhall be thought proper for preventing ſuch an abuſe, and for keeping up a good underſtanding, by removing every occaſion of diſtruſt. And to ſhew beſides how far his majeſty is from bearing with the raſhneſs of thoſe, who dare to act contrary to his intentions, he has cauſed the ordinances to be ſtrictly executed againſt ſuch of the officers of his troops as went out of the kingdom without his leave.

If it be true what the earl of Stair ſays, that England was diſarmed upon the faith of treaties, it is no leſs certain, that no perſon whatſoever can ſay with truth, that ever his majeſty had a mind to take that opportunity to diſturb it, nor that he hath granted any ſuccours to the chevalier de St. George. It is well known on the contrary, that his royal highneſs hindered the ſuſpected armaments and imbarkations, when he had notice of them; and nothing better proves, that the chevalier de St. George was not aſſiſted by France, than the condition he was in Scotland, deſtitute of all things neceſſary for ſuch an enterprize.

His majeſty ſees with pleaſure the marks of a perfect intelligence between the king of Great-Britain and his parliament, ſince this muſt be the moſt ſolid foundation of the glory of that prince, and the happineſs of his ſubjects. His royal highneſs will always have a great concern therein. As he very truly deſires to keep his Britannic majeſty's friendſhip, ſo he will omit nothing, that may ſhew him how glad he is of the teſtimonies he receives thereof; neither will he interpoſe, directly or indirectly, to hinder the duke of Lorrain from granting, upon the inſtances of the king of Great-Britain, what he ſhall be pleaſed to aſk of him, with relation to the chevalier de St. George's reſidence in his territories. And, as he hath a real concern for the ſatisfaction of his Brittannic majeſty, he will ſee, with a great deal of pleaſure, whatever may contribute towards it. But his royal highneſs is perſuaded at the ſame time, that the king of Great-Britain will not deſire him to take any meaſures with a prince, over whom the king hath no authority, which cannot be grounded on any ſolid foundation, and which would add nothing to the rendering effectual the powerful inſtances of his Brittannic majeſty. An anſwer conceived in terms ſo plain and particular, ought to evince to all mankind, what are the true intentions of the king; and leaves no manner of doubt or obſcurity in relation to the ſincere deſire his royal highneſs has always had carefully to preſerve the amity of the king of Great-Britain, and to contribute in whatever depended upon the authority he is intruſted with, to the eſtabliſhment and preſervation of a good correſpondence and perfect friendſhip between the king and that of England.'

° Theſe letters were printed at London, 1735, in 8vo. but immediately ſuppreſſed. As they contain ſeveral curious particulars, it may not be improper to inſert them at large with the prefixed charge againſt the lord Bolingbroke, ſent from London, March 16, 1716, by the agents of the pretender, in relation to the affairs of Scotland during the rebellion of the late earl of Mar, as contained in the following letters between his lordſhip's ſecretary, and mr. Murray. By the aſteriſm [*] is to be underſtood the pretender.

The articles againſt lord Bolingbroke are as follow:

I. Lord Bolingbroke was never to be found by thoſe, who came to him about buſineſs. If by chance, or ſtratagem, they got hold of him, he affected being in a hurry, and, by putting them off till another time, ſtill avoided giving them any anſwer.

II. The earl of Mar, by ſix different meſſengers, at different times, acquainted lord Bolingbroke, before the * came from Dunkirk, of his being in diſtreſs for want of arms and ammunition, and prayed a ſpeedy relief; and though the things demanded were in my lord's power, there was not ſo much as one pound of powder ſent in any of the ſhips which by his lordſhip's direction parted from France.

III. The * himſelf, after his arrival, ſent general Hamilton to inform him, that his want of arms and ammunition was ſuch, that he ſhould be obliged to leave Scotland, unleſs he received a ſpeedy ſupply. Lord Bolingbroke amuſed mr. Hamilton twelve days together, and did not introduce him to any of the French miniſters, though he was referred to them for a particular account of affairs, or in all that time ſo much communicated his letter to the queen or any body elſe.

IV. The count de Caſtel Blanco had for ſeveral months at Havre a conſiderable quantity of arms and ammunition, and did daily aſk his lordſhip's orders how to diſpoſe of them, but could never get any, even to the hour the * landed in France.

V. The *'s friends at the French court had, for ſome time paſt, no very good opinion of his lordſhip's integrity, and a very bad one of his diſcretion.

VI. For a time, when many merchants in France would have carried privately any quantity of arms and ammunition into Scotland, my lord deſired a public order of the regent for the embarkation; which being a thing not to be granted, is ſaid to have been done, in order to beg a denial.

VII. The * wrote to his lordſhip by every occaſion after his arrival in Scotland; and, though there were many opportunities of writing in return, yet from the time he landed there, to the day he left it, he never received one letter from his lordſhip.

The lord Bolingbroke, in his firſt letter, after he received theſe articles, wrote as follows:

'The * and earl of Mar, and the others, who came from Scotland, are ſo much in want of any excuſe for their flight, that they have thought fit to have my lord Bolingbroke diſcharged the *'s ſervice in the moſt abrupt and injurious manner, under the pretence, that the want of powder, which he delayed to ſend, forced them to abandon Scotland. His lordſhip ſays, publicly, 1. That he is able to prove, that if they wanted powder, it was not his fault. 2. That, according to what the * and earl of Mar both ſay in their letters, they muſt have come away as they did, had they had all the powder in France. 3. That, if they had pleaſed to have ſtaid in Scotland a few days longer, they would have received near ten thouſand arms, and above thirty thouſand weight of powder, and other ſtores in proportion. And laſtly, That the true reaſon flows from another ſource, and that he knew and ſpoke of the deſign to diſcard him, long before the want of powder was ſo much as talked of. That he is unwilling to enter into the particulars of thoſe general heads for reaſons that may be eaſily gueſſed, ſince he is perſuaded, that he ſhall neither paſs for Driveller nor a Traitor among his friends.'

The ſecond letter was wrote by lord Bolingbroke's ſecretary in the following terms:

April 4, 1716.

I have communicated to his lordſhip what you wrote to me; and it is by his lordſhip's order, that I give you the following anſwer:

The charge that you have ſent over, is ſo full of improbable lies, that his lordſhip can hardly imagine it can have any other effect, but the ſhame and confuſion of thoſe that brought it; which is the effect of that villainous and ungrateful treatment, that thoſe people have given, and my lord has met with in that country, where they are equally deſpiſed for their folly, and deteſted for their immorality, by all the people of conſideration.

My lord has hitherto had two other reaſons for his ſilence.

The firſt is, That he cannot very fully explain the articles of his not ſending arms and ammunition into Scotland, without betraying the ſecret of thoſe, by whom he has been truſted, and under whoſe protection he lives.

And the ſecond is, That he cannot give the true reaſon of the ill uſage he has received, without expoſing ſome characters in ſuch a light, as will ſhoc every body. However, you ſhall have as much as can be at preſent given of the ſtate of things on this ſide of the water; of the method Engliſh buſineſs is put into; and of the hands that are truſted with it. After which you will pity my lord, and not blame him.

When he returned laſt ſummer out of Dauphiné, and at the deſire of his friends engaged in this buſineſs, he found himſelf immediately expoſed to a daily ſtruggle with difficulties of three ſorts. The firſt ariſing from the rivetted prejudices of one perſon. The ſecond, from the impoſſibility of keeping the queen, and the whole rabble of the court of St. Germain's, from meddling in buſineſs. And the third, from the cabals of French and Engliſh men, women and children, people of the moſt part of no name in the world, or elſe of very bad characters, who had been let into the moſt ſecret parts of buſineſs, and expected to continue ſo.

To get over the firſt of theſe difficulties, my lord ſaw would be the work of time; but he ſaw likewiſe, as the later it was begun, the harder it would prove; and that any yielding to thoſe prejudices, increaſed and ſtrengthened them. He therefore began upon the firſt, and continued upon every occaſion to combat them with great decency, but with great firmneſs, contrary indeed to the opinion of others, who imagine it will be time enough to talk of thoſe things, when his lordſhip thinks it will be too late.

As to the people of the court of St. Germain's, my lord knew enough of England and France too, to know they would be a load upon buſineſs, but no help to it. In England they are odious, and in France in contempt. The firſt is not very ſtrange; for you may depend upon it, that twenty-eight years experience had not made them wiſer in any degree. And the latter is ſo true, that my lord affirms, that he never yet ſpoke of Engliſh buſineſs to any man of figure on this ſide the water; but, before he would give any anſwer, he exacted, that the court of St. Germains (no one perſon excepted) ſhould not know any thing of it.

With this ſet of people, and a whole tribe of jeſuits, my lord therefore avoided all ſorts of commerce before the duke of Ormond arrived. He would not ſo much as ſee any of them, before his grace came, and thought fit to open his door to them. My lord could no longer avoid ſeeing them; but he never would enter into any familiarity with them. He choſe three or four perſons of ſenſe and activity. Some of them were Proteſtants, and others were very indifferent Roman Catholics. Thoſe he employed were as many as he wanted. During the time that my lord, much againſt his will, was obliged to reſide at St. Germain's, he obſerved the ſame conduct, and never aſſociated with any one man there but the duke of Berwick, who is not to be reckoned of the court, though he has lodgings in the houſe, who has a hundred times more capacity and credit than all the reſt put together, in concert with whom my lord all along acted, and by whoſe judgment he is willing to ſtand or fall.

With the other cabal of people, that I mentioned in the third place, my lord had at firſt ſome little communication, for he was thrown into their hands; but as ſoon as he knew their perſons, and informed himſelf of their characters, he broke all meaſures with them, and the rather, as they were made uſe of as people, who intended to do nothing, only to amuſe thoſe on this ſide the water, and by that means our friends on the other ſide: and for this uſe they were indeed very proper, ſince they are ſo inconſiderable, that they may be at any time diſavowed, without the leaſt conſequence.

But the thing, that principally ſhoced my lord, was to find the ſource of all buſineſs, and even the heads of the beſt and deareſt friends, truſted to the keeping of a multitude of people, ſome of whom, both men and women of the vileſt characters.

The third letter was as follows:

April 8, N. S. 1716.

It is eaſy to imagine all thoſe neſts of hornets flew about my lord's ears immediately, and that with the greateſt ſpirit, becauſe the duke of Ormond on the 5th of September, 1638) and in the 73d year of his reign, which began May 14, 1643. His death produced a ſort of revolution in the government of France. The king, by his will, had placed the adminiſtration of the government in a council, of which the duke of Orleans was chief. But the duke was not, by his authority, to decree any thing, or iſſue any order in the name of the minor, without the advice and conſent of the council. The day after the king's death the duke of Orleans (attended as the kings of France uſually are on the like occaſions) came to the parliament of Paris, and, after the king's will was opened and read, complained of a diſpoſition ſo contrary to obſerved a quite contrary conduct. It was more than ſix weeks before the return out of Scotland, and conſequently long before the ſix articles mentioned in your letter were prepared, or any other of the pretences againſt my lord invented, that we knew of the union of the ſeveral cabals in order to get rid of him; and that he ſpoke to ſeveral of his acquaintance of it. He was not much concerned at it, being from the firſt reſolved to ſerve upon a proteſtant and Engliſh bottom, or not to ſerve at all; and he confeſſes, that he did not imagine, that the duke of Ormond, for whom he has always had a very particular reſpect, would ever have been drawn in to put himſelf at the head of a party on this ſide the water, and indirectly (for he is far from deſigning any ſuch thing) to do the work of the factions above-mentioned. My lord knew indeed, and knew with great ſorrow, that his grace gave ſo much ear to them, and ſuffered the ſtories they had told him, to make ſo great an impreſſion upon him.

When the reſolution was taken of leaving Scotland, and the principal perſons returned hither, it was judged a proper time to make the utmoſt effort againſt my lord; and perhaps there were people, who thought that the loading of him would excuſe the precipitation wherewith Scotland was abandoned, if that precipitation needed any excuſe. Then were theſe articles againſt my lord formed, and falſe reaſons invented, where the true ones were not to be owned. My lord was diſcarded with all the circumſtances of provocation poſſible; he was treated as far as it lay in the power of thoſe whom he ſerved, with an affectation of indignation and contempt: as ſoon as the ſtep was made, the tongue of every fellow, that could be encouraged to ſlander, was let looſe.

Having thus given a general view of the ſtate of things on this ſide the water, and the true account of the animoſities againſt my lord, I ſhall in very few words, refute the ſix articles you ſent me over.

That my lord was ſeldom to be found with any direct anſwer to their buſineſs, is true, if by people is meant any ſuch, as in the former part of what I have writ, are deſigned; if by people is meant one man, who could be of uſe, or was, or fit to be truſted, the accuſation is falſe. My lord never look upon himſelf to be under any obligation of converſing, in order to carry on buſineſs, with a ſet of people, againſt whom he would have done his utmoſt to have ſhut the door, if the buſineſs had gone proſperouſly on.

As to the ſecond it is true, that my lord Mar wrote for arms, for ammunition, for money, for officers, and laſt, for a body of troops; but, till the arrival of mr. Hamilton, my lord did not underſtand there was any particular want of powder, more than of any other ſpecies. My lord uſed his beſt endeavours to procure all that was deſired, as well as other aſſiſtances, much more conſiderable, which had never been aſked for, or thought of, and which would have been procured, had the buſineſs of Scotland kept alive a little longer, and had other people done their part as my lord did his. Moſt of the veſſels ſent to Scotland were barks, fit only to carry paſſengers, and not capable of tranſporting arms and ammunition. By theſe conveyances however, ſeveral ſums of money were ſent, and particularly ſixty thouſand livres in gold at one time, of which ſo good care was taken, that every farthing of it was loſt: arms and ammunition were to be got but two ways. They were either to be bought and ſent into Scotland, or ſuch quantities, as had been before promiſed, were to be made uſe of. That there was not one farthing to buy them with, is ſo true, that my lord may appeal to thoſe of St. Germain's, who had the management of the money, upon this head. The little caſh that was procured, was either ſent in ſpecie to Scotland, or employed in anſwering the bills th at were conſtantly drawing from the coaſts. And beſides, if money had not been wanting, the neceſſary orders for buying, conveying to the coaſts, and embarking, could not have been procured. My lord imagines when the duke of Ormond reflects, he cannot but be ſenſible of this truth, ſince he cannot be ignorant, that a quantity of arms, he thought himſelf ſure of in October, were in February ſtill in the ſame place, and no nearer being ſent than on the firſt day. As for ſending ſuch arms and ſtores as were already provided, my lord knew of but two parcels; one, and that a ſmall one, might have been in Scotland in October or November, had the directions given by my lord been purſued. Why they were not, he will not ſay; but the fault is, that thoſe arms and ſtores are at this hour rotting in a magazine at Morlaix, where they have lain theſe five months. As to the other parcel of arms and ſtores, it is that which you call count Caſtel Blanco's, and contains a very large quantity of both. This Caſtel Blanco is a Spaniard, who, by the merit of marrying lord Melfort's daughter, ſets up for a manager of Engliſh buſineſs. But that thoſe arms and ſtores belong to him, is no more true, than that other report, equally current, of his having advanced one million and ſeven hundred thouſand livres for the ſervice of England and Scotland. His name had indeed been made uſe of for buying thoſe arms and ſtores in the late king of France's time; and his name was to be made uſe of again, if, at laſt, on that pretence, the French king would let them go; which is ſtill a doubtful point; and to cover them as arms and ſtores going for Spain, and intended for the Weſt-Indies. It is ſilly to ſay, that orders from my lord were wanting to ſend them. Theſe orders muſt have been of another kind; and ſuch orders could not be got ſooner, or in any other manner than they were got. This is a point my lord cannot ſpeak plain upon; and it muſt therefore reſt here, whether this Caſtel Blanco, one mr. Franc, and ſuch other meddling people, deſerve the beſt credit. I think it proper, however, to add, that in a fortnight's time, after there was the leaſt appearance of being able to ſend away the ſtores and ſhips, and all other meaſures neceſſary, were got ready and prepared, without any noiſe or the leaſt ſuſpicion, they might have been in Scotland, had they not been at laſt ſtopped by the French (which I ſtill ſay is a doubtful point) in five or ſix days time, when my lord Mar and his company from Scotland landed at Gravelin; from whence orders, as I afterwards heard, were ſent to every place, to ſtop all manner of imbarkation.

What is ſaid under the ſecond head, may ſerve as an anſwer to the fourth, as well as to the ſecond letter.

As to the third article, upon general Hamilton's arrival, my lord repreſented where it was proper, all that he brought by letter and by word of mouth, the very next morning. It is therefore a ſimple lie, and worthy of thoſe, who ſcribble from this ſide of the water, to ſay, that general Hamilton was amuſed for twelve days, as if, during all that time, the purport of his meſſage had been kept a ſecret. It is to be ſuppoſed, that the regent's and the *'s miniſters would not have conferred with a man of his circumſtances, and who came on ſuch an errand; but if ſuppoſing they had not theſe ſcruples, of what uſe it was for them to ſee him, when he could tell them nothing more than they knew already? But, be that as it will, I can aſſure you, that my lord, if he could have given him the opportunity, would, which, it ſeems, ſo much weight is laid upon.

The fifth article of that letter contains the moſt impudent falſhood that ever was invented. Without money and the orders aboveſaid, no merchant could or would undertake to tranſport any quantity of arms or ammunition; and I am able to cite ſome very great bargains of this kind, which my lord brought to bear, which failed at laſt for want of money, and the neceſſary countenance. The latter part of the article is an accuſition of incredible weakneſs; my lord is ſaid to have inſiſted on a public order, and to have declined making uſe of private methods for the imbarkation of arms and ammunition. I remember indeed, that when preparation was made for ſending away the arms and ammunition from Havre, as if they were going for Spain, and a ſhip had been provided for that purpoſe by my lord, which no man living ſuſpected, he had the greateſt difficulties imaginable to keep theſe wiſe people from embarking part of the ſtores aboard a veſſel, which every body knew to belong to the chevalier. As to the ſixth article, no body is better able to anſwer it than myſelf, ſince I entered all the letters which my lord writ; and there was no leſs than five diſpatched before mr. Hamilton came into France, by whom my lord received the firſt letter of buſineſs after the *'s landing there. Some of thoſe were loſt at ſea, and the three laſt packets were brought bac to my lord, the gentlemen, that carried them, being arrived too late in Scotland.

This, ſir, I give you by my lord's directions. He ordered me to add, that he employed the utmoſt diligence he was maſter of; and he believes it ſufficient to carry him through ſuch work as he has been concerned in of late, ſince it carried him formerly through his buſineſs of another-gueſs ſort. That he all along ſaw, there was nothing but mortification to be met with, and reputation to be loſt, among the people with whom he had to do; and that it was impoſſible for a man to act upon the principles he brought out of England with him, and have kept his ground here. That he never had any correſpondence, directly, or indirectly, with my lord Marlborough, or any man belonging to the court of England, ſince he engaged in this buſineſs. That he deſires his worſt enemies to advance the leaſt ſhadow or proof of any thing of this kind. That, as he was incapable of betraying a truſt while it ſubſiſted, ſo it is with the utmoſt reluctancy, that, in his own juſtification, he is obliged to ſay what he has ſaid; and that he ſhall be very ſorry, if the ſame neceſſity oblige him to ſay more. That nothing ſhall ever oblige him to repair his fortune at the expence of betraying any man; but that, ſince he is treated in this violent manner, he thinks himſelf at liberty to give his friends a true ſtate of the fact, and to declare, that he never will, upon any account, or upon any ſolicitation, ſerve the ſame people again: that he has withdrawn himſelf almoſt intirely from the world; and that in his retreat he ſhall heartily pray for the proſperity of his friends and of his country; and, without very much fear of what is to come, comfort himſelf with the teſtimony of a good conſcience.

The fourth letter was as follows:

Paris, April 14, 1716.

I hope you have received my laſt of the 9th inſtant, which, with my former, will give you a light into affairs here, and be an anſwer to the articles you ſent. There are abundance of things more my lord could ſay to clear himſelf, but he rather chuſes to be ſilent.

Thoſe on this ſide, who firſt raiſed the ſtorm, begin to be ſenſible of their folly. My lord all along has acted like a wiſe, prudent, and honeſt man: they quite the contrary. And would they have ſtaid a very few days longer in Scotland, (which every body now agrees they might have done) they would have had ſuch aſſiſtances, which in all propability muſt have reſtored them.

There are many more circumſtances, which I am not at liberty to mention. All is referred to, &c.

A reply to the foregoing letter:

SIR,

I had the favour of yours, and return you thanks for the copies you incloſed of the letters writ by the lord Bolingbroke's orders, the firſt of which was without a date; the reſt of the 4th, 8th, and 18th of April. I was pleaſed to find the *'s conduct, in removing his lordſhip, thoroughly cleared by the weakneſs of his defence. And when I read the ſcurrilous paſſages of his letters, as that he was turned out in the moſt abrupt and injurious manner, and had met with villainous and ungrateful treatment, I was filled with indignation to ſee the beſt of princes inſulted by an unworthy ſubject, a negligent miniſter excuſing his faults at the expence of his maſter's honour, and wiping off his own guilt by throwing it on the dukes of Ormond and Mar, who had given ſuch unqueſtionable proofs of their p——y and loyalty.

Though you deſire a particular anſwer to his lordſhip's letters, I am perſuaded, that it is your opinion, that they do not deſerve it. However, to gratify your curioſity, I will put his management of the *'s affairs in ſo true a light, as muſt convince every loyal ſubject of the neceſſity of diſplacing him.

His lordſhip's letters are not calculated ſo much to clear himſelf, as to weaken the *'s intereſt in England, and to diſcourage all correſpondence with him. He has given general anſwers to particular charges. There are evident marks of guilt and concern at the diſcovery of his actions in every line; and an innocent man, with his lordſhip's pen, could have made a more plauſible defence. Before I enter into particulars, I cannot but obſerve, that his narrative of facts is as true as the accounts he gives of himſelf, that he was 'withdrawn from the world: that in this retreat he will heartily pray for the proſperity of his friends, and comfort himſelf with the teſtimony of a good conſcience.' The goodneſs of his conſcience will appear from the diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in him: and they, who are acquainted with his lordſhip's character, muſt be ſurprized at his reflection on the immorality and bad characters of others.

The ſubſtance of his lordſhip's apology for himſelf is, 'that, if they wanted arms and powder in Scotland, it was not his fault: that he had neither money to buy them with, nor could he obtain orders for imbarking them. That without money, and the neceſſary orders to the officers of the ports, no private merchant could or would undertake to ſhip off any quantity. That the * and duke of Mar ſay in their letters, they muſt have left Scotland, had they had all the arms and powder in France: and that, if they had ſtaid a few days longer, they would have had ten thouſand arms, thirty thouſand weight of powder, and other ſtores in proportion.' And he modeſtly concludes, the laws of the realm, and ſo prejudicial to his right. He therefore moved, that the will ſhould not be regiſtered, but that the parliament ſhould adjudge the regency to him without any reſtriction. They immediately complied with his motion, and adjudged the regency to him, with power to nominate ſuch ſubordinate councils for preparing all things to be laid before him, as he ſhould think fit. Lewis XIV. was ſucceeded by his great grandſon Lewis XV. ſon of the duke of Burgundy (who was dauphin after the death of his father) and of Maria Adelaida of Savoy. Lewis XV. was born the 15th of February 1710, and was between five and ſix years old when his great grandfather died. He was

'That he has all along acted like a prudent, honeſt, and wiſe man, and they (that is, the *, and dukes of Ormond and Mar) quite the contrary.

There are other particulars obſerved by his lordſhip, which ſhall be remarked in their proper place; and you may be aſſured, that I will give you an impartial narrative of facts: that I will mention nothing but what the dukes of Ormond and Mar will atteſt upon their honour: and if there wanted any additional proof, that the truth of every article might be confirmed by the teſtimony of ſeveral gentlemen of probity, who were employed.

The printed letter from an officer in the *'s army, after it had marched northwards from Aberdeen, will inform you of the ſtate of affairs in Scotland; and the extreme want they were in of arms and ammunition. The duke of Mar, by ſix ſeveral expreſſes, ſolicited lord Bolingbroke for an immediate ſupply. In all his letters he aſſures him, that numbers of men would join him, if he had arms for them; and that he wanted powder for the few arms that he had. His lordſhip's excuſe, that, till general Hamilton's arrival, he did not know, that there was a particular want of powder, more than of any other ſpecies, is falſe and frivolous; for the want of powder was ſpecified in ſeveral letters; and his lordſhip underſtands Engliſh too well not to know, that powder is principally intended by the word ammunition.

The want of money to provide arms is as groundleſs, as his other pretenſions. For, though the * did not abound in money, there was always a ſufficient ſum for that ſervice. Ten ſhillings is the price of a new muſket, and, ſince the reduction of the troops in France, ſerviceable arms were to be had at 20d. a peice: and his lordſhip probably means ſuch ſecond-hand arms by the great bargains he brought to bear, but failed for want of money.'

His lordſhip declines anſwering the charge of his inſiſting on a public order, and neglecting private methods of embarkation; and ſlides off into an idle ſtory of a ſhip at Havre de Grace, which, ſuppoſing it true, is nothing to the purpoſe. He knew, that a public order would not be granted; and he owns, that a connivance from the officers might be depended upon; and therefore it may be preſumed, that his conduct in this caſe was to amuſe the *'s friends in Scotland, and cover his wilful neglect of them. His lordſhip's firſt excuſe, though not mentioned in any of his letters, for not ſending arms, was, 'leſt the going of many ſhips through the channel ſhould draw the attention of the enemy's fleet that way, and endanger the *'s paſſage.' But what reaſon can be given why arms and ammunition were not ſent in the ſhips, that went to Scotland before the *, or in thoſe that followed him? Why ſome arms and powder were not put in every one of them that parted from France? And as a dozen ſhips arrived ſafe, they might have carried a ſufficient ſupply of every thing that was wanting. The ſmallneſs of the ſhips is a poor plea; for, if they were fit to tranſport paſſengers, they might alſo have carried ſome powder, and ſome arms; and ſuppoſing they could not, why were ſuch uſeleſs veſſels provided for that ſervice? Of what moment was it to ſend officers to command men, who, as his lordſhip knew, were neither furniſhed with powder nor arms? Beſides, thoſe ſhips, which arrived in Scotland, were each of them of ſufficient bulk to carry arms and ammunition.

His lordſhip appeals to the duke of Ormond for the truth of a paſſage in his third letter, 'That a quantity of arms, which his grace thought himſelf ſure of in October, were in February ſtill in the ſame place, and no nearer being ſent than the firſt day; and that a ſmall parcel might have been in Scotland in October or November, had the direction given by his lordſhip been purſued; and that theſe arms and ſtores are now rotting in a magazine at Morlaix.' Though his lordſhip pretends an unwillingneſs to mention where the fault of not ſending this ſupply lay, he ſtrongly intimates, that the duke of Ormond was blameable in it; and with what ſincerity that reflection on his grace was made, will be beſt judged from a true account of the circumſtances of that affair.

The ſhip loaden with the arms above mentioned arrived in the river of Morlaix the 24th of December, when the duke of Ormond returned from his ſecond attempt to land in England. W——n, the maſter of the veſſel, ſaid he was too deeply loaden, and too ſmall to undertake a voyage to Scotland in that rigorous ſeaſon of the year. It was then reſolved to put them on board of another ſhip, commanded by H——s, and the only veſſel that could be procured in that port at that time. H——s's ſhip was foul, and hauled aſhore to be cleaned. His crew were afraid of being taken at ſea, and on that account mutinied, and moſt of them deſerted; and while another crew was providing, on the 3d of January, the Adventure, and the Charles-Galley, two Engliſh men of war, came into the river, and anchored near her. Information was given to the captains, that H——s's ſhip belonged to the *, and that W——n was loaden with arms for his majeſty's ſervice. Whereupon W——n's veſſel was unloaden in the night, and the arms were privately conveyed to a magazine. The two men of war remained in the river till the beginning of March; and it was impraticable for H——s to ſail while they were there, becauſe out of the river is narrow, and it was impoſſible to paſs the men of war unobſerved, even in the night. In the mean time, the utmoſt endeavours were uſed to remedy this accident: it was reſolved to carry the arms a few leagues by land, and an agreement was made for a ſhip, that lay out of the reach of the men of war to carry them to Scotland; but afterwards the owner's heart failed him, and he peremptorily refuſed to ſtand to the bargain. The truth of theſe particulars is atteſted by his grace the duke of Ormond, and captain Cammock's journal; and when his lordſhip recollects himſelf, he cannot be ignorant of them.

Thus you ſee the true reaſon of the miſcarriage of the ſupply, that the accidents could neither be prevented nor remedied; that this 'parcel of arms might have been in Scotland in October or November, if his directions had been purſued,' though theſe directions were dated from Paris the 16th of December, and the ſhips that were to carry them, arrived in the port the 24th: that his lordſhip's exactneſs in other points may be judged of by this ſmall inſtance; and that a miſtake of two months in a fact of ſo late a date can hardly be excuſed as a failure in point of memory.

That ſhips might have been privately ſent without a public order, is evident, becauſe that quantity of arms, which lord Bolingbroke ſays were ſtill rotting in a magazine at Morlaix, were ſent by the * to Scotland ſoon after his return to France, and a month before the date of his lordſhip's letter; and two other ſhips loaden with arms and ſtores were alſo ſent from another port. And this was done at a time when the *'s affairs were deſperate, and whithout the privity and conſent of the French court.

In ſhort, lord Bolingbroke's defence on every particular of this head is weak and ſuperficial. Several private merchants would have ſupplied the * with arms, if they had been applied to by his lordſhip. Neither the * nor the duke of Mar affirm in their letters, that they muſt leave Scotland, though they had all the arms and ammunition of France. The eight thouſand arms, &c. lying at Havre, would have been ſent by a gentleman, who was zealous for the *'s ſucceſs, if he had not been amuſed for ſeveral months, and diverted from applying for an order, by his lordſhip's ſaying, that he would obtain one: and the ten thouſand arms, and the thirty thouſand weight of powder, which he ſays would have been ſent to Scotland, if they had ſtaid a few days longer, were not procured by his lordſhip, but by a gentleman, who was ſent by the * from Scotland, and who, being convinced of his lordſhip's former neglects, applied for a ſupply of arms elſewhere, and upon his own credit obtained it.

About the ſame time the duke of Ormond procured fifteen thouſand arms with a proportionable quantity of ammunition without the privity or aſſiſtance of the lord Bolingbroke.

Another remarkable circumſtance of his lordſhip's conduct was, the variety of excuſes he made to thoſe gentlemen, who came expreſs from Scotland, for not ſending arms and ammunition. In September and October he ſaid he was providing them. In November, that the ſending them through the channel would endanger the *'s paſſage: in December and January, that the court of France would neither grant arms nor ammunition; and his lordſhip had probably pretences in reſerve for every month in the year. What reaſon then had his majeſty to expect a ſupply of arms after ſo many repeated delays? And with what injuſtice does his lordſhip charge the * and the duke of Mar with precipitation in leaving Scotland, when the neceſſity they were in of coming away was entirely occaſioned by his neglect?

His lordſhip anſwers the articles of amuſing general Hamilton by calling it a ſimple lie. Whether his lordſhip repreſented the contents of his meſſage, where it was proper, depends upon his own word. It is probable, that the perſon hinted at by his lordſhip would not have ſcrupled to have the ſtate of affairs in Scotland from the mouth of one, who was ſo fully inſtructed in it; and that ſuch an interview would have been attended with a good effect. And it may reaſonably be inferred, that his lordſhip was faulty in that caſe, becauſe he did not communicate the *'s letters, which that gentleman brought to the queen or the duke of Ormond, for ſeveral days after he had received them, though the * had commanded him to ſhew them to her majeſty; and before he went to Scotland, had given his lordſhip poſitive inſtructions to act in concert with his grace, and to communicate every particular of his affairs to him.

His lordſhip endeavours to refute the charge of his being often denied to thoſe, who came about the buſineſs, with a groundleſs and malicious diſtinction; for he was ſeldom to be found by thoſe who were ſent by the duke of Mar to him, by officers of diſtinction, who daily preſſed him to be diſpatched to Scotland, and even by perſons whom he himſelf employed. And were it proper to mention names, particular inſtances might be given of his conduct in this point.

His lordſhip, in what he falſely calls a general ſtate of things on this ſide the water, has repreſented the duke of Ormond in the blackeſt terms, that malice could deviſe, 'as an aſſociate with the neſt of hornets; as heading a faction compoſed of perſons of the vileſt characters, who are deſpiſed for their folly, and deteſted for their immorality'; and he qualifies this heavy charge with a profeſſion of a very particular reſpect for his grace, and by ſaying, 'that his grace was drawn indirectly in to do the work of the faction here, and was far from deſigning any ſuch thing.'

With what view this virulent ſlander on his grace was framed, may be eaſily conjectured, and to beat down his grace's reputation, if it were poſſible, would be acknowledged by the——as a conſiderable ſervice to him. His grace's character is too well known in England to ſtand in need of a juſtification, and what lord Bolingbroke intended as a reflection on the duke of Ormond will be acknowledged by every honeſt man here, that his grace obſerved at Paris a quite contrary conduct from his lordſhip. His grace, it is true, opened his doors to every gentleman, who came to wait upon him: he thought it was for the *'s ſervice to receive thoſe perſons with civility, who chearfully offered to embark in it: that thoſe gentlemen, who were ready to hazard their lives in the ſame cauſe with his grace, ought not to be treated with contempt: and that his lordſhip's conduct was imprudent and unſeemly.

The ſincerity of his lordſhip's profeſſion of reſpect for the duke of Ormond will appear from his behaviour to his grace here; and you are not a ſtranger to the deſign that was formed by his lordſhip in July 1714, to ſet Lord Churchill at the head of the army. His lordſhip laboured upon all occaſions to vilify his grace, and to paint him in the foulеſt colours to his majeſty. Upon his grace's firſt expedition into England, he endeavoured to perſuade a gentleman, who had promiſed to accompany him, not to go; he told him that the duke of Ormond would certainly be never heard of more; and that it was a raſh and fooliſh enterprize he was going upon: and by the diſcovery of his grace's deſigns at that time, and his lordſhip's conduct ſince, it may be preſumed he had good reaſons to be aſſured, that the attempt would miſcarry.

When the duke had returned from his ſecond voyage to England, and waited on the coaſt of France for another opportunity, lord Bolingbroke wrote to him to come nearer Paris, and promiſed to meet his grace, in order to concert meaſures with him. His grace complied with the propoſal, named a place at twelve leagues diſtance from Paris, and was punctual to the time appointed. Lord Bolingbroke came about ten days after; inſtead of diſcourſing about buſineſs, he drank to exceſs, and early on the ſecond day after his coming, he returned to Paris, without ſaying any thing to the purpoſe. Though his grace had great reaſon to reſent this uſage, he reſolved at that juncture, to ſubmit to it, and complied with another propoſal of his lordſhip's to come to Paris, becauſe that he thought, when he was in the ſame place with his lordſhip, he could not eaſily find an opportunity to amuſe him longer. His grace was for four days in Paris, before he had a viſit from his lordſhip, though he ſent repeated meſſages to him. At length he came, when dinner was on the table. Before dinner was half done, he roſe up haſtily, and pretended urgent buſineſs to call him away. For ſome days after his grace could not poſſibly find him out.

Can it be imagined, that ſuch inſolent treatment of his grace could proceed from any perſon, who had not a quite different intereſt in view? And, as the * had a juſt ſenſe of his lordſhip's behaviour to the duke of Ormond, it was a ſtronger motive to induce his majeſty to remove him.

the third ſucceſſive minor that came to the crown of France, ſince the death of Henry IV.

The duke regent was ſon of the duke of Orleans, brother of Lewis XIV. and was then in the 41ſt year of his age. He was married in 1692, to one of the late king's natural daughters.

He began his regency with an act of juſtice and prudence. The edicts of the kings of France formerly had not the ſanction of laws, before they were regiſtered in the parliament of Paris, whoſe undoubted right it was to examine them; and in caſe they contained any thing againſt the laws of the realm, to remonſtrate againſt them. But the late king had deprived the parliament of that liberty in the year 1667, ſince which time they had been compelled to regiſter all his edicts, without being permitted to make any repreſentation againſt them. The regent reſtored this privilege to them by an edict, which was regiſtered a few days after the king's death. At the ſame time he cauſed to be regiſtered a declaration, containing a ſcheme of government to be obſerved in the kingdom during the king's minority. Purſuant to which he named, beſides the council of regency, ſix other councils, and, by that means, a new way of adminiſtration in the government was introduced.

By the death of Lewis XIV. the affairs between Great-Britain and France ſtood upon a very different foot than before. The regent, by virtue of king Philip's renunciation, and the death of all the princes in France, ſprung from Lewis XIV. was become next heir to the minor king, and conſequently it was his intereſt to cultivate the friendſhip of ſuch ſtates as were likely to ſupport his title againſt the king of Spain, and particularly of England. It was his buſineſs to ſeek all means for weakening the only prince in the world, that had any right to diſpute his ſucceſſion, or oppoſe his views. Hence his acceſſion to the quadruple alliance; his promoting, or at leaſt conniving at the deſtruction of the growing naval power of Spain in 1718; his ſtipulation in favour of Don Carlos, in order not only to divert Spain from forming deſigns againſt his power in France, but to weaken Spain by increaſing her expences. To theſe meaſures, the regent was carried, in order to divert and weaken king Philip, and king George undoubtedly went into all his ambitious views, as the only means to retrieve the fatal miſtakes of the treaty of Utrecht. But the fruits of all theſe proceedings were entirely loſt by the death of the regent, and the birth of a dauphin, and inſtead of facilitating the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Orleans, and thereby dividing the houſe of Bourbon for ever, they proved the foundation of all the expenſive diſputes, which ſubſiſted many years between Great-Britain and Spain, as will appear in the courſe of the hiſtory.

A parliament having been called in Ireland, and the duke of Grafton and the earl of Galway (who had been appointed lords juſtices upon the earl of Sunderland's reſignation of the poſt of lord-lieutenant of that kingdom) being arrived at Dublin, the two houſes met there on the 12th of November, and mr. Connolly was choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. The peers began with a bill for recognizing the king's title to the crown, and the commons with ſeveral bills for the further ſecurity of his perſon and government; namely a bill to attaint the pretender and give a reward of fifty thouſand pounds for his head; and for attainting the duke of Ormond, giving the crown his eſtate, and ten thouſand pounds reward upon his head.

Theſe bills were followed by a retroſpect upon the councils of the late reign; and a reſolution was unanimouſly paſſed againſt thoſe, who adviſed the queen to prorogue the late parliament, at a time when a bill to attaint the pretender was depending; and they were voted to be enemies to the ſucceſſion, and favourers of the pretender and popery. They proceeded in the next place, to bring in a bill to prevent tumults, rebellious and riotous aſſemblies. All theſe bills, together with the ſupplies demanded, went through the houſes in the uſual forms, without the leaſt oppoſition; and, being ratified in England, received the royal aſſent. But they did not end here: for, on the 17th of November, the commons, while the public accounts which were ordered to be laid before them, were preparing, entered into an inquiry, which brought a great many of their members on their knees. The laſt houſe of commons, in the queen's time, had addreſſed her againſt ſir Conſtantine Phipps, at that time lord-chancellor of Ireland, and one of the lords juſtices of the kingdom, deſiring her to remove him from his employments. But, as this addreſs ſeemed not to be very acceptable to the queen, or to the counſels of that reign, there were many counter-addreſſes procured, and ſent up from the ſeveral counties and towns in Ireland, in favour of ſir Conſtantine, deſiring he might not be removed, notwithſtanding the addreſs of the commons. This the houſe eſteemed a breach of the privilege of parliament, and reſolv-

I am not ſurprized at the lord Bolingbroke's appealing to the duke of Berwick, and that he is willing to ſtand or fall by his judgement; for I believe that duke will for the ſame reaſons appeal to his lordſhip to clear himſelf. No part of his behaviour is more wonderful than his ſudden intimacy with the duke of Berwick. He formerly mentioned, on all occaſions, that duke with diſregard, and would neither allow him capacity for buſineſs nor credit. But, ſoon after his grace had diſobeyed his ſovereign's command to go to Scotland, there became a cloſe union betwixt them, which ſtill continues, though the * had commanded his lordſhip not to communicate any part of his buſineſs to him. And it may be obſerved, that his lordſhip did not reſide at St. Germain's, where he owns that he held the cloſeſt friendſhip, till two months after his grace's refuſal to go to Scotland. If his grace had a hundred times more capacity and credit than the reſt of the *'s ſubjects in France, he has loſt ſome part of his credit by his undutiful behaviour to his royal maſter; and a perſon, who refuſes to ſerve in his province at a time when his ſervice is required and wanted, may be reputed not to be of that court, as his lordſhip obſerves, though he has lodgings in it; and he ſhould have added, that he had at that time a conſiderable penſion from it. I am perſuaded, his aſſociaſm, as he calls it, with the duke of Berwick owes its original to another cauſe, than the opinion he had of his grace's capacity; and that his grace was the channel of correſpondence betwixt his lordſhip and a certain lord in England. For though his lordſhip denies his having any correſpondence with him, or any of the court of England, there are good reaſons to ſuſpect him of it, as the old intimacy between them; his lordſhip's leaving England upon his advice; and the viſit he paid him the evening before he left London; not to mention the ſneaking letter he ſent from France to mr. Stanhope: and even his lordſhip qualifies the denial of ſuch a correſpondence, by ſaying, that he held none ſince he engaged in the *'s buſineſs, which, by the way, was three months after his coming to France.

This correſpondence with a perſon, who had upon ſeveral occaſions betrayed the church of England, and ſacrificed his own country to a foreign prince, is a pregnant inſtance of his lordſhip's reſolution to ſerve the * upon a proteſtant and Engliſh bottom, or not to ſerve at all.

His lordſhip's aſſertion, 'that the ſource of all buſineſs, and the heads of his beſt friends, were truſted to the keeping of a multitude of people, ſome of whom were of the vileſt characters,' is as groundleſs as his other calumnies; and it may be eaſily gueſſed for what end this ſlander was invented. And though his lordſhip is pleaſed to charge others with want of ſecrecy, I can aſſure you, that in the midſt of his wine he diſcovered ſecrets of the greateſt importance to ſome of the very perſons, whom he now repreſents in ſuch blac characters, and that they expreſſed a concern at his imprudence.

I am confident his lordſhip's deſign to cut off all correſpondence with the *'s ſubjects at home will fail of ſucceſs, when they conſider they are in leſs danger by his removal; and that his majeſty has been pleaſed to chuſe one in his ſtead, who is not only incapable of betraying a truſt, while it ſubſiſts, as his lordſhip ſpeaks, but an inviolable obſerver of a truſt for ever, and of tried prudence and ſecrecy in buſineſs.

His lordſhip, to heighten the charge on the conduct of buſineſs, is here pleaſed to add, that it paſſes through the hands of a whole tribe of jeſuits, though his lordſhip cannot be ignorant, that no perſon of that order was ever employed in buſineſs by the * or queen.

His lordſhip's inſinuation, of the riveted prejudices of one perſon, has the ſame malicious view; and tho' his lordſhip affirms, that from the very firſt, he began to combat them with great decency and firmneſs, it is certain he never ſpoke of his having ſuch a deſign, till a few days before the * had fixed his departure for Britain. And it muſt be owned, that ſeveral worthy men, who were then at Paris, thought it an improper time to preſs his majeſty on that head, when he had not leiſure to enquire into it; and that his lordſhip was not the moſt proper perſon to talk of religion.

Another ſlander, in his lordſhip's letter, is, that he was 'diſcarded with all the circumſtances of provocation poſſible, and treated, as far as it lay in the power of thoſe whom he ſerved, with an affectation of indignation and contempt;' for the * diſmiſſed him by a letter, without aſſigning any reaſon for his pleaſure, and commanded the duke of Ormond to carry it. His majeſty, in tenderneſs to his lordſhip, of whom he had once a good opinion, took this courſe; and, beſides, he thought it below his royal dignity to deſcend to a paper quarrel. And if his lordſhip had followed the advice that was given him, to lie quiet, his character would not ſo ſoon have been expoſed in its true light.

I could give many other inſtances of his lordſhip's neglect of the *'s buſineſs, at a time when he had the ſole management of it; and to name but one: his lordſhip for ten days neglected to ſend the duke of Mar's new commiſſion, to command in Scotland, which was ſo much wanted, upon an idle pretence of ſending a long and trifling memorial in cyphers along with it.

His lordſhip's behaviour to his equal and inferiors was not only contemptuous, but his treatment to the queen was inſolent to the laſt degree. To inſult majeſty in diſtreſs aggravates the crime: and ſuch a carriage to the *'s mother is an evident proof of want of duty to his majeſty. And though his lordſhip's friends induſtriouſly reported, that he was diſmiſſed by her advice, and from thence drew malicious inferences; you may be aſſured, that it was the concurrent opinion of the duke of Ormond, and all the *'s friends here, to diſplace him, and that her majeſty had no hand in his removal.

What the principles were, his lordſhip ſays, he brought out of England with him, I do not know, having never had reaſon to believe, that he gave himſelf much trouble about any. That they were not the principles of the tories, is plain, from his repreſentation of that party to the French court, and his expreſſions in converſation, that he never expected much good from the tories.

His lordſhip concludes, that there are abundance of things more, that he could ſay to clear himſelf, but, by the ſcurrility of his letters, it may be preſumed, that he has omitted nothing, in tenderneſs to any perſon whatſoever. And the reaſon given for ſaying no more, that thoſe on this ſide, who firſt began the ſtorm, are ſenſible of their folly, is notoriouſly falſe. And, as his actions are better underſtood here, than they poſſibly can be on your ſide, every honeſt man in France is thoroughly convinced of his ill conduct, and that his majeſty had juſt and wiſe reaſons to remove him.

This letter has ſwelled to a greater bulk than at firſt I imagined. Upon the whole, I leave you to judge, whether the *, the dukes of Ormond and Mar, or his lordſhip, deſerve moſt to be credited: and, if ſo many inſtances of his miſmanagements have been proved, it may be concluded, they would appear more clearly, if it were ſeaſonable to ſpeak plain upon ſeveral of them. I have avoided all unneceſſary bitterneſs of expreſſion againſt his lordſhip, and the leaſt imputation of flattery to others; and I ſhall embrace every opportunity of ſhewing you, that I am &c.

ed to ſhew their reſentment againſt theſe addreſſers, eſpecially ſuch as were members of the ſitting parliament. Accordingly, they appointed a committee to enquire who had ſigned theſe addreſſes, and many were cenſured or brought to acknowledgment upon that account. Then they addreſſed the lords juſtices for a proclamation againſt the popiſh inhabitants of Limerick and Galway, who, preſuming upon the conſtruction they thought fit to put upon the articles of capitulation made with king William, for the ſurrender of thoſe places, had claimed an exemption from the penalties and proceſs upon the other laws againſt papiſts. Upon complaint whereof to the houſe, this addreſs was founded.

Whilſt the bills were ſent to England to be ratified, the parliament adjourned to the 6th of January. Upon their meeting on that day, the lord viſcount Dillon came into the houſe of peers, and delivering his writ, took the oath of allegiance; but being aſked, whether he could take the other oaths? He ſaid, he would conſider of it, and then withdrew. Upon this, the lords reſolved, that no peer ſhould have parliamentary privilege, till he had taken and ſubſcribed the other oaths in the act to prevent the further growth of popery. This done, the lords entered into an aſſociation to defend the king, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, againſt the pretender, and all his open and ſecret abettors. The commons likewiſe entered into the like aſſociation; and alſo reſolved, that, whatever forces the king ſhould think fit to raiſe, or what expences he ſhould think neceſſary for the defence of the kingdom, they would enable him to make good the ſame. It was ſtrongly reported, that the day the aſſociation was brought into the houſe of peers, two lords, one of whom was the earl of Angleſey, embarked for England, to avoid ſigning it. The archbiſhop of Armagh and the biſhop of Corke refuſed alſo to ſign. Soon after the commons reſolved, that whoever adviſed the diſbanding or breaking a great part of the army, immediately after the unſeaſonable prorogation of the late parliament, when a bill to attaint the pretender was under conſideration, were enemies to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and deſigned to bring in the pretender and popery. After which it was voted, that the earl of Angleſey was one of the principal adviſers to break the army, and prorogue the late parliament, and was therefore an enemy to the king and kingdom. This was followed with an addreſs for the earl's being removed from the king's council and ſervice; which was complied with. The lords juſtices alſo thought fit, at that juncture, to ſecure ſeveral ſuſpected perſons, as the earl of Antrim, the earl of Weſtmeath, the lord Nutterville, the lord Cahir, the lord Dillon, and ſome others, and then adjourned the two houſes to the 8th of March.

The parliament met in England on the 9th of January, when the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The zeal and affection to my government, and the vigilant care for the ſafety of the nation, which you have ſhewn in your reſpective counties, have not only fully anſwered my expectations, but give me aſſurances, that you are met together, reſolved to act with a ſpirit becoming a time of common danger, and with ſuch a vigour as will end in the confuſion of all thoſe, who have openly engaged in this rebellion, and in the ſhame and reproach of ſuch, as by ſecret and malicious inſinuations have fomented, or, by an avowed indifference encouraged this traiterous enterprize.

It is, I doubt not, a great ſatisfaction to you, to have obſerved, that the powers, you intruſted me with for the preſervation of the public ſafety, have been employed in the moſt proper and effectual manner, and made ſtrictly ſubſervient to thoſe purpoſes only, for which you intended them. And you muſt have had the pleaſure to reflect with me, that as the meaſures taken for our defence have been juſt and neceſſary; ſo it has pleaſed the Divine Providence to bleſs them with a ſeries of ſuitable ſucceſs. And I cannot but take this opportunity of doing juſtice to the officers and ſoldiers of the army, whoſe brave and faithful diſcharge of their duty, has diſappointed our enemies, and contributed ſo much to the ſafety of the nation.

I did hope, that the detecting and preventing the deſigned inſurrections in ſome parts of the kingdom, and the defeating in others thoſe, who had taken up arms againſt me, would have put an end to this rebellion. But it is plain, that our enemies, animated by ſome ſecret hopes of aſſiſtance, are ſtill endeavouring to ſupport this deſparate undertaking; and the pretender, as I have reaſon to believe, is now landed in Scotland.

It is however with pleaſure I can acquaint you, that notwithſtanding theſe inteſtine commotions, Great-Britain has, in ſome meaſure, recovered its influence and reputation abroad. The treaty for ſettling the barrier for the Netherlands is now fully concluded between the emperor and ſtates-general under my guaranty. The king of Spain has agreed to a treaty, by which that valuable branch of our commerce will be delivered from the new impoſitions and hardſhips, to which it was ſubjected by the late treaties; and will ſtand ſettled for the future, on a foot more advantageous and certain than it ever did, in the moſt flouriſhing time of any of my predeceſſors; and the treaty, for renewing all former alliances between the crown of Great-Britain and the ſtates-general, is brought very near to its concluſion.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

I muſt rely on your affection to me, and your care and concern for the ſafety of the nation, to grant me ſuch ſupplies, as may enable me to reſtore, and to ſecure the peace of the kingdom; and I will order eſtimates of the neceſſary expences to be laid before you.

Among the many unavoidable ill conſequences of this rebellion, none affects me more ſenſibly, than that extraordinary burden, which it has and muſt create to my faithful ſubjects. To eaſe them as far as lies in my power, I take this firſt opportunity of declaring, that I will freely give up all the eſtates, that ſhall become forfeited to the crown by this rebellion, to be applied towards defraying the extraordinary expence incurred on this occaſion.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

It is matter of the greateſt uneaſineſs to me, that the firſt years of my reign, the whole courſe of which I wiſhed to have tranſmitted to poſterity, diſtinguiſhed by the fair and endearing marks of peace and clemency, ſhould be clouded and overcaſt by ſo unnatural a rebellion; which, however impotent and unſucceſsful, a due care may render it in all other reſpects, does moſt ſenſibly afflict me, by the calamities it has brought on many of my faithful ſubjects, and by thoſe indiſpenſable returns of ſeverity which their ſufferings, and the public ſafety do moſt juſtly call for. Under this concern, my greateſt comfort is, that I cannot reproach myſelf with having given the leaſt provocation to that ſpirit of diſcontent and calumny, that has been let looſe againſt me, or the leaſt pretence for kindling the flame of this rebellion.

Let thoſe, whoſe fatal counſels laid the foundation of all theſe miſchiefs, and thoſe, whoſe private diſcontents and diſappointments diſguiſed under falſe pretences, have betrayed great numbers of deluded people into their own deſtruction, anſwer for the miſeries in which they have involved their fellow-ſubjects. I queſtion not, but that, with the continuance of God's bleſſing, who alone is able to form good out of evil, and with the chearful aſſiſtance of my parliament, we ſhall, in a ſhort time, ſee this rebellion end, not only in reſtoring the tranquility of my government, but in procuring a firm and laſting eſtabliſhment of that excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate, which it was manifeſtly deſigned to ſubvert; and that this open and flagrant attempt in favour of popery, will aboliſh all other diſtinctions among us, but of ſuch as are zealous aſſertors of the liberties of their country, the preſent eſtabliſhment, and the proteſtant religion, and of ſuch, as are endeavouring to ſubject the nation to the revenge and tyranny of a popiſh pretender.'

The lords and commons preſented ſeverally very loyal addreſſes of thanks for this ſpeech. The commons declared, they thought themſelves obliged, in juſtice to their injured country, to proſecute, in the moſt vigorous and impartial manner, the authors of thoſe deſtructive counſels, which had drawn down theſe miſeries upon the nation. They began with expelling mr. Forſter, general of the Northumbrian rebels, and after a remarkable ſpeech, to ſhew the neceſſity of proceeding by way of impeachment, mr. Lechmere impeached the earl of Derwentwater of high-treaſon, and undertook to make the impeachment good. Mr. Pulteney impeached the lord Widdrington; mr. Boſcawen, the earl of Nithiſdale; mr. Hampden, the earl of Wintoun; the lord Finch, the earl of Carnwarth; the earl of Hertford, viſcount Kenmure; and mr. Wortley Montague, the lord Nairn. Then mr. Lechmere, and the reſt, were ordered to carry up their ſeveral impeachments to the lords; which being done, a committee was appointed to draw up the articles againſt the ſeven impeached lords. Mr Lechmere, chairman of the committee, in leſs than two hours reported, that the articles were drawn up: which being agreed to, were carried by him to the lords the ſame day.

The next day, the impeached lords were all brought to the bar of the houſe of lords, where the articles of impeachment againſt them were read, and they were ordered to put in their anſwer on the 16th, and, upon their requeſt, ſuch perſons, as they ſhould think proper to aſſiſt them in their defence, were allowed to come to them.

The impeachments being lodged, the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to continue the ſuſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus act for ſix months longer; which was oppoſed by mr. Shippen. He ſaid, 'it invaded the moſt valuable right of Engliſhmen; encouraged malicious informations, and gave a handle to thoſe in power to oppreſs innocent people.' Mr ſecretary Stanhope appealed to the whole houſe, whether the king or his miniſtry had made an ill or wanton uſe of the power with which the parliament had thought fit to entruſt his majeſty. And mr. Hungerford himſelf owned the government had uſed that power with great moderation. After which, the bill paſſed both houſes.

On the 16th of January a bill was brought in to attaint the earl of Mar, William Murray, commonly called marquiſs of Tullibardine, the earl of Linlithgow, and John Drummond, commonly called lord Drummond. The bill was prepared by mr. Smith, ſir Joſeph Jekyll, lord Coningſby, and mr. Lechmere, and had an eaſy paſſage through both houſes.

On the 21ſt of January the king came to the houſe of peers, and gave his aſſent to the act for continuing the ſuſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus. Then the lord chancellor read the following ſpeech of his majeſty to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I had reaſon to believe, when I ſpoke laſt to you, that the pretender was landed in Scotland. The accounts I have received ſince put it beyond all doubt, that he is heading the rebellion there, and does aſſume the ſtyle and title of king of theſe realms. His adherents do likewiſe confidently affirm, that aſſurances are given them of ſupport from abroad. This parliament hath on all occaſions expreſſed ſo much duty to me, and ſo true a regard for the religious and civil rights of my people, that I am perſuaded this daring preſumption of our enemies will heighten your juſt indignation againſt them, and beget ſuch further reſolutions, as, with the bleſſing of God, will enable me to defeat their attempts.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

"The moſt effectual way to put a ſpeedy end to theſe troubles will be to make ſuch a proviſion, as may diſcourage any foreign power from aſſiſting the rebels. I do therefore hope, that every ſincere proteſtant, and true Briton, will look upon the extraordinary expence, which a preparation may require to be the beſt huſbandry; ſince it will, in all human probability, prevent that deſolation and thoſe calamities which would unavoidably enſue, if the rebellion ſhould be ſuffered to ſpread, and be ſupported by popiſh forces from abroad.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The world muſt be convinced by all you have already done, that you have nothing but the honour and intereſt of your country at heart: and, for my own part, I rely entirely upon you, and doubt not but you will take ſuch reſolutions at this juncture, as will be moſt for the preſent ſafety, and future eaſe of my people."

Both houſes preſented addreſſes to his majeſty, full of expreſſions of duty and affection, and the moſt hearty aſſurances of their aſſiſtance againſt the daring preſumption of the pretender and his adherents.

The impeached lords, having, on the 16th of January, petitioned the houſe of peers for longer time to put in their anſwers to the articles of impeachment; they were allowed time till Thurſday the 19th, upon which day, all of them, except the earl of Wintoun (who upon his petition had till the 23d allowed him) were brought from the Tower to the bar of the houſe of peers, where they ſeverally pleaded guilty to the articles of their impeachment, but urged ſome things, by way of anſwer, to extenuate their guilt. The earl of Derwentwater's anſwer was in writing, as were alſo the anſwers of the lord Widdrington, and the earl of Nithiſdale. The anſwers of the earl of Carnwarth and the lord Kenmure were delivered viva voce; and the lord Nairn delivered in a petition to the lords in writing. Having thus pleaded guilty, the 9th of February was appointed for their receiving ſentence. Upon which day they were all brought to the bar of the court erected in Weſtminſter-hall, and had ſentence, as in caſe of high-treaſon, pronounced againſt them by the lord chancellor Cowper, lord high-ſteward on that occaſion.

The commons having put the caſe of the rebel lords in a courſe of juſtice, they returned their thoughts to the reſt of the Preſton priſoners who were brought up to London; and, to prevent the formality of ſending them into Lancaſhire to be tried, they brought in a bill to remove thoſe difficulties, which obſtructed the courſe of juſtice; and, as this was only to be a temporary law, ſo the occaſion was ſpecified in the title, which was, 'An act for the more eaſy and ſpeedy trial of ſuch perſons, as have levied war againſt his majeſty during the preſent rebellion.'

About the ſame time mr. Lechmere moved for an addreſs to the king, for a proclamation, offering a general pardon to ſuch as were yet in arms in Scotland, who ſhould lay them down within a certain time, with ſuch reſtrictions and limitations, as the king ſhould think fit. This motion was ſtrongly oppoſed by mr. Pulteny, the lord Coningſby, and ſome others, who repreſented the ill effects which ſuch a proclamation might have, both at home and abroad, in the preſent juncture of affairs. What had moſt weight in this debate was urged by mr. Walpole, who contented himſelf with ſaying, he would not enquire into the reaſons of this motion, but he had been offered ſixty thouſand pounds for the life of one ſingle perſon. This gave mr. Lechmere an occaſion to vindicate his integrity and honeſt intentions; but finding, what he had propoſed, was not thought conſiſtent with the king and the nation's ſervice, he did not inſiſt upon it. The next day major Stuart, aid de camp to the duke of Argyle, and captain Morton, aid de camp to general Cadogan, arrived at St. James's with advice that the rebels had abandoned Perth, and were flying before the king's forces: and therefore the publiſhing a proclamation for a general pardon, at ſuch a juncture, would have ſhewed a weakneſs in the government, and encouraged foreign powers to ſupport the rebels. About this time the pretender ſent a letter to the lord mayor of London, with orders to proclaim him king of Great-Britain; which was communicated to the ſecretary of ſtate.

Mr baron Bury, mr. juſtice Eyre, and mr. baron Mountague, having been appointed to try the rebels at Liverpool, there were a conſiderable number found guilty; and Richard Shuttleworth of Preſton, a papiſt; Roger Moncaſter of Garſtang, an attorney; Thomas Cowpe, William Butler, and William Ackworth, were executed at Preſton, on the 28th of January; and John Rowbotham, James Blundel, James Burne, James Finch, William Whally, and John Mac Gillivray, were executed at Wigan on the 10th of February; Richard Charley, eſq. James Drummond, William Black, Donald Macdonold, Rorie Kennedy, and John Ord, executed at Preſton on the 9th of February; and Thomas Sydal, William Harris, Stephen Seager, Joſeph Porter, and John Finch, executed at Manchester on the 11th of February.

About one thouſand of the rebel priſoners at Lancaſter, Liverpool, and Cheſter, ſubmitted to the king's mercy, and petitioned for tranſportation.

In the mean time, great ſollicitations were made with the court, and with the members of both houſes of Parliament, in behalf of the ſix condemned lords, particularly in favour of the earl of Derwentwater. On the 13th of February, the counteſs Nithiſdale, and the lord Nairn's lady, watching an opportunity, when the king went through the appartments of the palace of St. James's, behind a window curtain, without being preſented by the lord of the bed-chamber in waiting, as uſual, on a ſudden threw themſelves at the king's feet, begging mercy for their huſbands. This abrupt and irregular application could not but ſurpriſe the king, and thoſe about him, and therefore proved as ineffectual as thoſe which had been made in a more becoming and leſs artful manner. For a few days after, a reſolution was taken in council, to cauſe the ſentence paſſed on theſe lords to be executed; for which purpoſe, the neceſſary warrants and orders were on the 18th of February, ſent both to the lieutenant of the Tower, and to the ſheriffs of the city of London and Middleſex. The next morning the counteſs of Derwentwater, attended by her ſiſter, and accompanied by the ducheſſes of Cleveland and Bolton, and ſeveral other ladies of the firſt rank, was by the duke of Richmond and St. Albans introduced into the king's bed-chamber, where ſhe humbly implored his clemency for her unfortunate conſort; and then withdrew.

It is very probable, the counteſs of Derwentwater received no favourable anſwer from the court; for on the 21ſt of February, ſhe, with the ladies of ſome other condemned lords, and about twenty more of diſtinction went to the lobby of the houſe of peers to beg their interceſſion: but the lords did not then think fit to take notice of their petitions. The next morning, the ladies in diſtreſs, with a ſtill greater attendance than the day before, went to Weſtminſter to petition both houſes of Parliament, where, by this time, not a few members appeared inclined to mercy. Sir Richard Steel, among the reſt, offered one of theſe petitions, and made a long ſpeech upon that ſubject, and was ſeconded by mr. Farrar, mr. Shippen, and ſome others; but they were oppoſed by all the leading members of the prevailing ſide; and, though a great many, who uſed to vote with them, went over, on this occaſion, to the other party, yet a motion being made, and the queſtion put for adjourning to the 1ſt of March, the adjournment was carried by a majority of ſeven voices only, a hundred and ſixty-two, to a hundred and fifty-five.

The ladies of the condemned lords were more ſucceſsful with the peers than with the commons. The duke of Richmond, a near relation of the earl of Derwentwater, and one of the lords, allowed by the houſe to aſſiſt him, could not refuſe preſenting a petition in his favour, but at the ſame time he declared he would be againſt it. The earl of Derby, out of pity for the numerous family of the lord Nairn, charged himſelf with a petition in his behalf, as other lords did upon the like or different motives, with other petitions. The queſtion being put, whether theſe petitions ſhould be received and read, there aroſe a great debate, in which the lord Townſhend, and ſeveral other lords, who upon all occaſions had given undoubted proofs of their affection to the preſent ſettlements, were againſt it, but the earl of Nottingham, to their great ſurprize, declaring for it, his weight, as preſident of the council, drew to that ſide ſeveral peers; ſo the queſtion was carried by nine or ten voices. After the reading of the petitions, the next queſtion was, 'whether, in the caſe of an impeachment, the king has any power to reprieve?' This being alſo carried in the affirmative, the ſame was followed by a motion for an addreſs, to deſire the king to grant a reprieve to the lords, who lay under ſentence of death. This was oppoſed by the firmeſt friends of the government; and even an earl, who was for the two firſt queſtions, repreſented, 'that though clemency was one of the brighteſt virtues that adorn and ſupport a crown; yet, in his opinion, the ſame ſhould be exerciſed with diſcretion, and only on proper objects:' and therefore moved, 'that they ſhould addreſs the king to reprieve ſuch of the condemned lords, as ſhould deſerve his mercy.' This, after ſome further debate, was carried. Then the earl of Stamford moved, that the time of reſpite be left to the king, which was readily agreed to; and then the addreſs, with theſe amendments, was carried by a majority of five voices only. To this addreſs the king anſwered, 'that on this and all other occaſions, he would do what he thought moſt conſiſtent with the dignity of his crown, and the ſafety of his people.'

This wiſe and reſolute anſwer proved, the next day, a great mortification to the jacobite and diſcontented party, who were extremely elated by the inclinations to mercy, which appeared in both houſes, and which occaſioned various reflections. Whatever was the ſecret ſpring of theſe inclinations, it is certain, that in the council, held the ſame evening, about the execution of the condemned lords, there was a conteſt between the earl of Nottingham and ſome other lords; and four days after, that earl was removed from being preſident of the council, the earl of Aylesford, his brother, from being chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter; the lord Finch, ſon to that earl of Nottingham, from being one of the lords of the treaſury; and the lord Guernſey, his couſin-german, from being maſter of the jewel-office. This change, however ſudden, was not unforeſeen by men of obſervation; and it juſtified mr. Hampden's reflection, not many days before, in the houſe of commons, on a motley or mixed miniſtry.

Purſuant to the reſolution taken in the council, orders were diſpatched for executing the next morning, the earls of Derwentwater, and Nithiſdale, and the lord Kenmure; and for reſpiting the lord Widdrington, the earl of Carnwarth, and the lord Nairn, till the 7th of March. The ſame evening the earl of Nithiſdale found means to make his eſcape out of the Tower in a woman's apparel brought to him by his mother, who came to viſit him with ſome relations. The next morning, early, three detachments of the guards took their ſeveral poſts round the ſcaffold erected on Tower-hill, and, a little before ten o'clock, the earl of Derwentwater and the lord Kenmure were carried in a hacney coach from the Tower to the Tranſport-office, on Tower-hill, where there was a room hung with blac for their reception. From this room to the ſcaffold, (which was alſo covered with blac) there was a paſſage or gallery railed in. The earl of Derwentwater was firſt led to the ſcaffold; and it was obſerved, that in his going thither, and aſcending the ſteps, his countenance appeared very pale. But, after he had been a few minutes on the ſcaffold, his behaviour appeared reſolute and ſedate. Having ſpent ſome time in prayer with a book, he then addreſſed himſelf to the ſheriff, and deſired he might have liberty to read a paper, which he had drawn up. This requeſt being readily granted, he went to the rails of the ſcaffold, and read what follows:

'Being in a few minutes to appear before the tribunal of God, where, though moſt unworthy, I hope to find mercy, which I have not found from men now in power; I have endeavoured to make my peace with his divine majeſty, by moſt humbly begging pardon for all the ſins of my life: and I doubt not of a merciful forgiveneſs, through the merits of the paſſion and death of my Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; for which end I earneſtly deſire the prayers of all good chriſtians.

'After this, I am to aſk pardon of thoſe, whom I might have ſcandalized by pleading guilty at my trial. Such as were permitted to come to me, told me, that having been undeniably in arms, pleading guilty was but the conſequence of having ſubmitted to mercy; and many arguments were uſed to prove there was nothing of moment in ſo doing; among others, the univerſal practice of ſigning leaſes, whereof the preambles run in the name of the perſon in poſſeſſion.

'But I am ſenſible that in this I have made bold with my loyalty, having never any other but king James the third, for my rightful and lawful ſovereign. Him I had an inclination to ſerve from my infancy, and was moved thereto by a natural love I had to his perſon, knowing him to be capable of making his people happy. And though he had been of a different religion from mine, I ſhould have done for him all that lay in my power, as my anceſtors have done for his predeceſſors, being thereunto bound by the laws of God and man.

'Wherefore, if in this affair I have acted raſhly, it ought not to effect the innocent. I intended to wrong no body, but to ſerve my king and country, and that without ſelf-intereſt; hoping, by the example I gave, to have induced others to do their duty; and God, who ſees the ſecrets of my heart, knows I ſpeak truth. Some means have been propoſed to me for ſaving my life, which I looked upon as inconſiſtent with honour and conſcience, and therefore I rejected them; for, with God's aſſiſtance, I ſhall prefer any death to the doing a baſe unworthy action. I only wiſh now, that the laying down my life might contribute to the ſervice of my king and country, and the re-eſtabliſhment of the antient and fundamental conſtitution of theſe kingdoms; without which no laſting peace or true happineſs can attend them. Then I ſhould indeed part with my life, even with pleaſure. As it is, I can only pray, that theſe bleſſings may be beſtowed upon my dear country; and, ſince I can do no more, I beſeech God to accept of my life as a ſmall ſacrifice towards it.

'I die a Roman chatholic. I am in perfect charity with all the world, I thank God for it, even with thoſe of the preſent government, who are moſt inſtrumental in my death. I freely forgive ſuch as ungenerouſly reported falſe things of me; and I hope to be forgiven the treſpaſſes of my youth, by the father of infinite majeſty, into whoſe hands I commend my ſoul.

'JA. DERWENTWATER.

'P. S. If that prince, who now governs, had given me my life, I ſhould have thought myſelf obliged never more to have taken up arms againſt him.'

After the reading of this paper, he delivered it to the ſheriff, telling him he might do with it as he pleaſed; and that he had given a copy of it to a friend. Then turning to the bloc, he viewed it cloſe, and finding in it a rough place, that might offend his nec, he bid the executioner chip it off; which uncommon preſence of mind was obſerved with admiration by ſome of the ſtanders-by. Having prepared himſelf for the blow, by taking off his coat and waiſtcoat, he laid down to fit his head to the bloc, telling the executioner, that the ſign he ſhould give him was, 'Lord Jeſus receive my ſoul;' and at the third time repeating it, he was to do his office; which he did at one blow. It was reported, that the night before, the earl of Derwentwater having ſent for mr. Stephen Roome, an undertaker for funerals, and diſcourſing with him about his own; he told him, he would have a ſilver plate upon his coffin, with an inſcription importing, 'that he died a ſacrifice for his lawful ſovereign;' but mr. Roome, ſcrupling to comply with it, he was diſmiſſed. This was the reaſon no hearſe was provided for him at his execution; ſo that his head was only taken up by one of his ſervants, and put into a clean handkerchief; and, the body being wrapped in blac cloth, they were both together carried to the Tower.

Soon after the lord Kenmure was brought to the ſcaffold in the ſame manner, accompanied by his ſon and ſome friends, and attended by two clergymen of the church of England. He ſhewed a great reſolution and firmneſs in his gaite and countenance, though ſome nice obſervers pretended he was not ſo calm within as the earl of Derwentwater; which however was contradicted by others. On the ſcaffold he ſaid, 'he had ſo little thoughts of dying ſo ſoon, that he had not provided a blac ſuit, that he might have died with the more decency; for which he was ſorry.' He appeared very ſincere and fervent in his devotions, often lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven; but (contrary to what he had declared in his ſpeech to the lords, when judgment was pronounced againſt him) he prayed for the pretender, and repented of his having pleaded guilty. He embraced and kiſſed very tenderly moſt of the officers and gentlemen on the ſcaffold, and his ſon and ſome friends twice or thrice. He had with him mr. Roome the undertaker, who was to take care of his body, and a ſurgeon, who was to direct the executioner in doing his office. Having prepared for the bloc, he laid down his head upon it, then raiſed it up again, ſtill continuing on his knees; gave the executioner ſome money, and told him, 'he ſhould give him no ſign, but, when he laid his head down again, he might do his work as he ſaw good.' Then having lifted up his hands in prayer a ſhort time longer, he laid down his head again, which the executioner ſervered at two blows. Both the head and body were put into a coffin, and conveyed in a hearſe to mr. Roome's, where they were embalmed, in order to be ſent into Scotland, and buried with his anceſtors. He neither made nor delivered any ſpeech on the ſcaffold; but in a letter found after his execution, which he wrote to the pretender, (by the ſtile of king James) he declared, 'that he died for his faithful ſervices to his majeſty, but hoped the cauſe he died for would thrive and flouriſh after his death: and as he ſuffered for his ſervice, he hoped his majeſty would provide for his wife and children, who were in a miſerable condition.

On the 15th of March, the earl of Wintoun's trial came on. The long trouble and delay he had occaſioned by petitions for time, upon the pretence of witneſſes being on the road, made people expect, that a conſiderable defence would be made, and ſomething very particular be urged in his behalf, either by himſelf or his council; but they were ſurprized, that when he came to the bar, and the managers of the houſe of commons had ſpent two days in opening and enforcing the articles againſt him, and replying to what was offered, his anſwers were ſo weak, and what his council had to offer ſo trifling, that it could not be called a defence. This gave ſome confirmation to what had been ſuggeſted, that he was a lunatic. However the lords were unanimous in their judgment, and brought him in guilty; and on the 19th of March, judgment was pronounced againſt him by the lord chancellor Cowper, lord high ſteward upon this occaſion.

Two days after the king having received advice of the pretender's flight out of Scotland, came to the houſe of peers, and giving his aſſent to the land-tax bill, [p] made the following ſpeech to both houſes of parliament.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I take this opportunity of acquainting you, that my forces have obliged the pretender to fly out of Scotland; and he is ſince, as I am informed, landed near Gravelin. But I do not yet know, whether any country in amity with us will give him protection, after having ſo publicly invaded our kingdoms.

'The dangers, to which this nation was expoſed, made me determine, that neither the extraordinary rigour of the ſeaſon, nor any fallacious propoſal of the rebels, ſhould divert me from uſing all poſſible endeavours towards putting a ſpeedy and effectual end to this unnatural rebellion.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I muſt return you my thanks for the great progreſs you have made in the ſupplies. The neceſſary diſpoſitions are made for raiſing additional forces. But, as I ſhall always conſult the eaſe of my people, as far as is conſiſtent with their own ſecurity, I ſhall not make uſe of the confidence you have placed in me, unleſs the reſtleſs malice of our enemies ſhould make it neceſſary to go on with thoſe levies.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I promiſe myſelf, from the zeal and wiſdom of this parliament, that the future happineſs and tranquility of my ſubjects will be eſtabliſhed on a ſolid foundation; and ſuch meaſures taken, as may deprive our enemies at home of the power (ſince that alone can deprive them of the inclination) again to attempt the diſturbance of my government. This therefore is what I think myſelf obliged to recommend to you, as a deliberation of the utmoſt importance to the future ſafety, eaſe, and proſperity of my people.'

From this time to the 9th of April (when the ſeptennial bill was brought in) little elſe was done in both houſes, but preſenting ſuch bills as were ready, and voting for the ſupplies.

In the mean time the new commiſſion for trying the rebels met on the 7th of April, the firſt time, at the court of common-pleas. Sir William Thompſon, recorder of London, opened the meeting with a ſpeech to the grand-jury, by whom bills of high treaſon were found againſt Forſter, brigadier Mackintoſh, and twenty others [q].

[p] This bill had like to have raiſed a diſpute between the two houſes. The bill being ſent up to the lords, a debate aroſe about the preamble, which was in theſe words:

'We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great-Britain in parliament aſſembled, having hearts filled with the utmoſt gratitude to your majeſty, for the tender concern your majeſty, on all occaſions, expreſſes for the extraordinary burden this unnatural rebellion makes neceſſary to be laid on your faithful ſubjects, for preſerving all their rights, both ſacred and civil, and for your majeſty's unprecedented goodneſs in giving up all ſuch eſtates for the uſe of the public, and in caſe of your people, as ſhall be forfeited by this rebellion; the raiſing or the dreadful conſequences whereof, cannot, by the moſt implacable of your majeſty's enemies, be aſcribed to any one act done by your majeſty, ſince your happy acceſſion to the throne of your anceſtors; but even they will allow, that all the miſchiefs, burdens and calamities, which ſhall attend this horrid rebellion, are, in truth, owing to the fatal and pernicious counſels given by ſome perſons in the late mal-adminiſtration, when, under pretence of procuring peace abroad, the preſent deſtructive war was projected to be brought into the very bowels of our native country at home, when a popiſh army (part of which God hath delivered into your majeſty's hands) was deſigned to be the protector of our holy religion; and when under the falſe colour of paying the public debts, though their true deſign was to deliver us bound into the power of the antient enemy of theſe kingdoms, the ſame evil counſellors contrived unneceſſarily to incumber, for a long time to come (if not for ever) ſeveral conſiderable branches of the public revenues, which, for many years paſt, had, from time to time, been uſeful to ſupport the public expence; which revenues, in former adminiſtrations, had been carefully reſerved for that purpoſe, to the end that, upon the concluſion of a happy peace, which we had then reaſon to expect, the ſubjects of theſe realms might have reaped the fruit of a ſucceſsful, though expenſive war. And we, your majeſty's ſaid dutiful and loyal ſubjects, being fully reſolved to maintain your majeſty's juſt title to the imperial crown of theſe realms, againſt all enemies and traytors whatſoever; and, for that end, propoſed to raiſe ſuch ſupplies, as are neceſſary to defray your majeſty's public expences, have chearfully and unanimouſly given and granted, &c.'

Some lords being offended at this preamble, the earl of Abingdon moved, that all the peers in town might be ſummoned to attend the committee; which was done accordingly. And, on Monday, the 13th of February, the lord Harcourt went early to the houſe of peers, and cauſed the journals to be diligently ſearched for precedents of amendments, made by the lords to a money-bill. But few, if any, could be found, at leaſt ſince the reſtoration; from which time the commons would never ſuffer the lords to make any amendments to bills of that nature. When the grand committee was ſat, ſeveral lords ſpoke againſt the preamble in queſtion, as 'pre-judging matters of a very high and important nature, the cognizance and determination of which properly belongs to the houſe of peers.'

Upon this, an expedient was propoſed and admitted, that they ſhould enter in their journal a kind of proteſt or declaration, importing in ſubſtance 'that though the preamble was derogatory to the privileges and authority of the houſe of lords; yet their lordſhips, in conſideration of the king and nation's ſervice, in this dangerous conjuncture, were willing to give their concurrence to the bill, without amendments; but that the ſame ſhould not be drawn into a precedent for the time to come, or conſtrued to be any diminution of the judicial authority of the houſe of lords.' The lord chancellor Cowper and the lord Harcourt were appointed by the lords to draw up the proteſt or declaration, which was entered in the journal of the houſe.

It was on the 14th of April that Forſter was to have been arraigned, in order to his trial; but on the 10th about midnight, he made his eſcape out of Newgate, with one ſervant only. The matter was variouſly reported; and mr. Pitts, the keeper of Newgate, was not only committed for it, but afterwards indicted for high treaſon, as being wilfully guilty of the eſcape, and tried for his life at the Old-Bailey; but was acquitted. There was a proclamation immediately publiſhed, offering a reward of a thouſand pounds for the apprehending mr. Forſter; but it appeared afterwards, that his eſcape was ſo concerted, and all other things prepared, that as ſoon as he got out, he had horſes ready; and riding directly to Lee, near Rochford in Eſſex, he had a veſſel laid ready alſo, which took him on board, and landed him in France the very ſame day.

However the court ſat according to its adjournment, and mr. Forſter being abſent, mr. Mackintoſh, mr. Gaſcoigne, mr. Charles Wogan, and others, being arraigned, pleaded not guilty; and upon a motion for time, had three weeks given them to prepare for their trials; which favour, on the contrary, ſome of them made uſe of to prepare, not for their trial, but for their eſcape.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XXVII.

SECT. II.

From the End of the Rebellion to the Death of King GEORGE I.

30. GEORGE I.

1716] THE rebellion was now quelled, and the ſtrength of the rebels entirely broken, but the diſaffection of the people was not yet conquered. The parliament was the bulwark of the crown; the vigour and unanimity of the king's friends, and their ſuperiority in the houſe, was the ſupport of the whole affair. But the parliament being only of three years continuance, by virtue of the triennial act, made in the 6th year of king William and queen Mary; all the hopes of the other party ſeemed to be centered in this, that the parliament would expire; and that they ſhould be able, by their influence in the country, to chuſe a majority of their party at the next election; or raiſe ſuch a ferment at that juncture, as might make way for a ſucceſsful invaſion from abroad. This the perſons at the helm obſerved with concern; and therefore reſolved to baffle theſe hopes of the enemies of the government, by prolonging the ſitting of the preſent parliament. It is ſaid, it was firſt propoſed only to ſuſpend the triennial act for once, whereby this parliament would have continued three years beyond the time, at which it was to determine; but it was afterwards thought, that a bill for enlarging the time of continuance of parliaments, in general, would be leſs liable to exceptions. The next thing, that fell under conſideration was, whether this intended bill ſhould be ſet on foot in the houſe of lords, or in the houſe of commons? the firſt was judged the propereſt for ſeveral reaſons, particularly becauſe, the court being more ſure of a majority in the houſe of commons, if the bill miſcarried with the lords, the odium of this project, which carried a face of unpopularity, would not reſt with the commons, nor conſequently prejudice future elections.

On the 9th of April in the evening, about thirty of the court lords met at the duke of Devonſhire's, where, after a ſhort conſultation, it was reſolved to begin this matter the very next day; and the duke was deſired to move it in the houſe of lords. The duke readily complied with the deſire of the aſſembly; and the next day, after the lords had diſpatched ſome private buſineſs, the duke ſtood up, and made a ſpeech on the inconveniencies, that attend triennial elections, ſuggeſting, in particular, that they keep up party diviſions, raiſe and foment feuds and animoſities in private families; occaſion ruinous expences; and give occaſion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign princes. It therefore became the wiſdom of that auguſt aſſembly to apply a proper remedy to an evil, which might be attended with the moſt dangerous conſequences, eſpecially in the preſent temper of the nation. For, though the rebellion was happily ſuppreſſed, yet the ſpirit of it remained unconquered, and ſeemed only to wait for an opportunity to ſhew itſelf with more violence. That, the election of a new parliament, which by the triennial act was not far off, being the moſt favourable juncture, which the diſaffected could expect, he thought it abſolutely neceſſary to deprive them of it. For which purpoſe he had a bill to offer to the houſe for enlarging the continuance of parliaments, and moved, that the ſame might be read. The duke was ſeconded by the earl of Rockingham, and ſupported by the duke of Argyle, the earl of Dorſet, the lord Townſhend, and ſome other lords. The duke of Bucks, the lord Trevor, the earls of Nottingham and Aylesford, and ſome peers of the other ſide did not directly oppoſe the bill, but made long ſpeeches for putting off the reading of it to another time. They owned, that every member has the privilege of offering what bill he thinks fit, without aſking leave; but that the houſe is likewiſe at liberty either to read it or not, as they think convenient; and that the matter now offered was of ſo high a nature, that it well deſerved to be maturely weighed and conſidered before the ſame was debated: and therefore they moved, that the bill might lie for ſome days on the table. To this it was anſwered, that nothing was farther from their thoughts, than to carry any thing by ſurprize: that, by the ordinary method of proceeding, every member has ſufficient time to weigh, and conſider what is offered in the houſe; and to ſhew how fairly they intended to act in this affair, the earl of Dorſet propoſed, that, after the bill had been once read, the ſecond reading of it ſhould be put off for ſome days, and that all the members in and about London ſhould be ſummoned to attend. The lords of the oppoſite ſide, finding themſelves the weaker, acquieſced in this motion; ſo the bill was read the firſt time, and ordered to be read a ſecond on the 14th of April.

On that day the bill was read, [a] and a warm debate aroſe which laſted five hours. [b] The earl of Abingdon ſaid, 'the bill was of a very extraordinary nature, ſince it repealed the triennial act, which the people juſtly looked upon as the great ſecurity of their rights and liberties; and that, if it paſſed this houſe, and the commons agreed to it, the ſame

[a] The ſubſtance of the bill was: it has been found by experience, that triennial parliaments are grievous, by occaſioning much greater and continued expence, and more violent and laſting heats, than were ever known before. And if the triennial act continue, it may probably, at the preſent juncture, when a reſtleſs and popiſh faction are deſigning to renew the rebellion at home, and an invaſion from abroad, be deſtructive to the peace and the ſecurity of the government. Be it therefore enacted, that this preſent and all future parliaments ſhall have continuance for ſeven years, to be accounted from the date of the writ of ſummons, unleſs this or any ſuch parliament ſhall be ſooner diſſolved by his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors.

[b] The ſpeakers were as follow:

would be a breach of that truſt, which was repoſed in them by thoſe whom they repreſented.' The latter part of this aſſertion was denied by the duke of Kingſton, who urged, 'that the buſineſs of the legiſlature was to rectify old laws, as well as to make new ones.' Earl Powlet declared, 'that he would be for it, if he thought it for the king's ſervice and intereſt; but that, before they went any farther in ſo important an affair, ſome method ſhould be taken to know the ſentiments of the nation.' He urged, 'that this bill ſhewed a diſtruſt of the affection of the people, without which no king can be either ſafe or eaſy. That king William gained the hearts of his ſubjects by the triennial act; and it would look ſomewhat ſtrange, that the moſt popular of our laws ſhould be repealed a year after the proteſtant ſucceſſion took place.' After this he endeavoured to anſwer what was ſuggeſted in ſupport of this bill, viz. 1. That frequent elections occaſion ruinous expences. 2. That they raiſe a great ferment, and foment animoſities, which are of the moſt dangerous conſequence after the late rebellion: and 3. That they obſtruct foreign alliances. He ſaid, 'that no ſtreſs ought to be laid on the firſt of thoſe objections, expences at elections being voluntary. That, as to the ſecond, he was ſorry there had been a rebellion; but that the ſame was now happily ſuppreſſed. And, as to the third ſuggeſtion, the ſame was of no weight with him, it being his opinion, that in a matter, which ſo nearly concerns our conſtitution, we ought to have regard to ourſelves only, and not to foreigners.' Upon all which conſiderations he was againſt the committing of this bill. The earl of Dorſet ſaid, among other things, 'that they, who now ſpoke againſt this bill, would be for it, if it ſerved their turn. That the triennial act was a new law, and an alteration of the old conſtitution. That, the experience of twenty years having ſhewn a thouſand inconveniences, attending that law, they ought to apply a remedy to it. That it ſowed the ſeeds of corruption, it being notorious, that great numbers of perſons had no other livelihood, than by being employed in bribing corporations. That we had lately a ſad experience of it; ſince by thoſe methods a parliament was procured by the laſt miniſtry, which gave ſanction to moſt of their ill meaſures, and went near to give up the trade and liberties of the nation. That triennial elections deſtroy all family intereſt, and ſubject our excellent conſtitution to the caprice of the multitude: and, in ſhort, that by triennial elections we have but a triennial government, which is little better than no government at all.' For which reaſons he was for the bill. The lord Trevor ſaid, that the queſtion now lying before them was, whether the law they were going to make, tended to the good or prejudice of the conſtitution? That, for his own part, he looked upon the triennial act as an eſſential part of our antient conſtitution, according to which frequent and even annual parliaments were to be held. That he might eaſily prove, that long parliaments were always pernicious. That, when king Charles I. had given up his prerogative of diſſolving parliaments in 1640, he gave himſelf up into the hands of traytors, and had nothing but deſtruction to expect from them. That after the reſtoration, king Charles II. that very good prince, found the inconvenience of a long parliament. That, as ſoon as the nation had opportunity, by the revolution, to aſſert their juſt rights and liberties, the triennial act was inſiſted on, and gained, at laſt, with a great deal of oppoſition. That there were very good and cogent reaſons for making a law, to ſupport the conſtitution, and prevent encroachments, either of parliaments on the crown, or of the crown on the rights and liberties of the people; and to correct abuſes and exorbitances committed through the ambition and avarice of miniſters. That he would not be thought to reflect on the preſent adminiſtration; but that, in his opinion, frequent elections were a neceſſary right of the ſubject to remedy abuſes. That, for his own part, he had ever been againſt the bill for limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons: but, if the triennial act were repealed, he thought that bill would become very neceſſary, becauſe the long ſitting of parliaments would give the crown both an opportunity and temptation to multiply the number of officers. That ſome reflections had been caſt on the laſt parliament: but that, in his opinion, that parliament was choſen by the ſame method, as the preſent was, by great expences. That he owned this to be a great abuſe; but that laws might be made to rectify the ſame. That if this bill paſſed, how could any member of the other houſe expect to preſerve his intereſt with thoſe, who choſe him, when this bill would certainly be interpreted both a violation of their right, and a breach of the truſt repoſed in him? That if this houſe of commons continued themſelves beyond the time, for which they were choſen, they were no more the repreſentatives of the people, but a houſe of their own making. That he was ſorry there were diſcontented in the country; but he apprehend this bill would rather increaſe than abate them. He owned, that the majority of this houſe of commons were honeſt gentlemen, who had the intereſt of their king and country at heart; but that, in his opinion, thoſe, who went before them, did not come ſhort of them in point of duty and affection to his majeſty; for it was they, who eſtabliſhed the king on his throne, and ſettled his revenue with all chearfulneſs imaginable. That what he had ſuggeſted ſlowed from the dread of the ill conſequences of this bill, which might riſe to ſuch an height, as to render the crown uneaſy to his majeſty. That he owed ſo much to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, that, if he could believe this bill to be of any ſervice to the king and royal family, he would be entirely for it; but, as he was of a contrary opinion, he would not have a bill, obtained in the beſt of reigns, repealed in the firſt year of this proteſtant reign. And therefore he was againſt the committing of this bill.' Lord Carteret, who ſpoke next, owned, 'that frequent parliaments are a great ſecurity of the people's rights and liberties; but he obſerved, that this bill was not againſt frequent ſeſſions, but only againſt frequent elections. That they ought maturely to weigh and conſider what was ſuggeſted in the preamble of the bill, that there is a reſtleſs popiſh faction deſigning and endeavouring to renew the rebellion within this kingdom. That of all rebellions this laſt was the moſt monſtrous and unnatural; for all other rebellions were carried on under pretences of liberty, whereas this laſt was a rebellion for ſlavery. That, as to our allies abroad, though he could not ſay, that they expected this bill, yet it was reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that they would be glad to ſee it paſs into a law; for having found, by ſad experience, that great changes may be made in the beſt concerted meaſures by different parliaments, inflamed by different miniſtries; ſo, if they had not ſome ſecurity for the treaties his majeſty was now entering into with them, a ſtrong tide might come upon a new election, that might overturn all. That in ſhort, this bill would fix the king, and the preſent happy ſettlement, on a laſting foundation; and therefore he was for committing it.' The earl of Cholmondley ſaid, 'that he made no doubt, but the legiſlature is veſted with a ſupreme power to rectify any inconveniences, to which any former law may, by experience, be found to be ſubject; and this being the caſe of the triennial act, they ought to remedy the ſame. That what had been ſuggeſted, in relation to the long parliament in king Charles the ſecond's reign, was, in his opinion, rather an argument for, than againſt the bill. For though, in that parliament, the king had many penſioners, who, at firſt, complimented him with money, yet at laſt, when the intereſt of the nation came to be at ſtake, they voted for a war with France, and proſecuted the popiſh plot with the utmoſt vigour. That they had lately ſeen what a corrupt parliament may do, and by what means ſuch a parliament may be got: and every one might gueſs how there came to be a debt of 500,000l. upon the civil liſt. That he did not mention this to irritate againſt perſons, but againſt things. That, in his opinion, there was no better remedy againſt corruptions, than the ſuppreſſing frequent elections. That he thought this bill the more neceſſary, becauſe our allies will thereby have a ſecurity, that they ſhall not again be left in the lurch. And, in conſideration of the great benefits that will acrue from it both at home and abroad, he was for the committing it.' Lord Foley made a long ſpeech, in which he enlarged upon the excellency of our conſtitution; took notice, that the different branches of the legiſlature are to chec one another, which prevents exorbitances in the adminiſtration, and dragooing as in Turkey and other arbitrary governments; ſuggeſted, that the penſionary parliament made king Charles II. uneaſy, by making him neglect the affections of his people; and concluded, that he was afraid, that the repealing the triennial act would have the ſame effect, and therefore he was againſt it.'

The duke of Newcaſtle anſwered, 'that it had already been rightly obſerved, that, though the long parliament of king Charles II. at firſt complimented that prince, yet they afterwards vigorouſly oppoſed deſtructive meaſures, and inſiſted on a war with France.' Then paſſing over leſs material objections, which had been fully refuted, he urged, 'that the preſent happy ſettlement could not be maintained without taking away the ſeeds of corruption. That no cauſe ever miſcarried in ſo many inſtances as that of the rebels. But, notwithſtanding their defeat at Preſton and Dumblain, their being driven out of Scotland, with their king at their head, their diſappointments in other parts, and the execution of ſome of their leaders, the jacobites were as inſolent as ever. That this was the reaſon, why in a late debate in this houſe he was againſt lenity; and the rather, becauſe no prince was ever more naturally inclined to mercy than his preſent majeſty; for no prince ever had ſo many rebels in his power, and never were ſo few puniſhed. My lords (added he) you muſt now ſtrengthen yourſelves, and diſarm your enemies. It is not to be doubted, but the late unnatural and monſtrous rebellion was raiſed and fomented by large contributions of a reſtleſs popiſh faction. The ſame means, my lords, will be uſed to renew the rebellion as ſoon as a proper opportunity offers. Their emiſſaries are buſy every where to keep up the ſpirits of the people for a year longer, and then they hope to retrieve all by a new election.' He concluded, 'that though the allies would not make any thing done among us an article of their treaties, yet, having the ſad experience of being left in the lurch, they would certainly enter into alliances with us with more confidence, if they ſaw that our government was not precarious.' Upon all which conſiderations he was for the bill.[c]

The duke of Shrewſbury ſpoke with ſome vehemence againſt the bill; after which the lord Parker enlarged on the conſtitution with relation to the calling, election, ſitting and prolonging parliaments. He was followed by the lord-chancellor Cowper, who reſumed all the arguments that had been urged in the debate; rectified ſome miſtakes, as to the conſtitution and nature of parliaments; gave a clear account of the triennal act: and vindicated the king and the government, as to the preſent diſaffection; appealing to the lords and commons, 'whether the leaſt provocation had been given either by his majeſty or his miniſters?' and aſſerting, 'that if there was any fault on the king's ſide, it was too much lenity; and that the only crime that could be charged on his miniſters, was their zeal and vigilance in defence of his majeſty's perſon and government.' The earl of Aylesford having anſwered part of the lord-chancellor's ſpeech, the biſhop of London ſaid, 'that when he came to the houſe, he knew not which way he ſhould give his vote, and hoped to be guided and determined by what ſhould be offered on both ſides on this important ſubject: but now he owned he was confounded between dangers and inconveniencies on one ſide, and deſtruction on the other.'

The earl of Angleſey ſpoke next with great vehemence againſt the bill; and the duke of Bucks cloſed the debate with ſaying, 'that he was for the bill, but did not think it ſeaſonable.' At laſt, the queſtion, 'that the bill be committed,' being put, it was carried in the affirmative by ninety-ſix voices againſt ſixty-one. But thirty lords entered their proteſts.[d]

Two days after, the lords conſidered of the bill in a grand committee, and moſt of the former ſpeakers exerted themſelves for and againſt it; and among others, a biſhop, who had not yet ſpoken on the ſubject, ſaid, 'if this bill was never ſo good in itſelf, it is very unſeaſonable, becauſe very unpopular, and altogether uſeleſs, the rebellion be-

[c] After ſeveral other ſpeeches, the earl of Nottingham, having made large profeſſions of duty and affection to the king, ſaid, 'that he was againſt this bill, becauſe he thought it would rather exaſperate than quiet the minds of the people. That this bill ſhewed a diſtruſt of the affections of the people, and an intention of governing by fear, which, in his opinion, was the worſt way of government: and God forbid his majeſty ſhould have no proſpect of gaining the affections of his ſubjects. That the king came in univerſally beloved, and was received with general acclamations of his people; and, though he could not aſſign the true cauſe of the preſent diſſatisfaction, yet ſome ſecret cauſe muſt have been given for it. That he hoped, the people's diſſatisfaction was not ſo great, as it was repreſented. That the rebellion was entirely ſuppreſſed, and at an end; but, if any ferment yet remained, this bill was a very improper way to allay it, and would rather rivet the diſaffected in their prejudices againſt the government, than make them change their opinion. That one of the arguments urged for this bill was, that it would encourage foreign princes and ſtates to enter into alliances with us; but that, in his opinion, the ſame might have a contrary effect. For foreign potentates may be deterred from entering into meaſures with us, when they ſhall be informed by the preamble to the bill, that the popiſh faction is ſo dangerous, as that it may be deſtructive to the peace and ſecurity of the government; and may apprehend, from this bill, that the government is ſo weak as to want ſo extraordinary a proviſion for its ſafety; which ſeems to imply, that the gentlemen of Great-Britain are not to be truſted in a new election, and that the good affections of the people are reſtrained to ſo ſmall a number as that, of which the preſent houſe of commons conſiſts. That frequent and new parliaments are required by the fundamental conſtitution of the kingdom; and that the practice thereof, for many ages, was ſufficient evidence of this conſtitution. That this bill was ſo far from preventing corruptions, that it would rather encreaſe them; for, the longer a parliament is to laſt, the more valuable to be purchaſed is a ſtation in it, and the greater alſo is the danger of corrupting the members of it. That, whatever reaſons there may be to continue this parliament for ſeven years, they will be at leaſt as ſtrong, and by the conduct of the miniſtry, may be made much ſtronger, before the end of ſeven years, continuing it ſtill longer, and even to perpetrate it, which would be an abſolute ſubverſion of the third eſtate of the realm.' But, what was moſt taken notice of in his lordſhip's ſpeech, was, that in order to ſhew the danger of enlarging the prerogative, he inſtanced in the precedent of king Henry VIII. who perſuaded his parliament to give him the abbey-lands, under pretence, that they would bear part of his expences, which would eaſe them of taxes, and improve trade; but that, ſoon after, he demanded and obtained great ſubſidies, and made uſe of thoſe lands to enſlave the nation.

The duke of Argyle anſwered among other particulars: 'that he could by no means agree with the noble lord that ſpoke laſt, either as to the beginning or end of the rebellion. That it had been ſuggeſted, that the king had been received with the general acclamations of his people; but that it was certain, and had ſince manifeſtly appeared, that whatever arts were uſed by the late miniſtry to blind and deceive the people, deſigns had been laid to bring in the pretender long before the king's happy acceſſion to the throne. That the diſappointment of theſe deſigns was entirely owing to providence; for had the conſpirators thrown off the maſk ſooner, and improved the ferment their emiſſaries had raiſed in the nation, at the election of the laſt parliament, it is very probable their wicked ſchemes for ſetting aſide the proteſtant ſucceſſion had taken place. That he wondered, therefore, that his lordſhip could be puzzled to find out the cauſe of the preſent diſaffection, for it was plain, it proceeded from the falſe repreſentations of things and perſons, that were induſtriouſly ſpread abroad both before and ſince his majeſty's coming in.' As to what had been ſuggeſted, that the rebellion was at an end, his grace obſerved, 'that the rebels had only ſhifted their head-quarters from Perth to Paris, or St. Germain's; but that their emiſſaries were ſtill as buſy and inſolent as ever in Great-Britain, and wanted only an opportunity to renew the rebellion, and favour an invaſion.'

As to what had been hinted, that this bill would rivet the jacobites in their opinion, he ſaid, 'that was no good argument againſt it, for he had ſeen ſome perſons ſhift ſides often, and change their opinions, and be very zealous for both.'

The earl of Nottingham taking this reflection to himſelf, readily owned, 'that he was for ſome time againſt the abjuration oath, becauſe he thought a multiplicity of oaths would make the nation unſafe; but that, as ſoon as he was convinced of the neceſſity of that oath, he readily came into it.' The duke of Argyle thereupon ſtood up, and ſaid, 'he was ſorry that noble lord took to himſelf what he ſaid only in general.

[d] They were as follow:

Diſſentient.

I. Becauſe we conceive, that frequent and new parliaments are required by the fundamental conſtitution of the kingdom, and the practice thereof, for many ages (which manifeſtly appears by our records) is a ſufficient evidence and proof of this conſtitution.

II. Becauſe it is agreed, that the houſe of commons muſt be choſen by the people; and when ſo choſen, they are truly the repreſentatives of the people, which they cannot be ſo properly ſaid to be when continued for a longer time than that for which they were choſen; for, after that time, they are choſen by the parliament, and not by the people, who are thereby deprived of the only remedy, which they have againſt thoſe, who either do not underſtand, or, through corruption, do wilfully betray the truſt repoſed in them; which remedy is to chuſe better men in their places.

III. Becauſe the reaſons given for this bill, we conceive, were not ſufficient to induce us to paſs it, in ſubverſion of ſo eſſential a part of our conſtitution.

1. For, as to the argument, that this will encourage the princes and ſtates of Europe to enter into alliances with us, we have not heard any one miniſter aſſert, that any one prince or ſtate has aſked, or ſo much as inſinuated, that they wiſhed ſuch an alteration.

Nor is it reaſonable to imagine it; for it cannot be expected, that any prince or ſtate can rely upon a people to defend their liberties and intereſts, who ſhall be thought to have given up ſo great a part of their own; nor can it be prudent for them to wiſh ſuch an experiment, after the experience that Europe has had of the great things this nation has done for them under he conſtitution, which is to be altered by this bill.

But, on the other hand, they may be deterred from entering into meaſures with us, when they ſhall be informed by the preamble of this bill, that the popiſh faction is ſo dangerous, as that it may be deſtructive to the peace and ſecurity of the government; and may apprehend, from this bill, that the government is ſo weak, as to want ſo extraordinary a proviſion for its ſafety; which ſeems to imply, that the gentlemen of Britain are not to be truſted or relied upon; and that the good affections of the people are reſtrained to ſo ſmall a number, as that, of which the preſent houſe of commons conſiſts.

2. We conceive, this bill is ſo far from preventing expences and corruptions, that it will rather encreaſe them, for, the longer a parliament is to laſt, the more valuable to be purchaſed is a ſtation in it, and the greater alſo is the danger of corrupting the members of it. For if there ſhould be a miniſtry, who ſhall want a parliament to ſcreen them from the juſt reſentment of the people, or from a diſcovery of the ill practices to the king, who cannot otherwiſe, or ſo truly, be informed of them, as by a free parliament, it is ſo much the intereſt of ſuch a miniſtry to influence the elections (which by their authority, and the diſpoſal of the public money, they of all others, have the beſt means of doing) that, it is to be feared, they will be tempted, and not fail to make uſe of them; and even when the members are choſen, they have a greater opportunity of inducing very many to comply with them, than they could have, if not only the ſeſſions of parliament, but the parliament itſelf were reduced to the antient and primitive conſtitution and practice of frequent and new parliaments; for, as a good miniſtry will neither practiſe, nor need corruption, ſo it cannot be any lord's intent to provide for the ſecurity of a bad one.

3. We conceive, that whatever reaſons may induce the lords to paſs this bill, to continue this parliament for ſeven years, will be, at leaſt, as ſtrong, and may by the conduct of the miniſtry, be made much ſtronger before the end of ſeven years, for continuing it ſtill longer, and even to perpetrate it; which would be an expreſs and abſolute ſubverſion of the third eſtate of the realm.

ing cruſhed, and the power of France not to be feared; now eſpecially, when we have a glorious ſtanding army, and a miniſtry, that knows how effectually to engage the affections of the people.' The committee having gone through the bill, and ordered the blank before the word years to be filled up with the word ſeven, the queſtion was put, whether the ſame ſhould be reported, in order to be engroſſed, which was carried by ſeventy-four voices againſt thirty-nine. The next day the bill was reported, and without dividing, ordered to be engroſſed, and being read the third time, on the 18th of April, there aroſe a debate, which laſted about two hours. Near half of that time was taken up by the earl of Nottingham, who, among other things, by a long hiſtorical detail, endeavoured to ſhew, 'that councils for enlarging the prerogative were ever pernicious to the crown.' To this the duke of Argyle anſwered, 'that, not being ſo well read in hiſtory as that noble lord, he would confine himſelf to what had happened in his own time; and, that he had obſerved, that his lordſhip had by turns, oppoſed all that had been offered, either for the intereſt of the crown, or the liberties of the people; of which he might eaſily produce ſeveral inſtances:' adding, 'that he did not much wonder there appeared already ſo much joy among a certain party over a repenting ſinner.' Upon the whole matter, the queſtion being put, whether this bill ſhall paſs? it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſixty-nine voices againſt thirty-ſix; but twenty-four lords proteſted againſt it.

The bill being ſent down to the commons, the lord Guernſey moved for the rejecting of it without being read; but his motion was declared to be unprecedented, and the bill read. Upon the queſtion for a ſecond reading, there aroſe a debate, of which the moſt remarkable paſſage was, that an eminent member, who had been in the moſt difficult times very zealous for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, ſpoke againſt the bill, and, among other things ſuggeſted. 'that it was an impoſition of the lords to take upon them to direct the commons in a matter which ſolely concerns them, as guardians of the rights and liberties of the people.' He was ſeconded by mr. Shippen; but the lord Coningſby made them ſenſible. 'that their objection was altogether groundleſs, and the reſult of their want, either of experience or memory; for, had they, like himſelf, been members of that houſe, when the triennial act was made, they might have remembered that the ſame was begun in the houſe of lords, who, as part of the legiſlature, are no leſs guardians of the liberties of the ſubject, than the commons themſelves.' Mr Fuller and the lord Guernſey ſpoke afterwards againſt the bill, but were anſwered by the lord Stanhope, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Cheſterfield; and a ſecond reading was at laſt carried by a majority of two hundred and ſeventy-ſix againſt a hundred and fifty-ſix.

In the mean time, ſeveral petitions were prepared in the country, and preſented to the houſe againſt the bill, particularly from Haſtings, Marlborough, Cambridge, and Abingdon. Then the bill being read the ſecond time, there aroſe a warm debate, which laſted from about two in the afternoon till near eleven at night.

Mr Lyddal ſpoke a long ſpeech for the bill, and, among other things, ſaid. 'If this opportunity be loſt, you may poſſibly never have another, or at leaſt ſo good a one, not only to conquer, but even to eradicate that ſpirit of jacobitiſm, which has dwelt long among us, and has more than once brought this nation to the very brink of ruin and deſtruction. Since, therefore, with much danger and difficulty we have at laſt ſecured our religion, laws, and liberties, when all was at ſtake from the treachery of the late miniſtry, and the unaccountable proceedings of the laſt triennial parliament, why ſhould you run the riſk of having a new one ſo ſoon, firſt choſen by French money, and then voting by French directions, ſince the king and his parliament exert their united power for the good of the public, and to retrieve the honour of the nation? why ſhould they not continue longer together, that they may finiſh what they have ſo unanimouſly and happily begun? Upon the whole, the electors and people of all the boroughs in England having, for ſeveral years paſſed, been bribed and preached into the pretender's intereſt, and a diſlike of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, it becomes rather neceſſity than choice to apply an extraordinary remedy to an extaordinary diſeaſe.'

After this and ſeveral other ſpeeches, it was carried for committing the bill; [e] and, the next day, a petition from the borough of Horſham was preſented to the houſe, ſetting forth, 'that they looked upon the bill as an overturning the conſtitution, and an infringement of their liberties;' at which expreſſions the houſe being offended, it was reſolved, that the petition ſhould be rejected. Then mr. Lechmere moved, 'that the committee have leave to receive a clauſe, to diſable perſons from being choſen members of either houſe of parliament, who have penſions during pleaſure, or any number of years.' But mr. ſecretary Stanhope having repreſented, that ſuch a clauſe would but clog the bill, and endanger its miſcarriage, part of it being derogatory to the privileges of the houſe of lords; and that, if any jealouſy were entertained of the members of the houſe of commons having penſions from the crown, a bill might be brought in, to exclude them; the motion for the clauſe was rejected, and a ſeparate bill againſt penſioners ſitting in the houſe was ordered to be brought in, which, having paſſed both houſes, received the royal aſſent. When the ſeptennial bill had gone through the committee of the whole houſe, it was read the third time, and the queſtion for paſſing it being put, a debate of two hours enſued. Thoſe, who ſpoke againſt the bill, were mr. Freeman, mr. Hungerford, mr. Fuller, mr. Wykes, the lord Finch, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Nottingham, and ſome others. They were ſeverally anſwered by ſir Richard Steel, mr. comptroller, ſir William Thompſon, captain Erle, mr. Tufnel, mr. Morris, and ſir John Brownlow [f]. After which, the [e] Mr Haddon, a Scotch member, having ſpoken for the bill, mr. Snell, one of the repreſentatives for the city of Gloceſter, ſaid, 'it was no wonder, that they, who had betrayed the liberties of their own country, ſhould be ſo ready to give up their's.' Mr Smith animadverted upon this injurious reflection, and ſaid, 'that the member, who made that ſpeech, would not be ſo bold as to utter thoſe words any where elſe.' He was ſeconded by lord Coningſby; and, the diſpute being like to grow warm, the ſpeaker interpoſed, and ſaid, that, all the members of the houſe having the privilege of explaining themſelves, mr. Snell ought to enjoy the ſame. Hereupon mr. Snell ſaid, 'that he meant no perſonal reflection on mr. Haddon, and that he only ſpoke of the Scots nation in general:' by which pretended excuſe ſir David Dalrymple being provoked, ſaid, 'that this explanation, inſtead of extenuating, did but aggravate the offence;' for which he demanded ſatisfaction. Some other members calling to the bar, mr. Snell prevented any further proceeding, by begging pardon for any unguarded expreſſion he might have let fall.'

[f] Mr Hampden ſpoke for the bill, part of whoſe ſpeech was as follows:

'A principal argument for continuing the triennial bill is, that it is agreeable to the antient laws of this nation, that there ſhould be frequent parliaments. I find, by the laws I have looked over, that parliaments ought to be frequently held: but I found it no where laid down as a fundamental poſition of the nature of this conſtitution, that there ſhould be frequent elections. If gentlemen will look to the beginning of parliaments, they will find, in the 4th, 5th, and 36th of Edward III. that, for redreſs of divers miſchiefs and grievances which daily happen, a parliament ſhall be holden every year, or oftener, if need be. Let it then be conſidered, in what manner thoſe parliaments were held: when a king met his parliament, they uſed to ſit ten or twenty days, and then were prorogued or diſſolved; and there were frequent intermiſſions of parliaments, none being called for ſeveral years. By looking over the journals, we find the prorogations and diſſolutions of parliaments.

To come down to the time of Henry VIII. few of his parliaments ſat more than twenty days, though there was not a parliament met every year; and, from the 7th to the 25th of Henry VIII. there are no journals, and conſequently we cannot tell in what manner parliaments were held. Afterwards, there were ſeveral parliaments, but not every year, to the end of his reign.

A parliament was called the firſt year of Edward VI. and, in five years, ſat but four months. In Philip and Mary there were four parliaments, but the ſeſſions extreamly ſhort. From the 2d to the 5th, and from the 7th to the 13th of queen Elizabeth, no parliament met; and, from the 14th to the 25th of queen Elizabeth, the parliament ſat only from the 8th of May to the 30th of June; and, four years after, from the 8th of February to the 8th of March following; and, in eight years after, never ſat to do buſineſs, but were then diſſolved. There were ſix other parliaments called in queen Elizabeth's time; but never ſat long, unleſs that in the 39th of her reign, which ſat four months.

The parliament, the firſt of James I. ſat about four months, and, in three years after, ſat about eight days. That parliament was not diſſolved till the 9th of James, but ſat twice or thrice only. There were three other parliaments in his reign, but they met very ſeldom.

The ſeſſions in king Charles I. were much ſhorter than of late days, and very frequent prorogations; and, in the 16th of his reign, an act was paſſed, for preventing inconveniencies by long intermiſſion of parliaments; by which it was provided, that a parliament ſhould meet every three years; which law we find repealed in the 16th of Charles II. by reaſon that the proviſions in the former law were looked upon as a derogation to his majeſty's juſt and undoubted prerogative for calling and aſſembling parliaments, and might be an occaſion of manifold miſchiefs, and might endanger the peace of his people. This ſaid act is repealed, and a proviſion made therein, that becauſe, by the antient laws of this realm, in the reign of Edward III. parliaments are to be held very often, the ſitting and holding of parliaments ſhall not be intermitted above three years. In this king's reign, the long parliament was held; and, whatever corruptions they were tainted with, they could never be accuſed of favouring the cauſe of France, or attempting to enſlave their own country.

In king James II. that unfortunate prince, a parliament was held in May 1685, and ſat about two months, and was, at ſeveral times, prorogued to November 1687. Then the happy revolution took place; and, in the bill of Rights, 1 Guliel. & Mar. it is declared and enacted that 'all the rights and liberties, aſſerted and claimed in the ſaid declaration, are the true, antient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this kingdom, and ought to be firmly and ſtrictly holden and obſerved.' And, in the ſame bill, among this long catalogue of grievances, which precedes the ſaid declaration, there is not the leaſt mention made of want of frequent elections, but only, that parliaments ought to be free. In the ſixth of king William, this now-favoured bill for triennial parliaments was paſſed: and, upon this bill paſſed by a majority of two hundred and ſixty-four, againſt one hundred and twenty-one; and, being ſent bac to the lords, received, ſoon after, the royal aſſent.

On the 26th of April, died that great man, and great patriot, the lord Sommers, whoſe character is drawn with great force and elegance by mr. Addiſon in his Freeholder.

The eſcape of the earl of Nithiſdale, and of mr. Forſter, had given ſufficient warning to the government, and ought to have doubled the vigilance of the jaylors; yet brigadier Mackintoſh, John Mackintoſh, his ſon, Charles Wogan, James Tolbot, Robert Hepburne, William Dalmahoy, Alexander Dalmahoy, and John Taſker, ſervant to mr. Butler, having knoced down the keeper and turnkey, and diſarmed the centinel, broke out of Newgate between eleven and twelve at night. Six more of the rebels went out of the priſon with them; but being unacquainted with the ſtreets, and turning into Warwick-Court, where they found no paſſage, they were forced to return into Warwick-Lane, and ſo fell into the hands of their purſuers. Mackintoſh and, ſome others were to have been tried the day after. The judges met in Weſtminſter-Hall for that purpoſe, but, receiving a meſſage, that the keepers of Newgate were employed in ſearching after the rebels, who had made their eſcape the court and juries adjourned. James Talbot, one of the fugitives, was re-taken at an houſe in Windmill-Street, in Piccadilly, and ſent bac to Newgate.

When the court ſat the next time, thirteen of the rebels[g] were arraigned, and pleaded not guilty; but upon application for time, ſome of them ſetting forth, that they had evidence upon the road, they had three weeks allowed to prepare for their trial.

Mr Richard Gaſcoigne was ſet to the bar, but by the indulgence of the court had ten days allowed him for bringing witneſs to town. His trial came on the 17th of May; and beſides the evidence of mr. Patten, mr. Forſter's chaplain, who depoſed that he ſaw mr. Gaſcoigne in mr. Forſter's company at Preſton, mr. Wye made oath, 'that, coming once to the dutcheſs of Ormond's, he ſaw the priſoner Gaſcoigne in her grace's cloſet. That being introduced, he told her grace he was juſt come from France, and had ſeen the duke but ſix days before, who was well, and would be here quicly from Bayonne, and the pretender from ſome other place. Upon which her grace called for a map, to find whereabouts St. Sebaſtian lay. That he was aſked by her grace what people ſaid at Paris, eſpecially in relation to ſir William Wyndham; and aſked mr. Gaſcoigne, whether it was true, which was ſaid in the public news, that he had letters found in his pocet of dangerous conſequence? Mr Gaſcoigne ſaid, 'he could not tell; but if it were ſo, a ſchool-boy would deſerve to be whipped for carrying ſuch papers in his pocet.' It being at that time generally diſcourſed about town, that ſir William Wyndham had ſurrendered himſelf, Gaſcoigne ſaid, 'he had ſent or carried him one of the proclamations' (but the evidence could not be poſitive which) and added, 'if he was taken, their deſign was ruined, for there were an hundred gentlemen, who waited only for a ſignal, and ſir William would be at the head of eight or nine thouſand men.' That the lady Rocheſter having aſked him (mr. Gaſcoigne) where ſir William was? the priſoner replied, 'whether, if he ſhould tell her ladyſhip, ſhe would not make uſe of it to perſuade him to ſurrender? But, if it were only to give ſir William notice of the proclamation, he told her, that he had already ſent him one.' Mr Wye further declared, 'that, when he was in the dutcheſs's cloſet, he ſaw a gentleman dreſſed in laced ſcarlet cloathes, whom he underſtood to be one of the Cotton's; and, having ſince ſeen mr. Cotton, knew it to be the ſame perſon.' There were ſome other circumſtances, which mr. Wye ſaid mr. Gaſcoigne told him, particularly, that the priſoner ſaid, 'he came to London to learn whether ſir William Wyndham made any diſcovery.' The jury, after a conſiderable ſtay, brought in mr. Gaſcoigne guilty of high-treaſon.

Henry Oxburgh was tried May the 7th, and made a very weak defence. His council, ſergeant Darnel and mr. Kettleby endeavoured to ſerve him by inſiſting on a miſnomer in the indictment, wherein he was called Oxborough, whereas his true name was Oxburgh: but that being overruled, the jury brought him in guilty of high-treaſon.

On the 26th of May, mr. John Hall of Otterburne in Northumberland was brought to the bar. This gentleman had been a juſtice of the peace in his county, and taken the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. He was found guilty by the jury, and gloried in his guilt at his execution. Oxburgh was the firſt of thoſe who ſuffered at Tyburn. Gaſcoigne had been a common ſharper, and having been bubbled by gameſters out of the money he had raiſed by the ſale of a ſmall eſtate in Ireland, ſupported himſelf afterwards by defrauding others. He was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn on the 25th of May, and died a papiſt.

John Hume, brother of the earl of Hume, was tried, and found guilty, May the 8th; John Farquharſon not guilty; and Alexander Menzies guilty. On the 12th Thomas Farquharſon and John Ennis were brought to their trials. There was a great uproar in the court upon the jury's bringing in Farquharſon not guilty, though the evidence was poſitive, 'that he was in arms with the rebels at Kelſo, and occaſion, I cannot help obſerving, that it is ſome ſatisfaction, that the people abroad, who look upon the reign of that prince, as an uſurpation, ſhould be found of any one act that was paſſed in that time: and I hope from hence, they may in time, be more reconciled to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, which is in conſequence of that happy revolution.

If gentlemen will look over the writs of ſummons, and the return of thoſe writs, they will find no mention how long any parliament is to laſt; but the return makes mention of the perſons who are to ſerve in the parliament that is to meet and be held at ſuch a time at Weſtminſter. But it muſt be allowed, that the parliament is ſubject to the triennial act while it ſubſiſts; and therefore the advantages or inconveniencies of that law ought chiefly to be conſidered, in the matter now before us: and, in caſe an act be found prejudicial, if ſuch a veneration is to be paid to a law, as not to alter it from any conviction of its being inſufficient, or attended with ill conſequences, I think the legiſlator will become, in a manner, uſeleſs. I take the principal matter to be, to examine what benefit has accrued to the nation by virtue of this bill, and if the inconveniencies do not outweigh the advantages?

It is pretended, that by triennial elections, the people have an opportunity of laying aſide thoſe perſons with whoſe behaviour, in parliament, they are diſſatisfied, or ſuch, whom they apprehend to be under court influences: I deſire it may be conſidered, how very few examples there are, of perſons who, having accepted places, have not been re-elected. The reaſon is very obvious; becauſe the people who love expences, judge that a man, who has a place of profit, is much more capable of making an expence, than he that has none. But, ſuppoſing any gentleman ſo wicedly diſpoſed, as to ſacrifice his opinion to the lucre of a place; does not ſuch a perſon who has ſpent five or ſix hundred pounds at his election, and his circumſtances not very able to bear it, come more prepared for a court-temptation, than if he had enjoyed his ſeat in parliament, and been free from the trouble and expence of frequent elections? I appeal to gentlemen, if expences are not increaſed? and, if any inſtance can be produced, where they are abated, many more may be, where they are increaſed; ſo that the end of the bill, in this reſpect, is no way anſwered.

It is ſaid, that, expences being voluntary, it is the fault only of thoſe, who make them; but, when we obſerve the contagion of expences to be univerſally ſpread in the kingdom at the time of elections, and a diſſolution of manners occaſioned by ſuch expences, it is time for the legiſlator to interpoſe, and prevent the dangerous conſequences of ſuch an evil. Do, gentlemen, conſider the diſtractions occaſioned by elections, and the impoſſibility, conſidering the ſmall interval of elections, to heal up the wounds, which the animoſities of parties have occaſioned; ſo that ti is little better than living in a continual ſtate of warfare. This is no leſs a fatal, than, undeniable conſequence of this bill, which was calculated for the eaſe of the ſubject.

It is ſaid, the reaſon of this expedient, as it is called, is, becauſe the majority of this parliament are whigs: and, though it is allowed, that this parliament has acted for the ſervice of his majeſty and the nation, the proceedings of the laſt parliament are ſaid to be as meritorious of the king's good opinion, and the nation's, as what this parliament has done.

It is much inſiſted on, that the tories gave the civil liſt: that is true; but, had they not given it, I believe, the king would not long have been deprived of it. It is ſaid, the king was received here with the univerſal joy of his people: why did that ſatisfaction ceaſe ſo ſoon? has the king done any thing to loſe the affection of ſo many of his people? or, have his miniſters? if his miniſters, why hath the ſpirit of patriotiſm been ſo much wanting in gentlemen, as not to repreſent to the king, or in this houſe, the crimes of thoſe he employs in his ſervice? but, if no real handle for theſe diſcontents has been given, by king, or miniſters, then thoſe who pretended ſuch a zeal for the king and his ſervice, at his arrival here, acted a hypocritical part, and meant nothing leſs than what they now make profeſſions off. Let us conſider the preſent ſituation of the minds of the people, how exaſperated one ſet of them are at the neceſſary proſecutions of thoſe who ſo fatally concerted the ruin of their country; and to what degree that reſtleſs ſpirit influenced the people in the late rebellion; and how induſtriouſly a falſe and miſtaken cauſe of the church has been of late propagated in this nation.

From theſe and many other circumſtances of affairs, and ſymptoms of the ill temper of the nation, I think the diſpoſition of the people's minds far from being ſuitable to the buſineſs of an election, but rather for a reſtoration of that perſon, who, the deluded people have been taught, has alone a right to the crown, and came to free you from the oppreſſions you now lie under.

He concludes with ſaying, 'the reaſons why I am now for the bill are, to diſpoſe the people to follow their callings, and to be induſtrious, by taking from them, for a time, the opportunity of diſtracting one another by elections. To prevent ſuch who have the will, from the power of giving any new diſturbance to the government. To prevent another rebellion; there being juſt as much reaſon to expect one this year as there was the laſt. To chec that evil ſpirit in thoſe who have ſworn to the king, and roſe in arms againſt him, or abetted ſuch who have. To diſcountenance that ſpirit, which lately did ſo far prevail in this nation, as to approve of a moſt ignominious concluſion of a ſucceſsful war, by a ruinous peace. To render fruitleſs any concerted project of the regent, or any other foreign prince, to diſturb this nation, at a time, when elections, or the approach of them, have raiſed a ferment in the minds of the people; and to procure to the clergy an interval from being politicians, that they may be better able to take care of their flocs, in the manner the ſcripture has preſcribed.

at Lancaſter, where the pretender was proclaimed, and alſo at Preſton.' Two perſons who clapped and ſhouted were apprehended. One of them, who was ſummoned as a juryman, was fined 100l. the other 50l. and a year's impriſonment. The ſame jury, contrary to as full evidence as that againſt Farquharſon, acquitted Ennis likewiſe. The ſame day five rebel priſoners pleaded guilty; the two mr. Douglas's, captain Macquean, mr. Scrimſhaw, and mr. Skean, who received ſentence of death. Three days after came on the trials of Richard Townley and Edward Tildeſly. It was ſworn againſt mr. Townley, that he was not only among the rebels at Preſton, 'but that there was a troop called mr. Townley's troop, in which rode his coachman, his Butler, and poſtilion. It was ſworn againſt mr. Tildeſley, 'that a troop of the rebels went by his name alſo; and that he rode at the head of them with his ſword drawn.' Theſe two gentlemen had nothing to ſay for themſelves, but that they were forced to do what they did; and upon this ſlight defence, the jury acquitted them both.

Two days after mr. baron Montague came to the Marſhalſea-Court, and diſcharged the Surrey jury, after having reprimanded them for their behaviour in the late trials, eſpecially in the caſe of mr. Townley and mr. Tildeſley. The ſame day mr. Wogan was tried, and found guilty; and major Blair, retracting his former plea, pleaded guilty. Captain Lancelot Mackintoſh and Charles Radcliffe, brother to the late earl of Derwentwater, were likewiſe found guilty, and received ſentence of death.

Alexander Menzies petitioned the king for mercy, and was reprieved, as were the reſt of the perſons hitherto condemned on the like ſubmiſſion, or the interceſſion of their friends, excepting thoſe who are already mentioned to have been executed.

On the 30th of May came on the trial of mr. John Dalton. The evidence againſt him being poſitive, the jury found him guilty; upon which he deſired the court to intercede with the king for mercy.

Mr William Tunſtal pleaded guilty as to the being taken in arms, but not, as in the indictment, of any deſign of murdering the king, which, (he ſaid) never entered into his heart. But the court told him, 'that he, being a man of ſenſe, could not but know, had the rebellion ſucceeded, it could not have ended otherwiſe, ſince it was certain that his majeſty would not have run away, as the maſter they had declared for had already done.' The lord chief juſtice Parker adviſed him to draw up the ſtate of what he had to ſay in a petition, and he would recommend it to the king.

The next day Philip Hodgeſon, uncle to the lord Widdrington, Charles Peregrine Widdington, Donald Robertſon, Alexander Macrudder, Thomas Errington, John Nairne, ſon to the lord Nairne; George Seaton, who, before the battle of Dumblain, went by the name of the earl of Dumferling; John Stewart, dr. Patrick Blair, James Robertſon, William Grierſon, ſon of ſir Robert Grierſon, of Lagg; and John Carnegy, pleaded guilty to their indictments. But Francis Anderton, Baſil Hamilton, Archibald Rutter, William Shaſtoe, and William Paul, clerk, pleaded not guilty; which plea ſome of them afterwards retracted, and pleaded guilty, while others were tried and found guilty. The condemned rebels were reprieved from time to time; but, on the 13th of July, John Hall, and William Paul the clergyman, were executed at Tyburn.

Hall in his dying ſpeech declared, 'that he died a true and ſincere member of the church of England, but not of the revolution ſchiſmatical church, whoſe biſhops had ſo rebelliouſly abandoned the king, and ſo ſhamefully given up the rights of the church, by ſubmitting to the unlawful invalid lay-deprivations of the prince of Orange; but of the true catholic non-juring church of England.' Mr Paul likewiſe profeſſed himſelf a ſon of the church of England, but not of the ſchiſmatical church, whoſe biſhops ſet themſelves up in oppoſition to thoſe orthodox fathers, who were unlawfully and invalidly deprived by the prince of Orange. 'I declare, (ſays he) 'that I renounce that communion, and that I die a dutiful and faithful member of the non-juring church, which has kept itſelf free from rebellion and ſchiſm, and has preſerved and maintained true orthodox principles, both as to church and ſtate.' Yet this ſame man, in a petition to the lord chief juſtice King, after ſentence, had declared, 'that, through the grace of God, he had a deep inſight into, and a lively ſenſe of his crimes; which he did now at laſt deteſt and abhor from the bottom of his ſoul, and begged pardon of God, and king George, and his native country, againſt all which he had highly offended, and did now ſincerely repent, and declare his unfeigned ſorrow, in having been inſtrumental towards encouraging and promoting the ſame.'

And, in a petition to the king, 'he humbly begged leave, in all ſorrow of heart, to acknowledge his great and heinous offence, and did, from the bottom of his heart, aſk pardon of God, his moſt ſacred majeſty, and the church and nation.'

General Cadogan, whom the duke of Argyle had left in Scotland, had now extinguiſhed all remains of the rebellion, both by ſecuring the chiefs, and diſarming their dependants. About the middle of April, the marquiſs of Huntley, eldeſt ſon of the duke of Gordon, the lord Rollo, ſir Thomas Calder, and the laird of Tennaelue, were brought from the north of Scotland to Edinburgh, and committed to the caſtle. Glengary, a famous leader of the rebels, ſurrendered himſelf to the duke of Athol, which inclined many of the Highlanders to ſubmit, as did the greateſt part of the earl of Seaforth's vaſſals; and all the clans, except thoſe of the weſtern iſles, being reduced, two detachments, one of ſix hundred, the other of three hundred men, were ſent to thoſe iſles, under the command of col. Clayton, and lieutenant colonel Cholmondley, upon which all the rebels in the iſle of Skie ſubmitted to mercy. The rebels in the other iſlands followed their example, gen. Cadogan returned to Edinburgh, and from thence to London, where he arrived the 18th of May, having left the command of the forces in Scotland with general Sabine, and ordered the Dutch troops to march bac into England, where they embarked for Holland, after having received, both officers and ſoldiers, marks of the king's bounty for their good ſervices.

A court-martial ſitting at Edinburgh, made an order for the following Scots officers, who had deſerted from the Dutch ſervice to the pretender, to be hanged in effigy at the market-croſs, in the Cannon-gate, Edinburgh, and their names to be inſcribed round the gallows.[h]

Congratulatory addreſſes were preſented to the king from the city of London, and moſt of the communities in the kingdom, upon the entire ſuppreſſion of the rebellion; and the 7th of June was appointed to be kept as a day of thankſgiving.

On the 3d of May, mr. Harvey of Combe, who had been in the meſſenger's hands ſince he ſtabbed himſelf, was examined before a committee of the council, and ſent to Newgate. About a week after, mr. Thomas Harley, who had been formerly committed to the Gatehouſe by order of the houſe of commons, for his prevaricating anſwers to queſtions, that were put to him concerning his negotiations abroad, and was ſuppoſed to have been ſtill a priſoner, was found in a houſe in St. Martins-lane, by meſſengers, who were ſearching for ſome of the rebels, that had lately eſcaped out of Newgate. Mr Harley had a great parcel of papers before him, which were ſeized, and himſelf committed to the Gatehouſe.

The king, ſtrengthened by this late treaty with Spain, and by that which he was now certain of concluding with the duke of Orleans, and ſecure of having ſo faithful a parliament for five years more, thought he ſhould run no riſk in viſiting his German dominions this ſummer, where affairs of ſecrecy and importance required his preſence.

But it being provided, by the act for the further limitation of the crown, &c. 'that no perſon, who ſhould thereafter come to the poſſeſſion of the crown, ſhould go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without conſent of parliament;' the court was ſome time in ſuſpence, which way to get over that reſtriction. The aſking the parliament's conſent by a meſſage, or otherwiſe, being thought too derogatory to the royal prerogative, and ſome leading members of the houſe of commons being made ſenſible of it, ſir John Cope moved for repealing this reſtriction; which being agreed to, a bill paſſed both houſes for that purpoſe.[i]

[h] Theſe were:
Captain John Hepburne, enſign Patrick Smith, enſign Williams, Calderwood of Douglas's regiment, lieutenant Fleming, enſign Chalmers, and enſign Carſe of Lauder's; enſign William Creighton of Murray's, lieutenant Murray, enſign Dallas, enſign Boſwal, and enſign Robertſon of Collier's, and enſign Owen of Wood's regiment.

[i] Before the king went abroad, he made the following creations and promotions: Thomas, lord Coningſby, of the kingdom of Ireland, baron Coningſby, of Coningſby, in the county of Lincoln; ſir Richard Onſlow, baron Onſlow, of Onſlow, in the county of Salop; Thomas Newport, baron of Torrington, in the county of Devon; William Cadogan, baron of Reading, in the county of Berks; and ſir Robert Marſham, baron of Romney, in the county of Kent: viſcount Caſtleton in Ireland, viſcount Caſtleton, in England; ſir Henry St. John, viſcount St. John; George, lord Newburg, of

When the king came to the houſe of peers to paſs this and many other bills, and to put an end to the ſeſſion, the following ſpeech was by his order delivered to both houſes by the lord chancellor.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I cannot put an end to this ſeſſion without expreſſing to you my ſatisfaction in the proceedings of this parliament. The wholeſome and neceſſary laws, which have been paſſed with ſo much ſteadineſs, reſolution and unanimity, will, I truſt in God, anſwer thoſe good ends, which, it is evident, you have had in view, by defeating the deſigns, and reducing the ſpirit of our enemies, by encouraging our friends, and raiſing the credit and reputation of the nation abroad to ſuch a degree, as that I may reaſonable expect the fruits of a ſettled government; eſpecially being ſupported by a parliament, zealous for the proſperity of their country, and the proteſtant intereſt of Europe.

"I am confident, my conduct hitherto, in ſuppreſſing the rebellion, and puniſhing thoſe concerned in it, has been ſuch, as demonſtrates, that I deſire rather to leſſen their numbers by reclaiming them, than by making examples; but I am ſorry to find, that the numerous inſtances of mercy, which I have ſhewn, have no other effect, than to encourage the faction of the pretender to renew their inſults upon my authority, and the laws of the kingdom, and even to affect, with the greateſt inſolence, to diſtinguiſh themſelves from my good and faithful ſubjects, acting with ſuch folly and madneſs, as if they intended to convince the world, that they are not to be reduced to quiet and ſubmiſſion to my government, by ſuch gentle methods, as are moſt agreeable to my own inclinations.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

"I return you in particular my thanks for the ſupplies you have given; which, although they fall ſhort of the ſums you found neceſſary, and have voted for the ſervice of the whole year; yet, by the encouragement you have given to make them effectual, may, I hope, be ſo managed, as to carry on the current ſervice till another ſeſſion of parliament.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I am very ſenſible, there are matters of great conſequence ſtill depending before you; but, as they have hitherto been poſtponed, out of abſolute neceſſity, by intervening affairs of a more preſſing nature, and of the moſt immediate concern to the peace and ſafety of the nation, I thought the ſeaſon of the year required, I ſhould defer your further proceedings till the next ſeſſion, rather than you ſhould be detained out of your reſpective counties longer than could be conſiſtent with your private concerns.

"I cannot doubt but that, during this receſs, you will uſe all your beſt endeavours to preſerve the peace of the kingdom, and to diſcourage and ſuppreſs all manner of diſorders, ſince, as the firſt ſcene of the late rebellion was opened and uſhered in by tumults and riots, ſo you may be aſſured, upon what pretence ſoever they are raiſed, they can have no other tendency, but to ſupport a ſpirit of faction, reſtleſs and unwearied in their endeavours to renew the rebellion, and to ſubvert the religion, laws, and liberties of their country.

"I deſign to make uſe of the approaching receſs, to viſit my dominions in Germany, and to provide for the peace and ſecurity of the kingdom during my abſence, by conſtituting my beloved ſon, the prince of Wales, guardian of the realm, and my lieutenant with the ſame."

After this ſpeech, the parliament was prorogued to the 7th of Auguſt.

Thus ended this long ſeſſion of the firſt Britiſh parliament, called by king George. This parliament, by the excellency and ſeaſonableneſs of the laws made by them, recovered their country in a great meaſure, out of its confuſions, and provided for its future peace and happineſs, under the preſent eſtabliſhment. Their unanimous and regular proceedings; the abſolute neceſſity of ſome acts, which were paſſed, and their diſinclination to extend them any longer than that neceſſity required; their manifeſt averſion to enter upon ſchemes, which the enemies of the nation had inſinuated to have been their deſign; together with that temper ſo ſuitable to the dignity of ſuch an aſſembly at a juncture, when it might have been expected, that very unuſual heats would have ariſen in an houſe of commons ſo zealous for their king and country, were ſufficient to quiet thoſe groundleſs jealouſies and ſuſpitions, which had been induſtriouſly propogated by the ill wiſhes to our conſtitution.

The king had but too juſt cauſe to complain of the freſh inſults of the diſaffected, notwithſtanding the many inſtances of his clemency. For on the 29th of May (king Charles's reſtoration) the jacobite and tory factions had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by wearing oaken boughs, and on the 10th of June, the pretender's birth-day, by wearing white roſes. But the ſpirit of diſaffection ſhewed itſelf no where more openly than at Oxford. On the 28th of May, the king's birth-day, all the windows that were illuminated there were broken to pieces, as were all the windows that were not illuminated the next day, being the anniverſary of the reſtoration.[k] To prevent the ill effects of this diſaffection, ſoldiers were quartered there, who, as they were chearfully and peaceably celebrating the prince of Wales's birth-day, were inſulted by both the ſcholars and townſmen. Stones were thrown into the windows of the ſtar-inn, where the officers and ſome loyal gentlemen were met, who were attaced by the diſaffected party, when they came out to drink the king and royal family's healths at the bonfire. Provoked by theſe affronts, the ſoldiers broke the windows of the diſaffected, and committed ſome other diſorders. When the vice-chancellor and the mayor ſent up their depoſitions to the court, they took no notice of the inſults the officers and ſoldiers had met with, but only of what the ſoldiers had done by way of repriſals. As this affair came before the parliament, it will be mentioned more largely hereafter.

On the 13th of June, general Maccartney, who had returned to England, ſome time before, took his trial for the pretended murder of the duke of Hamilton. Colonel Hamilton, who, in the queen's time, had given ſuch a poſitive evidence, that he ſaw general Maccartney give the duke his mortal wound, now deviated from it, and only averred, that he ſaw his ſword over the duke's ſhoulder. The falſehood of which appeared by the evidence of the two park-keepers, who ſtood firm to their former depoſitions, 'that they had taken the ſwords from general Maccartney and colonel Hamilton, when they went to the relief of the duke and lord Mahon.' And one of them depoſed that he had been offered two handfuls of gold, and a place of 100l. a year by the lord Bolingbroke, if he would ſwear, that mr. Maccartney killed the duke. The jury acquitted mr. Maccartney of the murder, and he was diſcharged of the manſlaughter by the formality of a cold iron, immediately made uſe of to prevent appeal. He was ſoon after reſtored to his rank in the army, and had the earl of Orrery's regiment given him.

The king before his departure appointed the prince of Wales guardian of the realm, and his lieutenant, during his abſence. The titles of duke of York, and Albany, and earl of Ulſter, were given to prince Erneſt, biſhop of Oſnaburgh, the king's brother, who, with prince Frederick, was alſo made knight of the garter. The duke of Devonſhire was made preſident of the council, and his place of lord-ſteward of the houſhold was given to the duke of Kent. The earl of Portland was made marquiſs of Titchfield, and duke of Portland. Theſe promotions were attended with unexpected diſgraces. The duke of Argyle and his brother, the earl of Ilay, were removed from all their employments.[l] They had both diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their Ireland, lord Newburg, of Angleſey, in Wales; mr. Edgecombe was made one of the lords of the treaſury; mr. Methuen, one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate; and mr. Hampden, one of the tellers of the exchequer. Mr baron Bury was declared lord chief baron of the exchequer, in the room of ſir Samuel Dodd.

[k] At the next aſſizes, among others, Wood, mancipal of Baliol, and mr. Sterling of the ſame college, were tried for curſing the king: but Sterling was acquitted. Mr Frank Nicholls, a commoner of Exeter college, about fifteen years of age, was tried for crying out, 'Ormond for ever;' and fined and impriſoned for the ſame. The political ſtate, for July 1716, ſays, that he was tried for curſing the king and government: but it is a miſtake, for he was tried only for the fact above mentioned, as appears by the record.

[l] A liſt of the duke's poſts and employments was made public, to this effect:

Governor and commander in chief, of all his majeſty's forces in Scotland; general of the king's armies; lord-lieutenant of the ſhire of Dumbarton; lord-lieutenant of the county of Surrey; privy-counſellor; colonel of the royal blue regiment of horſe; governor of the iſland of Minorca; governor of Port-Mahon, in the ſaid iſland; firſt gentleman of the bedchamber, and groom of the ſtole to the prince of Wales; and knight of the garter. Whether he was governor of Edinburgh caſtle at the time of his being thus diſmiſſed, is a doubt; but to all theſe is to be added a penſion of 2000l. per annum, granted him by the king. His brother was likewiſe chief lord of the juſticiary, and lord clerk-regiſter in Scotland. The hereditary governments, ſheriffdoms, &c. which the duke and earl poſſeſſed in Scotland, they could not be deprived of; neither could the earl be removed from his place in the juſticiary, which was, as thoſe of the judges are in England, quam diu ſe bene geſſerint, or rather for life. Of theſe preferments, poſts, and truſts, the duke was diſpoſſeſſed at once.

zeal and ſervices for the government; and the king had in ſome meaſure put his crown into their hands, by placing them at the head of his armies in Scotland. They had all along voted in the houſe of lords on the court ſide; and therefore their removal was the more ſtrange. Whatever might be the cauſe, their poſts were diſpoſed of, to ſhew there was no room to expect being reſtored. General Carpenter was made commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, and governor of Minorca and Port-Mahon, and the duke of Montroſe was appointed lord-clerk regiſter of Scotland, in the room of the earl of Ilay.

On the 7th of July, the king ſet out from St. James's, took water at the Tower, and arrived about two in the afternoon, at Graveſend, where he went on board the Carolina Yacht [m]. He was attended by mr. ſecretary Stanhope, mr. Boſcawen, comptroller of the houſehold, the officers of the green cloth, and moſt of his German miniſters, who embarked in other yatches. In Margate Road they met a ſquadron of men of war, commanded by admiral Aylmer; and they all made the coaſt of Holland the 9th of July in the morning. About four in the afternoon, the king went aſhore, and paſſed through Holland incognito; lay at Voorts, the earl of Albemarle's ſeat, and arrived at Hanover the 15th of July; and on the 20th, ſet out for Pyrmont, to drink the waters.

The king was abſent ſix months, during which, the ſituation of affairs in Great-Britain remained much the ſame, and all was at laſt as quiet, as if he had himſelf been preſent. The prince (doubtleſs by his orders) ſet ſeveral priſoners at liberty, and reprieved others [n]. The paſſage from Dover to Calais was opened, and paſſports no longer required to go from England to France. The king's enemies affected to believe and give out, that theſe proceedings were all owing to the prince's good diſpoſition, of which he would have ſhewn many more proofs, had it been in his power. This was carried ſo far, that addreſſes were preparing at Oxford and Gloceſter, and other places, to be preſented to the prince, to extol his wiſdom in the adminiſtration of affairs, and in particular, his affability and graciouſneſs to all perſons without diſtinction of parties. It was ſoon perceived, that this inſinuated a reflection upon the king and his miniſtry, and therefore it was declared, the prince would receive no addreſſes that were not directly made to the throne.

The papers and ſpeeches of ſome of the rebels that were executed, particularly of mr. Hall and mr. Paul, made great impreſſion on many people. Their execution, inſtead of leſſening, rather encreaſed the number of the jacobites; nor were they deterred from declaring themſelves. Seditious ſermons were preached, and libels againſt the government were publiſhed [o]. By theſe means a ſpirit of mutiny and rebellion was kept up among the diſorderly rabble. So great was the diſaffection to the government at Oxford, that ſoldiers were quartered there, to keep the ſcholars and townſmen within bounds. Nor were theſe riotous proceedings confined to England; for the pretender's friends at Edinburgh had like to have freed a great number of lords and gentlemen impriſoned there on account of the rebellion [p].

[m] The duke of Argyle, it was obſerved, waited that morning on the king and was for a few minutes in private conference with him. Pol. Stat.

[n] On the 4th of Auguſt the earl of Wintoun made his eſcape out of the Tower. On the 15th, mr. Farquharſon of Invercald was ſet at liberty out of the Marſhalſea, as was likewiſe the ſame day the laird of Mackintoſh, out of the Fleet-priſon. Mr John Mackintoſh, a lawyer, under ſentence of death, was alſo releaſed from Newgate; and mr. James Drummond, who was taken priſoner at Dumblain, from the cuſtody of a meſſenger. About the ſame time pardons paſſed the ſeals for ſome other priſoners, and in particular for Charles Radcliffe, brother to the late earl of Derwentwater, and for mr. Wogan; as likewiſe a further reprieve of three months was granted to the other rebel priſoners under ſentence of death. But mr. Radcliffe, making ſome difficulty of accepting the pardon, was detained in Newgate till he made his eſcape from thence on the 11th of December following; as mr. Bruce, another of the rebel priſoners, had done on the 20th of Auguſt. The lord Duffus, who, as captain of a man of war, muſt have abjured the pretender, and afterwards entered into his ſervice, by joining with the rebels in Scotland, was from Hamburgh brought priſoner to London, examined by mr. ſecretary Methuen, and committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower. Some time after fourteen of the rebel priſoners were diſcharged out of Newgate, George Seton, Charles Maxwell, Edmund Maxwell, William Dalmahoy, Alexander Forſter, Alexander Milne, Francis Congleton, Alexander Congleton, Thomas Anderſon, David Hall, George Skinner, William Dundaſs, merchants; and mr. Lyon. The ſame day the following perſons were releaſed from the Marſhalſea; mr. Winram, ſenior, mr. Crow mr. Cunningham of Wall, mr. William Scot, mr. Carruthers, mr. Murray, mr. Grierſon, and mr. William Maxwell. Butler and Samburn, two of the rebel priſoners, died in Newgate; and another Samburne made his eſcape out of it.

[o] The moſt noted pamphlet was publiſhed by Lawrence Howel (a nonjuring clergyman) entitled, 'The caſe of Schiſm in the church of England truly ſtated;' wherein are the following paſſages:

'The authority of the church of England, and conſequently the church of England itſelf, was with the deprived biſhops and clergy, and remains ſtill with their ſucceſſors, who alone have immediately adhered to her true conſtitutions and principles. That all, who departed from them, are at leaſt, in a ſtate of ſchiſm.

That the canonical metropolitan, archbiſhop Sancroft, was not only diſplaced, but a ſubject-preſbyter of his (dr. Tillotſon) was hoiſted into his room; and, when God had removed him, another (dr. Tenniſon) was ſet up in his place, as head of the ſchiſm. And under the biſhops, who actually did this, or thoſe, who approved what they had done, by joining in communion with them, in oppoſition to the true canonical biſhops, have all the parochial clergy acted, and joined with them, againſt the canonical biſhops; and being thus joined with them, they become ſchiſmatics: and thoſe, who have, or do ſtill continue to join with theſe parochial clergy, do join in the ſchiſm, and thereby become guilty of ſchiſm. Let them therefore have been never ſo canonically ordained, and placed over a flock, yet by cloſing with ſchiſmatics, they have forfeited all, and cannot diſpence the ordinances of God with any benefit; God's grace and influence, then and now, forſaking them. And to join communion with them is not only to loſe the benefit of the ordinance, but to join in the ſchiſm, is to join with thoſe, whom they ought to oppoſe with all their might, as violators and grand enemies of the unity and peace of God's church.'

In the concluſion, the author cites the ſecond canon of the church of England, and then proceeds to affirm:

,That by king, mentioned in this canon, is to be underſtood (according to the undoubted principles of the church of England) that perſon, who is poſſeſſed of the throne, according to the civil inſtitution of the Engliſh hereditary monarch. Whoſoever diſowns his authority, &c. by the canon, incurs the ſentence of excommunication, ipſo facto.

If king James II. had a right, the revolutioniſts and compliers were excommunicated by this canon; for, in depriving their rightful king, they diſowned his authority, &c. That he had a right, and continued claiming to his death, none can deny: witneſs his perſonal aſſertion of his right in Ireland, his public manifeſto at the treaty of Ryſwick (wherein he declares to the world, that that peace was founded upon the uſurpation of his kingdoms,) and other declarations to the ſame purpoſe; and his ſon (whoſe right, as a ſon, is as inconteſtable as his father's) hath often repeated the ſame. Now the violation of this ſecond canon, by the revolutioniſts transferring their allegiance from their lawful king to an uſurper (which is diſowning the lawful and rightful king's authority) renders them ipſo facto excommunicates; and the non-jurors, who have faithfully adhered to the doctrine and principles, are the only true church of England.

The ſtate of the caſe plainly appearing, it is no difficulty to find out the guilty perſons, who muſt be no other than thoſe, that violated the canon, by breaking through their allegiance, and conſequently are in an immediate ſtate of excommunication, and, as ſuch, they ought to be deemed, and treated by all, though no declaratory ſentence be pronounced by the proper judges.

The words of the canon being poſitive, there is no farther occaſion to enlarge on it. The only queſtion then is, whether there is ſuch a notoriety in our caſe? and truly, I think, there ſcarce ever appeared in the world, a more notorious and manifeſt caſe. The fact is evident to all; for, who is ignorant of the unnatural treatment of king James II. from his children and ſubjects? how his authority was trampled on, deſpiſed, and denied? and, after ſeveral attempts to recover his undoubted right, how he was forced to live and die an exile? nor is the caſe in the leaſt altered now; for they, that pertinaciouſly continued and gloried in their ſin then, do the ſame now; which makes the caſe ſo notorious that theſe offenders ought to be treated as excommunicates, ipſo facto, upon the authority of the canon, without waiting for the declaratory ſentence of a judge.

Let us now conſider the ſtate and condition of an excommunicated perſon, which is dreadful to any man; but, when it falls to be a clergyman's lot, it makes fatal work; for, 1ſt, it diveſts him of the power of exerciſing any eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; which, if he ſhould preſume to do, it renders his acts invalid and null. 2. Excommunication renders a clergyman, ſo long as he continues in that ſtate, incapable of any eccleſiaſtical benefit, or promotion; and, if he aſſume any, his inſtitution is void. 3. It makes the whole adminiſtration of his miniſterial office ineffectual. You can expect no return of prayers with him, with whom you ought not to communicate. He cannot, authoritatively, bleſs the people of God, who is, himſelf, under a curſe, and excluded from being a part of them. And here, I think, all thoſe, who have joined with ſuch clergymen, ought to conſider what they have done, in communicating with them, hitherto, and, whether they think they can, with ſafety, continue therein; for, in communicating with them, as ſchiſmatics, they make them ſchiſmatics; and, in communicating with them, as excommunicates, not only all their labour is loſt, but, inſtead of a bleſſing, they get a curſe.'

Mr Howel was apprehended in Bull-Head court, Jewin-Street, and, with him, was ſeized a large impreſſion of his pamphlet. Among his papers, was found an original inſtrument, of his being ordained a prieſt, by dr. Hicks, who ſtiles himſelf ſuffragan biſhop of Thetford: and alſo, the form of abſolution and reception of converts to jacobitiſm. He was committed to Newgate for high-treaſon. Upon the publication of this charge of ſchiſm on the church of England, a controverſy aroſe between the members of that church, and the non-jurors. Howel being brought to his trial, and the pamphlet proved to be his, he was fined 500l. and three years impriſonment, and ſentenced to be twice whipped. Upon which, he aſked if they would whip a clergyman? And was anſwered by the court, 'they paid no deference to his cloth, becauſe he was a diſgrace to it, and had no right to wear it; and they did not look upon him as a clergyman, in that he had produced no proof of his ordination, but from dr. Hicks under the denomination of the biſhop of Thetford; which was illegal, and not according to the conſtitution of this kingdom, which knows no ſuch biſhop.' As he received his ſentence with an air of haughtineſs, and behaved himſelf contemptuouſly to the court, he was ordered to be degraded, and ſtripped of the gown he had no title to wear, which was done in the court, by the executioner. But, a few days after upon his petition to the king, the corporal puniſhment was remitted.

[p] The moſt remarkable riot was that in London in the month of July. Some time before the breaking out of the rebellion, many of the well-affected to the government, in order to be ready on any proper occaſion to quell the outragious mob, that diſturbed the peace of the city of London, met in ſeveral public houſes, which, from the veſſel in which the drink was ſold, were called mug-houſes. The two moſt noted of theſe ſocieties were the mug-houſe, in Long-Acre, and the roe-buck in Cheapſide, being ſet up before the king's acceſſion. Their example produced ſeveral other of the like houſes in Saliſbury-Court, Taviſtock-Street, Southwark-Park, Covent-Garden, and other places. As theſe ſocieties were a terror and mortification to the diſaffected, ſo were they the object of their fury, of which they gave many inſtances. The day before, mr. Paul, the clergyman, was hanged, they fell upon the mug-houſe, in Southwark-Park, with their uſual cry of 'high-church and Ormond;' but the ſociety ſallying out upon them, after the windows of the houſe had been all broke, the mob retired. The execution of mr. Paul, who declared himſelf at the gallows to be their martyr, exaſperated them yet Few occurrences happened during the king's abſence worth noting. The prince of Wales, in September, took a progreſs into the country, he ſet out the 24th, from Hampton-court, and arrived at Knowle in Kent, the ſeat of the earl of Dorſet, before noon, and at Tunbridge-wells about five in the evening. From thence he went to Haland in Suſſex, the ſeat of the duke of Newcaſtle, where he lay and came to Lewes about ten the next morning, and about nine in the evening to Stanſted, the earl of Scarborough's ſeat. The next morning, he proceeded to Portſmouth, and, having viewed the fortifications, docks, yards, and magazines, reviewed the regiments there, and went on board the guard-ſhip and bomb-ſhip, dined at lieutenant general Erle's, and returned in the evening to Stanſted, where archdeacon Boucher, one of the canons reſidentiary of Chicheſter, accompanied by the prebendaries and vicars of that cathedral, with many of the neighbouring clergy, were preſented to him by the lord Lumley. On the 27th, about nine in the morning, the prince left Stanſted, and, on a common near Rake, reviewed Wynn's dragoons. He came to Farnham about one, and near that place reviewed Evans's dragoons. In the evening he arrived at Guilford, and, about eleven at night returned to Hampton-court. Two days after, the Venetian embaſſador had a private audience, to notify the ſucceſs of the arms of that republic againſt the Turks, and the raiſing of the ſiege of Corfu, owing chiefly to the conduct of general Schuylenberg, commander of their army, though a proteſtant, and brother to the dutches of Kendal.

In the beginning of November, the princeſs of Wales was in extreme danger, having been ſeveral days in labour, but at laſt was delivered of a dead prince, who was privately depoſited in a vault in Henry VII's chapel.

About the ſame time the duke of Marlborough was taken ill at Blenheim-Houſe. His diſtemper being apoplectic, the fit ſo far impaired his health, that he never after could be ſaid to be perfectly recovered.

The ſtate priſoners that were in Edinburgh caſtle being removed to Carliſle, a commiſſion was iſſued to try them at that place. The priſoners gave the court little trouble, almoſt all of them pleading guilty. Some were condemned, and the reſt diſcharged; but, however, not one was executed. In December, brigadier Colin Campbell, the moſt obnoxious of all the priſoners, made his eſcape in diſguiſe. The laſt of the rebels, who were executed at Lancaſter and Preſton, were captain John Bruce, gentleman of the horſe to the duke of Hamilton, Thomas Shuttleworth, John Minkley, George Hodgſon, and William Charnley; theſe were hanged in October.

On the 6th of December, an accident happened, which gave occaſion to various conjectures. The prince of Wales being in one of the ſtage-boxes at the theatre in Drury-Lane, to ſee the tragedy of Tamerlane, mr. Freeman, a gentleman of Surrey, who had for ſome years paſt been troubled with fits of lunacy, came booted and ſpurred, and would have preſſed into the ſtage-box, near the place where the prince was. Being in a mean riding habit, he was ſtopped by the box-keepers, and a grenadier, who was upon duty; whereupon he drew out a piſtol, and ſhot the centinel in the ſhoulder. With great difficulty he was ſecured; and, being ſearched, two or three other loaded piſtols were found about him; which, together with his man's waiting for him with two horſes, at the end of the play-houſe paſſage, did not a little encreaſe the ſuſpicion of a treaſonable deſign againſt the prince. The report of the piſtol, and the diſturbance that followed it, occaſioned a great alarm within the houſe, particularly among the ladies; and, none rightly knowing the cauſe of the confuſion, the gentlemen and officers about the prince, and almoſt throughout the houſe, drew their ſwords; ſo that the players were a conſiderable time at a ſtand. But, mr. Freeman being ſent priſoner to the guard at St. James's, all was quiet again; the prince having all this while preſerved a great preſence of mind, and appeared to be under no apprehenſion. The ſoldier's wound did not prove mortal; but mr. Freeman's attempt of forcing the prince of Wales's guard coming within the ſtatute of treaſon, after he had been examined before the council, he was committed to Newgate, the rather, becauſe he was ſaid to have either killed, or mortally wounded a man two days before, in the country.

A conſiderable change began now to be made in the miniſtry. The earl of Sunderland, who had gone beyond ſea, under pretence of travelling for his health, had taken the opportunity of waiting upon the king at Hanover, and by his intrigues with the German miniſters there, particularly the barons Bothmar and Bernſdorff, and monſieur de Robethon, infuſed a jealouſy into him of the lord Townſhend and mr. Walpole; ſo that, on the 11th of December, an expreſs arrived in England from Hanover, and the next day it was publicly known that lord Townſhend was removed from his place of ſecretary of ſtate. This was however ſoftened with an account that his lordſhip was to be advanced to the poſt of lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the duke of Grafton, firſt lord-juſtice of that kingdom, being appointed colonel of the royal regiment of horſe-guards, lately commanded by the duke of Argyle; and the earl of Galway, the other lord-juſtice of Ireland, being to enjoy an honourable penſion during life. Two days after, the duke of Roxburgh was made ſecretary of ſtate, and keeper of the king's ſignet in Scotland. The lord Poleworth was appointed lord clerk regiſter, in the room of the duke of Montroſe, who was made keeper of the great ſeal of Scotland. The duke of Kingſton was appointed keeper of the privy-ſeal, and the earl of Sunderland ſole treaſurer of Ireland for life.

In this diſpoſition things remained till the king's return; and the lord Townſhend's removal affected no more for the preſent than himſelf; though the diviſions in the miniſtry ſeemed irreconcilable. [q] more, and the ſociety at mr. Read's, in Saliſbury-Court, having diſtinguiſhed themſelves by demonſtrations of duty and reſpect to the prince and princeſs of Wales, at their return from Greenwich; the jacobites took ſo much offence at it, that on the 20th of July, they attaced mr. Read's houſe, and would have demoliſhed it, had not the company within ſent for a reinforcement from Taviſtock-Street, with which being joined, the mob fled with great precipitation. But they continued hovering about the houſe the following days: and hearing, that mr. Archibald Butler, a young Scots gentleman, who had been in the rebellion, but had received the king's pardon, was in the Temple-Walks, they ran thither crying out, 'high-church and Ormond.' Mr Butler got away from them as faſt as he could; and preſently one Vaughan a ſmall-coal-man, propoſed to them to go and revenge the affront they had received three days before at the mug-houſe in Saliſbury-Court. The mob, aſſenting to his propoſal, followed him to mr. Read's houſe, on which they fell furiouſly; but, meeting with a vigorous reſiſtance, they gathered recruits from the multitude, that crowded thither. Upon this alarm, and hearing they were determined to demoliſh the houſe, mr. Read appeared, and bid them keep off; otherwiſe he would ſhoot amongſt them. The Bridewell-boys, of whom Vaughan had been one, and the reſt of the mob, regardleſs of his fa ir warning, preſſing forwards, with great clubs and ſtics, mr. Read diſcharged a muſket, and ſhot Vaughan, their leader, who died on the ſpot. The riot continuing, the ſheriffs of London repaired to the place, who cauſed the proclamation appointed by act of parliament againſt riots to be read; but this not availing, and the rioters being become rebels, a party of horſe-guards was ordered by the privy-council to march to Saliſbury-Court to ſuppreſs them: and, upon their appearance, the mob diſperſed and fled from the purſuit of juſtice; which, however, overtook ſome of them; for John Love, Thomas Bean, a ſervant to Caſſils and Carnegie, two condemned rebels, then in Newgate, George Price, Richard Price, and William Price, five of the moſt active of the rioters, were ſeized, impriſoned, and tried upon the ſtatute, which makes it felony to demoliſh, or begin to demoliſh any houſe. The evidence againſt them proved their breaking the windows with ſtones and ſtics, pulling down the ſign, entering the houſe, fetching out the goods, treading upon them, and breaking them. It was ſworn at their trial, that one of the mob brought three bottles out of mr. Read's houſe, kneeled down, by the ſwan alehouſe door, and drank the pretender's health, by the name of king James the third. The evidence againſt theſe five rioters being very ſtrong, they were all found guilty, and received ſentence of death. The prince was very much inclined to ſhew mercy to one or two of the youngeſt of them; but, the dangerous conſequences of riots and tumults, in the heart of the metropolis, and the neceſſity of preventing the ſame, by exemplary puniſhment, being repreſented to the prince, he acquieſced in the courſe of juſtice; which had the good effect, that was foreſeen and intended, the putting a ſtop to the deſperate outrages of an enthuſiaſtical multitude. The five rioters were executed on a gibbet, erected, on the 21ſt of September, at the end of Saliſbury-Court, near the place where the crimes, for which they died, were committed. George Purchaſe acknowledged himſelf 'greatly guilty, and his ſentence juſt; praying God to forgive him this and all other his ſins. This, (he ſaid,) he raſhly committed, not conſidering, then, the unlawfulneſs and diſmal conſequences of ſuch a rebellious ſedition, as that was, which ſo much tended, not only to the ruin of private perſons, but to the great diſturbance of, and diſhonour to, the whole government.'

However, ſome party-zealots proſecuted mr. Read for the death of Vaughan, who had led on the mob to deſtroy his houſe. The witneſſes againſt him, at his trial, ſwore very ſtrongly againſt him. John Bill depoſed, that he believed, Vaughan did not belong to the mob in Saliſbury-Court, and had no ſtic in his hand. Charles Tuckey ſwore, that Vaughan had no ſtic. The ſame was ſworn by Catherine Bennet. Joſeph Harris depoſed, that Vaughan told him, he would not be concerned, but go to work. This being ſo directly contrary to the fact, known to ſo many hundreds of ſpectators, and fully proved by ſeveral of them, the jury acquitted mr. Read, who had 400l. paid him at the treaſury, to make good his loſſes and charges: and mr. Gill, at the roe-buck in Cheapſide, had 200l. allowed him, on the ſame account, his houſe having been ſeveral times attaced by the mob, of whom, one, the apprentice of mr. Heptinſtal, a printer, was ſhot, preſſing on as Vaughan did, notwithſtanding repeated warnings to keep off.

[q] The following particulars happened during the king's abſence. Thomas d'Aeth and Matthew Decker were created baronets. The penſion of 2500l. a year was taken from the earl of Nottingham.

Edward Southwell, James Vernon, and Andrew Carlton were appointed commiſſioners of the privy-ſeal, in the abſence of the earl of Sunderland.

Mr Bruce, a Scotch priſoner, changing cloaths with his ſiſter, made his eſcape out of Newgate.

In Auguſt there blew ſo ſtrong weſterly wind (which forced bac the tide, and drove forward the ebbing water) that the Thames lay perfectly dry above and below bridge, except a narrow channel about four feet deep, and twelve feet over.

Several of the ſchool-maſters of the charity ſchools in London, were re-

During theſe tranſactions at home, the king was not idle abroad. One of the principal ends of the king's journey to Hanover, was to provide againſt any future attempts of the jacobite party, by endeavouring to make alliances with all thoſe powers from whence the pretender might expect any ſupport. But this was an impoſſible undertaking, in the then ſituation of the affairs of Europe. The king of Spain pretended to have numberleſs complaints againſt the emperor. The evacuation of Catalonia had given great offence, as to the manner of doing it. A tribunal had been erected at Vienna for the affairs of Spain, and the eſtates of the Flemiſh, who had ſerved king Philip, were confiſcated. But theſe were ſlight grievances in compariſon of what was now in agitation. Sicily had been granted to the duke of Savoy, by the Utrecht treaty, on condition of returning to Spain, in caſe of failure of heirs. The emperor had looked upon this grant with the utmoſt concern. He had almoſt perſuaded the duke of Savoy to accept Sardinia in exchange, without the participation of the court of Madrid, and without any regard to the clauſe of reverſion. To all theſe occaſions of rupture were added the pretenſions of the two courts to the ſucceſſion of the Tuſcan dominions.

As to France, with reſpect to Spain, the two nations were united, but their governors were not ſo. King Philip and the duke of Orleans were ready to contend for the crown of Lewis XV. in caſe death ſhould remove him out of the world. Philip had renounced that crown, and upon that alone was founded the duke of Orlean's title. But, beſides that, the renunciation was generally conſidered in France, as of no great force; the emperor's conſtant refuſal to ceaſe ſtyling himſelf king of Spain, ſeemed entirely to annul it, as it was not reaſonable that one contracting party ſhould be obliged to ſtand to mutual engagements, to which the other refuſes to ſubmit. King George therefore could not be attached to France without offending Spain, nor could he be united to Spain, without giving offence to both the others.

The caſe was much the ſame with the northern powers, and it was ſtill more difficult for king George to manage them, ſo as to draw none of them upon himſelf. Denmark and Sweden were at war: the Czar had entered into a confederacy, which had taken from the Swede his German dominions: the princes of the empire beheld with regret the Ruſſians in their country. It was the buſineſs of thoſe who had called them in, and made uſe of them, to ſend them away. The acquiſition of the duchies of Bremen and Verden, which king George had gained as elector of Hanover, had enraged king Charles of Sweden. He durſt not, as king of Great-Britain, declare war againſt him (though he had done it as elector of Hanover) nor could he be reconciled with him, unleſs he reſtored the two duchies. The only way therefore was to compel that warlike prince to make peace. In this ſituation, it was neceſſary for king George to make alliances, and unite with thoſe who could moſt annoy him, in caſe they became his enemies. Being ſure of the good diſpoſition of the regent of France, he truſted to his miniſters the negotiations with that prince, and undertook himſelf the affairs of the north, where it is plain, he knew ſome enterpriſe was contriving in favour of the pretender.

The negotiation with France ſucceeded to his wiſh. The duke of Orleans, who had ſtill more need of a ſupport to mount the throne, in caſe of a vacancy, than the king had to maintain himſelf on that of Great-Britain, granted all that was deſired. The States-general, who aimed only at peace and ſecurity, readily came into a treaty, which embroiled them with no power they were concerned to manage, and which laid upon them ſcarce any freſh obligation. General Cadogan, the abbot du Bois, and penſionary Heinſius negotiated this affair with ſuch ſecrecy, that the treaty was finiſhed almoſt before it was known to be in hand.

By this treaty, the pretender, that his near abode might not encourage commotions in Great-Britain, was to depart immediately from Avignon, and go beyond the Alps; nor was he to be ſuffered at any time to come to return thither, or paſs through the French territories, under pretence of going to Lorrain, or even to ſet his foot in any place within the dominions of France, much leſs to ſtay there on any pretence whatſoever. This was accompanied with the renewing of the promiſes made at Utrecht, of abſolutely refuſing protection to the chevalier de St. George, and of aſſiſting him in any manner directly or indirectly. No refuge was to be given to the ſubjects of either party who ſhould be declared rebels. All that had been formerly agreed, concerning Dunkirk, was to be fully executed, and nothing was to be omitted that the king of Great-Britain ſhould think neceſſary for the entire demolition of the harbour, and for the removing all ſuſpicion that a new harbour was intended to be made on the canal of Mardyke, This treaty referred to a memorial ſigned at London in September, by monſieur Iberville, reſident of France, and lord Townſhend and mr. Methuen, ſecretaries of ſtate, containing the particulars required by king George to make him eaſy, and cure his ſuſpicions.

After theſe preliminaries (which might be conſidered as the purchaſe given by France for this alliance) it was added, that the true deſign of this treaty being to ſtrengthen the friendſhip eſtabliſhed by the late treatiesat Utrecht, the articles of thoſe treaties, as far as they concerned the contracting parties, were confirmed and ratified, particularly that the ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain, in the proteſtant line, and to the crown of France in the family of Orleans, excluſive of the houſe of Anjou, ſhould remain in full force. A mutual guarantee was alſo given for the performance of theſe, and all the other articles, and for the defence of the dominions poſſeſſed by the three powers at the time of ſigning the treaty. Then was ſettled the ſuccours each ſhould give the party attaced, after fair means had been uſed to induce the aggreſſor to deſiſt from his enterpriſe. France and England were to furniſh each eight thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, and the States half that number. It was free to demand ſhips or money inſtead of troops, and to prevent all occaſion of diſpute, it was agreed that a thouſand foot ſhould be valued at 10,000 Dutch florins a month, and a thouſand horſe at 30,000. The ſuccours at ſea were to be valued in the ſame proportion.

The chief end of this treaty being to ſupport the ſucceſſions to the two crowns, that article was very largely explained. It was agreed, that if the kingdoms, countries or provinces of any of the allies were diſturbed with inteſtine diviſions, or by rebellions, on account of theſe ſucceſſions, or any other pretence, the ally ſo diſturbed ſhould have a right to demand aid, as in caſe of being attaced by a foreign power; that this aid ſhould be ſent within two months after demand, and the neceſſary expences advanced by thoſe of whom it was demanded, and no re-payment to be required till a year after the troubles ſhould ceaſe. In caſe this aid ſhould not be ſufficient, it was added, the whole forces of the other parties ſhould be employed, and, if occaſion required, war ſhould be declared againſt the aggreſſors.

As ſoon as this treaty was made public, it raiſed great murmurings, eſpecially in France, where it was openly ſaid, that the regent ſacrificed to his ambitious views, the honour and advantage of the nation; the condeſcenſion hitherto ſhewn for England, on account of the chevalier St. George, had been too great, but the preſent proceedings were ſhameful and mean: the demolition of Mardyke would be an eternal monument of the ſubjection of France to England: Lewis XIV. would never have conſented to it, and the unſettled ſtate of Great-Britain did not put her into a condition to impoſe laws: a prince who had no other intereſt but that of his people, would have taken the opportunity to finiſh a work ſo important and neceſſary: the expreſſions in the treaty, of doing whatever the king of Great-Britain ſhall judge neceſſary to remove his ſuſpicions, were of a very high ſtrain, and deragatory to the ſovereignty of the crown of France.

The king of Spain was highly offended at this alliance, and complained of it bitterly, affirming it belonged to the ſtates of the realm, not to foreigners, eſpecially the Engliſh, perpetual enemies to France, to decide pretenſions to the throne, in caſe God ſhould in his anger, call the young king to himſelf: and from that time he took meaſures to diſconcert this alliance.

This ſtrict alliance with France was found fault with even in England, where it was pretended that the ſucceſſion was ſufficiently ſecured by the treaty of Utrecht, and there moved for diſaffection to the government. Dr Walton, rector of Whitechapel, was deprived alſo for diſaffection to the government, and was ſucceeded by dr. Shippen, of Brazen-noſe-college, in Oxford.

Margaret, eldeſt daughter of the lord Coningſby, was created baroneſs and viſcounteſs of Coningſby, of Hampton-court, in Herefordſhire, with limitation to her heirs male.

January the 4th, the triple league between Great-Britain, France, and Holland, was ſigned at the Hague.

Three days after the king's return, January 22d, came on the famous trial of Francia the Jew, for correſponding with the king's enemies. He was acquitted.

Thirty of the Preſton rebels having been put on board a ſhip to be tranſported, affidavits were made before the mayor of Liverpool, that they had maſtered the ſhip's crew, and carried the ſhip to France. One hundred of the ſame priſoners who had been confined in the Savoy, were ſhipped off for the Weſt-Indies.

was no occaſion for ſo many foreign troops, which might be called in on pretence of an invaſion, and perhaps be uſed for very different purpoſes. The king and regent diſregarded theſe murmurs, being ſatisfied that their mutual intereſts would oblige them to an inviolable performance of their engagements. The character of theſe two princes had a great reſemblance in many particulars, they had both great talents for government, and may be ſaid to have equally had an occaſion for them in their reſpective circumſtances, which were much the ſame. Alike diſſatisfied with the late adminiſtration of affairs, they obſerved the ſame conduct. None of the friends and creatures of Lewis XIV. were in favour with the duke of Orleans; as none of the friends and creatures of queen Ann were in favour with king George. The difference in their manner of treating them, entirely flowed from the different uſages of the nations they governed. King George delivered himſelf up to the wigs, who had been perſecuted in the late reign: the duke of Orleans ſeemed to give himſelf up to the janeſeniſts, whom Lewis XIV. had conſtantly ill-uſed: they changed miniſters almoſt as often one as the other: their competitors inſpired them with the ſame views, and almoſt the ſame precautions: they were alike even in their death, for both died ſuddenly. The duke of Orleans is ſaid to have had a more prompt and ready genius: the multitude and difficulty of his affairs never hindered him from purſuing his pleaſures, whereas king George was always attentive, always ſerious, and ſeemed an enemy to all amuſements; and therefore he was beyond compariſons, more regular in his manners and conduct; beſides he was more conſtantly attached to the party he had eſpouſed, and was never ſeen to waver between the wigs and tories, as did the duke of Orleans between the janſeniſts and moliniſts.

General Cadogan had much better ſucceſs in his negotiations with France, than the king had in his with the northern powers. Notwithſtaning all his endeavours, he could engage them neither to be reconciled, nor even to ſuſpend their reſentments. He ſeemed, however, to have ſucceeded in ſpite of the king of Denmark's deſire to preſerve his advantages, and the king of Sweden's eagerneſs to revenge and repair his loſſes. His Swediſh majeſty had preſented to the emperor and the diet pacific memorials, and even ſent plenepotentiaries to aſſiſt at the congreſs of Brunſwick; but all theſe hopes quicly vaniſhed. King George had, however, made that prince all the advances imaginable: had ſtrongly preſſed the emperor, the kings of Denmark and Pruſſia, and even the Czar himſelf, that the Ruſſians might march out of the empire: nay, it is ſaid, he had proceeded ſo far towards a ſeparate peace with the king of Sweden, as to offer to join with him againſt the Muſcovite, on condition only that he would renounce all pretenſions to the duchies of Bremen and Verden. King Charles XII. was intractable: incenſed at the war made againſt him, when he could not defend himſelf; and ſtill more at the peace, which they would compel him to make, on conditions, as he thought, both diſhonourable and hard, he breathed nothing but revenge, and was as much offended with the king of Great-Britain, as with the Czar and the king of Denmark.

As king George could not obtain the ceſſion he deſired, he took the beſt meaſures to ſecure his new acquiſitions, and compel the king of Sweden to remain quiet. It was given out, that the confederacy he had entered into was formed purely for the ſake of peace. It was agreed by the confederates, that each ſhould furniſh a certain number of forces and ſhips, not to make new conqueſts upon Sweden, but to oblige his Swediſh majeſty to ſit eaſy under his loſſes, and not endeavour to recover them. This rupture with Sweden was only detrimental to the trade of Great-Britain, but had like to prove fatal to the king; for, whilſt he was labouring for a peace in the north, in order to ſecure his German poſſeſſions, a ſcheme was contriving to deprive him of his Britiſh dominions.

The diſaffected in England, ſtill purſuing their deſigns in favour of the pretender, turned their eyes on the king of Sweden to accompliſh it. They knew how exaſperated he was againſt king George, and how glad he would be of a revenge: count Gyllenburg was the Swediſh reſident at London. The count was applied to, or perhaps made the firſt overtures. The affair was carried on, not only at London, but by baron Gortz, the Swediſh ambaſſador at the Hague, and by baron Sparre at Paris, with the Engliſh jacobites there, and other friends of the pretender. Baron Gortz, who was the projector of this plot, went to France, in order to bring things to the point he deſired, and becauſe the ſecret could be kept better at Paris than at the Hague. The Czar was alſo treated with, who was known to be offended with king George.

Theſe negotiations could not be ſo privately managed, but that they were ſuſpected by the court of England. In April, when the ſeptennial bill was in hand, intimations had been given that a ſecond invaſion was to be feared, and this apprehenſion was made one of the motives for continuing a houſe of commons, in which the king had ſo much reaſon to confide. Theſe ſuſpicions were indeed not very clear, but, in the ſituation of Europe at that time, it was not difficult to gueſs from what quarter the danger was to come. The good diſpoſition of the duke of Orleans had removed all uneaſineſs with reſpect to France. The king of Spain, wholly intent on his projects againſt the emperor, could not be ſuſpected of quarrelling with England. The north therefore was the only place from whence the ſtorm could be thought to proceed: this conjecture, the only reaſonable one that could be formed, determined king George to repair to Hanover, where he could beſt diſcover the intentions of his enemies. He ſucceeded in his deſign; at leaſt the public was, in a few days after his arrival at London, informed of the plot, by the ſeizing of count Gyllenburg.

1716-17] The king having finiſhed all his affairs abroad, ſet out from Hanover the 19th of January, N. S. and in ten days landed at Margate, from whence he proceeded to London.

It was expected the parliament would have immediately met, but their meeting was put off for ſome time, on account of a ſurprizing event. On the 29th of January, mr. ſecretary Stanhope communicated to the privy-council the informations, the king had received of a conſpiracy, which had for ſome time, been carried on to excite a new rebellion, and to favour a foreign invaſion. The ſame night major Smith, an Iriſh officer, who was no longer in the ſervice, and who, that very evening, had been playing at baſſet at the apartments in St. James's, was ſeized at his lodgings; and about twelve o'clock, lieutenant-colonel Blakeney, with a detachment of the foot guards, ſecured the houſe of count Gyllenburg, the Swediſh reſident. Not long after, major-general Wade, attended by the colonel, went and knoced at the door of the Swediſh miniſter, and being admitted, found him making up ſome diſpatches. Having, in a few words, made him a compliment, and acquainted him with his commiſſion to put a guard upon his perſon, and to ſecure his papers, he laid hold on ſuch, as were on the table, and demanded thoſe, that were in his ſcrutore. Count Gyllenburg's ſurprize raiſed in him an extraordinary emotion, which made him expoſtulate with ſome warmth about the law of nations being violated in his perſon; but having ſomewhat recovered his temper, he deſired leave to ſend for the marquiſs de Monteleone, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, that he might conſult with him how to act on ſuch an occaſion. But general Wade having poſitive orders not to let him ſpeak with any perſon, could not grant his requeſt. On the other hand, the count's lady having refuſed the keys of the ſcrutore, upon pretence that there was nothing in it but linen and plate, the general cauſed it to be broke open; and having found in it a great many papers, he ſealed them all up, and left a ſtrong guard upon the reſident. The ſame morning Charles Cæſar, formerly treaſurer of the navy, and member of parliament for the borough of Hertford; and ſir Jacob Banks, formerly member of parliament for Minehead, were apprehended, upon ſuſpicion of being in confederacy with count Gyllenburg.

There were ſeveral conjectures, as to the means of this important diſcovery. Some affirmed, the king had long before notice of the deſign from France; others, that the diſcovery was owing to an intercepted letter from count Gyllenburg to the lord Duffus, priſoner in the Tower: and others aſſerted, the lord Duffus accidentally revealed the conſpiracy to an Engliſh lord, his fellow priſoner, who diſcovered it to the government, and thereby merited his pardon. Be this as it will, it is certain, that the king and his miniſters had long before entertained ſuſpicions of the count's clandeſtine practices; which were not a little encreaſed upon the publication of a libel about September 1716, entitled, 'an Engliſh merchant's remarks upon a ſcandalous jacobite paper publiſhed in the poſt-boy, under the name of, a memorial preſented to the chancery of Sweden, by the reſident of Great-Britain.' Of which libel count Gyllenburg was ſuſpected to be the author, as afterwards appeared by his letters.[r]

The ſecuring the perſon and papers of a public miniſter being an affair of an extraordinary nature, and ſome foreign miniſters having expreſſed their ſentiments of it at at court, they were given to underſtand, that in a day or two they ſhould be acquainted with the reaſons for proceeding againſt the Swediſh miniſter in ſuch a manner. Accordingly, the ſecretaries of ſtate, mr. Stanhope and mr. Mathuen, wrote a circular letter to the foreign miniſters of their reſpective diſtricts, who were pretty well reconciled to the proceedings of the court; only the marquiſs de Monteleone, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, ſaid, in his anſwer to mr. Stanhope: 'that he was ſorry no other way could be found out, for preſerving the peace of his majeſty's dominions, without arreſting the perſon of a public miniſter, and ſeizing all his papers, which are the ſacred repoſitories of the ſecrets of his maſter: and in whatever manner theſe two facts may ſeem to be underſtood, they ſeem very ſenſible to wound the law of nations.'

Not many days after the ſeizing of count Gyllenburg, baron Gortz, miniſter and favourite of the king of Sweden, was likewiſe ſecured in Guelderland, in the following manner: mr. Leathes, the Britiſh reſident at the Hague, received the king's orders to deſire the regents of that ſtate to conſent to the ſeizing of baron Gortz, with his two ſecretaries, mr. Stambke and mr. Guſtavus Gyllenburg; the baron having for ſome time been concerned in carrying on a correſpondence, and concerting meaſures with the Britiſh rebels in France, and with ſeveral perſons in England, by means of count Gyllenburg, for raiſing a rebellion in England, to be ſupported by a foreign force. Mr Leathes went immediately to Amſterdam, and diſpoſed the magiſtrates of that place to conſent to the ſecuring of baron Gortz, in caſe he ſhould come thither from France; and returned bac to the Hague. The ſame night baron Gortz arrived there, having heard at Calais of count Gyllenburg's being put under arreſt, which prevented his going over to England, as he intended. He had, on the 18th of February, a conference with the imperial miniſter, wherein he extolled the inclination of the king of Sweden to peace, and inſiſted on a reſolution about his laſt propoſitions; but the next day, he ſet out, a little before noon, in a poſt chaiſe, accompanied by general Poniatowſki, having, as it is believed, had ſome notice, that orders were given to ſecure him, which, indeed, he narrowly eſcaped; for, upon mr. Leathes's application, the council of the States of Holland met and paſſed a reſolution for ſeizing the baron and his ſecretaries; but before it could be executed, the baron and mr. Stambke were gone that morning for Amſterdam; ſo that only mr. Gyllenburg was then taken. A party of horſe was immediately ſent after the other two, and mr. Leathes followed them to Amſterdam, and learning where baron Gortz was lodged, he went, accompanied with the proper officers, to the houſe of M. Teitſen, a Swediſh merchant, and ſearched it; but the baron had left it ſome hours before. However a box was found, in which were twelve large packets of letters; and informations being given which way the baron had taken, ſome perſons were diſpatched after him, who ſeized him and mr. Stambke at Arnheim, by leave of the magiſtrates of that place, as they were taking coach to go on from thence. Mr Leathes, being returned to the Heague, waited on the deputies of the province of Guelderland, who thought fit to write a letter to the magiſtrates of Arnheim, ordering them to cauſe the baron and mr. Stambke to be kept in ſafe cuſtody. On this occaſion, all thoſe of the regency, who were applied to, entered readily into the reaſonableneſs of the king's demands, and gave all the aſſiſtance and diſpatch, that was conſiſtent with the known forms of proceeding in that country. It is obſervable, that, when baron Gortz was ſeized, he owned himſelf to have been the projector of the intended invaſion of Great-Britain by the king of Sweden, and that he had actually provided ten thouſand arms, and other neceſſaries for this ſervice, valuing himſelf very much upon what he had done in this affair, as thinking it extremely for the intereſt of his maſter, and a noble and glorious enterprize.[s]

The parliament of Great-Britain met on the 20th of February, according to their laſt prorogation; and the king being come to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnity, and delivering a ſpeech into the lord chancellor's hands, it was by him read to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I was in hopes, that the ſucceſs which it pleaſed God to give us, in defeating the late rebellion, might have ſecured to the nation peace, plenty and tranquility.

My endeavours have not been wanting, during your receſs, to improve the happy proſpect, which was in view, by entering into ſuch negotiations, as I judged moſt conducive to thoſe good ends: and it is with pleaſure I can acquaint you, that many defects in the treaties of Utrecht, which very nearly affected the trade, and even the ſecurity of theſe kingdoms, have been remedied by ſubſequent conventions, the happy conſequences of which have already very ſenſibly appeared by the flouriſhing condition of our trade and credit.

By the alliance lately concluded with France and the States-General, we are ſoon to be eaſed of all future apprehenſions from Dunkirk and Mardyke. The pretender is actually removed beyond the Alps: his adherents are deprived of all hopes of ſupport and countenance from France; and even the aſſiſtance of that crown is ſtipulated to us in caſe of exigency.

It ſeemed reaſonable to expect, that ſuch a ſituation of affairs at home and abroad ſhould have recovered from their deluſion all ſuch of our ſubjects, as had unhappily been ſeduced by the craft and wickedneſs of deſperate and ill-deſigning men, and thereby have afforded me the opportunity, which I deſired, of following the natural bent of my own inclinations to lenity, by opening this ſeſſion with an act of grace. But ſuch is the obſtinate and inveterate rancour of a faction amongſt us, that it hath again prompted them to animate and ſtir up foreign powers to diſturb the peace of their native country: they will chooſe rather to make Britain a ſcene of blood and confuſion, and to venture even the putting this kingdom under a foreign yoke, than give over their darling deſign of impoſing a popiſh pretender.

I have ordered to be laid before you copies of letters, which have paſſed between the Swediſh miniſters on this occaſion, which contain a certain account of the projected invaſion: and I promiſe myſelf from your experienced zeal and affection to my perſon and government, that you will come to ſuch reſolutions, as will enable me, by the bleſſing of God, to defeat all the deſigns of our enemies againſt us.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I did hope, the putting an end to the late rebellion would have ſo far ſecured the peace and tranquility of the nation, that I might, conſiſtently with the ſafety of my people, have made a conſiderable reduction of the forces. But the preparations, which are making from abroad to invade us, oblige me to aſk ſuch ſupplies, as you ſhall find abſolutely neceſſary for the defence of the kingdom.

You are all ſenſible of the inſupportable weight of the national debts, which the public became engaged for, from the neceſſity of the times, the preſſures of a long and expenſive war, and the languiſhing ſtate of public credit. But, the ſcene being now ſo happily changed, if no new diſturbances ſhall plunge us again into ſtreights and difficulties, the general expectation ſeems to require of you, that you ſhould turn your thoughts toward ſome method of extricating yourſelves, by reducing, by degrees, the debts of the nation.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I have an entire confidence in you, and have therefore nothing to aſk, but, that you would take ſuch meaſures, as will beſt ſecure your religion and liberties. While you preſerve thoſe ineſtimable bleſſings, I ſhall ſit eaſy and ſafe on my throne, having no other view but the happineſs and proſperity of my people.' [f]

The king being withdrawn, and the commons returned to their houſe, mr. ſecretary Stanhope laid before them copies

[s] To juſtify this invaſion, it was urged, that king George, as elector of Hanover, had aſſiſted the princes in confederacy againſt the king of Sweden, proclaimed war againſt him, aided the king of Denmark to take Bremen and Verden, and afterwards purchaſed theſe two duchies of him. And this year had given inſtructions to ſir John Norris to join the Daniſh and Ruſſian fleets in the Baltic; which the admiral did accordingly.

[f] Beſides the treaty of commerce with Spain (by which the three articles tacked to the treaty of Utrecht were revoked, and all the other grievances in trade removed) and the triple alliance between Great-Britain, France, and the States, the king had concluded another treaty with the emperor, May 16, 1716, which he did not think fit to mention to the parliament. By this treaty, there was to be perfect unity between them, and each was to reckon the advantage and loſſes of the other as his own. They were to defend one another in the poſſeſſion of all their preſent kingdom, provinces, and rights, and in caſe either of them was attaced, the other was to aſſiſt with eight thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe, or with ſhips in proportion. No prince was to be admitted without common conſent; but the States were to be admitted, and even invited without delay, to accede to it. By a ſeparate article this treaty was not to extend to the emperor's wars with the Turks.

The deſign of this alliance was to rouſe the jealouſy of France, and incline the regent to haſten a treaty with England. Accordingly, when he heard of this treaty, he reſolved to enter into an alliance with Great-Britain and Holland, and the treaty (as hath been ſaid) was concluded at Hanover the beginning of the next year.

of the letters which paſſed between count Gyllenburg, the barons Gortz and Sparre, and others, relating to a deſign of raiſing a rebellion in Great-Britain, to be ſupported by an invaſion from Sweden. By theſe letters it appeared, that a deſign was formed to dethrone king George, and conducted in ſuch a manner, as almoſt to warrant ſucceſs. Artful papers were publiſhed to foment and encreaſe diſcontent and diviſion; the apparent tranquility, enjoyed in Great-Britain, was to be an occaſion of requiring and obtaining the reduction of the national, and diſmiſſion of the foreign forces; ſhips, bought at different places, were to aſſemble at Gottenburg by the end of March, when the eaſt-winds uſually blow, on board of which eight thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe were to embark, with artillery, ammunition, and arms for fifteen thouſand men. The great number of the diſaffected had been ſo far relied on, that the ſecret of the negotiation had been truſted in England but to very few perſons; nothing was tranſacted in writing; no treaty was made; the mutual concern for the ſucceſs of the undertaking was, as it were, the warrant for the promiſes that were given.

This method of treating prolonged the negotiation, but withal was a ſecurity againſt the ill conſequences of a diſcovery. Both ſides were equally deſirous of being concealed. The king of Sweden abſolutely refuſed to appear in the affair, till the time of execution; and the pretender's friends, with whom count Gyllenburg treated at London, would not engage for any thing till they had his maſter's word. They did not care to labour in vain; but as ſoon as they ſhould have the aſſurance of his aſſiſtance, money ſhould not be wanting, nor means to ſupport the affair. Upon this, baron Gortz ſpoke out more plainly. He ſent word, he had done nothing but upon the knowledge of his maſter's intentions, and had lately been empowered in form to proſecute the enterprize. He ſent a copy of his full powers which were unlimited, and it was viſible they were ſo extenſive, only becauſe there might be no occaſion to mention the affair, which was to be concealed from the miniſters at Stockholm.

This aſſurance removed all uneaſineſs and irreſolution; money was given; views were explained; means of ſubſiſting the foreign troops were particulariſed; a perſon was procured, who was perfectly acquainted with the coaſts where it was reſolved they ſhould land; ſhips of war were provided, from ſixty to ſeventy guns; merchant-men, that were to carry corn to Gottenburg, were to ſerve for tranſports. The ſcheme was well laid, and the execution ſeemed infallible; eſpecially, if the army had been reduced, and the Dutch forces ſent home. Twelve thouſand choſen Swedes, in a condition to receive thoſe that were ready to join them, would have quicly formed a powerful army: encouraged by ſuch an army, the people would have riſen on all ſides: the Highlanders would have all been in arms: the torrent would have encreaſed without ceaſing, and a battle would have decided the affair. Thus much is certain, the project was infinitely better concerted than the laſt year's: the continual motions of the Swediſh forces would have ſerved to cover the true deſign, till it would have been too late to oppoſe it; a few days ſufficed to convey them into Scotland or England. But a timely diſcovery confounded all theſe meaſures, and eſtabliſhed king George on the throne. [t]

[t] The reader may ſee all theſe particulars, at large, in the following abſtracts of the letters.

The firſt letter is from baron Sparre, to count Gyllenburg, dated at Paris, September 25, 1716; in which the baron acquaints the count, 'that three days before, he was informed, that he [count Gyllenburg] had entered upon buſineſs with ſome lords of the chief of the pretender's party: that they took it for granted, he was authorized to do ſo, by the king of Sweden; and, in a word, that he was inclined to believe, that his Swediſh majeſty would eſpouſe the intereſts of that prince. In the firſt place, adds the baron, I will tell you, that I ſhall be charmed with it; and then, that it is not from a motive of curioſity, that I aſk, whether what I have heard be true; but that I may co-operate with you, though indirectly, till I have powers like yours, with which, you know, we are obliged to proceed very cautiouſly. Do me the friendſhip to let me know, what there is in this matter, as ſoon as poſſible. I flatter myſelf, you will find your account in it.

The next is a letter from count Gyllenburg to baron Gortz, dated London, Sept. 29, O. S. Octob. 9, N. S. 1716; which, being very material, deſerves to be inſerted at length. 'In anſwer to your excellency's letter, ſays the count, of the 22d. paſt, I now do myſelf the honour to acquaint you, that every body here is of opinion, that either France is extreamly weak, or elſe that the regent aims at the throne, and is deſirous to purchaſe it of king George, at any rate; for, otherwiſe, it is thought impoſſible, that France could condeſcend to make ſo ignominious a ſacrifice, as ſhe does, of a work [Mardyke] which coſt her ſo much, and for which the late king would have undergone a ten years war. People go ſo far here, as to lay wagers, that the young king of France will be diſpatched, before a certain time, to make room for his uncle. But, if the report, which is current at preſent, proves true, that the young king is fallen ill of the ſmall-pox, it is very poſſible, that Providence may confound his vaſt projects, which, among other things, tend to ſet up the court of Hanover to ſerve France, in our ſtead, as a balance againſt the power of the emperor: and it was with this view, that France already offered, laſt ſpring, to conſent to guaranty to the Hanoverians the poſſeſſion of the duchy of Bremen. If the emperor conſiders well the time, at which France takes theſe ſteps, and England is ſo forward to anſwer them, he will find, that his laſt advantage over the Turks has begot a jealouſy in thoſe two powers, and has made them bethink themſelves in good time of ſecuring one another mutually, againſt his power. I know not with what deſign it is done; but the miniſtry at preſent give out, that the peace of the North is actually in agitation, and that it will be concluded to the ſatisfaction of the king of Sweden. My friends would perſuade me, that this is done, in order to quiet a little the minds of thoſe, whoſe eyes my paper [Remarks of an Engliſh merchant, &c.] has opened. Be that as it will, I can aſſure your excellency, that never any paper met with a more general approbation; and, if I might venture to give my opinion, I ſhould think it would not be improper to cauſe it to be printed in French, in Dutch, and even in Engliſh, at the Hague. Your excellency may be aſſured, that if theſe gentlemen here make any anſwer to it, I ſhall be ready to baffle them entirely, and that there is nothing in the world I ſhould ſo much wiſh for.

Whether they do this, or not, I intend to have ſeveral pieces ready againſt the meeting of the parliament, and to publiſh them by a little at a time, the impatience of the people here not ſuffering them to read long deductions: and if I had wherewithal to defray the expence, I would cauſe ſome of them to be printed immediately, and the papers to be conveyed into ſuch places, that it ſhould not be in the power of this court to hinder the impreſſion. The intimations, which have been made me, terminate in bringing in the pretender; but as I cannot enter upon that affair, without an expreſs order from the king, my maſter, I have avoided coming to particulars.

Ten thouſand men, tranſported hither from Sweden, would do the buſineſs; and I believe, we ſhall not be at a loſs for money.

I ſend you incloſed, the tranſlation of the paper, which has been publiſhed here.

Baron Gortz, in his anſwer, dated at the Hague, October 5—16, 1716, is of opinion, 'that hitherto, they need not be much diſturbed about the treaty between France and Great-Britain;' and adds, 'that the count's printed piece deſerves the approbation it meets with: that he has ſent it to the king, and will take care to get tranſlations of it into other languages printed. He deſires to know the expence of printing the other pieces of the count's compoſing: cautions him, not to make any mention, in his letters to the king, nor to his correſpondents in Sweden, of what has been inſinuated to him about the pretender: but that, in the mean time, he will run no riſque, in acquainting him with all the particulars on that head; and that, above all, it will be neceſſary to make him clearly underſtand, how ten thouſand men might do the buſineſs; that is to ſay, what ſcheme has been contrived, and what motive they propoſe to offer, to induce the king of Sweden to enter into this affair.'

Count Gyllenburg, in his anſwer, dated at London, October 12—23, 1716, tells baron Gortz, 'I ſay nothing to the alliance lately made by France. Laſt ſpring, France offered the Hanoverians their guaranty of the poſſeſſion of Bremen, and I doubt not, but they have now done it. How do we know, but this may produce good diſpoſitions at Vienna towards us? It was in jeſt only, that count Volkra told M. Petkum, that his maſter would enter into that alliance.

I am very glad, that my pamphlet meets with your excellency's approbation. I aſſure you, that to print the pieces, that will be neceſſary, will coſt me, at leaſt, ſixty pounds. Printers muſt be bribed to it, for they run great riſques, in printing any thing, that diſpleaſes the government: but I will keep an exact account of every penny.

I would begin with our treaty, and make ſhort remarks upon it. Afterwards, I will print extracts from the cuſtom-houſe, to ſhew the little neceſſity there is of the trade to Peterſburg and Riga, eſpecially this year. Then I will come to the Hanover declaration of war, and will examine it, if it be neceſſary. After that, I will proceed to every one of our enemies, and I doubt not, but to undecieve the nation.'

To this letter count Gyllenburg ſubjoins this remarkable poſtſcript:

'Your excellency will have ſeen, by my laſt to M. de Mullern, what I have written upon the ſubject in queſtion. You will be pleaſed to ſend, or keep bac, that letter, juſt as you ſhall judge convenient. However, I beg you would be pleaſed to inform me which you do.

There is no medium; either Bremen, or the Hanoverians, muſt be ſacrificed. The latter is not ſo difficult, conſidering the general diſcontent. Ten thouſand men would be ſufficient. The mal-contents require but a body of regular troops, to which they may join themſelves. That body, being tranſported in the month of March, when the eaſterly winds reign, and when it will not in the leaſt be dreamt on, will cauſe a general revolt. We muſt alſo have arms for between fifteen and twenty thouſand men, and as many accoutrements as can be got; for as to horſes, we ſhall have them here. Your excellency may eaſily judge of what advantage this will be to the king; and, in my poor opinion, we have no other courſe to take, unleſs we are willing to give up every thing. My friends are not in town, but I ſhall ſpeak with them ſome day the next week; and then your excellency may expect their ſcheme: in the mean time, I ſhould be of opinion, that, if the buſineſs could be done, without making uſe of a great many Engliſh, there would be the leſs riſque run; for I do not know, whether I ought to touch upon what the king muſt have further, for, although they will endeavour to do every thing, that I aſk; yet, as it muſt be by a contribution raiſed among a great many, it may happen, that there may be a falſe brother. Our men once landed, I anſwer for the reſt. In the mean time, I beg you would remember what I had the honour to write to you, laſt ſummer, concerning one N———. No body knows the ſea and the coaſts better than he, and he is a brave and honeſt man. In ſhort, it will be a glorious enterprize, which will put an end to all our misfortunes, by ruining thoſe, that are the authors of them. As to what I have to ſay of the time, the ſooner the better, after the trade of Gottenburg is ended, or before it begins.'

The next letter is from count Gyllenburg, to his brother, Guſtavus Gyllenburg, ſecretary to baron de Gortz, dated at London, October 16—27, 1716; in which the poſtſcript to baron Gortz, is only material, which is as as follows:

'I have ſince ſpoken with two of the principals, who have aſſured me, that there ſhall be ſixty thouſand pounds, ſterling, ready, as ſoon as I ſhall ſhew them a line from the king, which aſſurances under his own hand, that he will aſſiſt them. As for the ſcheme, I ſhall have it within a few days. One of them, who is the chief promoter of this affair, aſſured me, that we had nothing to apprehend from the regent on this occaſion.'

By a letter dated at the Hague, November 3, 1716, M. Guſtavus Gyllenburg acquaints his brother, the count, that he has given baron Gortz his letter of the 16—27 of October, to read, as well as the note therein incloſed; to which he made him the following anſwer: 'It is my repeated advice to forbear ſpeaking any thing at all of money; but to hear people only, ſo as to learn clearly what they are able and diſpoſed to do, and to acquaint me with it, without opening yourſelf to them.'

The letters being read in both houſes, raiſed the utmoſt indignation in all the well-affected to the government, and addreſſes were preſented, full of the moſt lively expreſſions of loyalty and zeal, and of reſentment againſt the proceedings of the late miniſtry. The lords, in their addreſs, ſaid, 'we are ſenſible, that the groſs defects and pernicious conſequences of the late treaty of Utrecht could not have been remedied, but by your majeſty's unwearied application fo- the good of your ſubjects, and by that juſt regard, which is paid by foreign potentates to your known wiſdom and integrity. It is with unſpeakable ſatisfaction, that we ſee your majeſty's endeavours ſucceſsful in ſuch conventions, as

The next letter is from count Gyllenburgh to baron Gortz, dated at London, November 4, 1716, as follows: 'In anſwer to what your excellency has done me the honour to write to me in the poſtſcript to your letter of the 16—27th paſt, I grant there would be no harm in hearing the inſinuations of this court, if they were made not only without my promiſing to make report of them to his majeſty, but alſo my giving them hopes of his majeſty's being reſolved to be reconciled to the Hanoverians, and to ſacrifice Bremen to them for ſome equivalent on the part of the Czar. But as, without that, they will make no overtures, for fear we ſhould make uſe of them to encreaſe ſtill more the diſtruſt which is between the northern allies, and ſo make an advantage of them; it is not in my power to get any thing particular out of them; nor am I able to ſay of what ſervice to us their aſſiſtance againſt the Czar would be; but if I were to gueſs by their diſcourſe who have been talking with me about it, as from themſelves, though I eaſily perceive it was by order of the miniſters, I ſhould believe, that if the preliminary, concerning Bremen, was ſettled, the Engliſh miniſters would be very well pleaſed to retrieve the falſe ſteps they have made, by talking loudly of the defenſive treaty between us, and by perſuading the nation to give us the ſuccours therein ſtipulated either in money or ſhips. I ſhould fancy alſo, that we might come to an agreement in relation to what they ought to help us to take from the Czar, by way of repriſal for our loſſes in Germany. On the other hand, and if we do not ſubmit to them, your excellency may be aſſured, that, as well to juſtify their paſt actions, as to force us to a compliance, they will prevail upon the mercenary parliament, which they have at preſent, to take vigorous reſolutions, and even to declare war againſt us. This is what we muſt expect. The Engliſh miniſters do not mince the matter; and they have already made it appear, that they will ſtic at nothing. They are all furious perſons. Sunderland, who is, in a manner, at the head of affairs, and who has got all the intereſt he has with the king of England, by having conſented to what has been done againſt us (being beſides our enemy) is at preſent at Hanover, to take his inſtructions from the Germains, and your excellency may depend upon it, he will execute them with all the boldneſs [effronterie] imaginable. Your excellency will therefore find, we ought to make uſe of this opportunity to enter into meaſures againſt people, who certainly will not do things by halves. We muſt either ruin them, or be undone ourſelves, that is, if it be in their power to bring it to paſs.

Poſtſcript. My friends are now in town. An expreſs, which came to them yeſterday from the pretender, will put them in a better condition for forming a plan. To-day they are going about it. There are only five or ſix of the moſt conſiderable perſons conſulted. They would know, in caſe we agree, whether the money muſt be paid here or elſewhere, or if it muſt be ſent over to Sweden. They have alſo aſked me, if we had any occaſion for ſea-officers, for then they could furniſh us with good ones.'

In another letter at London, November 13, 1716, count Gyllenburg made good his promiſe to baron Gortz, about giving him his ſentiments about the buſineſs contained in the baron's laſt poſtſcript. 'The ſum thereof, ſays the count, is what I have already hinted, that we muſt determine ſome way or other, and that very ſpeedily. We have not in my humble opinion, any time to loſe in conſultations. If we do not take advantage of their preſent animoſity, it will cool; for the court, that is to ſay, the prince's party, does all that is poſſible to gain them. With the moſt conſiderable, it would perhaps be neceſſary to go on roundly. They run the hazard of their lives and fortunes in declaring themſelves, ſo that they will not ſpeak but upon good ſecurity. And as to the people of the ſecond rank, beſides that it would perhaps be dangerous ſo much as to hearken to their propoſals, theſe propoſals of theirs are of ſo little conſequence, and ſo confuſed, that we ſhould not be able from them to form any idea of the affair. I ſhould likewiſe be of opinion, that, till I receive freſh orders from your excellency, the ſafeſt way will be to avoid all converſations of that kind.'

The next letter is from M. Guſtavus Gyllenburgh to the count his brother, dated at the Hague, November 17, 1716, the ſubſtance of which is as follows: 'On Tueſday laſt arrived here a letter from baron Sparre, importing, that he had hopes of ſucceeding in his ſolicitation to have M. Lench ſent to the king. In his letter was incloſed one from the duke of Ormond to baron Gortz, in which the duke ſays, that the king, his maſter, had ordered him to let him [Gortz] know, that he expects ſhortly a ſupply of money; that he will then remit ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling to his Swediſh majeſty, leaving the diſpoſal of it to him; and that he begs him to look upon this as an earneſt of his good will to him. The bearer of this letter added, that the remittances might be made either to ——, or to ——. M. Sparre has ſince told the ſaid baron in confidence, of the men of war which we have bought in France, which will be ready and delivered. And that we are ſoliciting the court of France to ſend a perſon to the Czar, to make advantage of the pacific diſpoſition he is now in. But as this ſolicitation meets with many obſtacles, and that beſides France does not appear over forward to do any thing for us, unleſs it be in concert with England, M. Sparre takes notice, that my lord Mar has a couſin-german, named Erſkine, with the Czar, who is phyſician and privy-councellor to that prince; which favourite has wrote letters to my lord Mar, giving a very particular account of the Czar, viz. That the Czar will not attempt any thing more againſt the king of Sweden; that he has fallen out with his allies; that he can never be friends with king George; that he hates him mortally; that he is ſenſible of the juſt cauſe of the pretender; that he wiſhes for nothing more than a conjuncture, in which he may be able to reſtore him to his dominions; that the Czar, having the advantage wholly on his ſide, cannot make the firſt ſtep; but if the king would make the leaſt advance, there would be very ſoon an accommodation between them. The pretender has ſent to deſire baron Sparre to procure him leave to retire to Stockholm. M. Sparre has returned anſwer that, as this would be the ſame thing as declaring war by ſound of trumpet, it would abſolutely ſpoil the buſineſs in hand.'

In this letter mr. Guſtavus Gyllenburgh incloſed the copy of another letter from baron Gortz to baron Sparre, dated November, 12, 1716, as follows: 'I ſtill look upon the ſending M. Lench as very uncertain, becauſe I am perſuaded, that France will not take any ſtep, that may give the leaſt ſuſpicion, or by which they may diſguſt England, before they have finiſhed the treaty of alliance, that is now depending. Yet methinks they might venture to intimate to the court of England, that they have a mind to ſend a perſon to the king, to ſound his majeſty's intentions more thoroughly touching a reconciliation, and in order to qualify themſelves the better to do good offices.

As to the affair of England, and the duke of Ormond's letter to me, of, which you have ſent me a copy, I cannot forbear telling you frankly, ſir, that, if my ſcheme upon it be not approved and complied with, I cannot enter at all into that affair. It is upon the foundation of my ſcheme, that I have actually opened the matter to the king; and it would directly ſpoil all to make me depart from it. Any reaſonable man will eaſily comprehend the impoſſibility, in this caſe, of ſettling a treaty in form. Doubtleſs it would be running too great a hazard on both ſides, to depend upon its being kept ſecret. The beſt way is, to prepare on each ſide the materials neceſſary for the work before us. When all is ready for execution, it will then be time enough to make treaties, if it be judged requiſite.

I do not know even, whether it would be right to do what is deſired under the name of lending aſſiſtance; and I am very much inclined to think, that it would be better to avow openly our own intereſt, and the concern we have for maintaining the Engliſh liberties.

Your friends muſt place ſo much confidence in us, as to furniſh us with what we want to put ourſelves into a condition of becoming uſeful to them. The ſum required is not exorbitant. Three hundred thouſand crowns may ſatisfy us at preſent, for we want nothing but to augment our naval force at Gottenburgh.

I do not ſee what hazards your friends can run in this; I will give them ſufficient ſecurity; and, from the humour all the world knows the king to be of, they may very ſafely conclude, that, if his majeſty ſhould not be able to ſatisfy this loan by a real aſſiſtance, he would do all he poſſibly could to reimburſe our friends, the rather, becauſe his majeſty would not have it known, that he had touched any money for ſuch a purpoſe as this is lent.

Theſe gentlemen might, however, the more to engage the king's affection, give their offer the turn expreſſed in my ſcheme; though, for my part, I will not accept it, on any conditions, that may diſtinguiſh it from a common loan. But all depends upon their determining ſpeedily, and beginning forthwith, by furniſhing the three hundred thouſand crowns for the men of war, without which they muſt not flatter themſelves, that any thing can be done. I am upon the ſcent of getting a fourth hundred thouſand even in England.

France cannot reproach us with this agreement, while no treaty or convention can be produced to prove it. What I ſaid above, of the cautious behaviour of the court of France towards England, is no doubt applicable likewiſe to the negotiating of an accommodation with the Czar. It is probable, the court of France would not proceed in a negotiation of that kind, but by concert with England; and you will grant me, that this would not by any means ſuit our intereſt. This reflection leads me into an opinion, that the canal of France is not at preſent the moſt commodious for us. It may ſuffice therefore to have offered to make uſe of that canal without preſſing the matter further. Nor can M. Lench be the manager of this negotiation. For going to, and coming from Sweden at the ſeaſon of the year we are now in, requires time; and if we come to any agreement with the Czar, we ought to conclude it within three months at the very fartheſt. The canal of my lord Mar ſeems to me to be alike inconvenient and impracticable, becauſe of the length of time which that circulation of correſpondence would unavoidably take up. Yet I cannot but think, that by the canal of the favourite phyſician, the good diſpoſitions of the Czar might be improved, if they are indeed ſuch as have been repreſented. If the Czar comes hither, and one can get a private converſation with the favourite, we might certainly carry things on far, ſuppoſing, as I ſaid, that what the favourite, has written be well founded. In the mean while I am contriving ſome other way.

If we fix upon a project, that is in any tolerable degree promiſing, I ſhall not be with-held by the difficulty and hardſhips of the voyage from being the bearer of it myſelf.

If in the mean time your friends would enter into my ſcheme, I ſhould be the more ſure of bringing the king to a thorough good liking of their buſineſs. But I will not venture to convey any thing of this to his majeſty, otherwiſe than by word of mouth. It is ſatisfaction enough to me to know originally, that I am in no danger of giving offence to Sweden by the part I take upon me to act in this affair. The fancy of the pretender's retiring to Stockholme ſurprizes me: it would be blazing abroad our ſecret intelligence by ſound of trumpet.'

On the 12—23 of November, 1716, baron Gortz wrote from the Hague the following letter to count Gyllenburgh: 'I told you in my letter of Friday, that I deferred anſwering yours of the 13th, which I am now going to do. You ſay, ſir, that, as to the affair you are preſſed about, it would be neceſſary to go roundly to work with the principals. I am entirely of the ſame opinion. The buſineſs then is to ſpeak plainly. I believe, ſir, it will be thought a ſufficient proof of our frankneſs to declare, as you may do, that nothing is more natural, nor more ſweet, than to revenge an affront one has received; but that, in point of prudence, it ought to be maturely conſidered, whether the paſſion of revenge can produce the deſired effect. If your people do but make the leaſt reflection upon this rule, they will undoubtedly perceive, that it is entirely their buſineſs to make the ſucceſs of the enterprize, which they deſire, appear probable to us. After that it will be likewiſe proper, that they ſhould help us in ſettling the neceſſary points, that is, that they ſhould aſſiſt us with money. As I run no riſque with you, ſir, I make no ſcruple of telling you in confidence, that the buſineſs in hand has for ſome time been part of my correſpondence with embaſſador Sparre.

The principal members of the preſent court of Avignon, offer, on the part of their maſter, 60,000l. ſterling to engage the king's affection, I remonſtrated thereupon, that the delicacy of the conjuncture ought to caution us againſt cloſing too haſtily with this offer; but that I propoſed to treat upon the foot of a common loan; and that, in that caſe, being furniſhed with the king's full power to negotiate money for his majeſty's ſervice, I might accept it, giving them aſſurances on the king's part, for repayment, that if at the ſame time they would communicate to me a plan of the principal affair, I would not fail to ſend it to the king; and that, in caſe his majeſty ſhould be unwilling to enter into the deſign in queſtion, he would at leaſt pique himſelf upon taking care, that the ſum, which I ſhould have borrowed in his name, ſhould be punctually diſcharged; ſo that the lenders would run no riſque of their money, but that, on the contrary, they would have put it out to a good advantage, and that, in ſhort, the offer being made upon the foot before mentioned, without ſtipulating any other conditions than being reimhave already given new life to our trade and credit; and particularly in the treaty lately concluded with France and the States-General. As your majesty has, by this treaty, recovered to us, in so great a measure, those advantages, which might have been expected from a glorious and successful war, and were given up by a treacherous and dishonourable peace; we beg leave to congratulate your majesty upon an alliance, which opens to us so fair a prospect of an undisturbed succession, an equal balance of power, and a flourishing commerce.

We return your majesty our most humble thanks, for your majesty's most gracious condescension, in having laid before your parliament the discoveries concerning the intended invasion; and cannot but regard, with the utmost horror and indignation, the malice and ingratitude of those, who have encouraged such an attempt against their king and country.

We are sorry to find that your majesty's lenity has been ineffectual towards reclaiming a faction, who have rendered themselves so obnoxious to your justice.'

When this address was reported to the house, a bebate arose on account of the lord Coningsby's urging it very earnestly, that the peace of Utrecht was treacherous and dishonourable. The bishop of London asserted the contrary, burſed, the king might be more effectually wrought upon by that mark of their good will, than by directly ſollciting the ſuccours they deſire. I added to all theſe intimations, that, in caſe the king reliſhed the project of a revolution to be brought about in England, it might perhaps do better to give this enterpriſe the turn of its being intended to revenge the unworthy proceedings of the kings of England, and to maintain the Engliſh liberties.

You have herewith, ſir, the copy of a pecuniary contract, which I have juſt now ſettled with ſome private perſons in this country. You will find by it, that there is a conſiderable advantage to be made, which it was neceſſary to allow to ſtrangers, ſince no body in Sweden had courage enough for it. If your people had a mind to engage in it abſtractedly from the grand affair, I would admit them forthwith as far as the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns. The king's printed patent, whereof you have herewith a copy, ſufficiently ſecures every individual perſon from all frauds with regard to the ſtate's bonds, upon which the money is advanced.

But they muſt determine ſpeedily, or lay aſide all hopes, as I have juſt now obſerved to ambaſſador Sparre in a poſtſcript, which I communicate to you.

If the thing be taken upon the foot before mentioned, it may go on; but otherwiſe nothing can be done. In a word, we muſt have money, and, after that, we muſt know what they are in a condition to do in England, and what part they expect the king ſhould take, to put this deſign into motion, and to ſupport it.'

In anſwer to baron Gortz, count Gyllenburg wrote to him the following very remarkable letter, dated at London, December 4, 1716: 'As ſoon as I had received your excellency's letter of the 23d paſt, I went to one of the principals at his own houſe, with whom I have had a long and intimate friendſhip. I ſhewed him your excellency's letter which I enforced the beſt I could. Whereupon he aſked me, whither I had ſpoke of it to any one of his party? and I telling him I had not, he deſired me, for the love of God, not to do it. We were made to believe from Avignon, ſaid he, that all went on currently; that baron Gortz had accepted our offer, and had given poſitive aſſurances, on the part of the king of Sweden, of his aſſiſtance. We have been preſſed on the affair of the money, and to form a ſcheme; and we have actually applied ourſelves to both the one and the other. In the midſt of all this, here are three poſts arrived from Avignon, and no farther ſigns are ſhewn of ſo much haſte. This change has very much perplexed us, we not knowing to what to impute it, unleſs the prince's indiſpoſition. But all is now become clear. They were too ſure of their point at Avignon; they reckoned immediately on the aſſiſtance of the king of Sweden; and now they are afraid, on one hand, of damping our courage, by owning frankly, that they had deceived themſelves; and, on the other, they dare not, upon an uncertainty, engage to ſupply them with money, being ſenſible, it is the laſt we ſhall give them, if we ſhould find it employed to any other purpoſe than we deſigned; and without direct aſſurances firſt given of our having the ſuccours we need. You ſee, therefore, continued he, of what conſequence it is, if you wiſh us well, that you do not make known, to any perſon, what I ſee our court of Avignon conceals with ſo much care. If you act otherwiſe, you will deſtroy the credit of the chevalier de St. George here, which perhaps will be of neceſſary uſe to you, and you will make his adherents your implacable enemies; for, if their deſign fail, they will be regardleſs, whether Sweden periſhes or not; and yet you know, that it is they, who have hitherto defended your cauſe, as well in the country, as in the parliament of England, and who have obliged your enemies to act with more caution and reſerve than they would otherwiſe have done. You will ſtill have occaſion for their aſſiſtance in the next ſeſſion of the parliament of England, which your enemies are preparing to incenſe terribly againſt you, as well by pamplets, which are now actually in the preſs, as by petitions of the merchants, who have loſt their ſhips, and who now meet twice a week to conſult. Now, ſaid he, to return to baron Gortz's letter, give me leave to tell you freely, that, if the queſtion was explicitly and ſimply, whether we ſhould aſſiſt the king of Sweden, and we conſented, it might then be worth while to aſk, what ſecurity we required, and what gain we inſiſted on? but this is not the caſe at preſent, nor ever will be. For I muſt own to you very ingenuouſly, that there are very few amongſt us, who have any concern for the intereſts of foreign princes, any longer than while they affect our own, and that even very palpably: 'Manus noſtræ oculatæ ſunt; credunt quod vident: Our eyes are in our hands; what they ſee we believe.' So that for you to flatter yourſelves, that, out of reſpect or friendſhip, we ſhould part with our money to any whatſoever, would be to know nothing of us. You can never alter our minds on that article: ſo you muſt juſt take us as we are. As for gain, can we hope for greater in any country, than what we have at home, without riſquing our money? Do we not make 7 or 8 per cent. by the public funds; and this upon the ſecurities of the parliament of England, and are paid punctually every quarter? That, this queſtion being utterly unſeaſonable, it is neceſſary to form another, and let that be, whither we are willing, by a pecuniary ſubſidy, to merit the aſſiſtance of the king of Sweden? To that I anſwer roundly, let us but be aſſured on the part of his majeſty, upon whoſe bare promiſe we will rely, more than on all the ſecurities and engagements of others: I ſay, let us only be aſſured, that by our money we ſhall merit his help, and actually have it. After this, let us but know what you would have us to do, and we will make ſuch efforts, that his majeſty ſhall not repent of giving his royal word to aſſiſt us. But, ſir, added he, what muſt we think, when, after a negotiation of three months or more, we are yet in uncertainty upon what ought to be the chief ſpring of all our undertakings, and are to merit by our money, not the help we aſk, but barely an anſwer whether we ſhall obtain it or not? How can we run into expence, expoſe our friends, and, in ſhort, endanger our fortunes and lives when perhaps his majeſty's refuſal may ſtop us ſhort; ſubject, among other things, to the fear of being betrayed by thoſe who ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of our projects, and that there is nothing to be hoped for more on our ſide, may endeavour to make their fortune, by ſtriking in with our enemies, and ſacrificing us?

Let us examine all this and you yourſelf will acknowledge, we ſhould hazard too much in following thoſe, who leave us in ſuch uncertainty. But, on the other hand, what does the king of Sweden riſque? Is not our government his enemies in every reſpect; and will it not aſſiſt them more this enſuing year? What can be ſaid againſt him, if, after the example of Scipio he carries the war into their country, who have been deſirous, and are ſtill ſo to carry it into his? This diverſion will be ſo much the greater, as it will be unexpected; and there is the more reaſon to hope for ſucceſs, becauſe the whole country is diſaffected. It is alſo probable, that half the army will be diſbanded by the parliament of England; and it is certain great part of that army will deſert on the approach of a ſufficient body of troops.

But, ſuppoſe this enterprize ſhould not ſucceed, would this government be more bent upon the entire ruin of the king of Sweden than it was before? and, when king George's deſire to have the country of Bremen is ſatisfied, will our government be leſs ſollicitous by what means to prevent the Czar's aggrandizing himſelf? let me beg you, ſaid he, to repreſent all this to Baron Gortz; and I am ſure he will change his opinion; that he will not let ſlip, by chaffering, an opportunity ſo beneficial for the king of Sweden, and ſo glorious for himſelf. Tell him likewiſe, if you pleaſe, that there is nothing more proper than what he demands as to a ſcheme; and the means of ſupporting the affair. But he muſt give us the encouragement to ſee, that we are not labouring in vain, and running all hazards without any fair proſpect. One poſitive aſſurance given at Avignon will put all in motion; but, without that, all will flag. As to the colour, which the king of Sweden may put upon his enterprize, I ſhall always have that opinion, ſaid he, which baron Gortz himſelf would have me entertain of his ſcheme, namely, that the king of Sweden intends ſincerely to reſtore the chevalier. But I am much afraid, that the reſt of my party will take this affair in quite another light; that is to ſay, that they will imagine, his Swediſh majeſty, having not given any promiſe to our chevalier, nor declared for him, will make no other uſe of this enterprize, than only to compaſs his own deſigns, excluſive of the chevalier, and to oblige king George to come to better terms. But in this he will find himſelf deceived; for the greateſt part of the nation being at preſent inflamed with jacobitiſm, and ſet a longing for the return of him, whom they believe their lawful ſovereign, they will not join any perſon, who does not declare openly for him; on the contrary, perceiving it is only a foreign quarrel, which draws the king of Sweden hither, vexed to ſee their expectations fruſtrated, and not knowing how far his majeſty's reſentments may go, and who will be expoſed to his vengeance, or who be exempt from it, they will fall into the common humour of the nation, which is to unite all, notwithſtanding their paſt feuds againſt a foreign power.

This is ſo true (continued he) that, if the chevalier de St. George had not an Engliſh father, and been born in England, all his pretentions would avail him nothing with the common people; who when the conteſt ſhall be only between foreigner and foreigner, will certainly declare for him in poſſeſſion, without much regard to the juſtice of the cauſe.

For what remains, (added he) I entirely agree, that the maintaining of the church of England ought to be the topic in the king of Sweden's manifeſto. This is the more neceſſary, becauſe it would ſerve to ſettle the minds of ſuch, as are diſturbed about the chevalier's religion. His majeſty likewiſe would act in his known character, which is to be on all occaſions, ſollicitous for the welfare of the proteſtant religion.

This, ſir, is what was moſt material in my converſation with my friend, who, I aſſure your excellency, is a man of ſolid judgment, and ſo well informed of what paſſes at Avignon, that he told me a long time ago what was negotiated there on our part, though I took no notice of it, while I ſaw nothing particular about it, either in your excellency's letters, or in thoſe of monſieur Sparre. He even told me, that a certain relation of my lord Mar's was confident of doing us very good offices with the Czar; and that it had been intimated to baron Sparre. But, being tender of intruding into the provinces of others, I reckoned your excellency would be better informed of this the direct way.'

In anſwer to this letter baron Gortz wrote the following letter, dated at the Hague, December 11, 1716, to count Gyllenburg: 'I have received your agreeable letter of the 4th inſtant. I ſhall have the honour to anſwer the contents of it, that the ſtronger the reaſons are, which are alledged to make us enter into the affair you know of, the more ſhould people be perſuaded of the true deſire, that we have to undertake the thing. It is ſuperfluous to ſuggeſt motives to us, and we have no need of a ſpur. As I run no riſque with you, ſir, I will freely tell you, that, even before my departure from Sweden, we were already on our ſide, diſpoſed to this expedition. It is eaſy to believe, that thoſe diſpoſition are ſince increaſed, in proportion as the animoſity of the court, where you are, hath continued increaſing. There is therefore now no other queſtion, but of the means to ſatisfy our juſt deſire of revenge. We have in Sweden troops more than enough for that purpoſe; but what ſuſpends our entering upon actions is that,

Firſt, We have not the ſhips neceſſary as well for tranſporting the troops, as for the convoy itſelf.

Secondly, We do not know how it is propoſed to maintain the troops, when they ſhall be arrived at the place intended.

Thirdly, Horſes muſt forthwith be found to mount the cavalry. It is well known, that when one enters into an open country, the firſt impreſſion muſt be made by the cavalry.

Fourthly, We muſt know the number of troops, that is thought requiſite for this expedition, in order to regulate thereby the armament of the ſhips.

It is true, ſir, that, for ſeveral months laſt paſt, we have had ſome preliminary negotiation upon theſe matters with the court of Avignon. They have declared themſelves very well ſatisfied with the manner, in which we and ſaid, 'he himſelf drew up the inſtruments of that treaty, and, in his opinion, it was as good a peace, as had been concluded for theſe forty years paſt.' Lord Coningſby replied, 'he did not intend any perſonal reflection on any perſon; but the venerable prelate who ſpoke laſt, might remember, that about two years ago, when the miniſters who made the late peace were impeached, his lordſhip declared, he was kept in the dark, and ſcarce knew any thing of what was doing at Utrecht.'

The commons, in their addreſs, obſerved, 'that they could not, but with the higheſt reſentment and indignation, look upon the obſtinate and inveterate rancour of thoſe, who were again endeavouring to imbroil their native country in blood and confuſion: and that it was aſtoniſhing to find, that any, who called themſelves proteſtants, could be ſo inflexible and reſtleſs in their endeavours to impoſe upon us a popiſh pretender, and rather venture to ſubject the kingdom to a foreign yoke, than depart from their darling and avowed deſign of altering and ſubverting the preſent happy eſtabliſhment in the proteſtant ſucceſſion.' They conclude, 'we are all but too ſenſible of the unſupportable weight of the national debts, and therefore will not neglect to apply ourſelves with all poſſible diligence and attention to the great and neceſſary work of reducing and leſſening by de-we have ſpoken to them, and have promiſed not only to give the neceſſary explanations upon the advances of money propoſed, but alſo to furniſh inſtantly wherewithal to prepare on our ſide, during this winter, every thing, that concerns the firſt ſtep; being themſelves of opinion, that if any thing be intended to be done, it muſt be entered upon immediately after the obſtacles, which a hard winter might bring to navigation, are removed; but hitherto all this has ended only in vain hopes. However, I have not, on my part, loſt any time for this enterprize. I have beſtirred myſelf to find out men of war; I have actually found out ſome, and have even made bargains for purchaſing ſix of between ſixty and ſeventy guns, all armed and rigged; and they are to be delivered at Gottenburg in the beginning of the month of March. The advance of money which I aſked from the court of Avignon, was only deſigned for the purchaſe of thoſe ſhips: and the ſum did not exceed ſixty thouſand pounds. If I have propoſed the expedient of furniſhing us with this money upon the foot of a common loan, it was only done, ſir, with a view, the better to ſecure thoſe, that were concerned on both ſides, from the danger of a diſcovery, and thoſe that ſhould give the money, againſt the accidents, in caſe any ſuch ſhould be, that might render the deſign impracticable. It is alſo the fear either of ſome treachery or diſappointment, which cannot be foreſeen, that will hinder us from declaring before we come to the place where we are to ſhew ourſelves.

Our friends will have nothing to object againſt this precaution, if they will but conſider that, if we throw off the maſk too ſoon, and ſhould afterwards miſs our blow, we ſhould give the Engliſh miniſters a very good argument to carry the nation into a war againſt us, into which they would not have a great deal of trouble to draw Holland alſo.

This is a riſque of the laſt conſequence; and would they have us run into it, ſir, for a trifle? I do not know how elſe to ſtile the money buſineſs in queſtion.

The naval armament at Gottenburg cannot be uſeful to us, unleſs, for the deſign, which they propoſe to us, and the money we aſk will not be ſufficient even for that armament.

As to the reſt, however juſt and ſolid I allow your friend's reaſoning in other matters, yet I cannot reconcile the opinion, which your friend ſeems to have of the good faith of the king and his intereſt, with the fear which is nevertheleſs ſhewn, that we have no other end than to procure for ourſelves the reſtitution of the duchy of Bremen.

Pray, ſir, which way can the king of Sweden better ſecure to himſelf the recovery and poſſeſſion of his ſaid duchy, than by reducing king George to be nothing more than an elector of the empire? By which means the king of Sweden will make himſelf be courted by the houſe of Lunenburg, as in former times. Can good faith and a man's word be put in the ſcale againſt ſo ſolid and ſo evident a reaſon, after we have experienced how little account ought to be made of a ſecurity founded in words or in treaties? To be ſhort, ſir, the queſtion is with us, an affair already decided; nothing remains but to conſider the means.

As I underſtand the matter, thoſe, that ſhall furniſh the money, will be in no danger; they may give it under the name of Dutch merchants, and under pretext of the great gain, that is to be made in dealing with me. The better to colour the thing, they may even give commiſſion to ſome Engliſh merchants, to make an agreement with me upon the foot of the contract, which I have had the honour to communicate to you. After this there would remain no other riſque than that of loſing the money, in caſe the deſign ſhould not be executed; but, if they had the leaſt confidence in the word of the king, this ſcruple would vaniſh immediately. His majeſty piques himſelf too much upon performing his engagements, to leave any room to miſtruſt him We have freſh proofs of this; notwithſtanding the vaſt expence, that we are obliged to bear, his majeſty would have the pretenſions of mr. Cook, and the other merchants in France, touching the money advanced to him in Turkey, ſatisfied, and I have actually paid thoſe creditors.

To conclude, I muſt tell you again, ſir, that they muſt come to a reſolution ſpeedily, or think no more of the affair for all the next year.

It would alſo be neceſſary, that thoſe, who mean us well, ſhould labour to get half the troops that are now on foot in England, broken, and to hinder any naval armament till the month of May.

It concerns us alſo to know, for our direction, what number of regular troops will remain, after they ſhall have got one half of them diſbanded. I reckon, that we might employ from ten to twelve thouſand Swedes in this expedition; amongſt whom there ſhould be four thouſand horſe.

When things ſhall be put upon the foot above-mentioned, I intend to go into Sweden myſelf, to puſh on the execution; for I do not like to rely on the care of others in ſuch a particular. I had alſo rather concert this affair directly, and with you, than by the other way, which I think too long.

My lord's relation hath indeed ſent word, that the czar has ſome diſpoſitions to peace, which we will not fail to make advantage of, that we may be in a condition the better to puſh on the affair in queſtion. The czar is to be here very ſpeedily. If it could be ordered, that the ſaid relation of my lord Mar ſhould ſpeak to me, I ſhould quicly perceive what might be done there. You will eaſily judge, ſir, that an agreement with the czar would give great weight to the other affair.'

In anſwer to this letter, count Gyllenburg, on the 18th of December, N. S. 1716, wrote the following to baron Gortz: 'I received, two days ago, the letter your excellency did me the favour to write me of the 11th, and I have not deferred the execution of your orders one moment. I hope to be able to give you an account of them by the next mail. In the mean time I ſhall have the honour to anſwer to your excellency's poſtcript, that I ſhall not fail to govern myſelf as you there direct. If I have hitherto done otherwiſe, it has been, that I might not be accuſed of not repreſenting matters as they were on one ſide and the other, leaving it afterwards to our miniſters to make choice of that, which they thought moſt proper. Your excellency, according to your wonted goodneſs, will forgive me, however, for ſaying, that, in my opinion, whatſoever reſolution we take, it would, notwithſtanding, be well to keep the people here in good humour; that is, that we ſhould ſeem not entirely to reject their propoſals, for otherwiſe they will be prying into the motives, which render us ſo intractable, and will perhaps diſcover the true one, in which caſe they will cauſe it to miſcarry. Beſides, a little hopes would make them put off longer the puſhing the affair in parliament; and I think that is what your excellency ſeems to deſire. Methinks, to this end, it would be neceſſary, that your excellency ſhould write Petkum an anſwer, who complains of having received none to his letters, to ſhew your acknowledgement of the pains he has taken, and to deſire him to go on, in order to keep the miniſters in the ſame good way, till your excellency has received an anſwer to the account which you have given his majeſty of the whole affair; and then we may act with more vigour. As Petkum generally ſhews all his letters to Townſhend and Bothmar, I fancy they will thereby be eaſily perſuaded to believe what they wiſh. If this letter comes before the arrival of king George, it will perhaps prevent the impreſſion, which the Germans and Sunderland will be apt to make with their uſual violence at their firſt coming over.'

The two next letters relate principally to bills of exchange, ſhipping, corn, ſalt, &c. for Sweden; but in one from count Gyllenburg to baron Gortz, dated at London, December 29, 1716, he writes as follows:

'I am once more obliged to defer the departure of my expreſs till Friday, one of the principal of our friends being not yet returned to London; but he will be here to-morrow. I have the letters ready for the phyſician, but dare not venture them by the poſt. While I am waiting for the principal of my friends, I ſhall diſpatch to-morrow a gentleman to the czar, to endeavour to poſſeſs him with pacific thoughts. I have given him letters for my brother, that he may introduce him to your excellency, who will give him ſuch inſtructions, as you ſhall judge neceſſary. He is a Muſcovite by birth, and having been a long time known to my friend, and perhaps even employed on the like meſſages, he aſſures me, that we may put entire confidence in him. I have intimated to him, that he may alledge, for the pretext of his voyage, his natural inclination to ſerve the czar, by which he was induced to diſcover to him, that king George is making all the offers imaginable to acquire Bremen of the king of Sweden, at the expence of the czar, who is to be the ſacrifice of that acquiſition. Your excellency will add what other hints you judge convenient. I ſhould think, however, it might be proper, that this man ſhould be kept ignorant of the canal of the phyſician. I have another letter for him, which may introduce my brother to his acquaintance, and then he may convey meſſages between your excellency and the phyſician, till your excellency ſhall think fit to have an interview with him. We are aſſured here, that king George will have none with the czar; and they ſeem to be very little ſatisfied with that prince.

Your excellency will have the goodneſs to remember what I had the honour to write to you in my laſt, about my lord Sunderland. I have learnt ſince, that that lord does all he can to make thoſe of his party fond of king George's project to open a port at Harbourg: aſſerting, that England will gain more by it, than even by its Weſt-India trade. One ſees very well whither all this tends. I am working againſt it. A member of parliament has deſired me to inform him of the ſituation and nature of that port.'

On the 1ſt of January, count Gyllenburg writes thus to baron Gortz, after a long account of private buſineſs, hiring of ſhips, &c. 'Since writing what goes before, my friend has been with me, and has told me, that the money, as far as twenty thouſand pounds, was ready, if I would but give my acquittance, that I had received it for the uſe of the king my maſter, and this only, that he might have ſomething to ſhew to thoſe, who made this collection, ſuppoſing, that hereafter they ſhould aſk for it. I anſwered him, that I could not give any ſuch acquittance, without your excellency's order, which I would write for this poſt. He told me likewiſe, that they had already, by order of the court of Avignon, remitted eight thouſand pounds to baron Sparre.

Since writing theſe lines, the Dutch mail of the 25th is juſt come in, by which my brother adviſes me, that your excellency was ſetting out upon your journey. It will therefore be unneceſſary to ſend the expreſs, eſpecially ſince the two letters intended are now become uſeleſs. I will, however, ſend a duplicate of this next Monday by the French poſt, together with the pieces above mentioned.

Your excellency will receive, this day, the copy of a letter, which M. Petkum writ yeſterday to baron Sparre, the contents of which confirm the ill intentions of thoſe warm men, into whoſe hands the management of affairs is going to be put: particularly if it be true, as mr. Petkum has aſſured me, that my lord Townſhend to whom he read the ſaid letter, owned, that what he had writ, in relation to our affairs, was true. All that we have to flatter ourſelves with, is, that the miſunderſtanding, which there is among theſe gentlemen, may perhaps be of ſervice to us. Thus much, at leaſt, is certain, that, if we ſet ourſelves in earneſt about the great work, the ſucceſs cannot poſſibly fail.'

The next is a letter from count Gyllenburg to baron Gortz then at Paris, dated at London, January 7, 1716-17, as follows: 'Yeſterday I received the letters your excellency did me the favour to write me of the 29th paſt. That concerning the conduct of this court came very ſeaſonably. I gave it to read to one of the principal whigs with whom I have found means of contracting a friendſhip. As I am to dine with him to-morrow, I ſhall know what effect it has had. He is already in a good way, and I queſtion not but may be carried yet further by ſuch juſt reaſoning.

M. Petkum is charmed with your excellency's letter to him. He exclaims publicly againſt the Hanoverians for the groſs falſhood they have told of him. I believe him innocent as to this fact. He has told me, he will write himſelf to your excellency by this poſt. Mr Walpole's reply is remarkable. My friend, who is one of the champions of the whigs, has told me the ſame thing. If it be not the effect of the preſent diſcontent, and the court does not find expedients to regain thoſe people, I do not know whether the court will ever venture to bring that matter upon the ſtage; but I ſhall not be ſatisfied with that.

I am trying to get it brought into parliament my own way. My friend is labouring that point with me, and, to that end, is endeavouring to inform grees, this heavy burden, which may prove the moſt effectual means of preſerving to the public funds, a real and certain ſecurity.'

The convocation alſo preſented a very loyal addreſs, wherein was the following paragraph: 'we have ſeen, in the late declarations of ſome of theſe men, who, nevertheleſs, call themſelves by the name of proteſtants, what we muſt look for, ſhould a popiſh prince ever ſit upon the throne of theſe kingdoms. Whilſt they allow us no better a character than that of ſchiſmatics and heretics, of men cut off from the communion of Chriſt's church, and all the hopes of ſalvation, what can be expected from profeſſed papiſts, who account no better of them (however they may flatter themſelves) than they do of us; but that both they and we ſhall be utterly deſtroyed by them?'

But the univerſity of Oxford did not ſhew themſelves ſo loyal; for, at a meeting of the vice-chancellor, and other heads of the univerſity, dr. Dunſter, warden of Wadham-College, having made a motion for an addreſs to the king, and being ſupported by dr. Wynne, biſhop of St. Aſaph, and by the warden of Merton-College; dr. Smalridge biſhop of Briſtol, deſired to know the ſubject of the addreſs. Biſhop Wynne readily anſwered, that they might addreſs upon theſe three heads: 1. The ſuppreſſion of the late unnatural rebelhimſelf thoroughly of the whole. It was for him, that I demanded the other day of your excellency the particulars of Harbourg; and it is likewiſe upon his requeſt that I beg your excellency will ſend me, as ſoon as may be, all that you ſhall be able to pic up in relation to the treaty concluded between Hanover and our enemies; particularly, if you can procure the agreement, by which the aſſiſtance of an Engliſh force is ſtipulated to them. Your excellency ſees hereby what I am now doing on one ſide and the other; that is to ſay, with regard to our friends. I can do nothing before I have received your excellency's orders upon my laſt.'

The following letter from baron Gortz, to count Gyllenbnrgh, is dated from Paris, January 8, 1717.

I could not acquaint you before this day, that I am now authorized to enter into the affair, which you know of; and that I am allowed the liberty to do in it whatever I ſhall think convenient. You will be able to judge of this yourſelf by the incloſed copy of the full power, that has been ſend to me. Which way ſoever I turn this affair, I do pot ſee, that we can engage in it upon any other foot than that which I propoſed to you at the firſt. As intereſt is the moſt certain ſecurity of treaties, and what we are ſollicited to undertake is of ſo great importance to us, and the moſt expeditious means to re-eſtabliſh our affairs, that can be deviſed; no man can doubt, that we ſhall apply ourſelves to it heartily and earneſtly; and that we could wiſh for nothing better, than to do it without the concurrent aſſiſtance of others, if the juncture of time would ſuffer us to diſpenſe with that aſſiſtance.

The only thing I ſee wanting for our purpoſe are men of war and tranſports. Of the firſt I can have two in Holland, and ſix in France, all rigged and armed; and thoſe, who have the diſpoſal of them, oblige themſelves to deliver them in that condition at Gottenburg in the month of March. The laſt we ſhall not want, but we muſt immediately put our hands to the work, which requires money. Mr Sparre had aſſured me, that I ſhould find an hundred thouſand crowns ready here; but I learnt at my arrival, that our friends, far from doing what they had promiſed, are now grown cool; ſo that I thought beſt, ſir, to deſire you to preſs your friends to a ſpeedy reſolution, whether on the foot propoſed they will forthwith ſupply us with money, which we muſt have to purchaſe thoſe men of war, or not. In caſe they will, it is neceſſary they ſhould order it to be paid to me here as ſoon as poſſible, that I may put thoſe, who are to furniſh me with the ſhips, upon getting them ready. If they will not, this buſineſs ought to be broken off entirely, without thinking any further of it.

To loſe four weeks more would be loſing all, for this year at leaſt; and afterwards the circumſtances of affairs will ſo change, that there can be no thinking of it any longer.

For the reſt, our intention was to tranſport twelve thouſand men; eight thouſand of them infantry, and four thouſand cavalry, of which five hundred mounted. We were to carry with us a ſufficient train of artillery, arms for ten or twelve thouſand men more, with requiſite ſtores of ammunition. We were to land at the places, whither we ſhould be directed; ſo that we ſhould have carried with us all that is neceſſary excepting horſes, which we expected to find in the country; and all might have been executed without the leaſt umbrage being taken; provided, that on the other ſide the ſecret was kept. Mr Sparre tells me, that the reaſon of the coolneſs of theſe gentlemen in this country is the treaty between this court and England, and the enſuing departure of the pretender out of this country. For my part, I take this reaſon to be a very weak one; for as this treaty, and the departure of the pretender out of this country, muſt make the court of England think themſelves in perfect ſafety, and deprive them of the pretext of keeping up their troops, our enterprize is become more eaſy, and more ſure. And to imagine that this court, at the bottom of their heart, would not be better pleaſed to have the pretender on the throne of England than the elector of Hanover, eſpecially if the firſt continued to carry himſelf well towards this court, is to have a wrong notion of its intereſt, and of the private ſentiments of the duke regent.

Mr Sparre tells me further, that our friends here think we ſhould not have occaſion for any more men of war than thoſe eight, which we have at Gottenburg; but they are to know that thoſe ſhips are but of forty guns each; ſo that it would be hazarding too much, and expoſing a body of choſen troops (for ſuch we ſhould take on this expedition) for three or four large ſhips would be ſufficient to give them chace, and to take them all. But, when we ſhall have the eight ſhips, which carry from ſixty to ſeventy guns, nothing leſs than a ſquadron could oppoſe them, and before they could be fitted out, the blow would be ſtruc.

To conclude, ſir, I wait here for a ſpeedy yea or no; and I continue to adviſe you not to ſend any account of this matter to the court; for our miniſters themſelves are ignorant of it, and know not for what intent they have been obliged to give the turn they have to the full power, which they diſpatched. 'Aut nunc aut nunquam; now or never,' as well for our friends as our enemies.

When you have fixed this affair, at leaſt for what relates to the men of war here, I am very deſirous you ſhould come over to meet me in Holland, under pretext of being ordered thither; and that you ſhould put the court in hopes of returning with ſome acceptable offer, to the end we might concert together all that remains for our enterprize; after which I would ſet out myſelf for Sweden, to order every thing for making ſure of the execution. I communicate to you the ſubjoined copy of the full power, which his majeſty has been graciouſly pleaſed to give me:

We Charles, by the grace of God, king of Sweden, Goths and Vandals, great prince of Finland, duke of Schonen, Eſtonia, Livonia, Carelia, Bremen, Verden, Stetin, Pomerania, Caſſubia, and Vandalia, prince of Rugen, lord of Ingria and Wiſmar, Palatine of the Rhine, duke of Bavaria, Juliers, Cleves, and Bergues, &c. do hereby make known, and atteſt, that whereas we have committed to the fidelity and dexterity of the moſt illuſtrious and noble, our intirely beloved baron Gortz, privy-councellor of the moſt ſerene duke of Holſtein, and chief-marſhal of his court, various affairs for our ſervice, to be tranſacted in thoſe places where he ſhall reſide: and whereas the preſent circumſtances of the times and affairs do not eaſily permit, that we ſhould be able to furniſh him with particular credential letters (commonly called a full power) for every ſeveral tranſaction: to prevent therefore all delay, which might thence ariſe, we have judged it neceſſary to conſtitute by theſe preſents him, the ſaid baron Gortz, our miniſter plenipotentiary, and to grant him full power, as by virtue of theſe preſents we do grant him full power to treat and conclude, in our name, with all and ſingular perſons of what condition ſoever, all matters, which may relate to our ſervice, and be for our intereſt; promiſing on our royal word, that we will approve and ratify, and put entirely in execution, whatever the ſaid baron Gortz ſhall ſo tranſact and conclude. In ſure teſtimony whereof we have cauſed our ſeal to be affixed to theſe preſents, and ſigned the ſame with our own hand.

Given at Lund in Schonen, the 23d day of October, 1716.

CAROLUS.
(L. S.)
H. G. de Mullern.

On the 13th of January, N. S. 1717, baron Gortz wrote from Paris the following letter to count Gyllenburg:

'I am to acquaint you, that our friends here are charmed with my ſcheme. They have cauſed one hundred thouſand livres to be paid me down, and have promiſed to get the reſt paid to me in Holland, to the ſum of one million of guilders. I will go therefore, and give orders for working with all poſſible diſpatch on the men of war, and for providing and bringing together all neceſſaries. I ſhall alſo go bac with all expedition to Holland; whence you will have further advice from me. I ſhall wait there with impatience coming of your expreſs, and of the perſon, who is to ſpeak to the phyſician.'

At the ſame time mr. Guſtavus Gyllenburg wrote to the count his brother, the following note:

'After the baron had ſigned his letter to you, he ordered me to tell you in his name, that it is abſolutely neceſſary our friends ſhould determine ſpeedily, and cauſe the money to be remitted, and paid to us, without any delay; for otherwiſe we cannot have the men of war from this country time enough.'

Upon the receipt of baron Gortz's letter of the 8th of January, with the king of Sweden's full power, count Gyllenburg wrote an anſwer to the baron at Paris, dated at London, January 15, 1717, wherein he begs leave to know, 'whether his excellency would have him, for the future, add the title of plenipotentiary to the direction of his letters. As to our affair, continues he, I went immediately to the houſe of one of the principal of my friends, and, without taking notice of any coldneſs of the gentlemen in France, I told him, in order to engage him to ſpeak, that I had juſt received your excellency's orders to give ſuch an acquittance, as had been demanded of me. He ſeemed very well pleaſed, and told me in anſwer, that he, who had the direction of the whole affair, being gone again into the country, and being not to return before Saturday next, nothing could be done till Monday; but that then he queſtioned not but I ſhould be ſatisfied. We ſhall ſee what that gentleman will ſay at his return; and unleſs the gentlemen in France have made my friends here alter their opinions (which I do not yet find they have) I hope all will go as we would have it; and, in caſe that ſhould happen ſo, I am very much of your excellency's opinion, that we ſhould leave all thoſe gentlemen to their ill deſtiny, and go another way to work.

My whig friend was charmed with your excellency's letter, which he read over and over. Many others of the ſame party begin to change their language in our favour. I ſend my brother a little piece, which is juſt publiſhed at my charge, and writ in a pretty moderate ſtile. There is ſomething in it of my own. What is ſaid in the poſtſcript, in praiſe of the prince, is in order to gain the princes's party, which is already well inclined towards us.

If your excellency thinks it proper to order me to Holland, I ſhould be of opinion, that you ſhould ſend the like orders to monſieur Petkum, on pretence, that you would receive information from us both together, concerning the poſture of affairs here with regard to our common intereſts. That would not give any umbrage, and we might eaſily find out ways of amuſing M. Petkum.'

Before this letter reached baron Gortz, he writ another to count Gyllenburg, dated at Paris, January 16, 1717, N. S. as follows:

I have juſt now received your letters of the 1ſt, 2d, 4th, and 7th. You may depend upon it, ſir, and aſſure your friends, that the expedition to England does at preſent take up all our thoughts and attention. It will depend but upon two things; one is, the procuring four or five ſhips of war; and the other is money. I know where to get the former, but I can do nothing without the other. I cannot ſign the contracts that are offered me. Your friends muſt take care to remove that obſtacle, and to provide for the other ſquadron. There is not a moment to loſe: the time is very ſhort: our friends on this ſide have aſſured me, that the money ſhould be ready forthwith. By your letters, I am to believe, there are 20,000l. ready. I herewith ſend you the acquittance, which I have given here, that you may draw yours conformably to it, which you will exchange hereafter for mine, which I will ſend you, after you have let me know the names of the creditors, and that you have received the money. We are here agreed upon the plan of our enterprize; and I am promiſed a man to be ſent to Holland, who will bring me what farther informations may be wanting. You may likewiſe aſſure your friends, that our prince will certainly be of the party; but I conjure you to give nothing in writing about this negotiation, except what relates to the acquittances upon the foot above-mentioned.

I do not expect to hear from you any more here, but in Holland; and, if your man ſhould have been got thither in my abſence, he would have found Stambke fully inſtructed.

I herewith ſend you bac the contracts ſigned according to your deſire.

lion: 2. The king's ſafe return: 3. The favour ſhewn by the court to the univerſity, in granting their late requeſt, that the officers of Sterne's regiment, quartered at Oxford, ſhould not burn publicly, on the day of his majeſty's arrival, the effigies of the Devil, Pope, Pretender, Ormond, Mar, and others. The biſhop, Smalridge, replied, 'the rebellion had been ſuppreſſed long before; a thankſgiving had already been obſerved for it, and therefore he thought it now too late to addreſs upon that ſubject.' As to the ſecond, 'there would be no end of addreſſes, if they made one upon ſuch an occaſion.' And as for the third, 'the late favour they had received, was overbalanced by having a whole regiment quartered upon them.' Dr Charlett, the maſter of Univerſity College, urged, 'that there was no precedent for addreſſing a king, who returned from his German territories.' Dr Gardiner was againſt addreſſing, to ſave charges, on pretence, that they were out of caſh. Dr Cobb and others made other objections, and ſo the motion for addreſſing dropped. But the univerſity of Cambridge did not follow their example, but preſented a loyal addreſs, wherein they owned the king to be their only rightful and lawful ſovereign. [u]

Three or four days after their addreſs, the commons paſſed a bill for prohibiting all commerce with Sweden, as long as the king ſhould think it neceſſary for the ſafety and peace of the nation. The bill was approved by the lords, and received the royal aſſent. The trade with Sweden was of great moment to the merchants, but the indignation was ſo general in both houſes, that the bill met with little oppoſition. Before the ſupplies were ſettled, the commons voted ten thouſand ſeamen for the year 1717. Then they took into conſideration the eſtimates of the land-forces. In the debate, the tories alledged, that the late rebellion being ſuppreſſed, and the Swediſh conſpiracy ſeaſonably diſcovered, there was reaſon to hope, the counties would be ſoon eaſed of the grievous burden of quartering ſoldiers; but, if it appeared that the king of Sweden perſiſted in his deſign to invade Great Britain, they would all readily give their votes for keeping the preſent forces on foot. The contrary party urged the neceſſity of taking ſpeedy and vigorous reſolutions in relation to the army. At length it was reſolved, without dividing, that the ſum of 959,943l. ſhould be granted, for maintaining the guards, garriſons, and land-forces for the enſuing year. Not long after, they paſſed the mutiny and deſertion bill, by which the ſoldiers were exempted from arreſts for debts. When this bill was before the lords, the licentiouſneſs of the army, and the diſorders committed by the ſoldiery, particularly at Oxford, were complained of, and a motion was made, that, before they paſſed a bill in their favour, they ſhould enquire into the riot, which happened in that city on the prince of Wales's birth-day. The court inſiſted on the neceſſity of paſſing the bill without delay; but readily conſented, that the Oxford riot ſhould be enquired into. Some lords of the other ſide, who were apprehenſive that the univerſity would get no credit by ſuch an examination, endeavoured to wave it, by propoſing a general enquiry into the conduct of the army. This was oppoſed by the court lords, who obſerved, that they ought not to arraign a conſiderable body of men, againſt whom there was no legal complaint; and that ſuch a proceeding could

The poſitive promiſe of letting them have iron puts me under ſome difficulty, becauſe I had no thoughts of preparing for ſo great a quantity. As to your money, you may keep an account of what your ſhall receive, four thouſand crowns. I have not yet propoſed to the king that augmentation; but I am in hopes of obtaining it for you.

In the mean time, employ all your ſkill, in order to give the court all the trouble, that is poſſible, in the next ſeſſion, in relation to their conduct in the affairs of the north; and tell me from whence proceeds the good diſpoſition wherein Walpole ſeems to be.'

The form of the acquittance mentioned and incloſed in this letter of baron Gortz to count Gyllenburg, is as follows: 'I, the underwritten plenipotentiary of his majeſty the king of Sweden, acknowledge to have received of for the ſervice of his Swediſh majeſty, the ſum of which the ſaid has found means of lending to his ſaid majeſty, the ſum of I promiſe, on the part of his majeſty, in virtue of the full power, which I have from his ſaid majeſty and which I have produced in due form, to cauſe to be repaid to the ſaid or his order, in the ſpace of two years, to commence from the date of this acquittance; ſo that every four months there ſhall be paid a ſixth part of the principal, together with intereſt at the rate of one half per cent. by the month, and ſo on, to the full payment of the total ſum. In virtue and token whereof, I have ſigned theſe preſents, the eleventh of January, 1717,

The baron de Gortz.

The next letter is from count Gyllenburg to baron Gortz, dated at London, January 18, 1717, N. S. as follows:

'My friend, that directs the whole affair, came bac from the country laſt Saturday night, as I had the honour to acquaint your excellency, that he would in my laſt. He hath this day let me know, that upon a letter which he received from my lord Mar, to remit forthwith 20,000l. into France, to the queen dowager of England, who was to pay it to us, he had actually remitted that money, which he hoped was already paid to your excellency. He aſked my pardon for not having communicated this to me ſooner, having been obliged to go into the country, the moment the affairs was diſpatched. He added, that he had deſired further orders from my lord Mar, with reſpect to the place, where the reſt of the money ſhould be paid. I doubt not but that baron Sparre has already had advice of all this, and that he has acquainted your excellency with it; which, however, I beg you would forthwith let me know, that I may quiet the minds of my friends here, who imagine, that the ſaid baron doth not act in concert with your excellency in an an affair, wherein the leaſt miſunderſtanding might do a great deal of miſchief. I have told them, that your excellency deſigned that I ſhould come to you in Holland, to concert every thing with you; with which they were very well ſatisfied. But I have told them, that I will not go thither with empty hands, and that they ought at leaſt to get 10,000l. ready for me to carry with me. I have alſo deſired them to get me a letter from the brother of the czar's phyſician, which might ſerve to introduce me to him, if your excellency think fit to employ me to ſpeak to him. I cannot expreſs to your excellency my concern, that the affair above-mentioned ſhould have taken a turn, which I did not expect; and which, for ought I know, may not be pleaſing to your excellency. Even my friends are diſatisfied at it, every thing being done unknown to them. But, as they are obliged to have great regard for the director of the affair, who is a perſon of very great conſequence, they muſt ſeem to be ſatisfied. If your excellency, after this, thinks it neceſſary for me to come to Holland, I beg your orders therein, as ſoon as poſſible, that I may take my meaſures.

After I had written theſe lines, I received the favour of your excellency's of the 13th, from whence I perceive, with a great deal of pleaſure, that our affair is begun. I read it to one of my friends, who told me, that that was the ſum, of which he had ſpoken to me ſome days ago, and which I mentioned in one of my former; that he then believe it to be 8,000l. but that it was but 6,500l. which exactly anſwers that, which has been paid to your excellency, and which makes part of the 20,000l. that has been remitted. He has promiſed me to haſten the reſt, but I ſhould think, that it would be neceſſary that our friends in France, from whom they expect the orders, ſhould pray them to diſpatch it with all haſte. He has given me hopes, that I ſhall have a good ſum with me, when I go to Holland.'

The next letter is of count Gyllenburg to baron Gortz, dated at London, January 23, 1717, in which he writes thus:

The day before yeſterday I received the favour of your excellency's of the 16th. The incloſed triplicate of that which I had the honour to write to your excellency by the laſt poſt, will ſhew you the train that our affairs are in In the mean time, I have told our friends, that your excellency thought my voyage to Holland abſolutely neceſſary, in order to concert with me the neceſſary meaſures for the enterprize; but, that your excellency would by no means have me ſtir from hence, without carrying with me what money ſhould be neceſſary. That it therefore lay upon them now to make the beſt uſe of the time, which was ſo precious to us, and to put me in a condition of going with the firſt opportunity.

They promiſed me to do their beſt, that my voyage might not be deferred longer than the end of the next week. In caſe I can by that means bring them to haſten their diſburſement, it will afterwards depend upon your excellency's pleaſure, whether I ſhall go to pay my reſpects to you or not.

Your excellency may be aſſured, that I do all in my power to traverſe the ill deſigns of our enemies. The printed piece incloſed, wherein I have ſpoken entirely as an Engliſhman, is a ſmall ſpecimen of what is to follow. I do not know whether mr. Walpole's expreſſions were the effect of his firſt rage, on account of his brother-in-law, my lord Townſhend's being removed, or whether they came from his heart. We ſhall be better able to judge of thoſe gentlemen after the king's arrival, when it ſhall appear, if they have reaſon to be ſatisfied; for it is from thence, that they will form their ſcheme of politics.

It is ſtrongly reported here, that your excellency has made a declaration, that the king having waved all preliminary demands, has accepted the emperor's mediation, and agreed to ſend his plenipotentiaries to Brunſwick. I moſt humbly beg your excellency will let me know what truth there is in it.'

The next letter is from baron Gortz to count Gyllenburg, dated at Paris, January 27, 1717, N. S. wherein he ſays: 'Yours of the 18th, with the duplicate, is come ſafe to my hands. Your friends are in the wrong, to imagine that mr. Sparre and I do not act in concert in this affair.

He has communicated every thing to me with the greateſt exactneſs, and not being authorized himſelf to enter upon this affair, nor to receive the money, he left all to my diſpoſal. I have even put into his hands acquittances, where the ſum is left in blanks, that he may make uſe of them in my abſence, as ſoon as the money is come. The friends which are in France ſhall be writ to, to preſs thoſe in England to furniſh as ſoon as poſſible, the million of Dutch guilders, which we have agreed on; and I muſt needs tell you, that I cannot take the leaſt ſtep in relation to the ſhips, which are abſolutely neceſſary to us for carrying on this enterprize, before I am in poſſeſſion of that whole ſum; for, if I ſhould begin, and the money afterwards not come in, the ſum employed upon this occaſion would be loſt; not to ſpeak of the diſgrace it would be for me to have entered upon an affair, without being able to go through with it.

As for your voyage into Holland, that likewiſe depends on the payment of this money. When you have ſecured that point, you will do me a pleaſure in coming over to me, furniſhed with all the informations tending to the execution of our deſign, which may ſtill be wanting. I will write next poſt to Petkum to come along with you.'

[u] Theſe addreſſes were followed by a long one from the diſſenting miniſters, in which they ſaid:

'We think it the particular honour of the proteſtant diſſenters, that their ſtrict adherence to the intereſt of your illuſtrious family, before your majeſty's acceſſion, and their loyalty to it ſince, have drawn upon them ſo much of the fury of their fellow-ſubjects; we are not conſcious what elſe could render us obnoxious to them: our principles being, as we hope, the moſt friendly to mankind, and amounting to no more than thoſe of a general toleration to all peaceable ſubjects, univerſally love and charity for all chriſtians, and to act always in matters of religion, as God ſhall give us light into his will about them.

We do not much expect or deſire any thing that ought to give any one the leaſt diſturbance; we only wiſh that under your majeſty, as the common father of all your loyal people, thoſe of our perſuaſion might not want capacity, as we hope your majeſty will find they never want an inclination to promote the true intereſt of the proteſtant religion, and of their country.'

not but be disagreeable, and even injurious to the king, who, by his prerogative, has the command of the army; and, if any abuses and disorders are committed by the soldiers; the complaints ought first to be laid before him: but, since it had been moved to enquire into the Oxford riots, which had indeed made a great noise, and been examined in council, they ought to address his majesty, that he would be pleased to cause all the papers, relating to that affair, to be laid before the house. The address was resolved and presented, and the papers being laid before the lords, there arose a great debate. The archbishop of York, and the bishops of Rochester and Chester, endeavoured to justify the university, alledging, among other things, 'that for forty years past they had not paid any regard to the birth-day of any prince of Wales, or even of the prince sitting on the throne, by making public rejoicings: that the university had a method of expressing their loyalty more consistent with the dignity of their founders, and the characters of their persons, than illuminations, bonfires, and firing of guns: that, as for the mayor and magistrates of the city of Oxford, they had this to plead for their excuse, that they were ignorant it was the prince's birth-day: that, the several affidavits and informations, upon which the mayor and magistrates grounded their complaints, having been sent up to court, copies of the same were returned to the officers of the regiment quartered at Oxford, in order to give them an opportunity to justify their proceedings; which produced another set of affidavits and depositions in behalf of the officers: that the magistrates had no opportunity to make any replication in their own defence; and therefore it was moved, that the house would come to no resolution, upon the foot of the two sets of affidavits but that they would adjourn the further proceedings, and appoint a day, when they would hear the persons concerned in these informations. They insisted upon this method, because nothing could set this matter in a truer light, than the cross-examining and confronting the evidences on each side; urging, that this method, their lordships very well knew, was the constant practice of the courts below, and even of all the hearings of the bar of their lordships house: and that their lordships had never yet refused to admit of a replication: that as to the disrespect to the prince regent, charged upon the university, for the neglect of ringing the bells on his royal highness's birth-day, of the sixteen colleges in the university, only three had any bells to ring: and that it appeared plainly by the affidavits taken before the mayor and magistrates, that the riotous proceedings were occasioned by the insolence and rude behaviour of the soldiers, encouraged by several members, of the university, calling themselves the constitutional club; and by the neglect of the commanding officers of the regiment, in not issuing proper orders to suppress the disturbance.' The duke of Bucks, the earl of Abingdon, the lords Harcourt, Trevor, North and Grey, and some others, spoke also in favour of the university and magistrates of Oxford.

The lord Coningsby, who spoke first on the other side, said, 'that he knew the usage of the university to have been otherwise than had been represented; and gave a short account of the behaviour in the reigns of king Charles II. and James II; and distinguished between their past and present loyalty.' He owned, 'that, in these two reigns, they had expressed their loyalty in a most extraordinary manner, and had made such great advances to countenance an unlimited power in the prince, that, if Providence had not miraculously interposed, they had, as far as in them lay, destroyed the liberties of their country, which would have involved the university in certain ruin.' The lord-chancellor, the duke of Kingston, the earl of Sunderland, the lord Parker, the lord Townshend, the lord Cadogan, and some other peers who spoke on the same side, observed in general, 'that the disrespect to the prince regent, charged upon the university and city of Oxford, was manifest; because the major of the regiment did, about ten of the clock in the morning go to the mayor, and complained, that he had shewed no regard to the prince's birth-day, by ringing the bells; to which the mayor returned a shuffling answer, pretending he did not know it to be the prince regent's birth-day. That upon this the major told him, he would draw out the regiment to celebrate the day with proper rejoicings, which he did accordingly; but that the mayor, instead of joining in the rejoicings, with a vast mob after him, filled up the public streets; and some of his attendants insulted the soldies on their march, and gave them opprobrious language, crying out, 'Down with the round-heads.' That they proceeded so far in their insults, as to throw dirt and stones at the soldiers, and even attempted to disarm some of them. That the house, wherein the officers of the regiment, and some of the collegians met to celebrate the festival, was in an insolent manner assaulted, and the windows broke by stones thrown from the opposite house of one Hurst, an ironmonger, upon which the soldiers, to revenge the affront, began likewise to break windows, of which the major was no sooner informed, but he immediately went out and bid them desist. That it was indeed affirmed in some of the affidavits produced in behalf of the university and magistrates, that a certain collegian went round the bonfire, and encouraged the soldiers to break the windows of Hurst, and all that were not illuminated; but, that the same was contradicted by no less than five or six persons, who upon oath declared, that the colgian was from seven till ten that evening in their company, and had not stirred from the house all that time. That, upon the mayor's applying to the major of the regiment, the latter gave immediate orders for patrols to go through the city, and send home to their quarters all the soldiers they should find in the streets. And that, the patrols being insulted by some of the mayor's attendants two or three of the soldiers fired, but with powder only, pursuant to the orders given them.' During this debate, the earl of Abingdon offered a petition from the vice-chancellor, and the mayor, and magistrates of Oxford, praying to be heard; and insisted, that it should be received and read: but it was urged on the other side, that the house being in a grand committee, the receiving any petitions was irregular. Then it was moved, that the chairman should leave the chair; which being carried in the negative, the debate was resumed, and about six o'clock in the evening the two following resolutions were agreed to by a majority of sixty-five against thirty-three.

I. Resolved, 'That the heads of the university, and mayor of the city, neglected to make any bublic rejoicings on the prince's birth-day; but some of the collegiates, with the officers, being met to celebrate the day, the house where they were assaulted, and the windows were broken by the rabble: which was the beginning and occasion of the riots that ensued, as well from the soldiers as the scholars and townsmen; and that the conduct of the major seemed well justified by the affidavits produced on his part.

II. Resolved, That the printing and publishing the depositions, upon which the complaints relating to the riots at Oxford were founded, while that matter was under the examination of the lords of the committee of council, and before they had time to come to any resolution touching the same, was irregular, disrespectful to his royal highness, and tending to sedition.'

1717] The commons, proceeding upon the supplies, among other things granted 24,000l. for the payment of four battalions of Munster, and two of Saxe-Gotha, which the king had taken into his service, to supply the place of such as during the rebellion should be drawn from the garrisons of the States-general to the assistance of England. This occasioned a great debate. It was said, as these troops did not serve, they ought not to be paid. It was replied, by the treaties it was agreed that they should be paid whether they served or not, and the circumstances of the times made such an agreement necessary. It was moved, and the question put for an address to the king, that the instructions given to those who transacted the treaties for the six battalions, might be laid before the house, but it passed in the negative by a majority of one hundred and sixty-five against thirty-eight. It was believed these treaties were called for, and the addresses moved by some gentlemen, with a design to bring a censure on the German ministers. About 5,500l. was also granted to make good the damages and losses sustained by the tumultuous and rebellious proceedings in several counties, particularly the demolishing the meeting-houses. The money voted for the army, navy, and other particulars, amounted to above two millions and a half.

To raise these supplies, the commons granted a land-tax of three shillings in the pound, and the malt-tax. While these things were transacting, mr. secretary Stanhope delivered to the house the following message from the king:

'His majesty being desirous, above all things, not only to secure his kingdoms against the present danger with which they are threatened from Sweden, but likewise to prevent, as far as possible, the like apprehensions for the future, thinks it necessary that such measures should be early concerted, as may conduce most effectually to this end.

And, as this may require some expence, his majesty hopes that his commons will, by their assistance at this iuncture, enable him to make good ſuch engagements, as may eaſe his people of all future charge and apprehenſions upon this account.'

The conſideration of this unexpected meſſage was deferred till the next day, when mr. ſecretary Stanhope made a motion, 'that a ſupply be granted to enable his majeſty to concert ſuch meaſures with foreign princes and ſtates, as may prevent any change or apprehenſions from the deſigns of Sweden for the future.' He urged the advantage and ſecurity that would ariſe to the nation, by enabling his majeſty to reduce the king of Sweden; and what confidence they ought to repoſe in the king's honour, wiſdom and œconomy, in the management of what money ſhould be thought neceſſary for that ſervice. Mr Shippen replied, 'that it was a great misfortune, that ſo wiſe and excellent a prince as his majeſty was as little acquainted with the uſage and the forms of parliamentary proceedings, as with the language of our country. That, if he knew either, he would not have ſent a meſſage, which, he was ſure, was unparliamentary and unprecedented; and therefore it was his opinion, that the ſame was penned by ſome foreign miniſter, and then tranſlated into Engliſh. That, ſince the king's acceſſion to the throne, there had been reflections caſt in that houſe upon the laſt miniſtry, as if they had betrayed the intereſt of their country. That, on the contrary, they had often been told, that his majeſty had retrieved the honour and reputation of the nation, the effects of which had already appeared in the flouriſhing condition of trade. That, after all this, he could not but be very much ſurprized, to find a motion made for a ſupply of money to enable his majeſty to enter into new meaſures, to ſecure his kingdoms againſt any future apprehenſions from the Swedes. That the neceſſity that was urged for this, ſeemed to be inconſiſtent with the account of thoſe glorious advantages, which his majeſty had obtained for us. And he could not help being of the opinion, that if the new alliances and meaſures to be concerted were ſuch, as were to be obtained purely by the force of our money, that ever the happineſs or the ſecurity of the nation could be the conſequence of ſuch counſels: for, whenever foreigners come to taſte the ſweetneſs of Engliſh money, we might depend upon it, that their adherence to our intereſt would laſt no longer than we continued to ſupply their neceſſities.' Mr Hungerford, who ſeconded mr. Shippen, ſaid, among other particulars, 'that, for his part, he could not underſtand what occaſion there was for new alliances; much leſs, that they ſhould be purchaſed with money. That it muſt needs be very ſurpriſing to the whole world, that a nation, not long ago the terror of France and Spain, ſhould now ſeem to fear ſo inconſiderable an enemy as the king of Sweden; eſpecially when we had ſo good a fleet at ſea, and ſo great an army at land.' Some other ſpeeches were made on the ſame ſide, which gave mr. Stanhope occaſion to ſay, 'that he was ſorry to find gentlemen grow ſo warm upon a ſubject of this nature: that the king was a prince of that integrity and honour, and had already given ſuch convincing proofs of his tender care for the true intereſt of the nation, that they might entirely depend upon his wiſdom in this matter: and therefore he was of opinion, that none would refuſe compliance with this meſſage, but ſuch as either were not the king's friends, or who diſtruſted the honeſty of his miniſters.' This gave offence to ſeveral members; and mr. Lawſon, one of the knights of the ſhire for Cumberland replied, 'That he was very much ſurprized to find ſuch unguarded expreſſions fall from that worthy and honourable gentleman, for whom, he was ſure, the whole houſe had a very great regard. But, ſince he had thought fit to ſpeak ſo openly, he hoped he might well be juſtified in ſaying, that if every member of this houſe, that uſed freedom of ſpeech on any ſubject of debate, muſt be accounted an enemy to the king, when he happens not to fall in with his miniſters; he knew no ſervice they were capable of doing for their country in that houſe; and therefore it was his opinion, that they had nothing elſe to do but to retire to their country ſeats, and leave the king and his miniſters to take what they pleaſed.' Mr Boſcawen, comptroller of the houſhold, ſir Gilbert Heathcote, mr. Horace Walpole, and ſome other gentlemen baced mr. Stanhope's motion; but mr. Grimſtone, member for St. Alban's, and ſome other wig members, ſpoke againſt it, on the other ſide; and what is ſtill more obſervable, was the ſilence of mr. Walpole, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. However, it was moved and reſolved, that the houſe would in a committee conſider on the 8th of April of mr. Stanhope's motion for a ſupply. Mean time the king was addreſſed for a copy of the treaty made by king William, with the king of Sweden, in 1700, which was read and examined. With the treaty there was printed, and delivered to the members, an account of the damages ſuſtained by the Britiſh ſubjects in ſhips and lading confiſcated in Sweden, amounting to above 69,000l. and of the loſſes ſuſtained by the Muſcovite company, amounting to above 45,000l.

It was now obvious, that there was a miſunderſtanding among the king's miniſters, and that the wigs were divided. This more plainly appeared, in the courſe of the debate about mr. Stanhope's motion for a ſupply againſt Sweden. For, when it came to be reſumed on the day appointed, it was urged by thoſe who oppoſed it, 'that it was unparliamentary to grant a ſupply, before the occaſion was known, and an eſtimate of the expence was laid before the houſe. That the king's meſſage about this matter was ſo unprecedented, that his miniſters ſeemed to be divided about it; and that it was a great misfortune ſuch diviſions ſhould happen among the miniſtry; for then a parliament cannot have a true information of things. That they could not eaſily apprehend, what occaſion there was to make new alliances, ſince we had a ſtanding army in Great-Britain, and a conſiderable fleet at ſea, which ſufficiently ſecured his majeſty's kingdoms againſt any dangers from Sweden. That if we deſigned to make an offenſive war againſt the crown, why did we not ſend part of our forces on board our fleet; eſpecially, ſince we were now ſecure at home, both by the ſuppreſſion of the late rebellion, and by the concluſion of the triple alliance, which the regent of France had begun faithfully to perform, by cauſing the pretender to paſs the Alps? however, if the court inſiſted on the neceſſity of entering into new engagements againſt Sweden, they thought it proper to addreſs his majeſty, to acquaint the houſe with the nature of thoſe engagements, and the ſum that was requiſite to make them good.' To this it was anſwered by mr. Stanhope, and ſome others, 'that the diſcovery of the late conſpiracy, carried on by the Swediſh miniſters, in conjunction with the diſcontented party at home, ſufficiently evinced the neceſſity of a ſtanding army in Great-Britain. That the treaty of triple alliance ſeemed indeed to ſecure us againſt any danger on the part of France; but it was to be obſerved; that treaty had met with ſo great oppoſition at the French court, that, had not the regent ſticled ſtrenuouſly for it, the ſame would have infallibly miſcarried: and, though hitherto we had all the reaſon imaginable to command the honeſty and candour of that prince, yet in good policy we ought not to depend on that treaty any longer, than it ſhall be the intereſt of France to obſerve it.' And, as for the addreſs, 'the ſame would be injurious to the king's prerogative of entering into ſuch alliances, as his majeſty thinks neceſſary for the ſecurity of his dominions, without communicating the ſame to his parliament: which prerogative was grounded on very good reaſons; for, if the crown was obliged to impart the ſecret of affairs to ſo great a number of perſons, the moſt important negotiations might thereby miſcarry.' Sir Gilbert Heathcote, who ſpoke on the ſame ſide, mentioned the great loſſes and damages, which the Britiſh ſubjects had ſuſtained by their ſhips being made prize, and confiſcated in Sweden; and, beſides thoſe contained in the printed account, which was that day delivered to the members, produced a liſt of other loſſes; concluding, 'that, the king of Sweden having ſeveral times refuſed to make ſatisfaction for the ſame, and, on the contrary, his miniſters having endeavoured to raiſe a new rebellion in his majeſty's dominions, there was a ground to declare war againſt him.' To this mr. Gould replied, 'that, the Dutch having ſuſtained as great loſſes by the Swedes, they had an equal concern with Great-Britain to declare war againſt them; and therefore it would be proper, before we proceeded further, to engage Holland, in the firſt place, to prohibit all commerce with Sweden, as we had done.' Mr Stanhope ſaid, 'he made no doubt, but the States would readily come into any meaſures, that ſhould appear neceſſary for the good of both nations in general, and to obtain ſatisfaction for the late depredations of the Swedes in particular: that they had lately given ſignal inſtances of their firm adherence to the crown of Great-Britain, in cauſing the Swediſh miniſters to be ſeized in their dominions upon his majeſty's deſire: but that the form and conſtitution of their government, and the good of their ſubjects, who muſt ſubſiſt by trade, did not permit them to take ſuch vigorous and ſpeedy reſolutions, as could be wiſhed; and therefore it would not be fair to exact the ſame from them.' Mr Craggs preſſed the neceſſity of making new alliances againſt Sweden, from the late doubtful conduct of a northern potentate (meaning the czar of Muſcovy) who, by his inactivity againſt Sweden, and the poſts ſome of his troops had taken, gave great umbrage to the empire.' On the other hand, to the great ſurprize of the generality of the aſſembly, the ſpeaker and mr. Smith, one of the tellers of the exchequer, declared, that, though they were not againſt the ſupply, they were againſt demanding and granting it in ſuch an unparliamentary manner: and the ſpeaker propoſed, that part of the army ſhould be diſbanded, and the money thereby ſaved applied towards the making good ſuch new engagements, as were thought neceſſary to be entered into. But general Mordaunt, and ſome others, ſhewed how unſafe and impolitic it would be, at this juncture, to diſband any of thoſe troops. Mr Caſwell cloſed the debate with obſerving, 'that he had rather pay others for fighting than fight himſelf: that he thought it more advantageous for Great-Britain to carry the war abroad, and enjoy peace at home, in order to improve our trade, and reduce our public debts: and, as the employing foreigners againſt Sweden would be a far leſs expence than national troops, he therefore was for complying with his majeſty's meſſage.' At laſt the queſtion was put, and it was carried for a ſupply, by a majority of fifteen voices only; one hundred and ſixty-four againſt one hundred and forty-nine.

The next day, this reſolution being reported to the houſe, a ſhort debate aroſe. The aſking and granting ſupplies without an eſtimate of the expence was inſiſted on again as unparliamentary, and it was propoſed, either to preſent an addreſs to the king to aſſure him, that the houſe would effectually make good all the engagements he ſhould think proper to enter into; or that the king be deſired to diſband part of the army, and apply the ſavings towards the new alliance. Both theſe expedients were rejected by the ſpeakers on the other ſide, and mr. Hampden in particular, ſaid, 'he remembered, that, about ten or eleven years before, a great man in that houſe made a motion for allowing and providing for about nine hundred thouſand pounds, which the government had expended, without laying any eſtimate before the commons.' To this the ſpeaker, who was the perſon meant, ſaid, he wondered that gentlemen would bring in as a precedent a buſineſs, which was tranſacted ſo many years ago, and which was not parallel to the preſent caſe. Mr Hampden replied, 'he did not mean to reflect upon mr. ſpeaker, ſince he had the honour to vote with him upon that occaſion.' After ſome other ſpeeches, the reſolution for granting a ſupply was agreed to, though by a majority only of four votes, one hundred and fifty-three againſt one hundred and forty-nine.

The carrying of this vote, by ſo ſmall a majority, could not but give the king ſome uneaſineſs; and it being evident, that the great oppoſition which the court found on this occaſion in the houſe of commons, chiefly proceeded from a party of which the lord Townſhend was ſaid to be the head; mr. Stanhope wrote that very evening, by the king's command, a letter to acquaint him, that his majeſty returned him thanks for his paſt ſervices, but had no farther occaſion for him as lord lieutenant of Ireland.

The next morning mr. Walpole waited upon the king to reſign his places of firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer. The king ſhewed great regret to part with him, and with many kind expreſſions endeavoured to perſuade him to keep his poſt; but though mr. Walpole aſſured him, that he would never ſwerve from his duty to ſo good and gracious a maſter: Yet at the ſame time he repreſented, how impoſſible it was for him to ſerve him in the preſent circumſtances of affairs. Mr Methuen and mr. Pultney, ſecretary at war, followed mr. Walpole's example, and the ſame morning reſigned their reſpective places.

On the 12th of April, the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, conſidered of the ſupply againſt Sweden; and, mr. Stanhope having made a motion for granting to the king 250,000l. to enable him to concert meaſures againſt Sweden, there was for a minute or two a great ſilence in the houſe. Mr Pulteney, who broke it firſt, expreſſed his ſurprize at it; and added, 'he had not yet ſaid any thing to this matter, becauſe he thought it inconſiſtent with decency to oppoſe a motion that came from the court, while he had the honour to be his majeſty's immediate ſervant; but that, having reſigned his place, that he might act with the freedom becoming an Engliſhman, he could not forbear declaring againſt the granting a ſupply, in a manner altogether unparliamentary and unprecedented. That he could not perſuade himſelf, that any Engliſhman adviſed his majeſty to ſend ſuch a meſſage; but he doubted not, the reſolution of a Britiſh parliament would make a German miniſtry tremble.' The lord Finch ſeconded mr. Pulteney, and objected to ſome ſteps which had been taken in relation to the affairs of the north, alledging, 'that it appeared by the memorial preſented by the Ruſſian miniſter, and by the anſwer which had been returned to the ſame, that ſuch meaſures were purſued, as were likely to engage us in a quarrel with the czar.' Mr Stanhope, in a long ſpeech, vindicated the king and his miniſters, in relation both to the czar and the king of Sweden. With reſpect to the czar he obſerved, 'that hitherto he had been obliged to be ſilent; but he was now at liberty to ſet this matter in a clear light, and to acquaint the houſe, that the coldneſs which appeared of late between the king and the czar, proceeded from his majeſty's refuſing to become guarantee of his czariſh majeſty's conqueſts; and from his ſolliciting the czar to withdraw his troops from the duchy of Mecklenburgh. That, as to the firſt, his majeſty's conduct deſerved the applauſe and thanks of a Britiſh parliament, ſince it appeared, that his majeſty was tender not to engage the nation in foreign quarrels. That this indeed had been his principal care ſince his happy acceſſion to the throne; and he might aſſure them, that Great-Britain was entirely free from any engagements, and at liberty to follow ſuch meaſures, as beſt ſuit with her intereſt. That as for the inſtances which his majeſty has cauſed to be made with the czar, and the meaſures he may have concerted to get the Ruſſian troops out of the duchy of Mecklenburgh, his majeſty has acted in all this as elector and prince of the empire. That he was perſuaded, all the gentlemen there would agree with him, that the king's dignity, as king of Great-Britain, was never underſtood to tie up his hands with reſpect to his intereſts in Germany, and as prince of the empire: But, beſides, he muſt deſire gentlemen to conſider, that, long before his majeſty's acceſſion to the crown, Great-Britain was in ſtrict union with the emperor and empire; ſo that if, by virtue of antient alliances, the emperor ſhould require Great-Britain to uſe theſe inſtances with the czar, which the king has made only as elector, of Hanover, Great-Britain could not avoid complying with his requeſt. That, in relation to Sweden, the king's conduct was not only blameleſs snd unſpotted, but worthy of the higheſt commendations. That in the late queen's time, Great-Britain interpoſed to procure a neutrality in the north, whereby the king of Sweden might have preſerved his poſſeſſions in the empire. That the regency at Scockholm agreed to this overture; but that the king of Sweden rejected it with hautineſs, and the utmoſt ſcorn, declaring, he would uſe thoſe as his enemies, who ſhould pretend to impoſe ſuch a neutrality upon him.

That, during the whole courſe of that negotiation, the king, then elector of Hanover, uſed all friendly offices in favour of Sweden. That the ſame having proved ineffectual, through the king of Sweden's obſtinacy; and the king of Denmark having, by the fortune of war, reconquered the duchies of Bremen and Verden, his majeſty, as elector of Hanover, had purchaſed the ſame with his own money for a valuable conſideration. That although it was never in his majeſty's thoughts to engage Great-Britain in a war to ſupport that acquiſition; yet, if gentlemen would give themſelves the trouble to caſt their eyes upon the map, and ſee were Bremen and Verden lie, he hoped they would not be indifferent as to the poſſeſſor of thoſe two duchies, but would agree with him, that their being in the king's hands ſuits far better with the intereſt of Great-Britain, than if they were in the hands either of the czar, who gives already but too much jealouſy in the empire, or of the king of Sweden, who endeavoured to raiſe a new rebellion in Great-Britain, and harbours our fugitive rebels.'

This ſpeech made a great impreſſion upon the majority. However, mr. Smith thought fit to anſwer mr. Stanhope, and ſaid, 'he had already declared his reaſons for oppoſing the granting this ſupply in ſuch an extraordinary manner; and ſome expreſſions that had eſcaped a gentleman in the miniſtry, inſtead of making him alter his opinion, rather confirmed him in it. That he did not pretend to be thoroughly acquainted with affairs abroad; but, having had the honour to ſit ſo long in that houſe, where ſo great a variety of buſineſs, both foreign and domeſtic, had often been debated, he might preſume to have ſome knowledge of them. That however he would not ſay any thing to what had been advanced by the honourable member who ſpoke laſt; but if an eſtimate of the conduct of the miniſtry in relation to affairs abroad was to be made by a compariſon of their conduct at home, he was ſure they would not appear altogether ſo faultleſs as they were repreſented. Was it not a miſtake, (added he) not to preſerve the peace at home, after the king was come to the throne with the univerſal applauſe and joyful acclamations of all his ſubjects? was it not a miſtake, upon the breaking out of the rebellion, not to iſſue a proclamation, to offer pardon to ſuch as ſhould return home peaceably, as had ever been practiſed before upon ſuch occaſions? was it not a miſtake, after the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion, and the trial and execution of the principal authors of it, to keep up animoſities, and drive people to deſpair, by not paſſing an act of indemnity and grace, by keeping ſo many perſons under hard and tedious confinement, and by granting pardons to ſome, without leaving them any means to ſubſiſt? is it not a miſtake not to truſt to a vote of parliament for making good ſuch engagements as his majeſty ſhall think proper to enter into; and, inſtead of that, to inſiſt on the granting of this ſupply in ſuch an extraordinary manner? is it not a miſtake to take this opportunity to create diviſions, and render ſome of the king's beſt friends ſuſpected and obnoxious? is it not a miſtake, in ſhort, to form parties and cabals, in order to bring in a bill to repeal the act againſt occaſional conformity?' To this ſpeech mr. Stanhope replied, 'that he had the honour to ſerve his majeſty ſince his happy acceſſion to the throne, but, as there were other perſons (ſome of them in, and others out of place) who had a greater ſhare than himſelf in the adminiſtration of affairs, he left it to them to juſtify themſelves. That, however, he would clear a principal point, by aſſuring the aſſembly, that he had ſome time ago the king's orders to draw up an act of indemnity [v].

Mr William Young, ſon of ſir Walter Young, ſaid, 'that ſome days before he had been againſt the motion for granting a ſupply upon the king's meſſage, becauſe he thought it unparliamentary; and it was then his opinion to addreſs the king to enter into ſuch engagements, as his majeſty ſhould think proper; and that the commons would make good the ſame. But that, ſince the majority of the houſe had determined to grant a ſupply, they had brought themſelves into this dilemma, either to grant what was aſked as neceſſary for the ſervice, or to tell the king, that ſervice muſt remain unperformed, which they, in a manner, determined to be neceſſary, by granting a ſupply. This ſpeech was ſupported by ſir John Brownlow, and mr. Gould, who owned, 'that we could not carry on our trade to the Baltick, without bringing the king of Sweden to reaſon: and therefore he was for granting this ſupply.'

Mr Walpole, who cloſed the debate, ſaid, 'that, having already ſpoken for the ſupply, he would not refuſe the court his vote; and, the ſum being named, he was for granting it. [w] Upon this, moſt of the tory members, who were divided among themſelves as to the ſum, going out of the houſe, it was carried, 'that a ſum not exceeding 250,000l. be granted, to enable his majeſty to concert ſuch meaſures with foreign princes and ſtates, as may prevent any charge or apprehenſions from the deſigns of Sweden for the future.' Which reſolution was afterwards paſſed in form.

By this time there was almoſt a total change in the miniſtry. The earl of Sunderland was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, as was alſo mr. Joſeph Addiſon: mr. Stanhope was made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer; lord Torrington, mr. Wallop, mr. Baillie of Jerviſwood, and mr. Micklethwaite were the other commiſſioners of the treaſury; ſir William St. Quintin, mr. Methuen, and mr. Edgecombe, being removed, mr. Craggs was declared ſecretary at war; mr. Charles Stanhope, coadjutor to mr. Lowndes, ſecretary to the treaſury; and mr. Joſeph Micklethwaite, ſecretary to mr. Stanhope, as chancellor and under treaſurer of the exchequer. The earl of Orford reſigned his place of firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, which was given to the earl of Berkley. The reſt of the commiſſioners of the admiralty were mr. Aylmer, ſir George Byng, mr. Cockburne, and mr. Chetwynd. The duke of Bolton was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; and his place of lord chamberlain of the houſhould was beſtowed on the duke of Newcaſtle. The duke of Devonſhire reſigned his place of preſident of the council.

The commons, having been adjourned during theſe changes, met again the 6th of May. All the expedition poſſible had been uſed to fit out a fleet for the Baltick, conſiſting of twenty-one ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and fire-ſhips. This fleet, under the command of ſir George Byng, arrived at Copenhagen the 11th of April, in order to ſail into the Baltick, to obſerve the motions of the Swedes. An expreſs of his arrival in the Sound came juſt before the meeting of the parliament. The king thought proper to acquaint the parliament with the news, which, as it was unexpected, could not but agreeably ſurprize both houſes. To this end he came to the houſe of lords, and delivered to the chancellor the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'It is with great ſatisfaction, that, after this ſhort receſs, I can acquaint you with the certain advice I have received, that my fleet is ſafely arrived in the Sound, which, by the bleſſing of Almighty God, will ſecure theſe kingdoms againſt any immediate danger of an invaſion.

I have, by this means, an opportunity, which is very acceptable to me, of making a conſiderable reduction in our land-forces, having eſtabliſhed it as a rule with myſelf, to conſult the eaſe of my people in every thing, ſo far as is conſiſtent with their ſafety. And, for my own part, as I ſhall always place my greatneſs in the proſperity of my ſubjects, ſo I ſhall always deſire, that my power may be founded in their affections.

It is upon theſe conſiderations, that I have given orders for the immediate reduction of ten thouſand men.

That nothing may be wanting in me to quiet the minds of all my ſubjects, I have likewiſe given directions to prepare an act of grace; and, however it may be received by thoſe,

[v] Mr Barrington Shute anſwered mr. Smith more at large, and ſaid, 'that the king was indeed come to the throne with the joyful acclamations of moſt of his ſubjects; but that the diſaffection that appeared ſoon after, did not proceed from the ill conduct of his miniſters, but ſolely from the removal of ſome perſons in great employments. That, nevertheleſs, in the changes that were then to be made, his majeſty had followed the rules of prudence, juſtice, and gratitude, ſince he advanced thoſe, who in the worſt of times had given undoubted proofs of their affection and attachment to his intereſt, in the room of thoſe who had been preferred in the laſt reign, as the fitteſt inſtruments to deſtroy the proteſtant ſucceſſion, even before it took place, and who had ſince been in open rebellion againſt his majeſty. That, as for the other miſtakes charged upon the adminiſtration, they might be reduced to theſe two, the not paſſing the act of Indemnity, and the deſign to repeal the Occaſional bill. That, as to the firſt, there were various opinions about it; and, conſidering the reſtleſs ſpirit of the diſcontented party, it was hard to determine, whether an Indemnity was a proper way to reduce them, ſince it was notorious, that the repeated inſtances of clemency, which his majeſty had given ſince his acceſſion, have been abuſed and deſpiſed. That, as to the repeal of the act againſt the Diſſenters, nothing, in his opinion, was either more juſt or reaſonable; and he could not but wonder, that a gentleman, who had been turned out of his employment in the laſt reign, and reſtored ſince the king's coming to the crown, ſhould account it a miſtake, on the other hand, to make his majeſty's undoubted friends eaſy.' Mr Smith, after an explanation demanded and given, about his being turned out of place and reſtored, replied to the laſt part of mr. Shute's ſpeech, 'that he ever was for allowing liberty of conſcience to the diſſenters, and had even voted againſt the Occaſional bill; but that, the ſame being paſſed into a law, it was his opinion, that it could not be repealed without diſquieting the whole nation.' The deſign mentioned in theſe ſpeeches, of repealing the Schiſm and Occaſional conformity acts, took its riſe from hence: mr. Hillerſden, member for Bedfordſhire, and mr. Tuckfield, member for Aſhburton, happening to meet at a tavern, and complaining to each other of the breach of court promiſes, with regard to the diſſenters, came to a reſolution each of them to invite three members to meet the next night at the ſame place. When theſe met, they all entered into the ſame way of thinking; and, when they parted, every one agreed to invite their friends. In a little time, the number increaſed to above two hundred members of the houſe of commons, who, on the 26th of March, had a meeting at the roſe-tavern, near Temple-bar, in order to conſult together, 'whether the bill for repealing the act againſt Occaſional Conformity ſhould be brought in?' The lord Moleſworth, mr. Jeſſop, ſir Richard Steele, and ſome others, made ſpeeches, to ſhew the reaſonableneſs and juſtice of eaſing the diſſenters of thoſe hardſhips, which had been put upon them in the laſt reign, chiefly upon account of their zeal and affection for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and of putting them in a capacity to ſerve their king and country; urging, that they had reaſon to believe, that ſuch a bill would be very acceptable to the king. The majority of the aſſembly inclined to this opinion: but mr. Tufnel, who had conſulted a perſon in a high poſt, and found, that the court were apprehenſive, ſuch a bill would meet with ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of peers, made a ſpeech, wherein he ſaid, that, as for his own part, he had already ſo often declared againſt the Occaſional act, that he hoped nobody would ſuſpect him of entertaining any doubt concerning its repeal. For, beſides the reaſonableneſs and juſtice of it, they ought, out of gratitude, to take off a mark of infamy, which the enemies of the proteſtant ſucceſſion had put on them, who appeared moſt zealous for it. But that, in his opinion, the queſtion now before them was not, whether the repeal of the act was reaſonable and juſt, for he hoped, the whole aſſembly were ſatisfied as to that; but whether the bringing of it in ought not to be put off till a more favourable opportunity?' Several members were of a contrary opinion; but, mr. Stanhope having declared for it, the aſſembly agreed to meet again about a week after, and debate on the affair. At the meeting, the lord Moleſworth was choſen chairman. Several ſpeeches were made to ſhew the neceſſity as well as reaſonableneſs and juſtice of bringing in the bill for a repeal at this juncture; and a miniſter of ſtate having ſent an intimation, that moſt of the obſtacles, that might have obſtructed its paſſage, were removed, it was reſolved to conſider further of the affair. But though the debate was again reſumed; and though it was reported, that ſix or ſeven biſhops, being made ſenſible of the hardſhips put on the diſſenters by theſe acts, had promiſed not to oppoſe the repeal, yet the matter took not effect at this time.

[w] Mr Walpole, upon bringing in a bill concerning the window-tax, juſt after the reſigning his places, told the houſe, 'he now preſented the bill as a country gentleman, but hoped it would not fare the worſe for having two fathers, and that his ſucceſſor would take care to bring it to perfection. Pr. H. C.

who are obſtinately bent on the ruin of their country, I promiſe myſelf, that it will raiſe a due ſenſe of gratitude in all ſuch, as have been artfully miſled into treaſonable practices againſt my perſon and government, and preſerve them from ſtanding in need of the like mercy for the future, when ſuch an inſtance of clemency may not be expedient for the public welfare, as it would be agreeable to my own inclinations.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I thank you for your readineſs to ſupport me in the preſent juncture of affairs, and for the ſupplies, which you have given me; and do promiſe you, that they ſhall be employed for the uſes, to which you deſigned them.

I ſhall order ſuch faithful accounts to be laid before you the next ſeſſion, as will make it appear, there was no other view in aſking any particular ſupply, than to prevent a much greater expence, which the nation muſt have unavoidably incurred without it.

I muſt recommend to you, as I did at the beginning of the ſeſſion, to take all proper methods for reducing the public debts, with a juſt regard to parliamentary credit.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The year being ſo far advanced, I hope you will go through the public buſineſs with all poſſible diſpatch and unanimity; it being my intention to meet you early next winter, that the ſitting of parliament may be brought into the more uſual and convenient ſeaſon.'

The lords immediately voted an addreſs of thanks, which they preſented the next day. The like addreſs being moved for in the houſe of commons, and reported, mr. Shippen propoſed an amendment. Inſtead of, 'the reducing ſuch a body of land-forces is the moſt acceptable pledge you could give your people of your tenderneſs for them,' he propoſed to ſay, 'that nothing could more endear his majeſty to all his ſubjects than the reducing the land-forces to the old eſtabliſhment of guards and garriſons, ſuch as his majeſty found it at his acceſſion to the crown.' To ſupport this motion, he repreſented the danger of a ſtanding army, urging, that in Cromwell's time a force, much leſs than what will remain in Great-Britain, had, after the intended reduction, overturned the monarchy, aboliſhed epiſcopacy, put down the houſe of peers, and drove the commons from their ſeats. He was ſeconded by mr. Bromley, and ſupported by mr. Herne and general Roſs; but they were anſwered by mr. Stanhope, who ſaid, 'that the member, who ſpoke firſt, could not pitch upon a properer juncture to move for the diſbanding of the army, eſpecially, if the news was true, that the pretender deſigned to come incognito to Paris, to confer with a certain prince;' (meaning the czar of Muſcovy, who was now arrived at Paris.) To this purpoſe it may be obſerved, that the very day before Ibberville received advice from France, that the pretender was arrived at Baſil, in Swiſſerland, and had a few days after been ſeen at Old Briſack; upon notice whereof, the regent of France had ſent orders to all the governors of the frontier towns, not to ſuffer him to enter the kingdom of France: but it was ſoon after known, that the pretender had not ſtirred from Italy. However, mr. Stanhope, to the great ſurprize of the oppoſite ſide, was ſupported by mr. Walpole, and alſo by mr. Pulteney, who declared, 'that, before the diſcovery of the late Swediſh conſpiracy, while he had the honour to ſerve as ſecretary at war, he had received ſuch directions, as ſhewed his majeſty's intentions, at that time, to reduce ſtill a greater number of forces than at preſent: and therefore he did not doubt but his majeſty would do it, as ſoon as the ſafety of his kingdoms would admit of it.' Adding, 'that, in his opinion, the nation had no reaſon to fear any thing from an army, who, for near thirty years paſt, had given ſignal proofs of their firm adherence to the proteſtant intereſt, and of their zeal to maintain the liberties of their country; and, if there was any danger at preſent, it was only from foreign counſels.' The queſtion being put upon mr. Shippen's amendment, it was rejected by a majority of one hundred and eighty-eight againſt eighty-three; and the commons, with their ſpeaker, preſented their addreſs to the king.

In order to paſs a cenſure on lord Cadogan, mr. Pulteney acquainted the commons, that he was apprehenſive of ſome miſmanagements and imbezzlement of public monies in relation to the ſix thouſand Dutch troops, and the ſervice in North-Britain. Upon this it was reſolved to addreſs for an account of the money given for the pay and tranſportation of theſe forces, and of the diſtribution of the extraordinaries and contingencies for ſervice performed in Scotland during the rebellion. But, after all the enquiry into the affair by mr. Pulteney, mr. Walpole, and others, nothing material was found againſt the lord Cadogan. In the laſt day's debate. mr. Lechmere urged, 'that the enquiry was altogether frivolous and groundleſs: that, as it was the reſult of party pique and malice, ſo it had no other view, than to blacken and aſperſe a perſon, whoſe greateſt crime was, that he had real bright qualities, that eclipſed the tinſel merit of others: that this enquiry was of the ſame nature with thoſe, that had formerly been ſet on foot againſt the duke of Marlborough, the lord Townſhend, and an honourable member of that houſe; and he hoped would have the ſame end: that it looked very ſtrange, that the perſons, who now appeared the hotteſt in this enquiry, ſhould have been ſilent about theſe pretended frauds, while they were in place. But that it was ſtill more ſurprizing to hear them exclaim, with ſo much rancour and bitterneſs, againſt a noble lord, of whom they had been heard to ſay, that the ſpeedy ſuppreſſing of the rebellion in Scotland was, under God, owing to his activity and indefatigableneſs; and that, if another general had the management of that affair, he would have made it a ten years war.' After both parties had maintained the debate ſeveral hours, mr. Stanhope moved, 'that the chairman leave the chair.' Which was carried in the affirmative by two hundred and four voices againſt one hundred and ninety-four. This was looked upon as a great victory on the court ſide; for, had the tories and their new allies, as mr. Shippen called them, gained their point, it was apprehended, that they deſigned, not only to have paſſed a cenſure on lord Cadogan, but alſo to have carried the enquiry further, that they might have an opportunity of returning thanks to the duke of Argyle, his rival in the buſineſs of Scotland. Moſt of the Scots members voted for lord Cadogan; but, though mr. Hungerford ſpoke in his favour, yet he voted with his enemies; and the lord Finch and ſir Thomas Hanmer were abſent from the houſe that day.

The principal buſineſs of this ſeſſion was, the reduction of the national debts, which the king had earneſtly recommended to the commons in his ſpeeches from the throne. The national debt, by means of long and expenſive wars, carried on in ſupport of the revolution, and conſequently in defence of the religion, laws, and liberties of Great-Britain, was become very large and heavy. And therefore the circumſtances of time, high credit, and low price of money, prompted thoſe, whoſe province it was, to conſider of proper means to make uſe of that favourable opportunity, that the public might ſhare in the common advantage of the flouriſhing ſtate of public credit. For it was thought juſt and reaſonable, that the public ſhould have the ſame liberty, every private man has, to pay off his debts when he is able; or to reduce the high intereſt, which neceſſity had ſubjected him to, as ſoon as he could borrow the money elſewhere at more eaſy rates; unleſs his creditors would conſent to accept of the common rate of intereſt upon good ſecurity. This method of redemption, among the many ſchemes that were propoſed for reduction of the public debts, was choſen by thoſe who had the management of the affair.

The national debt was conſidered under two heads, redeemable and irredeemable debts. The redeemable, or ſuch debts as had been provided for by parliament with a redeemable intereſt of ſo much per cent. the public had a right and power to pay off whenever they were able, either by providing money for ſuch proprietors as inſiſted upon money, or by offering new terms, in diſcharge of all former conditions, which offer, if accepted by the proprietors, was to be deemed an actual redemption of the firſt debt, as if it had been paid off in ready money.

As for the irredeemable debts, or the long and ſhort annuities (ſo called from the greater or leſſer number of years they were granted for) nothing could be done without the abſolute conſent of the proprietors. The only method therefore to treat with them was to offer them ſuch conditions as they ſhould think it their intereſt to accept.

Upon theſe principles (as will preſently be ſeen) were founded the reſolutions taken by the commons with relation to the public debts.

Mr Walpole who was then at the head of the treaſury, and chief projector of the ſcheme, gave the firſt hint of it by a motion in the houſe of commons, which was agreed to, 'that whoever ſhall advance or lend any ſum, not exceeding 600,000l. for the ſervice of the public by ſea or land, ſhall be repaid the ſame with intereſt at 4l. per cent. out of the firſt aid to be granted this ſeſſion of parliament.' The putting the intereſt of this intended loan ſo low as four per cent. gave reaſon to ſurmiſe, that thoſe, who had the management of the treaſury, deſigned to put on the ſame foot the intereſts of all public funds: whereupon mr. Lechmere made a long ſpeech, obſerving, 'that ſeveral ſchemes and propoſals for reducing the national debts had been printed and diſperſed; which gave the perſons concerned in the public ſecurities the greater uneaſineſs, becauſe there was reaſon to apprehend, thoſe ſchemes came abroad with the privity and countenance of men in great places: that the general alarm, which this had occaſioned among monied men, might very ſenſibly affect public credit, and be, at this juncture, of very dangerous conſequence. To prevent which he thought it neceſſary, and therefore moved, that the houſe ſhould come to a reſolution, effectually to make good all parliamentary engagements.' To this unexpected motion mr. Walpole replied, 'that his majeſty having, with great tenderneſs, recommended to them, from the throne, the reducing, by degrees, the debts of the nation; and the commons having in their addreſs promiſed to apply themſelves, with all poſſible diligence and attention to that great and neceſſary work, they ought to exert themſelves to make good that promiſe, and appoint a day to take that important matter into conſideration. And he did not doubt but the commons would then ſhew all poſſible regard to juſtice and public faith. He owned, there had been indeed ſeveral ſchemes publiſhed relating to the reduction of the national debts; but that the ſame were made by private perſons; and he durſt aſſure the houſe, without the participation of any of his majeſty's miniſters; and therefore not to be regarded; but that, in a ſhort time, ſuch propoſals would be laid before the houſe, as, he hoped, would give them ſatisfaction, and meet with their approbation.' He therefore moved, that mr. Lechmere's motion might be thus altered, 'that this houſe will effectually make good the deficiencies of all parliamentary engagements;' which, after a ſhort debate, was approved, and a day was appointed to conſider of the national debt.

By this time the ſurmize, that force would be uſed in the reduction of the public debts, had heightened the uneaſineſs of monied men and ſtoc-jobbers, in ſome, to a degree of extravagance and madneſs, in others, of ſullen diſcontent, ſo that many did not ſcruple to inveigh againſt the preſent adminiſtration, as if the public debts were to be ſpunged off, and all ſeemed combined to diſtreſs the government, by not advancing any money towards its ſupport; by which means in three days not above 45,000l. was ſubſcribed to the loan of 600,000l. in the land-tax. This diſappointment, at ſo critical and dangerous a juncture, furniſhed mr. Lechmere with matter for another ſpeech on the 8th of March, when, the commons being in a grand committee on the ſupply, he told them, 'he was ſorry he was obliged to take notice, that their late vote for a loan at four per cent. intereſt was like to prove ineffectual; and, as the preſent exigency required a ſpeedy ſupply, ſo he thought it neceſſay, and therefore moved, that a day be appointed to conſider further of that matter.' Mr Robert Walpole declared, 'that he ſeconded this motion, there being the greater neceſſity for it, becauſe he was informed, that ſome ſtoc-jobbers, in order to deter the parliament from purſuing the deſign of reducing the public debts, had formed a combination to diſtreſs the government, and ruin public credit, which was the occaſion, that the late vote for borrowing 600,000l. at four per cent. had not the deſired effect.' To this mr. Lechmere anſwered, 'that as none but the moſt wiced of men could enter into ſuch a combination againſt the good of their country; ſo the honourable member, who ſpoke laſt, would do well to name them, that the honeſt might ſhew the utmoſt reſentment and indignation againſt them. But, that, in his opinion, the ill ſucceſs of the loan was rather occaſioned by ſome reflections, on the monied men and ſtoc-jobbers, and by certain maxims lately advanced, that the parliament may exert its authority to extricate themſelves by reducing the national debts: that ſuch maxims could not but alarm any perſons concerned in the public ſecurities; and the more, when they ſaw, that a ſlur had been put upon the motion made three days before, that all parliamentary engagements ſhould effectually be made good. That he ſtill thought ſuch a vote abſolutely neceſſary, both to remove people's fears and jealouſies, and to vindicate the honour and juſtice of the nation: that the ſame was entirely agreeable to his majeſty's ſentiments, who, in his firſt ſpeech to this parliament, had been pleaſed to recommend to the commons, in a particular manner, the ſtrict obſervance of all parliamentary engagements, than which nothing could more contribute to the ſupport of the credit of the nation: with which opinion of his majeſty the commons did entirely concur; and that he could not believe any of his majeſty's miniſters could be ſo regardleſs of his honour, and known equity, or put ſo hard a thing upon him, as to make him, in the leaſt, contradict what he had, in ſo ſolemn a manner, declared from the throne. 'He added, that, the commons having already appointed a day, to conſider the ſtate of the nation with relation to the public debts, he would not anticipate that important affair: but he could not forbear declaring, on this occaſion, his private opinion, that it would be the greateſt ingratitude, as well as injuſtice, in the leaſt to wrong thoſe perſons, who had ſupported the government in the moſt preſſing exigencies, and moſt perilous junctures, and who, on all occaſions, had ſhewn their zeal and affection for the proteſtant ſucceſſion. That he had nothing to ſay as to ſuch public ſecurities, as were redeemable by parliament; but, as to annuities granted for term of years, he would be poſitive, that they could not be meddled with, without breaking in upon parliamentary engagements, and violating the public faith; ſince thoſe annuities were not to be looked upon as debts, but as a ſale of annual rents for a valuable conſideration, of which contract the parliament had propoſed and made the terms and conditions, and the rentees became purchaſers upon the parliamentary faith and ſecurity. And that, beſides the injuſtice of breaking through a national contract, thoſe annuities could not be touched without occaſioning great confuſion and diſpute in private families, by reaſon that moſt of theſe annuities had been ſettled for portions, jointures, and the like.' Upon this mr. Walpole declared, there never had been a deſign to uſe any compulſion with relation to the annuities: that, indeed, an alternative might be offered to the proprietors of the ſame; but it ſhould be in their choice, either to accept or refuſe it. And, as for ſuch funds as were redeemable, nothing would be propoſed, that ſhould not entirely conſiſt with juſtice and public faith. [x]

Three days after, the commons ordered to be laid before the houſe, an account of the public debts at the exchequer, diſtinguiſhing what the funds were; when granted; what term remained; how much the original money was; how much had been paid off, and how much unpaid; and what the annual intereſt was, that was payable for the ſums advanced. [y]

On the day appointed to conſider of the national debt, mr. Walpole, having in his hand the account of the public debts at the Exchequer, made proper remarks upon them, and then communicated his ſcheme, both for paying off, or reducing the intereſts of redeeming funds, and for ob-years (at the election of the reſpective ſubſcribers) either ſo much as the ſame annuities ſhall amount to at 14 years and a half's purchaſe, to be made good by new annuities of 4l. per cent. per annum, redeemable by parliament, or 13 years and a half purchaſe, to be made good by annuities of 5l. per cent. per annum, redeemable in like manner; and and that the ſaid annuities ſhall be ſettled and ſecured accordingly.

XIII. that all ſavings that ſhall ariſe upon any of the preſent funds by the propoſed redemptions or reductions, be reſerved and applied, after all defficiencies that may happen upon any of the ſaid funds are made good, towards diſcharging and reducing the debts of the national debt.

XIV. That all the ſaid duties now in being, or to be continued, ſhall immediately ceaſe and determine, after the ſaid national debt, and all intereſt, due thereupon, is diſcharged and paid off.

Theſe reſolutions being approved of in form, bills were ordered to be brought in upon them.

Before theſe bills were preſented, there happened a change in the adminiſtration which occaſioned the new officers of the revenue to think ſome alterations in the meaſures likewiſe neceſſary; but, however, they were forced to build upon mr. Walpole's foundation, who had now reſigned his poſt, and who, believing theſe variations detrimental to the public, made ſome oppoſition to them.

As the foundation of the ſcheme for reducing the national debts was built upon paying off or ſatisfying the public creditors, many conferences had been held with the money corporations, in order to provide money for ſuch as ſhould be willing to receive their principal and intereſt in ready money. For this purpoſe, the bank agreed to furniſh two millions and a half, and the South-ſea two millions, or as much as ſhould be called for, and, for the money advanced, theſe companies were to have annuities of 5l. per cent.

The propoſals of the bank and South-ſea being agreed to [z], three bills were brought in, upon the reſolutions that had been made in relation to the public debts, and all three paſſed into laws; namely, the General Fund act, the Bank act, and the South-ſea act.

The general fund act recites the ſeveral acts of parliament for eſtabliſhing the four lotteries of the ninth and tenth years of queen Anne, the terms of years for which thoſe revenues were granted, and ſtates the annual produce of the ſeveral funds; namely, 1350001. 186670l. 168003l. 168003l. which together with banker's debt 398551. 15s. 7½d. and another ſmall ſum of about 27317l. 11s. 3d. amounted in all to 724,849l. 6s. 10½d. which is the general fund, the deficiency whereof is to be made good annually, out of the firſt aids granted by parliament. And, to the end that a ſure and ſufficient ſecurity may be ſettled for the regular payment of all ſuch annuities, as ſhall be payable by this act; all the duties and the revenues, mentioned therein, ſhall continue for ever. With a proviſo, that the revenues, by this act made perpetual, ſhall be ſubject to redemption.

Proprietors, who are willing to accept 5l. per cent. redeemable annuities, in lieu of their lottery orders, ſhall ſignify their option by ſubſcribing.

And ſuch as are willing to receive their principal and intereſt in ready money, ſhall likewiſe declare their option in writing.

As for the bank act, it muſt be obſerved, the bank at that time, as proprietors of redeemable debts, were entitled to an annuity of 106,501l. 13s. 5d. per annum, in lieu of exchequer bills formerly cancelled, amounting to 1,775,027l. 17s. 10½d. And the exchequer bills ſtanding out, on the 22d of March 1716, are ſtated at 4,561,025l. over and above the charge of circulation which was then due to the bank. The bank, by virtue of their contracts for circulating and exchanging theſe bills for ready money, were entitled to 3l. per cent. for all theſe bills, and the bills carried an intereſt of 2d. a day, which together made 6l. per cent. or the whole ſum of 4,561,025l. of exchequer bills. There was alſo granted, on the change of queen Anne's miniſtry, the ſums of 45000l. and 8000l. a year, which make together 7l. 4s. 0¾d. per cent. upon all the exchequer bills. The annuity payable to the bank for the cancelled exchequer bills, together with the whole charge to the public for circulating the exchequer bills then ſtanding, amounted to above 435,000l. a year. In theſe circumſtances the bank act ſays, the governor and company of the bank are willing to accept one annuity of 88751l. 7s. 10½d. being after the rate of 5l. per cent. per ann. or the principal of 1,775,027l. 17s. 10½d. in lieu of the preſent annuity or ſum of 106,501l. 13s. 5d. per annum. In the ſame manner the act goes on, and declares the bank willing to diſcharge, and deliver up to be cancelled, as many exchequer bills as amount to two millions, and to accept of an annuity of 100,000l. being after the rate of 5l. per cent. redeemable after one year's notice, to circulate the remaining exchequer bills at 3l. per cent. and 1d. a day, the former allowances to be continued to Chriſtmas 1717; and, after that, the bank to have for circulation the 2,561,025l. remaining exchequer bills, an annuity of 76830l. 15s. at the rate of 3l. per cent. till redeemed, over and above the 1d. a day for intereſt. The bank is then required to advance a ſum not exceeding 2,500,000l. towards diſcharging the national debts, if wanted, and to have 5l. per cent. for as much as they have advanced, redeemable by parliament.

As for the South-ſea act, the original ſtock of the South-ſea was 9,471,325l. but, as the funds granted were ſufficient to anſwer the intereſt of ten millions, at 6l. per cent. in the year 1716, the South-ſea company advanced to the government 528,675l. which compleats the ſum of ten millions, for which they received an intereſt or annuity of 600,000l. and likewiſe 8000l. a year for management. Now by this act the governor and company declare, they are willing to accept an annuity of 500,000l. in lieu of the 600,000l. with 8000l. a year for management. The company are to continue a corporation till their annuity is redeemed, towards which, not leſs than a million is to be paid at a time. The company is alſo required to advance a ſum not exceeding two millions, towards diſcharging the principal and intereſt due on the four lottery funds, of the 9th and 10th years of queen Anne.

Purſuant to theſe acts, the bank, which was in poſſeſſion of receipts out of the exchequer, amounting to 435,063l. 1 6s. 0½d. per ann. accept voluntarily of three annuities, amounting to about 304,531l. 1s. 3¾d. whereby the ſaving to the public was 130,532l. 14s. 8¼d. a year.

[z] In the debates on theſe propoſals, a quarrel had like to ariſe between mr. Stanhope and mr. Walpole. Mr Pulteney having ſaid, 'he did not know what private advantage ſome perſons might have for accepting the propoſal of the South-ſea company,' mr. Stanhope (who thought the reflection of private advantage was chiefly levied againſt him) vindicated himſelf, and began with owning his incapacity for the affairs of the treaſury, which were ſo remote from his ſtudies and inclination: that therefore he would willingly have kept the employment he had before, which was both more eaſy, and more profitable to him, but, that he thought it his duty to obey the king's commands. That, however, he would endeavour to make up, by application, honeſty, and diſintereſtedneſs, what he wanted in abilities and experience. That he would content himſelf with the ſalary and lawful perquiſites of his office: and, though he had quitted a better place, he would not quarter himſelf upon any body to make it up: that he had no brothers, nor other relations, to provide for; and that, upon his firſt entering into the treaſury, he had made a ſtanding order againſt the late practice of granting reverſions of places.' Mr Walpole, being touched with theſe innuendos, complained in the firſt place of breach of friendſhip, and betraying private converſation. He frankly owned, 'that, while he was in employment, he had endeavoured to ſerve his friends and relations; than which, in his opinion, nothing was more reaſonable and juſt. That, as to the granting reverſions, he was willing to acquaint the houſe with the meaning of it. That he had no objections againſt the German miniſters, whom his majeſty brought with him from Hanover, and who, as far as he had obſerved, had all along behaved themſelves like men of honour; but, that there was a mean fellow, of what nation he could not tell, who took upon him to diſpoſe of employments: that this man, having obtained the grant of a reverſion, which he deſigned for his ſon (mr. Walpole) thought it too good for him, and thereupon kept it for his own ſon. That thereupon the foreigner was ſo ſaucy as to demand of him the ſum of 2500l. under pretence, that he had been offered ſo much for the reverſion; but, that he was wiſer than to comply with his demand. And that one of the chief reaſons that made him reſign his places, was, becauſe he would not connive at ſome things that were carring on.' Mr Stanhope anſwered; mr. Walpole replied; and, ſome ſevere expreſſions having eſcaped them in the heat of the diſpute, mr. Hungerford ſaid, 'that he was ſorry to ſee thoſe two great men fall foul upon one another. However, (ſays he) in my opinion, we muſt ſtill look upon them as patriots, and fathers of their country; and, ſince they have, by miſchance diſcovered their nakedneſs, we ought, according to the cuſtom of the eaſt, as the ſcripture tells us, to cover it by turning our backs up on them.' He added, 'that this unlucky accident had, however, produced ſome good, in that it had revealed a piece of ſecret hiſtory, the ſcandalous practice of ſelling places and reverſions.' And therefore he moved, 'that the honourable member, who made the diſcovery, might be called upon to name the perſon.' But no body ſeconded this motion. Mr Boſcawen, comptroller of the houſehold, acted the part of a common friend between mr. Stanhope and mr. Walpole, ſaying, 'that it was melancholy to ſee, that any difference ſhould happen between thoſe two worthy members, unbecoming their own characters, and the dignity of that aſſembly; but that it would ſtill be a greater misfortune, if they ſhould go out with any reſentment: and therefore he moved, 'that the houſe would lay their commands upon them that no farther notice be taken of what had paſſed.' Mr Methuen ſeconded mr. Comptroller, whoſe motion being unanimouſly applauded, the ſpeaker put it immediately in execution.

The proprietors of the lottery orders amounting to above nine millions, ſubſcribed their orders at the bank, and accepted bank annuities in lieu of the ſame.

Thus, though the bank and South-ſea had agreed to advance four millions and a half towards the payment of thoſe that ſhould demand ready money, not one farthing was ever demanded in money, except very ſmall ſums, amounting in the whole to 4711. 4s. [a]. All the annuities that were ſettled by virtue of theſe three acts, were redeemable perpetuities granted at the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum, upon a principal of about 25,869,247l. the amount of the national debt at that time redeemed or reduced.

In the general fund act is the clauſe that eſtabliſhes the ſinking fund. As the reduction of the intereſt to 5l. per cent. would make a ſurplus or exceſs upon the appropriated funds, the act declares, 'that all the monies ariſing from time to time, as well for the ſurplus by virtue of the acts for redeeming the funds of the bank and of the South-ſea company, as alſo for the ſurplus of the duties and revenues by this act appropriated to make good the general fund, and the overplus monies of the general fund, ſhall be appropriated and employed for the diſcharging the principal and intereſt of ſuch national debts as were incurred before the 25th of December, 1716, in ſuch manner as ſhall be directed or appointed by any future act of parliament, to be diſcharged out of the ſame, and for none other uſe, intent, or purpoſe whatſoever.' This clauſe conſtitutes the ſinking fund, and ſhews of what it conſiſts, and to what uſes it is appropriated. Though there had been ſinking funds before this time for the payment of particular debts [b], yet a ſinking fund, for diſcharging the national debt in general, was firſt projected and formed in the year 1716, and till that time unheard of.

As the change in the miniſtry had cauſed a diviſion among the whigs, ſome adhering to thoſe that were in, and others to thoſe that were out of place, an oppoſition was formed by thoſe laſt in conjunction with the tories on ſeveral occaſions. This evidently appeared when ſir William Wyndham (who had been diſcharged) moved, that dr. Snape ſhould be appointed to preach on the reſtoration of king Charles. The doctor was one of the king's chaplains, and maſter of Eaton-ſchool, but was of high-church principles, and had lately attaced the biſhop of Bangor. Sir William's motion was ſeconded by mr. Shippen, and ſupported, not only by ſeveral tories, but alſo by all the whigs who had lately reſigned their employments. Mr Horace Walpole, who ſpoke after mr. Shippen, ſaid, 'that it was unuſual, on ſuch occaſions, to put the negative on any man, whom a member of that houſe had thought fit to name; and that dr. Snape was not only a perſon of merit, and great learning, but had likewiſe the honour to be one of his majeſty's chaplains.' To theſe commendations mr. Robert Walpole added, 'that he knew dr. Snape to be both a very learned, and a very honeſt man: that he had not only intruſted him with the education of his own children, but alſo recommended the ſons of the duke of Devonſhire and lord Townſhend to his care; and therefore he could not but think, that he might be truſted with preaching a ſermon before that aſſembly. M. Lechmere obſerved, 'that he could not but wonder, that a member, who had been one of the managers againſt dr. Sacheverel, ſhould now ſpeak in behalf of a divine, who had aſſerted the ſame notions of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, for which the other had been proſecuted; and who had lately attaced a worthy champion of the revolution and proteſtant ſucceſſion.' Mr Aiſlabie anſwered, that he gave his vote to dr. Snape, becauſe he looked upon him as a learned and honeſt man: and, as for his having written againſt the biſhop of Bangor's ſermon, he did not think it a ſufficient reaſon to put upon him a negative, which would be pre-judging of a controverſy, that did not properly belong to their cognizance.' The lord Guernſey ſpoke with ſtill more vehemence in behalf of the doctor, ſo that the motion being thus ſtrongly ſupported, he was appointed to preach by a majority of one hundred and forty-one againſt one hundred and thirty-one.

The controverſy mentioned in this debate between the biſhop of Bangor and dr. Snape, was occaſioned in this manner: dr. Benjamin Hoadly (the preſent biſhop of Wincheſter) famous for his ſteady adherence at all times to the principles of the revolution (for which he had been recommended to the throne by the houſe of commons, and advanced to the ſee of Bangor) had lately publiſhed, a preſervative againſt the principles and practices of the non-jurors; and, ſoon after, preached a ſermon before the king, which was printed under the title of, 'the nature of the kingdom of of Chriſt' [c]. To this ſermon dr. Snape publiſhed an anſwer; and, preſently after, the lower houſe of convocation (as they had before done with regard to dr. Samuel Clarke's ſcripture doctrine) entered upon the ſubject, both of the biſhop of Bangor's ſermon, and of his preſervative. They appointed a committee of ſix of their members, dr. Moſs, dr. Sherlock, dr. Friend, dr. Sprat, dr. Cannon, and dr. Bliſs, to examine them, and made their report to the houſe. The committee ſat and drew up a repreſentation, in which both the preſervative and ſermon were cenſured, as tending,

'I. To ſubvert all government and diſcipline in the church of Chriſt, and to reduce his kingdom to a ſtate of anarchy and confuſion, And,

'II. To impugn and impeach the regal ſupremacy in cauſes eccleſiaſtical, and the authority of the legiſlature, to inforce obedience in matters of religion by civil ſanctions.'

[b] In moſt of the funds that were granted for circulating and exchanging exchequer bills, there was a ſurplus of the fund itſelf, computed to be ſufficient to cancel and diſcharge annually ſome part of the bills: and, in the Aggregate Fund act of the firſt of king George, there was a ſum of 270,999l. 7s. directed to be paid annually towards diſcharging the exchequer bills. In all ſhort annuities likewiſe granted for thirty-two years, the principal being to be ſunk at the end of the term granted, this may be looked upon as a ſinking fund, attending thoſe particular debts. But the firſt mention that ever was made in parliament of a ſinking fund, for diſcharging the national debt in general, was in this ſeſſion.

[c] The text was, 'my kingdom is not of this world.'

[d] The biſhop, in the concluſion of his anſwer to this repreſentation, has confronted the paſſages, on which the charge againſt him was founded, with the oppoſite doctrines, which muſt be true, if his are falſe.

The propoſitions contained in thoſe paſſages of my ſermon and Preſervative, which are made the foundation of the charge in the repreſentation.	The propoſitions, contradictory to them: which, therefore, muſt be maintained to be true and chriſtian, by all who condemn the others:
1. Chriſt himſelf is king in his own kingdom.	1. Chriſt himſelf is not king in his own kingdom.
2. Chriſt is the ſole law-giver and ſole judge of his ſubjects, in all points relating to the favour, or diſpleaſure of Almighty God. In other words,	2. Chriſt is not the ſole law-giver and ſole judge of his ſubjects, in all points relating to the favour, or diſpleaſure of Almighty God.
3. No one of his ſubjects is law-giver and judge over others of them, in matters relating to ſalvation. In other words thus,	3. Some of his ſubjects are law-givers and judges over others of them, in matters relating to ſalvation.
4. No men upon earth have a right to make any of their own declarations or deciſions to concern and affect the ſtate of Chriſt's ſubjects, with regard to the favour of God.	4. There is a right in ſome men, to make their own declarations and deciſions to concern and affect the ſtate of Chriſt's ſubjects, with regard to the favour of God.
5. The more cloſe and immediate the regard of men to Chriſt is, the more certainly and evidently true it is, that they are of his kingdom.	5. A cloſe and immediate regard to Chriſt himſelf, is not ſo certain and evident a mark of being of his kingdom, as a cloſe and immediate regard and reſpect to frail men, ſubordinate to him.
6. It is worthy of all chriſtians, to live and act as become thoſe who wait for the appearance of an all-knowing and impartial judge; and in ſuch a behaviour to be without fear of man's judgment, who is both ignorant of many things neceſſary to form that judgment, and partial in the forming it.	6. It is not worthy of all chriſtians to live and act as becomes thoſe who wait for the appearance of an all-knowing and impartial judge; but it becomes them, at the ſame time that they live and act thus, to be under a fear of man's judgment, who neither has capacity nor authority to determine their condition; and who, in very many caſes, contradicts the judgment which Chriſt will make.
7. We muſt not frame our ideas, from the kingdoms of this world, to what ought to be, in a viſible and ſenſible manner, in Chriſt's kingdom.	7. We muſt frame our ideas, from the kingdoms of this world, to what ought to be, in a viſible and ſenſible manner, in Chriſt's kingdom.
8. Our title to God's favour depends upon our real ſincerity in the conduct of our conſciences, and of our own actions under them.	8. Our title to God's favour doth not depend upon our real ſincerity in the conduct of our conſciences, and of our own actions under them; but upon our actual being in the right.

form of a report, to be laid before the convocation. But the government, out of regard to the intereſt of the conſtitution in church and ſtate, thought proper to put a ſtop to theſe proceedings, by a prorogation to the 22d of November. As this was induſtriouſly repreſented to be the effect of the biſhop's ſollicitation, and an argument of his fear, he publicly declared before the world, that the prorogation was ordered, not only without his ſeeking, but without ſo much as his knowledge or even ſuſpicion of any ſuch deſign till it was reſolved. It muſt be obſerved that the repreſentation was never approved of by the lower houſe, ſo as to be made the act of it: though many have been led to think it was, by the artifice made uſe of in the title-page to the printed copy of it.

The prorogation of the convocation did not put an end to the controverſy. For ſeveral of the members, ſince they could not attac the biſhop, as a public aſſembly, reſolved to take up the cauſe in a private capacity. Dr Sherlock, who was one of the committee who drew up the report, ſeconded dr. Snape, and theſe two were followed by many others, inſomuch that the tracts publiſhed on this occaſion, on both ſides, are ſaid to be about ſeventy. [e]

During theſe proceedings the miniſters were no leſs employed than the parliament. Negotiations were carrying on, particularly to oblige the king of Sweden to make peace. The czar had the laſt year married his niece the princeſs Catharina to the duke of Mecklenburg Swerin, and reſolved to procure the poſſeſſion of Wiſmar for him. To that end he had ſent firſt twelve thouſand Ruſſians (which were afterwards increaſed to twenty-ſix thouſand) to aſſiſt at the taking of that place then beſieged by the Pruſſians, Hanoverians, and Danes. But, the town having ſurrendered before the arrival of his army, his project fell to the ground, nor would the allies ſuffer any of his troops to be garriſoned there. The czar was vexed at this diſappointment, and from hence may be dated ſeveral memorable events, particularly the miſunderſtanding between him and the court of Hanover.

9. Human benedictions—abſolutions—denunciations—excommunications—do not determine either God's favour, or anger, towards chriſtians: and therefore are vain words, when they pretend ſo to do.	9. Human benedictions—abſolutions—denunciations—excommunications—do determine God's favour, and anger, towards chriſtians: and therefore, are not vain words, when they pretend ſo to do.
10. Whoever has a right to add ſanctions to Chriſt's laws, is ſo far king, and has ſo far regal power in Chriſt's kingdom.	10. Men may have a right to add ſanctions to Chriſt's laws, without having any part of regal power in his kingdom.
11. The ſanctions of Chriſt's laws, appointed by himſelf, are not the rewards of this world; not the offices or glories of this ſtate; not the pains of priſons, baniſhments, fines, or any leſſer and more moderate penalties; nay, not the much leſſer negative diſcouragements that belong to human ſociety. He was far from thinking that theſe could be the inſtruments of ſuch a perſuaſion, as he knew to be acceptable to God.	11. The ſanctions of Chriſt's laws, appointed by himſelf, are the rewards of this world; the offices and glories of this ſtate; the pains of priſons, baniſhments, fines, or other leſſer and more moderate penalties; or the much leſſer negative diſcouragements that belong to human ſociety. Theſe he thought the proper inſtruments of ſuch a perſuaſion, as he knew to be acceptable to God.
12. Chriſt choſe the motives which are not of this world, to ſupport a kingdom which is not of this world.	12. Chriſt did not chuſe the motives which are not of this world, to ſupport a kingdom not of this world.
13. The maxims, oppoſite to the maxims upon which Chriſt founded his kingdom, are contrary to the intereſts of true religion.	13. The maxims, oppoſite to the maxims upon which Chriſt founded his kingdom, are agreeable and helpful to the intereſts of true religion.
14. To apply worldly force or worldly flattery, worldly pleaſure or worldly pain, to the caſe of religion, is a method oppoſite to the maxims upon which Chriſt founded his kingdom: and therefore, contrary to the intereſts of true religion.	14. To apply worldly force or worldly flattery, worldly pleaſure or worldly pain, to the caſe of religion; is not oppoſite to the maxims upon which Chriſt founded his kingdom: or, is not contrary to the intereſts of true religion, though it be contrary to our bleſſed Lord's maxims relating to it.
15. Chriſt knew the nature of his own kingdom, or church, better than any ſince his time.	15. Chriſt did not know the nature of his own kingdom, or church, better than his profeſſed followers do, ſince his time.
16. Chriſt left no ſuch matters to be decided againſt himſelf, and his own expreſs profeſſions.	16. Chriſt did leave the nature of his own kingdom, and the maxims of ſupporting it, to be decided, by others after him, againſt himſelf, and againſt his own expreſs profeſſions.
17. To teach chriſtians that they muſt either profeſs, or be ſilent, againſt their own conſciences, becauſe of the authority of others over them, is to found that authority upon the ruin of ſincerity and common honeſty; to teach a doctrine which would have prevented the reformation and the being of the church of England; which diveſts Chriſt of his empire in his own kingdom, and leads his people to proſtitute their conſciences at the feet of men.	17. To teach chriſtians that they muſt either profeſs, or be ſilent, againſt their own conſciences, in regard to the authority of others, is a very good doctrine; very conſiſtent with the ſincerity and honeſty becoming chriſtians; very uſeful for the juſtification of the reformation, and church of England: perfectly conſiſtent with chriſtians regard to Chriſt as their king; and not at all leading them to proſtitute their conſciences at the feet of weak men.
18. Chriſt never interpoſed, ſince his firſt promulgation of his law, either to convey infallibility; or to aſſert the true interpretation of it.	18. Chriſt does interpoſe, ſince the firſt promulgation of his law, to convey infallibility to ſome of thoſe who interpret it; or to aſſert the true interpretation of it.

After this the biſhop adds a partiular view of thoſe principals, which ought to be the meaſures of judging in ſuch important matters:

1. Chriſt has the ſupreme authority of legiſlator, and judge, with reſpect to all chriſtians.

2. No authority, therefore, can be juſtly claimed by any chriſtians, for what rank ſoever, in any chriſtian church, which deſtroys the ſupreme authority of Chriſt.

3. The will of Chriſt is delivered to all chriſtians for the conduct of their lives.

4. No human, fallible authority, therefore, can determine chriſtians in points of religion, which they themſelves do not judge to be agreeable to the will of Chriſt.

5. Whatſoever equally concerns the ſalvation of all chriſtians is equally propoſed to the underſtandings of all.

6. There can, therefore, be no ſuch thing as ſubmitting our underſtandings, out of humility or out of lazineſs, to any other men whatſoever, in points relating to eternal ſalvation; without either ſuppoſing that Chriſt did not deliver his will for us, in things which concern us; or did not deliver it plainly enough for us to find it out (with the aids and means, he has put in our power) in thoſe points which concern our eternal ſalvation, and therefore require all ſufficient plainneſs: though the taking in the advice and aſſiſtance of others, and attending to their arguments, is perfectly conſiſtent with the foregoing propoſition.

7. No argument can be admitted by proteſtants, which deſtroys the very eſſence of proteſtantiſm: nor can any reaſonings conclude juſtly in favour of any powers amongſt them, which they conſtantly and ſtrongly condemn in the church of Rome.

8. No authority therefore, can be claimed by any reformed church, which was juſtly condemned and oppoſed, in order to the reformation itſelf. Conſequently,

9. No ſubmiſſion in religious affairs can juſtly be demanded from proteſtants, by proteſtants, upon any ſuch foundation, as would have abſolutely prevented the reformation itſelf.

10. Whatſoever was true at the time of the reformation, is true ſtill.

11. Whatſoever principles are true and juſt, when urged againſt papiſts, are likewiſe ſo, amongſt proteſtants.

12. Whatever principles and conduct are unjuſtifiable in papiſts, are equally ſo, in all proteſtants.

13. Whatſoever was the foundation of the reformed church of England then, is ſo ſtill: and whatſoever was neceſſary to juſtify it at firſt, is neceſſary to defend it now.

14. Nothing therefore, which contradicts the main principle of the reformation; and that, without which the church of England itſelf could not juſtly have been in being; can be for the true intereſt of this church, as it is a proteſtant church.

15. As it is a chriſtian church, nothing can be ſuppoſed either to ſupport or defend its intereſt, which, admitted as true, would have prevented even the reception of chriſtianity itſelf, or which contradicts the main deſign of the goſpel.

16. The principles therefore, which alone can juſtly and unexceptionably ſupport it, are ſuch as are uniformly and conſiſtently chriſtian and proteſtant.

[e] Dr Snape, on the 26th of June, publiſhed a ſecond letter to the biſhop of Bangor, being a reply to the biſhop's anſwer to his firſt, wherein the doctor puts the following queries to the biſhop:

'I pray recollect yourſelf, and put theſe queſtions home to your own conſcience, whether your abſolutely's and properly's, and ſuch evaſive words, were not omitted in your ſermon, as it was originally compoſed? Whether you did not, before it was preached, ſhew it to a certain perſon without ſuch limitations? And whether you was not with difficulty prevailed upon by him to inſert them by way of caution? If you think fit to anſwer in the negative, I engage, a perſon of as high a ſtation as your lordſhip will charge himſelf with the proof of the affirmative.'

The biſhop two days after in an advertiſement ſolemnly denies all this, and challenges the doctor to name his author.

The doctor, preſſed by the ſolemnity of the challenge, names the biſhop of Carliſle, who, being called upon to prove what he had aſſerted, diſputed a while with dr. Snape, affirming he had not ſaid, the words were put in before the ſermon was preached, but before it was publiſhed; owning withal, that he knew there was ſuch a perſon in the world who had averred the ſame. The biſhop of Carliſle, being preſſed to name him, names dr. White Kennet, and writes to him of what had paſſed, telling him he did not queſtion but he would own his own words. Dr Kennet poſitively denied the fact, ſaying, I never affirmed, never ſuggeſted to any mortal that the late ſermon of the biſhop of Bangor was preached with my knowledge, or ſubmitted to my correction. Notwithſtanding this, the biſhop of Carliſle aſſerted in print, that dr. Kennet was the man that told him he had prevailed with the biſhop of Bangor to put in the forementioned words. In ſhort, the biſhop of Carliſle pledges his eternal ſalvation that dr. Kennet did ſay ſo: dr. Kennet in one of his papers, ſays, God ſo help him, and judge him, if he did. They went on advertiſing againſt each other, till the biſhop of Carliſle reſolved to give no more anſwers to whatever ſhould be ſaid. However, the biſhop of Bangor, reſolving that calumny ſhould lie where it ought to lie, publiſhed a long advertiſement, as dr. Kennet did another, to fix the fact upon the biſhop of Carliſle, and to convict him of forgetfulneſs at leaſt, in charging a fact upon the biſhop of Bangor, which was not true, and quoting a witneſs for it who knew nothing of the matter. In a word, after lying dormant ſome months, this controverſy was revived in October following, on account of the biſhop's entertaining in his houſe Francis de la Pillonere, who had been a jeſuit, but had now renounced the popiſh religion. The biſhop's three principal adverſaries were dean Sherlock, dr. Snape and dr. Cannon, whom the biſhop ſeemed to out-do in reaſon and argument as far as they did him in virulence, perſonal reflections, and reproachful language. He was painted in the moſt odious colours, both from the preſs and the pulpit, and all for aſſerting, that Chriſt is the ſole law giver, and ſole judge in his kingdom in all points relating to the favour or diſpleaſure of God, a propoſition as evident as the ſun at noon-day. Dr Cannon vindicated the convocation, and dean Sherlock attaced the biſhop upon a popular point, the repeal of the Teſt act, which he aſſerted to be the deſign of the biſhop's ſermon. The dean ended his treatiſe with a moſt unjuſt and reproachful reflection, which the biſhop immediately anſwered, by ſetting the matter in a clear light. In November, dr. Sherlock and dr. Snape were both removed from being king's chaplains, nor has the convocation ſat to do any buſineſs ever ſince.

Soon after this, a deſcent on Schonen was concerted between the kings of Pruſſia and Denmark and the czar, in order to oblige the king of Sweden to quit Norway, where he had penetrated with an army of twenty thouſand men, and was advancing towards Chriſtianſtadt, the capital of that kingdom. The czar ſeemed the moſt forward in this expedition, and took upon him the command of the united fleets of England, Holland, Denmark, and Ruſſia, in order to drive the Swediſh fleet into port. But this was all outward ſhow. For the appearance of the Britiſh fleet under admiral Norris could not be very agreeable to the czar, as it prevented the deſigns he had formed againſt Denmark itſelf after his diſappointment at Wiſmar. And therefore when, in a council of war between him and the king of Denmark, all things were ſettled for the deſcent in Schonen, and the troops ordered to embark, on a ſudden the orders were countermanded, and the project, which was to reduce the king of Sweden to ſuch terms as the allies ſhould think proper to impoſe on him, was laid aſide, after the great expence the Danes had been at for the tranſportation of the forces, and other preparations. The czar pretended the ſeaſon was too far advanced, and that it would be better to defer the expedition till the ſpring. This was ſtrongly remonſtrated againſt in a long manifeſto by the king of Denmark, to which the czar, knowing his own ſecret motives, returned no anſwer. The czar had for ſome time been diſcontented with the allies, who were all for preventing his having any footing in Germany, ſo jealous were they of his power; and this diſcontent of the czar was probably what hindred the utter ruin of the king of Sweden, and was now like to reconcile him to his moſt powerful enemy, if baron Gortz ſucceeded in his project of making a peace between them, of which not only Denmark, Pruſſia, and Poland, but England itſelf was to feel the effects. [f] The firſt ſtep to this reconciliation was by the means of dr. Erſkine to ſound prince Menzikoff, who, pleaſed with the deſign, ſoon brought the czar into it. But it will preſently be ſeen, how deſirous he was to clear himſelf from ſuch an imputation.

The czar having ſent his forces into Mecklenburg, reſolved to take a tour to France, He arrived at Amſterdam in December, where he expected the czarina, who attended him in his travels; but ſhe being big with child, happened to be delivered of a prince, as ſhe was preparing to ſet out from Weſel, and came not to Amſterdam till the 10th of February 1717. The czar remained there and at the Hague till the 4th of April. When king George paſſed through Holland, in his way from Hanover, the czar was there, and, had they deſired it, might have had an interview, but the czar excuſed himſelf on pretence of an indiſpoſition. During the czar's ſtay in Holland, the letters of baron Gortz and count Gyllenburg were publiſhed in England by the king's ſpecial command. In theſe letters, there were ſome paſſages relating not only to dr. Erſkine the czar's phyſician, but to the czar himſelf, reflecting on his conduct in regard to king George. Upon this the czar ordered Weſſelouſki to preſent a long memorial to king George, wherein he expreſſes a ſurprize at the malice of his enemies, to make him a party concerned in the conſpiracy in favour of the pretender: ſhews the improbability of it, as the pretender would not fail (ſhould he ſucceed) of aſſiſting the king of Sweden againſt him: mentions his offering, the laſt year, to guarantee the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great-Britain in the houſe of Hanover, though he had obſerved ſeveral diſagreeable ſteps taken by the Britiſh miniſters at the courts of Vienna, Pruſſia, and Denmark, and even at the diet of Ratiſbon; and though he had been informed that the court of England was privately treating of a ſeparate peace with the king of Sweden, promiſing him aſſiſtance on his yielding up Bremen, as too plainly appeared by count Gyllenburg's letters; offers, however, to eſtabliſh the antient good underſtanding between them, and to concert meaſures for the vigorous proſecution of the war againſt the common enemy: concludes with ſaying, he could not but be very much concerned at the king's cauſing to be printed the malicious inſinuations of his enemies, which wounded his honour, without a previous communication of the ſame, or demanding an explanation of thoſe paſſages, as a good ally ſhould have done.

As ſome articles of this memorial related to the king as elector of Hanover, there were two anſwers given to it, one by mr. Stanhope, the other by the chancery of Hanover. The king ſays, he is very far from ſuſpecting the czar of entering into any engagements in favour of the pretender: owns (as nothing can leſſen the good underſtanding between them, but the continuance of the Ruſſian troops in the empire) he cauſed inſtances to be made to the courts of Vienna, Denmark, and Pruſſia, for uniting their endeavours to perſuade him to remove them: hopes the czar will have a due regard thereto, and ſpeedily withdraw his troops, ſince the continuance of them in the empire intimates a deſign quite contrary to the acting againſt Sweden, and creates ſuch diſtruſt and jealouſies as cannot be otherwiſe removed. As for the publication of the letters, it was impoſſible (ſays the memorial) to omit the paſſages concerning the czar, becauſe the king had weighty reaſons to impart to the parliament the letters entire as they were found. The anſwer concluded with aſſuring the czar, that he ſhould have reaſon to be ſatisfied, provided he would remove the only obſtacle to their mutual good underſtanding, the continuance of the Ruſſian troops in the empire.

Theſe memorials did not reconcile the two princes: the diſtance of their dominions, the intereſt of their ſubjects with regard to commerce, ſuſpended their reſentments, but they were enemies the reſt of their life. The czar, curious as he was, would not have failed of viſiting England in his progreſs, had the two monarchs been upon good terms.

The czar, after having ſpent three months in Holland, reſolved upon a tour to the court of France, with deſign to enter into a confederacy with the regent of France. He offered to pour a numerous army into the empire, which ſhould be at the diſpoſal of the regent, provided he would pay him the ſubſidies, he demanded, which were very large. But his offer was rejected, and communicated by the regent to king George. However, the czar during his ſtay at Paris concluded a treaty of friendſhip with France, in which the king of Pruſſia was included, and, being preſſed by the regent, he promiſed to withdraw his forces from Mecklenburg. The czar, at his return to Amſterdam, admitted baron Gortz (who had been ſet at liberty the day before his arrival) with great privacy to an interview at Loo [g]. Gortz undertook to adjuſt all differences between the czar, and the king of Sweden, within three months, and the czar engaged to ſuſpend all opperations againſt Sweden till the end of that term.

This interview having been complained of by the Britiſh reſident at Peterſburg, the czar's miniſters at firſt denied it, but ſoon after were obliged to own it. The late duke of Ormond, with one mr. Jernegan, a Roman catholic, was come to Mittau in Courland to propoſe a marriage between one of the czar's daughters and the pretender, and to offer to go and perſuade the king of Sweden to make peace with the czar, and aſſiſt in ſetting the pretender on the throne of Great-Britain; but the propoſal of the marriage interfered with baron Gortz's ſcheme, who had long intended that princeſs for the duke of Holſtein, to whom ſhe was afterwards married. Mr Jernegan was ſent to Sweden for leave that the duke of Ormond might come there as the pretender's miniſter. The anſwer he brought to the duke was, that the king of Sweden had ſtrong reaſons for not admitting him. He was ſoon after ſent from Mittau, and Jernegan was left to manage the buſineſs at Peterſburg, with all poſſible ſecrecy. Mean while a congreſs was formed at Abo, between the Swediſh and Ruſſian miniſters, which was afterwards removed to Aland.

The czar's chief aim was to keep not only Ingria, and part of Carelia, but alſo Revel, with Eſtonia, and Riga, with Livonia, and to reſtore to Sweden only Finland, and the reſt of Carelia. Baron Gortz flattered the czar with [f] The czar's laying aſide the deſcent upon Schonen was ſaid to be brought about by the ſecret management of baron Gortz, who was become chief miniſter and favourite of the king of Sweden. As there was no likelihood of the czar's making a peace with the king of Sweden, unleſs the provinces he had conquered on the eaſt and north of the Baltic were yielded to him, Gortz perſuaded the king of Sweden that he would have ample amends made him for relinquiſhing thoſe conqueſts of the czar, by having the honour of re-placing Staniſlaus on the throne of Poland, ſetting the crown of England on the head of the chevalier de St. George, and by reſtoring the duke of Holſtein to his dukedom. Beſides, that, being united with the czar, there was nothing they might not undertake.

[g] It may here be obſerved, that the duke of Orleans had interpoſed to bring the king of Sweden to a peace, and ſent the count de la March to him as his embaſſador. But the king of Sweden would hearken to no propoſals till baron Gortz and count Gyllenburg were ſet at liberty. The regent, upon this, orders d' Ibberville to aſſure his Britannic majeſty, that the king of Sweden had declared, he had yet no intentions to trouble the tranquility of Great-Britain, nor had entered into any of the deſigns, attributed to his miniſters, and ſhould conſider, as a great injury to him, the ſuſpicion of his having any concern in their projects. After this declaration on the part of the king of Sweden, the regent hoped, that the king would ſend bac count Gyllenburg to his maſter, and give his conſent that baron Gortz ſhould be alſo releaſed. This was accordingly done, and count Gyllenburg was exchanged for mr. reſident Jackſon, who had been detained at Stockholm.

the hopes of the king of Sweden's conſent to theſe ceſſions, in conſideration of his aſſiſting him in reſtoring Staniſlaus, and retaking what Denmark and England had conquered upon Sweden. The king of Pruſſia was to be included in the treaty, and the czar, the better to make his own terms, engaged to prevail with him to reſtore Stetin for an equivalent ſomewhere elſe. Upon theſe foundations baron Gortz and M. Oſterman, the czar's plenipotentary, concerted the plan of a peace between the czar and the king of Sweden. By this plan the conqueſt of Norway was deſigned. The czar was obliged to aſſiſt his Swediſh majeſty in that expedition, and both promiſed to unite all their forces againſt the king of Great-Britain, in caſe he ſhould interpoſe. This ſeemed to have a view to the intereſt of the pretender, and a deſign of an invaſion in Scotland, after the conqueſt of Norway.

When baron Gortz ſet out for Aland with the plan of peace, in order to obtain his maſter's conſent, the king of Sweden was with his army before Frederickſtad, in Norway, where he was killed in the night, between the 29th and 30th of November 1718. Baron Gortz, not being informed of his death, was arreſted on the road, and having drawn upon himſelf the hatred of the nation, and reſentment of the nobles, whom he had treated with haughtineſs, he was by them condemned to the ſcaffold, where he died with great reſolution. By the king of Sweden's death, the face of affairs in the north was entirely changed. Sweden was forced to ſubmit; the czar, king of Denmark, and king George, as elector of Hanover, remained in poſſeſſion of what they had acquired. Theſe affairs, though not ended till the following year, have been related at once to prevent any farther recourſe to them. But to return to England.

The earl of Oxford had now been confined in the Tower almoſt two years, and, finding the ſeſſion was like to end without entering upon his caſe, he cauſed a petition to be preſented to the houſe of lords, wherein he ſubmitted his caſe to their lordſhips conſideration, praying, that his impriſonment might not be indefinite. The lord Trevor, who preſented his petition, made a long ſpeech in his favour, as did alſo the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Nottingham and Abingdon, and the lords Harcourt and North and Grey. It was inſiſted in the earl's behalf, that the impeachment was deſtroyed and determined, ſince he was not brought to his trial the ſame ſeſſions, in which he was impeached; and that the prorogation ſuperſeded the whole proceedings. The earl of Nottingham, who, in 1715, when in favour, had been one of the moſt zealous againſt the miniſters of the late queen, ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon the impeachment's being ſuperſeded by the prorogation, and demanded leave to enter his proteſtations againſt the vote paſſed to the contrary, by a majority of eighty-ſeven to forty-five.[h]

This being rejected, the duke of Buckingham moved to appoint a day for the earl's trial, which, after ſome debates, and appointing a committee to ſearch for preſedents, was fixed and appointed. It is remarkable, that the appointing a day did not occaſion ſo long a debate as the ſhortening the day, and that the earl's friends preſſed the houſe to appoint a ſhort day, while the other ſide pleaded for time. Accordingly, the duke of Buckingham, who had made the motion, declared in a ſpeech for a ſhort day, and named the 6th of June. But the earl of Sunderland and the lord Coningſby were for ſending a meſſage to the commons, to know whether they were ready, or to appoint the 13th of June for the trial. After ſome debate, the 13th was appointed by a majority of eighty-five againſt forty-four, and a meſſage was ſent to the commons to acquaint them with the ſame.

This meſſage cauſed no leſs debates among the commons. They ſaw the face of their affairs a little changed: ſome, who had been active in this proſecution when it was firſt begun, and upon whom the houſe might be ſaid in ſome meaſure to depend for carrying it on, ſeemed to look coldly upon the matter, and to decline the work, or at leaſt to have leſs of that confidence, the houſe uſually ſhewed them before. This cauſed a vote to appoint a committee to enquire into the ſtate of the earl of Oxford's impeachment. The committee found, upon enquiry, that ſeveral members of the ſecret committee (who begun the proſecution) had been called up to the houſe of peers, as the lords Onſlow, Coningſby, and Marſham, and that others ſeemed remiſs, or were abſent. Therefore the houſe was moved and did agree, that mr. Carter, ſir William Thompſon, the ſerjeants Birch, Pengelly, and Reynolds, ſhould be added to the ſecret committee. At their firſt meeting, mr. Carter was choſen chairman in the room of mr. Walpole, who, with ſeveral others, abſented himſelf. For this reaſon mr. ſecretary Addiſon, mr. Craggs, ſerjeant Mead, and mr. Jeſſop, and a little after mr. Lechmere, now chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, were added to the number.

All the eminent lawyers of the houſe being thus named to be of the committee, they immediately fell to preparing to make good the articles of impeachment, in caſe the houſe ſhould agree to proceed to the trial; but all the while they left people in ſuſpence, as to their reſolution, even till the day before the trial was to be. The king had appointed lord-chancellor Cowper to be lord high-ſteward on this occaſion, and all things were in readineſs for the trial; when, on the 12th of June, a meſſage was ſent from the commons to the lords, to demand longer time for their preparations, purſuant to the following report of the committee.

'That the committee had met ſeveral times, and made ſome progreſs in the matters to them referred; but that the proſecution of the impeachment having been interrupted for ſo many months, by the intervention of many weighty and urgent affairs, which more nearly and immediately concerned the welfare, defence, and ſecurity of the kingdom, it was become abſolutely neceſſary for thoſe who ſhould be appointed to manage the impeachment, to review and carefully peruſe all the treaties, records, letters, and other papers, proper and neceſſary for ſupporting this proſecution; which being voluminous it would be impoſſible, within the time appointed for the trial, to adjuſt and apply the proper evidence to the ſeveral articles.'[i]

[h] His proteſt was as follows:

Diſſentient,

I. Becauſe there ſeems to be no difference in law between a prorogation and a diſſolution of the parliament, which in conſtant practice, have had the ſame effect as to determination, both of judical and legiſlative proceedings; and conſequently this vote may tend to weaken the reſolution of this houſe, May 22, 1685, which was founded upon the law and practice of parliament in all ages, without one precedent to the contrary, except in caſes which happened after the order made the 19th of March, 1678, which was reverſed and annulled in 1685; and in purſuance hereof the earl of Saliſbury was diſcharged in 1690.

II. Becauſe this can never be extended to any but peers, for by the ſtatute 4 Edw. III. no commoner can be impeached of any capital crime; and it is hard to conceive, why the peers ſhould be diſtinguiſhed and deprived of the benefit of all the laws of liberty, to which the meaneſt commoner in Britain is entitled; and this ſeems the more extraordinary, becauſe it is done unaſked of the commons, who, it is conceived, never can aſk it with any colour of law, precedent, reaſon or juſtice.

This proteſt was ſubſcribed by Nottingham, Fra. Roſſen', North and Gray, Bathurſt, Abingdon, Manſell, Hay, Guilford, Dartmouth, Foley, Bruce.

[i] When this report was read in the houſe of commons, there was a ſilence for two or three minutes, till at laſt mr. Hungerford roſe up, and took notice of the great hardſhips, which the earl of Oxford had undergone. Mr Boſcowen expreſſed his concern, 'that a proſecution, which the commons had begun in ſo ſolemn a manner, and which was thought ſo neceſſary to vindicate the honour and juſtice of the nation, ſhould, at laſt, be dropped; which he was ſure would be a reflection upon that houſe.

Here again was a deep ſilence; and the ſpeaker riſing, in order to put the queſtion, mr. Samuel Tufnel, made a long ſpeech, in which he obſerved, that, the houſe having been aſſured by the chairman of the committee of ſecrecy, that there was evidence againſt the earl of Oxford ſufficient to convict him of high-treaſon in Weſtminſter-hall, it was that which ſwayed him to vote for bringing an offender to public juſtice, who had betrayed the honour and intereſt of the nation. Mr Bromley endeavoured to vindicate mr. Walpole, by alledging, 'that, though he was chairman of the ſecret committee, yet, if any thing were done amiſs amongſt them, it were hard to lay all the blame at his door, ſince the whole committee were equally concerned in the impeachment.' But, as to the matter then under deliberation, mr. Bromley added, 'that they had been told above a year and a half ago, that the evidence was ready; but that they ought not to give the lords the trouble of going through the whole impeachment, ſince, in his opinion, twenty of the articles were altogether vain and needleſs.' Some members being ſhocked at this aſſertion, mr. Bromley immediately explained himſelf, ſaying, 'that, if the two articles that were for high-treaſon could be made good, the other twenty would be needleſs and inſignificant.' Mr Shippen obſerved, 'that this impeachment had been depending ſo long, that every body expected it would be dropped: and indeed, unleſs the two articles of high-treaſon could be made good, he thought it unreaſonable to give the two houſes an unneceſſary trouble about the other articles, by keeping them ſitting in the hotteſt part of the ſummer. That, after all, thoſe, who had firſt begun the impeachments, ought to be ſatisfied with having got the places of thoſe that were impeached; which, indeed, ſeemed, to be what they had principally in view. That the truth of this appeared evidently from the behaviour of the gentleman, who was the moſt forward and active in the impeachments, whoſe warmth was very much abated ſince he was out of place. That he did not mention this as a reflection on that gentleman, for whom he ever had a great reſpect; but that he was afraid this would leſſen him in the eſteem of others. That, for his own part, he was not the leaſt ſurprized at his conduct; of which he had, of late obſerved many inſtances; but that he ever diſapproved it.' After this mr. Walpole made an apology for himſelf, ſaying, among other things, 'that he had of late looked over ſome of the moſt material papers relating to this impeachment; and he was ſtill convinced in his conſcience, that the late miniſtry had given themſelves up intirely, and were ready to deliver up the nation to France.' Mr Lechmere ſtrongly ſupported the motion for the meſſage, and ſaid, 'it was no wonder, that a certain ſet of men, who had, at firſt, oppoſed the impeachments, ſhould now be for letting them drop: and that Upon this meſſage the earl of Sunderland moved to allow the commons a fortnight. The duke of Devonſhire ſaid, twelve days were ſufficient. The lords Trevor, Harcourt, and others inſiſted, that the lords having fixed a day for the trial, they ought not to grant any farther time; but the duke of Devonſhire's motion for twelve days was carried by ſeventy-ſix againſt fifty-ſeven; and the 24th of June was appointed for the day of trial, of which notice was ſent to the commons.

Upon this the commons, to let it be ſeen that they reſolved to go on with the trial, voted the preparatory orders, and appointed the committee, with four other members, to be the managers, to make good the articles of impeachment.

On the 24th of June, the lord high-ſteward, with the houſe of peers, paſſed to the court, prepared for them in Weſtminſter-hall, when the commons were preſent, as a committee of the whole houſe, their managers coming firſt, and taking their places. The king, the prince, and princeſs of Wales were ſeated in boxes: as were the reſt of the royal family, and the foreign miniſters. All things being prepared, and ſilence proclaimed, the earl of Oxford, who had been brought from the Tower by water to Weſtminſter, was conducted to the bar by the deputy-lieutenant of the Tower, having the axe carried before him by the gentleman-jailor of the Tower, who ſtood with it on the left hand of the priſoner, with the edge turned from him. Then the articles of impeachment [k] were read, with the earl's anſwer, and the replication of the commons. After which the lord high-ſteward addreſſed himſelf thus to the priſoner (after having mentioned the uſual way of exhorting perſons in his condition as to their behaviour) 'but, conſidering the many great offices your lordſhip has borne in the ſtate, your long experience and known learning in all parliamentary proceedings, I cannot but think it would be improper for me to ſpeak to your lordſhip in that manner.' Mr Hampden, one of the managers, then made a long ſpeech, which ended, ſir Joſeph Jekyll ſtood up, in order to make good the firſt article of the impeachment: but the lord Harcourt having ſignified to the lords, that, before the managers proceeded farther, he had a motion to make, they adjourned to their own houſe, and the commons returned to theirs.

As ſoon as the peers were come to their houſe, the lord Harcourt repreſented, 'that the going through all the articles of impeachment would take up a great deal of time to little purpoſe; for, if the commons could make good the two articles for high-treaſon, the earl of Oxford would forfeit both life and eſtate, and there would be an end of the matter; whereas the proceeding, in the method the commons propoſed, would draw the trial into a prodigious length: urging, that it would be a great hardſhip upon a peer, who had already undergone ſo long a confinement, to appear every day at their bar like a traitor, and be, at laſt, found guilty only of high crimes and miſdemeanors:' and therefore he moved, that the commons might not be admitted to proceed, till judgment was firſt given upon the articles for high-treaſon. The lord Harcourt was ſupported by the lord Trevor, and the earls of Angleſea and Nottingham. But the lord Parker anſwered them, 'that, in all courts of judicature, it is the uſual and conſtant method to go through all the evidence, before judgment be given upon any part of the accuſation: that, though the houſe of peers be the ſupreme court of the kingdom, yet it has ever a regard to the rules of equity and juſtice, and even to the forms obſerved in the courts below. And, as for the priſoner's appearing in the abject condition of a traitor, it was but a piece of formality, which did him no manner of hurt, and to which perſons of the higheſt rank had ever ſubmitted, in order to clear their innocence.' The earl of Sunderland, the lord Coningſby, and the lord Cadogan ſpoke on the ſame ſide. But, the dukes of Buckingham and Argyle, the earl of Ilay, the biſhop of Rocheſter, the lord North and Grey, the lord Townſhend, and ſeveral others having ſtrenuouſly ſupported the lord Harcourt's motion, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of eighty-eight againſt fifty-ſix.

This reſolution being declared to the managers at the lords return to the hall, ſir William Thompſon replied: 'that they conceived it to be ſo much the undoubted right of the commons to proceed in their own method, in maintainance of the articles exhibited by them, and did apprehend, that this reſolution of their lordſhips might be of fatal conſequence to the rights and privileges of all the commons of Great-Britain, that they could not take upon them to proceed any further, without reſorting to the houſe of commons for their direction therein.'

Upon this proceeding, conferences, ſearching for precedents, and the like method of managing ſuch diſputes took up ſome days; and in particular, on the 27th of June, the commons at a conference delivered a paper, containing their reaſons for aſſerting it as their undoubted right to impeach a peer either for high-treaſon, or for high crimes and miſdemeanors, or, if they ſee occaſion, to mix both in the ſame accuſation. [l]

This paper being debated in the houſe of lords, they inſiſted on their former reſolution, that tha commons ſhould not proceed till judgment was given upon the articles of high-treaſon, and ordered likewiſe a paper of reaſons in ſupport of their reſolutions to be drawn up and delipered to the commons at another conference, wherein they aſſerted it to be a right inherent in every court of juſtice to order and direct ſuch methods of proceedings as ſuch courts ſhall think fit to be obſerved, in all cauſes depending before them. [m]

Thus far the two houſes carried on their debate with ſome

this was yet the leſs ſurprizing, in that the ſame gentlemen had conſtantly oppoſed all that had been propoſed for the ſupport of the preſent happy ſettlement. But that, for his own part, he was of the ſame opinion he ever was, that the nation could not proſper, till they had brought thoſe to juſtice, who betrayed its allies in ſo ſcandalous a manner, and brought it to the brink of ruin: and that he would venture his life in this proſecution.' This ſpeech had ſo much weight, that it was carried without dividing, that the meſſage be ſent to the lords.'

[k] See page 25.

[l] The paper was as follows:

'The commons having taken into their conſideration your lordſhips reſolution communicated to their managers relating to the proceedings on the trial of Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer; and being deſirous, as far as in them lies, to maintain a good correſpondence with your lordſhips, have deſired this conference, and have commanded us to acquaint your lordſhips, that they conceive it to be the undoubted right of the commons to impeach a peer, either for high-treaſon, or for high crimes and miſdemeanors; or, if they ſee occaſion, to mix both the one and the other in the ſame accuſation.

The impeachment preferred againſt Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer is one continued accuſation, conſiſting of high crimes and miſdemeanors, and alſo of charges of high-treaſon. The facts, on which the articles preceding thoſe of high-treaſon are grounded, are laid together in order of time, and follow one another ſucceſſively, in the manner they were committed.

As the commons thought this the moſt natural method for exhibiting the ſeveral articles againſt the ſaid earl, they were of opinion, that they ſhould proceed in the proof of theſe ſeveral facts after the ſame method, ſince it is manifeſt, that, in laying open the courſe of ſuch a wiced adminiſtration, the preceding parts of it gave light to thoſe which follow; and that the proof of the ſeveral articles of high crimes and miſdemeanors would naturally lead to the proof of thoſe of high-treaſon.

Your lordſhips received theſe ſeveral articles of impeachment, without making any exception againſt the form in which they were exhibited. The ſaid earl made his anſwer to them in the ſame order, and has no where inſiſted to be tried in any other method: ſo that the commons are ſurprized to find a ſtop put to their proſecution by an objection, which has never been ſtarted by the ſaid earl, and which your lordſhips had given them ſo little reaſon to expect.

To this muſt be added, that as the commons only are maſters of the evidence, and as upon that account they are beſt able to determine what to charge firſt, and what next; ſo they are moſt proper to determine in what method to proceed for the advantage of the proſecution, in the event of which all the commons of Great-Britain are ſo highly concerned.

To which they further add, that they ſee no reaſon, but that your lordſhips may as well invert the whole order of the articles, as to preſcribe to the commons thoſe particular articles, on which they are firſt to proceed; which will neceſſarily produce ſuch a confuſion, both in the facts and evidence, as is by no means conſiſtent with that clearneſs and perſpicuity, in which the commons think this affair ought to appear.

The commons, upon examining precedents, do do find divers precedents of impeachments for high-treaſon, and other high crimes and miſdemeanors, in the ſame accuſation; and do not find, that the lords ever objected to ſuch proceedings, or ever gave judgment upon any particular article of an impeachment before the commons had gone through, and concluded their evidence upon all the articles, or ſo many of them as they thought fit: and the commons are at a loſs to conceive what arguments, or precedents, can be brought to ſupport the reſolution of your lordſhips, to give judgment upon one part of the ſame accuſation, reſerving the other part for a ſubſequent trial, as they are to know what your lordſhips mean by admitting the commons to proceed upon the articles of high crimes and miſdemeanors, after the judgment is given upon the articles for high-treaſon ſuppoſing the judgment proper for high-treaſon ſhould be given againſt the ſaid earl.

For theſe reaſons the commons aſſert it as their undoubted right to proceed on the trial of Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, after the method, in which their managers were proceeding, when interrupted by your lordſhips reſolution.'

[m] The paper was as follows.

'Their lordſhips, in order to preſerve a good correſpondence with the houſe of commons (which they ſhall always endeavour to do, as far as lies in their power) have deſired this conference upon the ſubject-matter of the laſt conference, and have directed us to acquaint you, that their lordſhips judge it a right inherent in every court of juſtice, to order and direct ſuch methods of proceedings, as ſuch courts ſhall think fit to be obſerved in all cauſes depending before them; which can have no influence to the prejudice of juſtice, and where ſuch methods of proceedings are not otherwiſe ſettled by any poſitive rule. The power of judicature, on all impeachments, being a right unqueſtionably inherent in their lordſhips, and it not being determined by any poſitive rule, whether the houſe of commons may proceed to make good the ſeveral articles exhibited for high-treaſon; and there being no precedent, where the commons, upon the trial of any ſuch impeachment, attempted to proceed, in the firſt place, to make good any of the articles contained in ſuch impeachments for high crimes and miſdemeanors; their lordſhips conſidering the nature of the impeachments now depending before them, and the method, wherein the managers for the houſe of commons were beginning to proceed upon the trial, to make good the firſt article thereof, which is a charge for high crimes and miſdemeanors only; and alſo conſidering the very different methods of proceeding on an impeachment of a peer for high-treaſon, as well

calmneſs, but they grew warmer the next day, when th commons, having conſidered the paper delivered to them by the lords, ſent a meſſage to deſire a free conference, and the lords refuſed it; and now the party for the earl of Oxford began to ſee his deliverance at hand, for the lords refuſing to grant the commons a free conference, ſet the two houſes into a new diſpute, and put the wiſhed-for agreement about the trial quite out of the queſtion.

This refuſal of a free conference was urged in the houſe of lords upon the foundation, that it was a point of judicature in which the commons had no concern, at leaſt, they could not admit it to be debated; and ſome precedents were brought, in which the commons had denied the peers a free conference, as in money-bills, in which the ſame reaſons were given, namely, that it was a money-bill in which the lords had no right to make any amendment. Theſe things were going on to great heights, and, the commons deſiring a conference upon this ſubject, they gave in a paper to the managers for the peers, wherein they inſiſted that it was not a point of judicature, but a point relating only to the proſecution of the commons, and therefore a free conference ought not to be denied. [n]

The lords, though many of them were zealous for bringing on the trial, yet being tender of the privileges of the peers, and ſatisfied that the commons were in the wrong, reſolved to inſiſt upon it, that they ought not to grant them a free conference upon this ſubject; and, having put the queſtion again in their houſe, it paſſed, not to grant a free conference, which was ſignifyed to the commons.

This meſſage put the houſe of commons in a flame, and ſeveral warm ſpeeches were made on the occaſion by mr. Stanhope, mr. Craggs, mr. Tufnel, and others; mr. Lechmere 'lamented the unhappy dilemma to which they were brought, either to ſee ſo great an offender as the earl of Oxford eſcape unpuniſhed, or to acquieſce in proceeding on his trial in the manner preſcribed by the lords.' He ſaid, 'he thought the latter more eligible of the two, with a ſaving to the rights and privileges of the commons, and therefore made a motion for it.' He was ſupported by mr. Hampden, and ſeveral other members, but his motion was rejected. Then a meſſage was brought from the lords, that they intended preſently to proceed on the trial of the earl. The commons took no notice of this meſſage. [o] However, ſeeing the lords were reſolved to proceed, the houſe adjourned. It was ſuggeſted, this adjournment was ordered, that they might not receive any more meſſages about it, or be ſent to from the hall to appear at the trial.

It appears from the debates above-mentioned, that theſe things were not carried thus without ſome variety of opinions and motions. Some, who were zealous for bringing a great offender (and ſuch they accounted the earl to be) to juſtice, were for quitting the nicety they contended for, and, not doubting but they ſhould be able to make good the charge of high-treaſon againſt him, were for giving the lords the point and proceeding. But others, no leſs zealous for juſtice, and as much convinced of the earl's guilt, were yet of opinion, that they ought not to make any precedent, which might be uſed by poſterity to the diſadvantages of the commons, and in prejudice to their rights, but that they ſhould proceed in the ordinary methods of juſtice, and preſerve the privileges of their houſe entire, as their anceſtors had done before them.

It was, however, propoſed to proceed by way of attainder; and ſir William Strickland moved it, though in other words, 'that leave be given to bring in a bill, to inflict pains and penalties on Robert earl of Oxford, as his traiterous practices and miſdemeanors deſerve, and as ſhall be thought reaſonable.' This bred a high debate, which ended in an adjournment to the 3d of July.

In the mean time, the lords proceeded to the formalities of judicature. They went down to the hall, took their places, ordered the earl to be brought to the bar, and made proclamation for his accuſers to appear, and make good the impeachment againſt him. After this, the court ſat perfectly ſilent, as if expecting the commons ſhould appear. This ſilence held about a quarter of an hour, when the lords adjourned to their houſe, where the queſtion, that the earl ſhould be acquitted, paſſed in the affirmative, after ſome debate. Then the houſe returned to the hall, where, one or two excepted, they all gave their votes for the diſcharge of the earl of Oxford, who was immediately ſet at liberty. It was obſerved, moſt of the whig lords retired, before the peers went the laſt time to the hall, ſo there were not above a hundred and ſeven who gave their votes.

Thus ended this affair: and it is plain, the earl owed his diſcharge not only to the diſputes between the two houſes, but alſo to the late changes in the miniſtry; without which the earl of Nottingham, the duke of Argyle, the earl of Ilay, the duke of Devonſhire, and the lord Townſhend would certainly not have been in the number of his friends. However, the commons did not reſt here, for, though ſir William Strickland's bill for inflicting pains and penalties on the earl was not ſeconded, yet, to ſhew their reſentment at this proceeding, they reſolved that the king ſhould be addreſſed, to except him out of the act of grace, which was intended to be brought into the houſe [p]. The king had likewiſe, two days before, upon information that the before as upon the trial thereof, and the circumſtances attending ſuch a trial, thought themſelves obliged to come to a reſolution communicated to the commons on the 24th inſtant, as well for the doing juſtice in the caſe depending before them, as for the preventing a new precedent to be made on this trial; in conſequence whereof, a new and unjuſtifiable form of proceeding againſt a peer, upon an impeachment for high-treaſon and high crimes, might be introduced at his trial upon thoſe articles, in which he is charged for high crimes and miſdemeanors only, to the prejudice of the peerage of Great-Britain in all time to come, viz. the trying a peer on articles for high crimes and miſdemeanors without the bar, the detaining in cuſtody a peer ſo accuſed, and repeated commitments of him to the Tower during the time of ſuch trial and ſubjecting a peer to as ignominious circumſtances on his trial, as if he was then on his trial on articles for high-treaſon: whereas a peer, on his trial, on articles for miſdemeanors only, ought not to be deprived of his liberty, nor ſequeſtered from parliament, and is entitled to the privilege of ſitting within the bar during the whole time of his trial: in all which particulars, the known rule of proceedings in ſuch caſes may be evaded, ſhould a peer be brought to his trial on ſeveral articles exhibited againſt him on high crimes and miſdemeanors and high-treaſon mixed together, and the commons be admitted to proceed, in order to make good the articles for high crimes and miſdemeanors, before judgment be given upon the articles for high-treaſon. Their lordſhips have fully conſidered the matters offered to them by the houſe of commons, at the laſt conference relating to the proceedings againſt Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer; and their lordſhips are fully ſatisfied, that the reſolution they have taken and communicated to the commons on the 24th inſtant, is juſt and reaſonable; and that the houſe of commons are not put under any real inconvenience thereby, in carrying on their preſent proſecution. Their lordſhips have commanded us to let you know, that they do inſiſt on their ſaid reſolution, viz. that the commons be not admitted to proceed, in order to make good the articles againſt Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, for high crimes and miſdemeanors, till judgment be firſt given upon the articles for high-treaſon.'

[n] The paper was thus:

'The commons having taken into conſideration your lordſhips meſſage, viz. that your lordſhips did not think fit to give a free conference on the ſubject-matter of the laſt conference, as was deſired by the commons: and they being ſtill deſirous, to the utmoſt of their power, to preſerve a good correſpondence with your lordſhips, have aſked this conference; and have commanded us to acquaint your lordſhips, that they are very much ſurprized to find your lordſhips deny a free conference, after your lordſhips have already agreed to a conference deſired by the commons on the ſame ſubject-matter, and after your lordſhips have, on your parts, alſo deſired a conference upon the ſame ſubject. The free conferences are the moſt ancient and eſtabliſhed methods for adjuſting the differences that have at any time ariſen between the two houſes, and, as the commons conceive, is the only method to preſerve a good correſpondence between them on ſuch occaſions, which, at this time, is of the higheſt importance, becauſe a miſunderſtanding on this account would tend to defeat the trial of the impeachment of the commons. That the commons conceive clearly, that the ſubject-matter of the laſt conference is not point of judicature, but a point relating only to the commons, it having ariſen before any matter of judgment had come before your lordſhips upon the trial. For which reaſons the commons conceive, that your lordſhips ought not to have denied them a free conference upon the ſubject-matter of the laſt conference.'

[o] It is ſaid, ſome moved not to receive it. Annals.

[p] As this addreſs (which was preſented by the whole houſe on the 5th of July) ſets forth the juſt reſentment of the commons; it is here inſerted, with the king's anſwer:

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

'We your majeſty's moſt faithful ſubjects, the commons of great Britain in parliament aſſembled, do moſt humbly repreſent to your majeſty, that, in our impeachment exhibited againſt Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, we did ſet forth, that he the ſaid earl did traiterouſly adhere to, aid, and abet the late French king, then an enemy to her late majeſty, and did begin and carry on a clandeſtine and ſeparate correſpondence and negotiation with the miniſters of the ſaid French king; in conſequence of which it is evident, that great part of the forces maintained at the expence of ſo much Britiſh treaſure, in order to reduce the power of France; as likewiſe great part of the ſame end, were, in reality, made ſubſervient and inſtrumental to awe the good allies of her majeſty into a compliance with the hard terms dictated by France. The unhappy Catalans were abandoned; the emperor, empire, and king of Portugal, were left to treat for themſelves; the kingdom of Sicily was given to the duke of Savoy, as an inducement and reward to him for quitting the common cauſe, in direct defiance and violation of the grand alliance, and of the declared ſenſe of moſt of our good allies, and eſpecially of the Dutch, who, to this day, have never aſſented to that condition of the treaty of Utrecht. A ſhameful and diſhonourable treaty of peace was at laſt concluded, by which impracticable terms of trade were impoſed on Great-Britain; the demolition of Dunkirk, which had been addreſſed for by parliament, was eluded by a treacherous connivance, as the making of a new canal at Mardyke; and the ſecurity which was propoſed, by removing the pretender out of France, was, in the like manner, evaded by a treacherous connivance at his reſiding in Lorrain.

It is owing to your majeſty's unwearied endeavours for the good of your ſubjects, and that juſt regard which is paid to your majeſty by foreign princes and ſtates, that we ſee ourſelves delivered, in a great degree, from the effects of theſe pernicious meaſures, which might otherwiſe have proved fatal to your kingdoms: but as we reflect, with equal gratitude and admiration, on your majeſty's being able to retrieve ſuch miſcarriages, eſpecially in a time which has been diſturbed by public tumults and rebellion, we think it is a great aggrevation of guilt in thoſe who gave up ſo many national advantages, earl of Oxford designed to come to court, thought fit to forbid him.

The session now drew towards an end, and the houses were chiefly employed in finishing the bills that were depending, when, on the 15th of July, the earl of Sunderland delivered in the house of peers, the act of grace, which the king had promised in his speech of the 6th of May. It was immediately read and passed, and then sent down to the house of commons where it met wirh the like dispatch.

All things being ready, the king came the same day, in the afternoon, to the house of peers, and, having given the royal assent to all the bills, closed the session with the following speech, which was read to both houses by the lord-chancellor:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I cannot put an end to this session without expressing my thanks to you for the dispatch you have given to the public business, and declaring the satisfaction I promise myself in meeting you again early the next winter, with the same good dispositions for the service of your country.

'The measures we have taken in this parliament, have, by the blessing of Almighty God, effectually defeated all the attempts of our enemies, both at home and abroad: and as the principles, on which those measures are founded, are equally conducive to the supporting the just rights of the crown and the liberties of the people, I shall always persevere in them myself, and distinguish those who adhere to them with the same steadiness and resolution.'

Gentlemen of the house of Commons,

'I thank you, in the most affectionate manner, for the supplies you have granted me, and for that constancy and zeal, which you have shewn in reducing our national debts, notwithstanding the many incidents and obstructions you have met with in the carrying on of that great work. As you have furnished me with the means of disappointing any designs of a foreign enemy against these my kingdoms; so I cannot but ascribe, in a great measure, the happy prospect of our affairs abroad to that public spirit, which has appeared in your proceedings, and has convinced the world, that no insinuations or artifices can divert you from your duty to your sovereign, and a disinterested regard to your fellow-subjects.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'It is with great pleasure, that I see the tranquility of the nation so well established, as to admit of an act of grace, which I have long desired a fit opportunity to grant. I hope, that such as shall, by this means, be restored to the enjoyment of security, and the protection of those laws, against which they have offended, will have a due sense of this my indulgence, and give me the most acceptable return they can possibly make me, that of becoming friends, instead of enemies to their country.'

Then the parliament was prorogued to the 12th of August; and afterwards, by several prorogations, to the 21st of November.

Thus ended this session of parliament, famous for the transactions relating to the earl of Oxford, but chiefly for laying the foundation of paying the public debts, without any breach of parliamentary credit.

The expectation of the act of grace had long agitated the minds of people. Some, through their impatience for want of it: others, through fear of being excepted out of it; and others, though their dislike of the general tenor of it, had appeared dissatisfied about it, and spoke contemptible of it. [q]

This act of grace and free pardon was as a finishing to the whole transaction of the rebellion, and therefore it will not be improper to give an account of the persons who received benefit by it, and also of those who were excepted out of it.

The exceptions by name were no more than, the earl of Oxford, pursuant to the commons address, lord Harcourt; mr. Prior, mr. Thomas Harley, and mr. Arthur Moor, with five mean persons, Crisp, Nodes, O'Brian, Redmayne (the printer) and Thompson. Besides these, the assassinators in Newgate (confined there ever since the assassination-plot in king William's reign) were also excepted by name. The other exceptions were but five, except such as are usual in all general pardons. No act of grace for many ages past, in like circumstances, had been clogged with fewer exceptions, considering the number of rebels then abroad, and their unwearied diligence to disturb the peace of the kingdom. [r]

As for those who received the benefit of it, they were first the lords in the Tower under sentence of death, who were immediately delivered. This was directed by an exception in the act of grace, namely, 'all persons impeached in parliament, before the 6th of May 1717, whose impeached remains undetermined.' So that they who were impeachmed for rebellion, and being convicted were under sentence of death, were not by this articles excepted, because the impeachment was determined in law. Consequently, the earl of Carnwarth, with the lords Widdrinton and Nairn, peers, condemned by the house of lords, were immediately discharged. The lord Duffus was continued under confinement, with an allowance of 3l. a week.

Likewise the prison doors were set open all over England: seventeen gentlemen under sentence of death in Newgate were released; as also a great many in the Marshalsea and Fleet, and in the hands of messengers; and not only those who were under sentence, but several others who were not tried.

In the castle of West-Chester, about two hundred prisoners, taken at Preston, were set free, none being detained but the lord Charles Murray, son of the duke of Athol, and he was only reserved to be a particular object of the king's clemency, a pardon having passed for him a few weeks after.

In like manner the prisoners in the castle of Lancaster were delivered; these were in general the common soldiers of the rebels, the rest of them were either sent to the plan tations at their own request, or dead in prison, or had made their escape. The prisoners in the castle of Carlisle, being twenty-six gentlemen, the chief of the disaffected people in Scotland; most, if not all, taken in actual rebellion, and under sentence of death, were likewise released.

In Scotland, all the prisoners remaining in the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling, as the lord Rollo, the earl of Strathallan, and several others of rank were all discharged.

Commissioners, for enquiring into the forfeited estates, had been appointed some time by the parliament. They had managed their enquiry with great application, but had met with great difficulties and obstructions from the creditors of the attained persons, who, by the ordinary course of justice, were in possession of the estates. The lords of session had also, at the petition of some persons, pretending to be creditors, sequestered all the most considerable at a time when they laboured under no such difficulties at home, and when the continued successes of a long and glorious war had put them into a condition of gaining the most beneficial terms from the enemy.

Your faithful commons did likewise exhibit several other charges against the said earl, representing him, in many notorious interests, as a person who had abused the trust and confidence which her late majesty had reposed in him, and sacrificed the honour of his sovereign, and the good of her people, to private views of interest and ambition.

Your faithful commons have not been wanting in their endeavours to bring the said earl to justice; but, by reason of the unhappy differences that have, in this proceeding, arisen between the two houses, we have found ourselves disappointed of our just expectation, and reduced to the necessity either of giving up rights and privileges of the highest importance to all the commons of Great-Britain, or seeing this great offender escape with impunity for the present.

For these reasons, we do most humbly beseech your majesty, that your majesty will be pleased to except Robert earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer out of the act of grace, which your majesty has been graciously pleased to promise from the throne, to the end the commons may be at liberty to proceed against the said earl, in a parliamentary way.'

To this address his majesty was pleased to return the following answer:

Gentlemen,

'I will give directions, in relation to the earl of Oxford, as you desire; and it is with pleasure I observe the sence expressed in your address of my endeavours for the security, honour, and advantage of these kingdoms.'

[q] This gave ground to the following expression in a treatise published at that time, 'that the clemency of king George was not only great and godlike, but even extended further than that of God himself. For (says the author) God Almighty, however merciful in his nature, yet has proclaimed pardon to none but the penitent; whereas king George has pardoned, not those who have repented only, but even those who contemned the very grace they have received, and insulted the king that forgave them, receiving the grace with unthankfulness, and with ungrateful reproaches against the hand that gave it.'

[r] Among the exceptions were all the persons of the name and clan of Macgregor, mentioned in an act of parliament in Scotland, in the first year of king Charles I. It seems the family or clan of Macgregors alias Campbells, had been in rebellion in the time of king James I. and were reduced. But on king James's death, they took up the arms again, not so much on any state account, as to plunder the low-lands, and injure the country; whereupon a remarkable act passed against them. By this act they were all at the age of sixteen to appear before the privy-council, and give surity for their good behaviour; and, in order to their exterpation, no minister, within the bounds of the Highland's, were to baptize any male-child, with the name of Gregor, or Macgregor. The famous Robert Roy, head of this clan, being in the rebellion, occationed perhaps the exception, by which the whole family of the Macgregors were excluded the benefit of the act of grace.

forfeited eſtates, and appointed factors with power to diſtrain tenants for non-payment of rents, on behalf of thoſe creditors. Theſe factors, or receivers, repreſenting, that they acted by the authority of the court of ſeſſion, abſolutely refuſed, though ordered by the commiſſioners, either to pay the rents into the exchequer, or to give ſecurity for ſo doing. In vain did the commiſſioners appoint receivers, as they could not give them a power to diſtrain. Nor would the court of ſeſſion, upon the petition of the commiſſioners, recal the ſequeſtrations.[s] The barons of the exchequer were next applied to, but they likewiſe refuſed to comply with the commiſſioners, upon which they ordered all the monies, ariſen from the ſale of the perſonal eſtates, into the receiver-general of Scotland.

The yearly value of the real eſtates, of which the commiſſioners had perfected the ſurvey, amounted to 29694l. 6s. 8d. ſterling, per annum, as appeared by the report, which was publiſhed in July, by order of the houſe of lords.[t]

The commiſſioners in England did not meet with ſo much difficulty, by whoſe report (which was alſo printed) the annual rents of the forfeited eſtates in England and Ireland amounted in the whole to 47626l. 18s. 5½d. The improved rents of eſtates on lives, after the lives were expired, they computed at 4798l. 6s. 3d.[u]

As the king reſolved not to go into Germany this year, the houſhold removed to Hampton-court, where he reſided for the ſummer.

At the cloſe of the ſeſſion, the following alterations and promotions were made: mr. Stanhope, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, was created baron of Elvaſton, and viſcount of Mahon; the earl of Suffolk, mr. Chetwynd, ſir Charles Cook, mr. Docminique, mr. Moleſworth, mr. Pelham, mr. Daniel Pultney, and mr. Bladen, were appointed commiſſioners of trade; lord Cadogan was made general of all the forces in England; and mr. Boſcowen vice treaſurer of Ireland, of which kingdom the following perſons were made peers: Trevor Hill, viſcount Hillſborough; ſir Thomas Southwel, viſcount Southwel; Walter Chetwynd, viſcount Fitzharding; Alan Broderick, viſcount Middleton; lord Hamilton of Strath Allan, viſcount Boyn; John Allen, viſcount of Kildare. Coniers d' Arcy, brother to the earl of Holderneſs, was removed from his employment of gentleman of the horſe, and one of the commiſſioners for executing the office of maſter of the horſe. The earl of Leiceſter was appointed conſtable of Dover caſtle, and warden of the Cinque-Ports, in the room of the earl of Dorſet; and the duke of Portland was made one of the lords of the bed-chamber.

Whilſt the king was at Hampton-court, count Volkra, the imperial miniſter, brought him the news of prince Eugene's victory over the Turks at Belgrade. Prince Eugene, having aſſembled the imperial army, before the Turks could draw their forces together, reſolved to beſiege Belgrade: to this end he marched his army over the Theyſe, upon a bridge of boats laid for that purpoſe, and poſted himſelf on the other ſide of the Danube, in ſight of that fortreſs: this unexpected paſſage ſtruc the infidels into ſuch a conſternation, that their troops ran away in the utmoſt confuſion, while the reſt of the imperial army paſſed the Danube likewiſe over a bridge, that was laid with all poſſible diligence. The place was immediately inveſted, and lines of circumvallation and contravallation were made from the Save to the Danube, by which means the imperial camp became ſo ſtrong, that it ſeemed as if one fortreſs had laid ſiege to another. This precaution had its effect: for when the main army of the Turks was advanced to relieve Belgrade, they found the beſiegers ſo ſtrongly intrenched, that they were under a neceſſity of opening trenches to approach their lines: but prince Eugene had taken his meaſures ſo well before hand, that when the Ottoman army appeared, though they were much more numerous and formidable than could be believed, he was in a condition to expect them in his intrenchments, without diſcontinuing his attacs. It was undoubtedly a very extraordinary ſight, to ſee two ſieges at once, and even the beſiegers themſelves beſieged; the place being ſhut up on all ſides by the imperial army; and the imperial army ſhut up on one ſide between two great rivers, and on the other between a town, defended by a ſtrong garriſon, and the enemy's camp ſtrongly intrenched: thus there was a neceſſity either to conquer or periſh, and the leaſt falſe ſtep would have decided it. But, when things ſeemed reduced to this dangerous criſis, prince Eugene, inſtead of waiting to be attaced in his intrenchments, marched out of them, and attaced the Turks in theirs, with ſo great bravery and conduct, that he gained a moſt compleat victory, over their almoſt innumerable forces, which was followed the next day by the ſurrender of Belgrade, the key of the Ottoman empire.

Mean while, the great preparations, the Spaniards were making by ſea and land, drew the attention of all Europe. When the emperor ſent his army into Hungary againſt the Turks, who had invaded the dominions of the Venetians, his allies, the pope, to whom wars of that kind are always agreeable, obtained repeated aſſurances from the king of Spain, both by letters, and by declarations from his ambaſſador at Rome, 'that he would not undertake any thing againſt the intereſts of the emperor, whilſt his arms ſhould be employed in ſo religious a cauſe; and would even aid the Venetians with a ſquadron of men of war and gallies.' For which purpoſe he obtained from the court of Rome an indulto, for raiſing a ſubſidy of two millions and a half on the eccleſiaſtical revenues in the Indies; and another for five hundred thouſand ducats on the eſtates of the clergy in Spain. Accordingly, the king of Spain ſent out the laſt year a ſmall ſquadron of ſix men of war and five gallies, which arrived too late in the Levant, to be of any ſervice to the Venetians, who had before ſuſtained a naval fight with the Turks, and had almoſt finiſhed the operations of the campaign. But this year the preparations in Spain were ſo extraordinary, as gave a jealouſy, that, inſtead of ſending aſſiſtance to the Venetians, the Spaniards had a deſign to make ſome conqueſt themſelves on the emperor's dominions in the Mediterranean. The event juſtified the ſuſpicion. A ſtrong ſquadron of men of war, with about nine thouſand land-forces, commanded by the marquiſs de Lede, ſailed from Barcelona the 20th of July, and, landing at Cagliari in [s] Theſe ſequeſtrations were founded upon the words of the act for encouraging ſuperiors, &c. 'That no conviction or attainder ſhall exclude the right of any creditor remaining peaceable, for ſecurity of any juſt depts contracted before the commiſſion of any of the aforeſaid crimes.' As theſe words ſeemed only to import, that the creditors ſhould be paid their juſt debts, the commiſſioners ſubmitted the matter to the lords, whether the payment of theſe debts was not better provided for, by paying the rents into the exchequer, for the benefit of the public and creditors, according to the expreſs direction of the act of parliament, than by ſuffering the growing rents to remain at the diſpoſal of the receivers, who being the truſtees friends, and agents of the forfeiting perſons, were like to injure both the public, and the creditors.

Sardinia, made a ſpeedy and entire conqueſt of that iſland which belonged to the emperor, and was in no good condition of defence.

During this expedition, the marquiſs of Grimaldo, ſecretary of ſtate at Madrid, ſent a letter to the Spaniſh miniſters in foreign courts, to be publiſhed as a manifeſto or declaration of the reaſons of thoſe proceedings, the ſubſtance of which was; 'that all Europe, as well as himſelf, might well be ſurprized to find the military preparations of his maſter, which were deſigned to ſecond the efforts of the chriſtian army according to promiſes made to the pope thereupon, on a ſudden turned againſt that very power, in the attac of Sardinia; but that, as he had opportunity of learning the reaſons of ſuch a conduct from his majeſty's own mouth, he thought fit to communicate the ſame, to be, that though his majeſty had borne with great magnanimity the ſacrifice of many of his territories to the public tranquility by the late peace; upon the preſumption that ſuch a condeſcenſion would ſecure the repoſe of a nation, whoſe good fortune was not anſwerable to its virtue; yet as the arch-duke, contrary to the faith of treaties, encouraged and ſupported the deſertion of his ſubjects in Catalonia, by frequent ſuccours from Naples, and other places, and ſeemed, by all his meaſures, reſolved on all opportunities of giving him diſquiet in his dominions; his majeſty had looked upon the war with the Turks to have opened to him a gate of revenge, in recovering thoſe territories which had been uſurped from him by the arch-duke. That all overtures of pacification on his majeſty's ſide, had rather inflamed the arch-duke's conduct in his prejudice; and that becauſe declarations had been publiſhed in many parts of Europe, injurious to his majeſty's honour and dignity, and particularly becauſe the great inquiſitor of Spain had been ſeized, though furniſhed with his holineſs's paſſport, and in deſpite to that authority, neceſſary to ſupport the due regards of his ſubjects; his majeſty was reſolved to employ thoſe forces in a lawful revenge, which were at firſt deſigned againſt the enemies of the arch-duke.' [v] Theſe reaſons did not appear ſatisfactory: for whatever unfairneſs had been practiſed by the emperor, it was long before the king of Spain's promiſe, not to moleſt the emperor whilſt he was at war with the Turks. And the detention of a ſingle ſubject was too weak a ground for a proceeding of ſuch violence. However, the king of Spain promiſed (by the marquiſs Beretti Landi, his ambaſſador at the Hague) to proceed no further againſt the emperor, and to ſuſpend all operations, in order to give time and opportunity to the powers of Europe to think of expedients for reconciling their differences, and ſecuring the tranquility and balance of power in Italy. The marquiſs alſo complimented the king of Great-Britain and the States, with the arbitration of that important affair.

King George and the regent of France were not only guarantees of the neutrality of Italy, but the king was moreover engaged in a defenſive alliance with the emperor. Purſuant therefore to the king of Spain's promiſe, they concerted meaſures in conjunction with the imperial miniſter, for an accommodation between the emperor and king Philip, on ſuch terms as ſhould be equally advantageous and honourable to both, ſupply the defects of the treaties of Utrecht and Baden, and eſtabliſh, on a more ſolid baſis, the tranquility of Europe; with a reſolution of compelling by force that party, which ſhould refuſe to accede to thoſe ſtipulations, and obſtruct the general good. The abbot du Bois came to London, the lord Stanhope was ſent to Madrid, and the lord Cadogan to the Hague. Theſe negotiations gave birth to the famous treaty, called the quadruple alliance, which was concluded the next year. It was agreed, that the emperor ſhould renounce all pretenſions to the crown of Spain (a point king Philip had much at heart) and part with Sardinia to the duke of Savoy, in lieu of which the duke was to ſurrender Sicily to the emperor. The ſucceſſion to the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, which the queen of Spain (of the houſe of Farneſe) claimed by inheritance, in default of male-iſſue, was to be ſettled on her eldeſt ſon: the king of Spain, not being ſatisfied with this partition, continued to make very formidable prepararions by ſea and land, without any regard to the admonitions of England and France. Upon which king George ordered a ſtrong ſquadron of ſhips of war to be fitted out, as will preſently be ſeen.

Before the parliament met, the following incident happened. The earl of Peterborough, whether with a deſign only to travel, as was given out, or charged with ſome ſecret negotiation, was gone into Italy. Before his departure, he had conferred with the duke of Marlborough, and at Paris had talked with the duke of Orleans: he was ſaid to carry with him larger remittances than was uſual for travellers, even of his rank. The pretender was then at Urbino, where he had notice ſent him from St. Germains to be upon his guard, there being a deſign to deſtroy him. He gave information of it to Rome, and pope Clement XI. ſent orders to all places round Urbino to examine all foreigners, eſpecially Engliſh, and ſeize ſuch as ſhould be ſuſpected.

The earl of Peterborough came at that very time to Bologna with a few armed followers. He was immediately ſeized with his papers, and confined to Fort Urbino, and his people ſent to priſon. His papers were examined, but, nothing being found againſt him, he was himſelf interrogated. He ſaid, he was come to paſs ſome time in Italy for the benefit of the air, and that his people were armed for his defence. He was cloſe confined for a month, and no perſon ſuffered to ſpeak with him. He was at length ſet at liberty with all poſſible civilities, and afterwards had an authentic reparation for the inſult, the cardinal miniſter having declared, that he had been ſeized unadviſedly, and without ſufficient cauſe. The news of the earl of Peterborough's confinement was highly reſented by the people in England, but the king was content with demanding and receiving reparation for the affront. The pope agreed to write with his own hand a letter to an ally of Great-Britain, by which he would declare, that the legate of Bologna had violently and unjuſtly, without the knowledge of his holineſs, cauſed the earl of Peterborough to be ſeized upon ſuſpicions, which proved to be ill-grounded; that then the cardinal Paulucci, ſecretary of ſtate, and the cardinal legate of Bologna, ſhould ſend each a declaration to the Engliſh admiral in the Mediterranean; the firſt to ſhew the pope's diſavowal, and the other to aſſure him, that, out of complaiſance to his friends, and upon unjuſt ſuſpicions, he had ordered a peer of Great-Britain to be apprehended on his travels, for which he had begged the pope's pardon, and deſired his Britannic majeſty's. This letter and theſe declarations were accordingly ſent, and are preſerved, to ſhew the earl of Peterborough's innocence, and the falſity of the ſuſpicions.

On the 3d of November, the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a prince, at St. James's, and the king two days after paid her a viſit, and returned to Hampton-court. The young prince was baptized the 28th of the ſame month, and died not long after. This baptiſm occaſioned an unhappy difference between the king and the prince. It ſeems, the prince had deſigned the duke of York, biſhop of Oſnaburg, the king's brother, to be one of the godfathers, and had reaſon to believe the king was ſatisfied with his choice. But, when the ceremony came to be performed, the duke of Newcaſtle ſtood godfather with the king, not as proxy for, or repreſenting the duke of York, but for himſelf, and in his own name and perſon. This the prince took ill of the duke, not as he acted in obedience to his majeſty's command, but as if the duke had done, or at leaſt ſeemed officious to do, ſomething which he was not commanded. This proceeding ſenſibly touched the prince, and raiſed his indignation to that degree, that he could not help ſhewing it; but, as ſoon as the ceremony was over, ſpoke ſome warm words to the duke, expreſſing his reſentment at what he had done. Upon report of theſe words to the king, his majeſty thought fit to give a ſudden mark of his diſpleaſure, by ſending his commands to the prince to keep his own apartment till his pleaſure was farther known; to which he immediately ſubmitted: ſoon after this his majeſty's farther pleaſure was ſignified to the prince, that he ſhould leave St. James's; accordingly he quitted the palace, the princeſs going along with him, and retired to the houſe of the earl of Grantham, in Albemarle-Street: but the children, by the king's order, remained at St. James's. Soon after this, his majeſty's pleaſure was ſignified to all the peers and peereſſes of Great-Britain and Ireland, and to all privy-counſellors and their wives, that all perſons, who ſhould go to ſee the prince and princeſs of Wales, ſhould forbear coming into his majeſty's preſence. Beſides, ſuch, as had employments under the king and prince both, were obliged to quit the ſervice of one of them.

Soon after this difference, there was printed in the Amſterdam Gazette a letter in French, ſaid to be written by one of the ſecretaries of ſtate to the foreign miniſters, dated at [v] The king of Spain had not yet acknowledged him for emperor.

At the ſame time, the cardinal Paulucci, ſecretary of ſtate to the pope, wrote a circular letter to clear his holineſs from the imputation of any colluſion in that affair, by greatly enlarging upon the reſentment with which he treated ſo perfidious a breach of promiſe in his catholic majeſty, not to fall upon any of the dominions of the emperor during his war with the Turks, and for the performance of which his holineſs had engaged in the moſt ſolemn manner.

Whitehall, December 14, 1717, giving an account of the whole affair, of which the author of the Critic (a weekly paper) publiſhed a tranſlation. [w]

The parliament met the 21ſt of November, and the king came to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnities. His ſpeech had been prepared with great care, by reaſon of the importance of the matters he had to ſpeak of, and was attended with the the expected ſucceſs. The ſpeech was as follows:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am very glad I have been able to bring the ſitting of parliament into a more proper and uſeful ſeaſon of the year. I hope, ſuch an early meeting will not only be a benefit to the public, but a convenience to your private affairs.

As I have always had at heart the ſecurity and eaſe of my people, ſo I never kept up any troops, but for their protection, and have taken every opportunity to diſband as many as I thought conſiſtent with their ſafety. I have reduced the army to very near one half, ſince the beginning of the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and leſſened them to ſuch a number, as will neither be a burden to my good ſubjects, nor an encouragement to our enemies to inſult them.

You cannot but be ſenſible of the many attempts, which have been ſet on foot to diſturb the peace of Europe, and of theſe kingdoms. They only pretend not to ſee, who are not afraid of them. But, as no application has been wanting, on my part, to preſerve the public tranquility, I have the pleaſure to find my good offices have not been altogether unſucceſsful, and have reaſon to hope they will, in the end, have their deſired effect.'

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

'I queſtion not, but you are very well pleaſed to find, that your endeavours for leſſening the national debts have at the ſame time, raiſed the public credit; and that whatever was propoſed, for that end, is actually and compleatly effected. This ſucceſs muſt chiefly be attributed to that juſt and prudent regard you have ſhewn to parliamentary engagements.

It was with a view of procuring and ſettling a laſting tranquility, that I demanded the extraordinary ſupply, which you granted me laſt ſeſſion. The credit, which this confidence repoſed in me hath given us abroad, has already been ſo far effectual, that I can acquaint you, we have a much better proſpect than we had. I have ordered an account to be laid before you of the very ſmall part of that ſupply, which, as yet, has been expended. Any further iſſues, that may be made of it, ſhall be laid before you. And you may be aſſured, that every part of it ſhall either be employed for your ſervice, or ſaved to the public.

I have ordered to be laid before you a ſtate of the deficiencies of the preſent year, and the ſeveral eſtimates for the ſervice of the next, which you will find conſiderably diminiſhed, I rely upon your making the neceſſary proviſion for them; not doubting of the continuance of that zeal for the good of your country, which hath been ſo eminently conſpicuous in every ſeſſion of this parliament.

I cannot, in juſtice, avoid putting you in mind, that ſeveral arrears of pay and ſubſidy, incurred before my acceſſion to the crown, are claimed by foreign princes and ſtates. I ſhall order them to be laid before you, to the end you may put them in a method of being examined and ſtated; which will very much tend to the honour and credit of the nation.'

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I could heartily wiſh, that at a time, when the common enemies of our religion are, by all manner of artifices, endeavouring to undermine and weaken it, both at home and abroad, all thoſe, who are friends to our preſent happy eſtabliſhment, might unanimouſly concur in ſome proper method for the greater ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt; of which, as the church of England is unqueſtionably the main ſupport and bulwark; ſo will ſhe reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing by the union and mutual charity of all proteſtants.

As none can recommend themſelves more effectually to my favour and countenance, than by a ſincere zeal for the juſt rights of the crown and the liberties of the people; ſo I am determined to encourage all thoſe, who act agreeably to the principles, of theſe my kingdoms, and conſequently to the conſtitution on which my government is founded.

The eyes of all Europe are upon you at this critical juncture. It is your intereſt; for which reaſon, I think it is mine, that my endeavours for procuring the peace and quiet of chriſtendom ſhould take effect. Nothing can ſo much contribute to this deſirable end, as the unanimity, diſpatch, and vigour of your reſolutions for the ſupport of my government.'

This ſpeech, as it appears, was worded with great caution, particularly with regard to the army, and the proteſtant diſſenters. The king, by ſaying he had ſo leſſened the troops, that they would neither burthen his ſubjects nor encourage his enemies, prevented any intended addreſſes for a farther reduction. His wiſhing that all the friends of the eſtabliſhment would concur in ſome method for ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt, tended to the repeal of the ſevere laws made in the laſt reign againſt the diſſenters, which had been prevented by the commotions in the kingdom, and which he thought might be accompliſhed this ſeſſion. He had, ever ſince his acceſſion, declared for toleration, and ſeems here to promiſe his favour and countenance to ſuch as ſhould be of his mind.

The lords without any debate voted an addreſs, in which they thanked the king for diſbanding ſo many troops, and for his unwearied application towards ſettling the peace of Europe, aſſuring him, that nothing ſhould be wanting on their parts towards ſupporting him with the utmoſt zeal and vigour, till his endeavours had the deſired effect. They concluded with ſaying, 'we have a grateful ſenſe of your majeſty's concern for the proteſtant religion, and the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; which, as it has always been the chief of the proteſtant churches, ſo it can never be ſo well ſupported, as by ſtrengthening and uniting (as far as may be) the proteſtant intereſt.'

An addreſs of thanks was alſo voted by the commons, but not without ſome debates. It was moved by the high-church party, that the king's general expreſſion, 'to concur in ſome proper method for the greater ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt,' ſhould be thus ſoftened, 'to concur in the moſt effectual methods for ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt of theſe kingdoms, as far as the laws now in force will permit.' But this motion was rejected, and the addreſs paſſed as it had been drawn up; wherein, after having thanked the king for bringing the ſitting of parliament into a more proper ſeaſon of the year, and aſſuring him of their endeavours to anſwer his gracious intentions, by improving their early meeting (as much as they were able) to the public benefit, they expreſſed their lively ſenſe of his concern for the welfare of the people by the reductions he had made from time to time of the land forces. 'It is (ſay they) our peculiar happineſs to ſee ourſelves governed by a ſovereign who is not influenced by any notions of greatneſs that are inconſiſtent with the proſperity of his ſubjects, and who propoſes to himſelf the eaſe of his people, as the chief glory of his reign.

We acknowledge, with hearts full of duty and gratitude, your majeſty's unwearied endeavours to prevent the many attempts which have been ſet on foot to diſturb the peace of Europe, and the quiet of theſe kingdoms; and have the more reaſon to apprehend the ill-con-

[w] The letter was as follows:

SIR,

'His majeſty having been informed that ſeveral reports, for the moſt part ill grounded, are ſpread abroad concerning what has lately paſſed in the royal family, he has ordered me to ſend you the incloſed account of it.

As ſoon as the young prince was born, the king cauſed himſelf to be informed of what was wont to be obſerved in the like caſes in this kingdom, in regard to the ceremony of baptiſm; and having found by the records, that, when it was a boy, and the king was godfather, it was the cuſtom for him to nominate, for ſecond godfather, one of the principal lords of his court, who for the moſt part was the lord-chamberlain; he named for this function the duke of Newcaſtle, who now bears that charge; naming at the ſame time for godmother the dutcheſs of St. Albans, firſt lady of honour to the princeſs. Nevertheleſs, his royal highneſs the prince of Wales conceived ſuch a diſlike at this, that on Thurſday laſt, after the ſolemnity of the baptiſm was over, finding himſelf no longer maſter of his temper, he drew near to the duke of Newcaſtle, and gave him very reproachful words, upon ſuppoſition that he had ſolicited that honour in ſpite of him: the king was ſtill in the chamber, but not near enough to hear what the prince ſaid to the duke. This laſt thinking himſelf obliged to inform the king of it, and the prince having confeſſed the matter to the dukes of Kingſton, Kent, and Roxburgh (whom his majeſty ſent to him the next day upon this occaſion) his majeſty ordered him by a ſecond meſſage, not to go out of his own apartment till further order: on Saturday the prince wrote a letter to the king, and the next day (Sunday) another: but, his majeſty not finding them ſatisfactory, and having beſides other reaſons of diſcontent at ſeveral ſteps the prince had taken, he cauſed him to be told yeſterday in the afternoon, by his vice-chamberlain, mr. Cooke, that he ſhould be gone from the palace of St. James's; and to the princeſs, that ſhe might continue in the palace as long as ſhe thought convenient; but that, as for the princeſſes her daughters, and the young prince, the king would have them remain with him in the palace, and that the princeſs ſhould be permitted to ſee them as often as ſhe deſired it. However, the princeſs, being unwilling to leave the prince her huſband, went with him to the houſe of the earl of Grantham, her lord-chamberlain, where their royal highneſſes lay laſt night.'

In the Posession of John Conduit Esq.r

Publisht as the Act directs May 14. 1785.

ſequences of ſuch attempts, ſince there are thoſe, who, as they would be thought to ſee no danger in them, give us reaſon to believe, that they would not be troubled at their ſucceſs.'

This approbation of the king's ſentiments was followed with aſſurances of moſt effectually ſupporting him in ſuch meaſures as he ſhould judge neceſſary, and of chearfully granting ſuch ſupplies as the public ſervice ſhould require. Concluding, 'it is a pleaſure to us, that the eyes of all Europe are turned upon us at this critical juncture, ſince we have thereby an opportunity of ſhewing the world the juſt confidence we repoſe in your majeſty, and our unſhaken reſolutions to ſupport your government, in ſuch a manner as ſhall enable your majeſty to ſettle the peace of Chriſtendom.'

The commons began with fulfilling their promiſe concerning the ſupplies. Eſtimates and accounts were called for, to ſee what was wanted to ſettle the eſtabliſhment of the army, navy, and ordinance as uſual. Ten thouſand men, at 4l. a month each, were voted for the ſea-ſervice; and 224,857l. 14s. 11d. was granted for the ordinary of the navy.

When the motion for a ſupply for the army was made, is was oppoſed by mr. Shippen, ſir William Windham, and others. Mr Walpole made a ſpeech that laſted above an hour, wherein, beſides the common topic of the danger of a ſtanding army in a free nation, he inſiſted on four principal points: '1. That whereas they were given to underſtand, that the army was reduced to ſixteen thouſand and odd men, it ſtill conſiſted of about eighteen thouſand, which was one-third part more than the number of land forces in Great-Britain amounted to formerly in time of peace. 2. That there was no due proportion obſerved, either between the number of the horſe, dragoons, and foot, or between the number of the officers and ſoldiers, that were kept ſtanding, inſomuch that, of about 110001. which the pay of a reduced regiment of foot amounts to, near 7000l. goes toward the pay of the officers, and 4000l. only to the private ſoldiers. 3. That the keeping up ſo great a number of officers was, in effect, the maintaining of an army almoſt double of what was intended, ſince the ſoldiers, that were wanting to complete the companies and regiments, might be raiſed with a drum, in twice four and twenty hours. 4. That the pay of general officers, which amounted to above 20000l. was an expence altogether needleſs, and unprecedented, in time of peace.' Mr Craggs, ſecretary of war, anſwered mr. Walpole, and obſerved, in general, 'that, in all wiſe governments, the ſecurity of the ſtate is the rule chiefly to be regarded; and that his majeſty, both in the augmentation, and the reduction of his forces, had not only conſulted the ſafety but likewiſe the eaſe of his people. That, though, as was ſuggeſted, the nation paid at preſent, near eighteen thouſand men, yet there were only ſixteen thouſand three hundred and forty-ſeven, who could give any jealouſy, unleſs ſome people ſhould think our liberties in danger from the chaplains, ſurgeons, widows of officers, and ſuch inoffenſive perſons, who were included in the firſt number. That therefore there were not much above four thouſand men more now in Great-Britain, than there were kept up after the peace of Ryſwick; which number muſt be thought very moderate by all, who wiſh well to the preſent happy ſettlement, conſidering, that the embers of an unnatural rebellion lately extinguiſhed, were ſtill warm, and the diſcontents induſtriouſly fomented by the enemies of the government. That the parliament had ever contented themſelves with fixing the number of forces, that were thought neceſſary to be maintained; but had left to the crown the manner of reducing and modeling that number. And therefore if they ſhould now do otherwiſe, it would be but an indifferent return to that gracious and tender regard, which, on all occaſions, his majeſty had ſhewn to the ſecurity and eaſe of his ſubjects. That, after all, it was no leſs a piece of juſtice than matter of prudence, to keep up as great a number of officers as poſſible; for, beſides the occaſion, which this nation may have for them for the future, it was but reaſonable to acknowledge the paſt eminent ſervices of gentlemen, who having been brought up to no other trade but war, had no other way to ſubſiſt and provide for themſelves and families. Mr Craggs was ſupported by ſeveral members, particularly ſir David Dalrymple, who declared for keeping up ſixteen thouſand men at leaſt one year longer, urging, 'that the diſcontents ran ſtill as high in Scotland, as before the late rebellion; of which he alledged ſeveral reaſons. But mr Walpole and others were, on the contraty, of opinion, that twelve thouſand men were ſufficient. The debate having laſted ſome hours, the queſtion was going to be put, whether the number ſhould be ſixteen thouſand, or twelve thouſand, when mr. Shippen made a ſpeech, in which, among many other vehement expreſſions, he ſaid, 'that the ſecond paragraph of the king's ſpeech ſeemed rather to be calculated for the meridian of Germany than Great-Britain: and that it was a great misfortune, 'that the king was a ſtranger to our language and conſtitution.' Theſe reflections gave great offence to ſeveral members, and mr. Lechmere urged 'that the ſame was a ſcandalous invective againſt the king's perſon and government, of which the houſe ought to ſhew the higheſt reſentment; and therefore moved, that the member who ſpoke thoſe offenſive words, ſhould be ſent to the Tower.' Upon which mr. Walpole ſaid, 'that, if the words in queſtion were ſpoken by the member, on whom they were charged, the Tower was too light a puniſhment for his raſhneſs: but, as what had had been ſaid in heat of this debate might have been miſunderſtood, he was for allowing him the liberty of explaining himſelf.' But mr. Shippen not thinking proper either to retract or excuſe what he had ſaid, he was voted to the Tower by a majority of one hundred and ſeventy-five againſt eighty-one.

The next day it was reſolved, that the guards and garriſons in Great-Britain ſhould be ſixteen thouſand three hundred and forty-ſeven effective men, and that the ſum of 681,618l. ſhould be granted for their maintenance: that 130,361l. 5s. 5d. ſhould be given for the half-pay of the reduced officers. After this was ſettled as uſual, the pay of the forces in America, and the garriſons of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon. When theſe reſolutions were reported, ſeveral of them were debated. The pay of the army was reduced to 650,000l. by a majority of fourteen voices only, one hundred and ſeventy-two againſt one hundred and fifty-eight. The ſum for the half-pay officers was reduced to 94,000l.[x]

An attempt was made this ſeſſion to lower the value of guineas. Mr Aiſlabie having taken notice of the great ſcarcity of the ſilver coin, occaſioned chiefly by the exportation of ſilver, and importation of gold, propoſed, that a ſpeedy remedy might be put to the growing evil, by lowering the value of gold ſpecies. Upon this the king was addreſſed for the repreſentations made by the officers of the mint to the treaſury, in relation to the gold and ſilver coins. Accordingly mr. Lowndes preſented to the houſe ſeveral papers relating to the coins, and particularly ſir Iſaac Newton's repreſentation to the lords of the treaſury[y]. Then mr. Aiſlabie renewed his motion, and was

[x] At the ſame time the following regulations were agreed to:

I. That no perſon ſhall be intitled to half-pay, who was a minor under the age of ſixteen years at the time when the regiment, troop, or company in which he ſerved was reduced.

II. That no perſon ſhall be intitled to half-pay, except ſuch perſons who did actual ſervice in ſome regiment, troop, or company.

III. That no perſon, having any other place or employment of profit, civil or military, under his majeſty, ſhall be intitled to half-pay.

IV. That no chaplain of any garriſon or regiment, who has an eccleſiaſtical benefice, or other preferment in Great Britain or Ireland, ſhall be intitled to half-pay.

V. That no perſon ſhall be intitled to half-pay, who hath reſigned his commiſſion, and has had no commiſſion ſince.

VI. That no half-pay ſhall be allowed to any perſon by virtue of any warrant and appointment, except to ſuch perſons who would have been otherwiſe intitled to the ſame as reduced officers.

VII. That half-pay ſhall not be allowed to any of the officers of the five regiments of dragoons, and eight regiments of foot, lately diſbanded in Ireland, except to ſuch as were taken off the eſtabliſhment of half-pay in Great-Britain.'

[y] This repreſentation, being reckoned a curious piece, is here inſerted at large:

In obedience to your lordſhip's order of reference of Auguſt 12, that I ſhould lay before your lordſhips a ſtate of the gold and ſilver coins of this kingdom in weight and fineneſs, and the value of gold in proportion to ſilver, with my obſervations and opinion, and what method may be beſt for preventing the melting down of the ſilver coin; I humbly repreſent, that a pound weight troy of gold, 11 ounces fine, and one ounce allay, is cut into 44 half guineas; and a pound weight of ſilver, 11 ounces 2 penny-weights fine, and 18 penny-weights allay, is cut into 62 ſhillings; and, according to this rate, a pound weight of fine gold is worth 15 pounds weight, 6 ounces, 17 penny-weights, and 5 grains of fine ſilver, reckoning a guinea at 1l. 1s. 6d. in ſilver money. But ſilver in bullion exportable is uſually worth 2d. or 3d. per ounce more than in coin. And, if at a medium ſuch bullion of ſtandard allay be valued at 5s. 4½d. per ounce, a pound weight of fine gold will be worth 14 pounds weight, 11 ounces, 12 penny-weights, 9 grains of fine ſilver in bullion. And at this rate a guinea is worth but ſo much ſilver as would make 20s. 8d. When ſhips are lading for the Eaſt-Indies, the demand of ſilver for exportation raiſes the price to 5s. 6d. or 5s. 8d. per ounce, or above; but I conſider not thoſe extraordinary caſes.

A Spaniſh piſtole was coined for 32 reas, or 4 pieces of eight reas, uſually called pieces of eight, and is of equal allay, and the 16th part of the weight thereof. And a doppio moeda of Portugal was coined for ten cruſadoes of ſilver, and is of equal allay, and the 16th part of the weight thereof; gold ſeconded by mr. Caſwel, who made a long ſpeech on the various values, which at different times, gold and ſilver coins have borne, with reſpect one with another, according to the plenty or ſcarcity of either; he ſuggeſted, that the over valuation of gold, in the current coins of Great-Britain, had occaſioned the exportation of great quantities of ſilver ſpecies; and, to that purpoſe, laid open a clandeſtine trade, which of late years had been carried on by the Dutch, Hamburghers, and other foreigners, in concert with the Jews, and other traders here, which conſiſted in exporting ſilver coins, and importing gold in lieu thereof, which being coined into guineas at the Tower, near fifteen pence was got by every guinea, which amounted to about 5 per cent. and, as theſe returns might be made five or ſix times in a year, conſiderable ſums were thereby got, to the prejudice of Great-Britain, who thereby was drained of ſilver, and over-ſtoced with gold: concluding, that, in his opinion, the moſt effectual way to put a ſtop to this pernicious trade, was to lower the price of guineas, and other gold ſpecies.

This ſpeech was received with applauſe, and an addreſs was voted, and preſented to the king, for a proclamation to forbid all perſons to utter or receive guineas at a higher rate than one and twenty ſhillings for each guinea. Purſuant to this addreſs the proclamation was iſſued the next day, after which the commons adjourned till the 13th of January.

1717-18] The lowering the value of gold, which was thought a proper expedient to procure a greater circulation of ſilver ſpecies, had, during the receſs, a contrary effect, either, as was ſuppoſed, through the covetouſneſs of ſome monied men, who hoarded up ſilver, in hopes that the ſame would be raiſed; or out of fear that gold would ſtill be lowered; or through the malice of the diſaffected, who, by the ſame method, thought, if not to diſtreſs the government, at leaſt to raiſe murmurings againſt it amongſt the common people, upon account of the ſtop which was thereby put to petty trade. In order therefore to remedy this great evil, as ſoon as the commons met, they came to a reſolution, 'that this houſe will not alter the ſtandard of the gold and ſilver coins of this kingdom in fineneſs, weight, and denomination.' The lords came alſo to the ſame reſolution, and ordered a bill to be brought in to prevent the melting down of the ſilver coin.

Upon a meſſage delivered to the lords by the lord-chancellor, and to the commons by mr. Comptroller, both houſes adjourned for a few days. It was generally believed this adjournment was occaſioned by ſome meaſures that were then taken, in order to reconcile the royal family, which not having the deſired effect, it was expected the king would, on the day of meeting, have come to the houſe of peers, and acquainted the parliament with ſome matters of importance; but the court took another courſe, to the great diſappointment of ſome perſons.[z] is therefore in Spain and Portugal of ſixteen times more value than ſilver of equal weight and allay, according to the ſtandard of thoſe kingdoms; at which rate, a guinea is worth 22s. 1d. But this high price keeps their gold at home in good plenty, and carries away the Spaniſh ſilver into all Europe; ſo that at home they make their payments in gold, and will not pay in ſilver without a premium. Upon the coming in of a plate-fleet, the premium ceaſes, or is but ſmall; but, as their ſilver goes away and becomes ſcarce, the premium increaſes, and is moſt commonly about 6 per cent. which being abated, a guinea becomes worth about 20s. 9d. in Spain and Portugal.

About this time a deſign againſt the king's life was diſcovered. The author of it ſeemed to be fitter for Bedlam than Newgate. His name was James Shepheard, a youth of eighteen years, apprentice to a coach-maker in Devonſhire.

In France, a pound weight of fine gold is reckoned worth 15 pounds weight of fine ſilver; in raiſing or falling their money, their king's edicts have ſometimes varied a little from this proportion, in exceſs or defect: but the variations have been ſo little, that I do not here conſider them. By the edict of May 1709, a new piſtole was coined for 4 new lewiſes, and is of equal allay, and the 15th part of the weight thereof, except the errors of their mints. And by the ſame edict fine gold is valued at fifteen times its weight of fine ſilver, and at this rate a guinea is worth 20s. 8½d. I conſider not here the confuſion made in the monies in France, by frequent edicts to ſend them to the mint, and give the king a tax out of them. I conſider the value only of gold and ſilver in proportion to one another.

The ducats of Holland, and Hungary, and the empire, were lately current in Holland among the common people in their markets and ordinary affairs, at 5 guilders in ſpecie, and 5 ſtivers, and commonly changed for ſo much ſilver monies in three guilder pieces, and guilder pieces as guineas are with us for 21s. 6d. ſterling; at which rate a guinea is worth 20s. 7½d.

According to the rates of gold to ſilver in Italy, Germany, Poland, Denmark, and Sweden, a guinea is worth about 20s. and 7d. 6d. 5d. or 4d. for the proportion varies a little within the ſeveral governments in thoſe countries. In Sweden, gold is loweſt in proportion to ſilver, and this hath made that kingdom, which formerly was content with copper money, abound of late with ſilver, ſent thither (I ſuſpect) for naval ſtores.

In the end of king William's reign, and the firſt year of the late queen, when foreign coins abounded in England, I cauſed a great many of them to be aſſayed in the mint, and found by the aſſays, that fine gold was to fine ſilver in Spain, Portugal, France, Holland, Italy, Germany, and the northern kingdoms, in the proportion above-mentioned, errors of the mint excepted.

In China and Japan, one pound weight of fine gold is worth but 9 or 10 pounds weight of fine ſilver; and, in Eaſt-India, it may be worth 12. And this low price of gold in proportion to ſilver carries away the ſilver from all Europe.

So then, by the courſe of trade and exchange between nation and nation in all Europe, fine gold is to fine ſilver at 14 4-5th, or 15 to one; and a guinea at the ſame rate, is worth between 20s. 5d. and 20s. 8½d. except in extraordinary caſes, as when a plate-fleet is juſt arrived in Spain, or ſhips are laden here for the Eaſt-Indies, which caſes I do not here conſider. And it appears by experience as well as by reaſon, that ſilver flows from thoſe places where its value is loweſt in proportion to gold, as from Spain to all Europe, and from all Europe to the Eaſt-Indies, China, and Japan; and that gold is moſt plentiful in thoſe places, in which its value is higheſt in proportion to ſilver, as in Spain and England.

It is the demand for exportation which hath raiſed the price of exportable ſilver about 2d. or 3d. in the ounce above that of ſilver in coin, and hath thereby created a temptation to export or melt down the ſilver coin, rather than give 2d. or 3d. more for foreign ſilver; and demand for the exportation ariſes from the higheſt price of ſilver in other places than in England, in proportion to gold, that is, from the higher price of gold in England than in other places, in proportion to ſilver, and therefore may be diminiſhed by lowering the value of gold in proportion to ſilver. If gold in England, or ſilver in Eaſt-India, could be brought down ſo low as to bear the ſame proportion to one another in both places, there would be here no greater demand for ſilver than for gold to be exported to India: and if gold were lowered only ſo as to have the ſame proportion to the ſilver money in England, which it hath to ſilver in the reſt of Europe, there would be no temptation to export ſilver rather than gold to any other part of Europe: and to compaſs this laſt, there ſeems nothing more requiſite, than to take off about 10d. or 12d. from the guinea, ſo that the gold may bear the ſame proportion to the ſilver money in England, which it ought to do by the courſe of trade and exchange in Europe; but if only 6d. were taken off at preſent, it would diminiſh the temptation to export or melt down the ſilver coin, and by the effects would ſhew hereafter better than can appear at preſent, what further reduction would be moſt convenient for the public.

In the laſt year of king William, the dollars of Scotland, worth about 4s. 6½d. were put away in the north of England for 5s. and at this price began to flow in upon us; I gave notice thereof to the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury, and they ordered the collectors of taxes to forbear taking them, and thereby put a ſtop to the miſchief.

At the ſame time, the lewidores of France, which were worth 17s. 0¾d. apiece, paſſed in England for 17s. 6d. I gave notice thereof to the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury, and his late majeſty put out a proclamation that they ſhould go but at 17s. and thereupon they came to the mint, and 1400000l. were coined out of them; and if the advantage of 5¼d. a lewidor ſufficed, at that time, to bring into England ſo great a quantity of French money, and the advantage of three farthings in a lewidor to bring it to the mint, the advantage of 9½d. in a guinea, or above, may have been ſufficient to bring the great quantity of gold which hath been coined to theſe laſt fifteen years, without any foreign ſilver.

Some years ago, the Portugal moeders were received in the weſt of England at 28s. apiece; upon notice from the mint that they were worth only about 27s. 7d. the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury ordered their receivers of taxes to take them at no more than 27s. 6d. Afterwards, many gentlemen in the weſt ſent up to the treaſury a petition, that the receivers might take them again at 28s. and promiſed to get returns for this money at that rate, alledging, that when they went at 28s. their country was full of gold, which they wanted very much: but the commiſſioners of the treaſury conſidering, that at 28s. the nation would loſe 5d. apiece, rejected the petition. And, if an advantage to the merchant of 5d. in 28s. did pour that money in upon us, much more hath an advantage to the merchant of 9d. half-penny in a guinea, or above, been able to bring into the mint great quantities of gold without any foreign ſilver, and may be able to do ſtill, till the cauſe be removed.

If things be let alone till ſilver money be a little ſcarcer, the gold will fall of itſelf; for people are already backward to give ſilver for gold, and will, in a little time, refuſe to make payments in ſilver, without a premium, as they do in Spain, and this premium will be an abatement in the value of the gold: and ſo the queſtion is, whether gold ſhall be lowered by the government, or let alone till it falls of itſelf, by the want of ſilver-money?

It may be ſaid, that there are great quantities of ſilver in plate, and, if the plate were coined, there would be no want of ſilver-money: but I reckon that ſilver is ſafer from exportation in the form of plate than in the form of money, becauſe of the greater value of the ſilver and faſhion together; and therefore I am not for coining the plate, till the temptation to export the ſilver-money (which is a profit of 2d. or 3d. an ounce) be diminiſhed: for, as often as men are neceſſitated to ſend away money for anſwering debts abroad, there will be a temptation to ſend away ſilver rather than gold, becauſe of the profit, which is almoſt 4 per cent. And, for the ſame reaſon, foreigners will chuſe to ſend hither their gold rather than their ſilver.'

All which is moſt humbly ſubmitted to your lordſhips great wiſdom.

Mint-Office,
Sept. 21, 1717. ISAAC NEWTON.

[z] The king conſulted the judges about ſome matters in diſpute between him and the prince. He gave notice of it to the prince, that he might ſend ſome perſons to ſet forth and ſupport his pretenſions. His royal highneſs ſent ſir Robert Raymond, mr. Carter, mr. Darnel, and mr. Reynolds. The firſt point was, whether the care of the education of the royal family belonged of right to the king? The judges were moſt of them for the affirmative, alledging, beſides other arguments, the example of king Charles II. who educated his two nieces in the proteſtant religion, and married them to proteſtant princes againſt the will of the duke of York, his brother. They cited alſo the example of king William, who appointed governors and preceptors for the duke of Gloceſter, ſon of the princeſs Anne, preſumptive heir of Great-Britain by the new eſtabliſhment.

The other point was, whether the king could retain for the maintenance of the children ſome part of the hundred thouſand pounds granted by parliament to the prince of Wales? The judges were divided upon this point, but, however, in ſuch a manner as ſeemed to favour the prince. This conſultation proved fruitleſs. The prince and princeſs ſtood their ground, and, though they left to the king the education of their children, they refuſed to contribute towards the expence. The king made his grandſon, prince Frederick, duke of Gloceſter, and formed the young princeſſes houſhold.

Street. On the 24th of January, he came to the houſe of mr. John Leake, a non-juring clergyman, and, not finding him at home, left a letter with the maid, who delivered it to mr. Leake's daughter. When mr. Leake came home, the letter was given him, who, upon reading the ſuperſcription, found it directed for the reverend mr. Heath; upon which he doubted of its being for him; but being told by the maid, that it was left for him; and conſidering, that there was no ſuch perſon as mr. Heath, a clergyman, in that neighbourhood, he opened the letter, and, having read it to himſelf, told his maid and daughter, it was a wiced and villainous letter, and then read it to them, and afterwards threw it into the fire. But, upon conſidering the matter, and ſuſpecting that ſome perſon might have ſent it, with a deſign to get his houſe ſearched, and fix an odium upon him, he went to ſir John Frier, alderman, the next morning, and acquainted him with the matter. Sir John adviſed him to ſecure the writer of the letter, if he ſhould call again at his houſe, as it ſeems he had promiſed to do. According to his promiſe he called again in three days, when mr. Leake aſked him whether his name was James Shepheard, and if he had left a letter for him on the Friday before? He anſwered in the affirmative; upon which he was ſeized and carried before ſir John Fryer; Shepheard owned to him the bringing of the letter; and being aſked, if he had a copy of it? he anſwered, he had no copy about him; but, if he had pen, ink, and paper, he could ſoon write one; which he did, and gave it to ſir John; who obſerving to him, that he had not put his name to it, he immediately ſubſcribed it, affirming, that he believed it to be a true copy of the letter he had left at mr. Leake's; and that if, at all, it differed only in ſome few words. The copy was as follows:

SIR,

'From the many diſcontents, viſible throughout this kingdom, I infer, that, if the prince now reigning could be by death removed, our king being here, he might be ſettled on his throne without much loſs of blood. For the more ready effecting of this, I propoſe, that if any gentleman will pay for my paſſage into Italy, and if our friends will intruſt one ſo young with letters of invitation to his majeſty, I will, on his arrival, ſmite the uſurper in his palace. In this confuſion, if ſufficient forces may be raiſed, his majeſty may appear; if not he may retreat or conceal himſelf till a fitter opportunity. Neither is it preſumptuous to hope, that this may ſucceed, if we conſider how eaſy it is to cut the thread of human life; how great confuſion the death of a prince occaſions in the moſt peaceful nation; and how mutinous the people are, how deſirous of a change. But we will ſuppoſe the worſt, that I am ſeized, and by torture examined. Now, that this may endanger none but myſelf, it will be neceſſary, that the gentleman, who defrays my charges to Italy, leave England before my departure; that I be ignorant of his majeſty's abode; that I lodge with ſome whig; that you abſcond; and that this be communicated to none. But, be the event as it will, I can expect nothing leſs than a moſt cruel death; which that I may the better ſupport, it will be requiſite, that, from my arrival till the attempt, I every day receive the holy ſacrament from one, who ſhall be ignorant of the deſign.'

James Shepheard.

Sir John Fryer committed him priſoner to the Compter, and afterwards went with him and mr. Leake, his daughter, and maid, to the earl of Sunderland's office, where the copy of the letter was produced and read to him; which he owned with the greateſt unconcern imaginable. He owned likewiſe, that, while he was at ſchool at Saliſbury, he had imbibed the principles, which he then acted upon, by converſation with his ſchool-fellows, who, in the time of the rebellion in the north, wiſhed the pretender might have ſucceſs, and was confirmed in his opinion by reading ſome pamphlets he ſaw lying on ſome bookſellers ſtalls, particularly, a vindication of the biſhop of Exeter, and eſpecially from the improvement of the words of St. Paul, 'that perſons ought to be obedient to the powers that were ſet over them, although they were tyrannical.' That he had three years ago reſolved upon the deſign to aſſaſſinate the king, and did determine to put it in execution, when opportunity offered. [a] He was brought to his trial on the 6th of March for high-treaſon; and the evidence againſt him was very ſtrong. Being called upon by the court to make his defence, he acknowledged the truth of what had been depoſed againſt him; and owned, that he meant it, that he intended it, and did not think there was any harm in it, or any guilt in the fact, if committed. Upon this he was condemned, and executed at Tyburn, being attended by mr. Orme, a non-juring clergyman, who abſolved him at the gallows, and was ſuppoſed to have penned his ſpeech; which being an invective againſt the king, the government did not think proper to allow it to be printed; [b] and mr. Orme was taken into the cuſtody of a meſſenger. Orme was frequently examined; but, as nothing appeared, upon which it was judged proper to bring him to a trial, he was at laſt ſet at liberty.

The ſame day that Shepheard was hanged, the marquis de Paleotti, brother to the ducheſs of Shrewſbury, was executed for killing his ſervant. The marquis had been in the army many years, under various commiſſions, and had then a regiment in the emperor's ſervice. He was reported to be a gentleman very unhappy in his natural temper, and apt to fly into ſudden indecencies of paſſion. It appeared, upon trial, that the marquis committed this unhappy fact upon his ſervant late at night, as they were going along in the ſtreet together, but upon what provocation no one knew. The circumſtances were ſuch, as to leave no poſſibility of its being done by any other hand, though none ſaw otherwiſe than the buſtle, and running and purſuing, with outcries of danger made by the deceaſed. The marquis made a very inſignificant defence, and pretended diſtraction, or a total ignorance of the whole matter; and it was ſaid, that afterwards he would frequently call for him, as if he had been in attendance about him, and had fallen into no harm; but he was found guilty, and ſentence paſſed accordingly. Very earneſt inſtances were made for his pardon, and perſons of great diſtinction employed on his behalf, particularly his ſiſter the ducheſs of Shrewſbury; but it was all to no purpoſe, his majeſty reſolving that the law ſhould take place upon ſuch an offender, notwithſtanding the eminence of his character. And upon apprehenſions only of a pardon, from the known influence of thoſe who ſolicited it; even the common people began ſtrangely to ferment, and diſaffected perſons were cunning enough to blow up the coals and aggravate highly upon the impunity of ſuch a crime; inſomuch that the public quiet called for his execution. So much regard was, however, granted to his diſtinction, as to be carried out, on the day of execution, early in the morning, to avoid the uſual crouds of ſpectators; but, whether by that getting air, and the deſire of the people to ſee juſtice done upon him, or becauſe young Shepheard, the aſſaſſin, was to be executed at the ſame place that day, is not certain; yet the place was more thronged than commonly, and he had the mortification of having many thouſand ſpectators witneſſes to his unhappy and ſhameful end.

The king had always ſhewn a great regard for the South-Sea company, and was pleaſed to be a proprietor in their ſtoc. The company, to expreſs their gratitude, deſired leave to chuſe him for their governor in the following addreſs:

'The general court of the South-Sea company crave leave to acknowledge, with the greateſt ſenſe of gratitude, the many marks of your royal favour, which the company have received, ever ſince your majeſty's happy acceſſion to the crown: and in particular, the honour done them in becoming a proprietor in their ſtoc.

They therefore do, in the moſt humble and dutiful manner, beſeech your majeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed to grant them the further honour of uſing your royal name for their governor in the enſuing election.'

The king agreeing to their requeſt, ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, acquainting them, that, having condeſcended to permit himſelf to be choſen governor of the South-Sea company, he recommended it to the houſe to conſider of proper methods to remove any difficulties that might ariſe on that occaſion. Immediately a bill was brought in, and paſſed both houſes, enabling the king to be governor, and exempting him from taking the uſual oaths.

[a] When the recorder gave ſentence, he ſaid, it was reaſonable to think that you had received thoſe impreſſions, which incited you to this undertaking, from ſome of thoſe falſe and malicious libels, which have been induſtriouſly diſperſed to delude unwary readers, and to alienate the minds of his majeſty's ſubjects; and it appears to be ſo from your own confeſſion, that you had imbibed your principles from ſermons and pamphlets, which made you think king George an uſurper, and the pretender your lawful king.

It ſeems ſtrange, that you ſhould hint at a paſſage in St. Paul for your juſtification. If he exhorted the chriſtians to ſubmit to the Roman emperors, even though they ſhould be tyrants, how comes it, that you, a private youth, ſhould not only judge of the title of kings in oppoſition to the ſenſe of ſo many parliaments; but that you ſhould think yourſelf authorized to murder a prince in peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne, and by whom his ſubjects are protected in the enjoyment of all their rights and privileges, and of every thing that is dear and valuable to mankind?'

[b] However, it was clandeſtinely printed and diſperſed about, inſomuch that it came bac to England at laſt in the Amſterdam Courant.

On the 3d of February, the king was unanimouſly choſen governor by the whole company, conſiſting of fifteen hundred and eighty-three perſons. At the ſame time were choſen a ſub-governor and deputy-governor. As every thing is influenced by party in England, the whigs of the company had formed their plan, to chuſe under the king mr. Samuel Shephard and ſir Theodore Janſſen; but the tories had laid their meaſures ſo well, that ſir James Bateman, one of that party, was elected ſub-governor, by a majority of nine hundred and eighty-three againſt ſix hundred, and the whigs were forced to be ſatisfied with chuſing mr. Shephard for deputy-governor.

One of the principal ſubjects of debate, this ſeſſion, was the bill for regulating the land-forces, and puniſhing mutiny and deſertion. As the court had occaſion for their whole ſtrength to carry this bill, care was taken that all the abſent members ſhould be ſummoned, ſo that the houſe, when the bill was brought in, was more numerous than had been known for many years paſt. The debate ran chiefly upon the power of courts-martial, to puniſh mutiny and deſertion with death. Mr Hutchinſon began with urging, that a court-martial was never allowed of in England in time of peace, as being inconſiſtent with the rights and liberties of a free people; and moved that the offences committed by the ſoldiers be cognizable and puniſhed by the civil magiſtrate. Mr Hutchinſon was ſeconded by mr. Harley, who, to ſhew the danger of a ſtanding army, governed by martial law, quoted with great commendation, a book written by a noble member of that houſe, intitled, an account of Denmark. Upon this the lord Moleſworth (author of that book) endeavoured to ſhew, that this was not a parallel caſe: that the preſent poſture of affairs in Great-Britain was very different from the ſtate of things in Denmark at that juncture; and that the commons having already declared it neceſſary to maintain ſtanding forces, it was no leſs neceſſary to keep thoſe forces within the bounds of duty and diſcipline by the ordinary rules of martial law as was ever practiſed in all civilized nations. General Lumley, and ſome others, were of mr. Hutchinſon's opinion; and, on the other hand, ſir Joſeph Jekyll was for keeping up the martial law, at leaſt a year longer. But the main diſpute was between mr. Craggs and mr. Walpole. After they had done ſpeaking, mr. Lechmere, who had been hitherto ſilent, roſe and ſpoke with great weight, particularly in anſwer to what mr. Walpole, as well as mr. Hutchinſon had advanced, that a court-martial, in time of peace, was altogether unknown in England. He ſhewed, on the contrary, that the court of admiralty, which is allowed in times of peace, as well as of war, has an equal power in relation to ſeamen, with a court-martial in relation to ſoldiers.

When the debate was over, and the queſtion put, whether courts-marſhal ſhould puniſh mutiny and deſertion with death, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of eighteen voices only, two hundred and forty-ſeven againſt two hundred and twenty-nine. So that there were four hundred and ſeventy-ſix members in the houſe, beſides three whigs, and ſix or ſeven tories, who happened to be ſhut out when the queſtion was put. The abbot du Bois, the French miniſter, having deſired to be preſent at this debate, he was admitted incognito, a favour which, that day, had been refuſed to ſeveral peers.

When the bill came to be read the laſt time, and the queſtion put for paſſing it, there were a hundred and eighty-ſix votes for it, and but a hundred and five againſt it. This great majority was aſcribed to mr. Walpole's voting for it, and his having declared to his friends, 'that though, in the debate about the bill, he was for having mutiny and deſertion puniſhed by the civil magiſtrate, yet he had ſtill rather thoſe crimes ſhould be puniſhed by martial law than not at all.' The bill having paſſed the commons, was ſent up to the lords.

When the bill came before the lords, it occaſioned very warm debates, and many ſpeeches were made on both ſides, of which theſe are ſome of the moſt remarkable.[b] The lord Harcourt ſpoke againſt the bill, and urged, among other things, 'that the parliament, that is the repreſentative of the whole nation, were ever extreme jealous of the legiſlative power, with which they are veſted; and that the lords in a particular manner, ought to be tender of it; becauſe it is a branch of their prerogative to be the ſupreme court of judicature; but that by this bill, whereby the king was enabled to eſtabliſh courts-martial, with power to try and determine any offences ſpecified in the articles of war, the parliament veſted a ſole legiſlative power in the crown, which was communicated and delegated to a council of war. That this bill ſets aſide all other laws, both civil and eccleſiaſtical, in relation to the ſoldiery; and gives courts-martial a larger juriſdiction than ſeemed neceſſary for maintaining diſcipline in the army; ſuch juriſdiction extended not only to mutiny, deſertion, and breach of duty, but alſo to all immoralities, and other offencies, which might be committed by any officer or ſoldier, towards any of his fellow-ſubjects, whereby the law of the land might either be obſtructed, or ſuperſeded by a court-martial. That the officers conſtituting a court-martial did, at once ſupply the place of judges and jurymen, and ought therefore to be upon their oath, upon their trying any offence whatſoever; whereas it is provided by this bill, that they ſhall be ſworn, upon their trying ſuch offences only as are puniſhable by death. That martial courts aſſume to themſelves an arbitrary and unprecedented authority, of which they had a remarkable inſtance, an enſign of the guards having being ſentenced to death without being heard, which was contrary to Magna Charta, and to the birth-rights and privileges of Engliſhmen; and therefore they ought to reſtrain ſo dangerous a power.' On the other hand, the lord Carteret ſaid, 'that he had maturely

[b] When the bill was read the ſecond time in a very full houſe, the earl of Oxford began with ſaying, 'that, as long as he had breath, he would ſpeak for the liberties of his country: and that he was not only againſt this bill, becauſe he thought a martial court inconſiſtent with the rights and privileges of Engliſhmen, but alſo againſt the keeping up ſo great a number of forces; which, being altogether uſeleſs in a time of profound peace, could not but raiſe juſt apprehenſions, that ſomething was intended againſt our happy and ancient conſtitution.' To which it was anſwered by the lord Stanhope, that the nation had the happineſs to be governed by a prince, who, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, had convinced every body, that he deſired no more troops than what were abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety and tranquility of his dominions: that whoever would impartially and ſeriouſly conſider the preſent circumſtances of affairs, muſt own, that the number of troops that were kept ſtanding was very ſmall: that it could not be denied, tha tthe pretender had a great many friends both at home and abroad, who watched all opportunities to foment and take advantage of our inteſtine diviſions: that, on the other hand, Great-Britain ſtood guarantee for the neutrality of Italy, which was then threatened with an invaſion: and therefore it was a matter of prudence, as well as of neceſſity, to keep up a competent force, both to ſuppreſs any inſurrection at home, or to repel any inſult from abroad; and to make good our engagements for maintaining the repoſe of Europe. Hereupon a late miniſter (earl of Stafford) ſaid, he was ſurpriſed to hear, that the noble lord, who ſpoke laſt, was not better acquainted with ſome matters of fact; but that he thought himſelf obliged to inform the houſe, that, by the treaty concluded and ſigned at Utrecht in March 1713, between the miniſters of Great-Britain and France, the late queen, of glorious memory, was guarantee for the nutrality of Italy, and the iſlands in the Mediterranean, only during the evacuation of Catalonia, and till the concluſion of a general peace: for the truth of which, his lordſhip appealed to his colleague in that negotiation. He added, that, ſince that time, the ſtate of things was quite altered, and thoſe in the miniſtry could beſt tell, what engagements had been entered into, either with the emperor or France. Hereupon it was thought neceſſary to know the contents of thoſe new treaties; and therefore it was moved, to addreſs his majeſty, that the ſame might be laid before the houſe: which addreſs was agreed to, but was never preſented.

On the 20th of February, it was moved, 'that it be an inſtruction to the committee, that they do provide that no puniſhment ſhall be inflicted at any court-martial, which ſhall extend to life or limb.' Some reaſons were given for ſupporting this motion; but it was anſwered, that ſuch a clauſe would render the bill ineffectual, baniſh all manner of diſcipline from the army, and conſequently render it entirely uſeleſs. Hereupon there aroſe a warm debate, which laſted from two o'clock in the afternoon, till ſeven in the evening.

Herein it was endeavoured to be ſhewn, that ſo numerous a force, as was allowed by that bill to be maintained in time of peace, was not only dangerous in itſelf to a free nation, but was yet rendered more dangerous, by their being governed by martial law; a law unknown to our conſtitution, deſtructive of our liberties, and not endured by our anceſtors. To which it was anſwered, that, among ancient Romans, the wiſeſt people in the world, and the greateſt lovers and aſſertors of public liberty, martial laws and diſcipline were invigorated by decrees of the ſenate, and were in force in times of peace as well as in times of war. And replied to, in ſubſtance, that it was much better to attend domeſtic than foreign examples; whereupon were produced ſeveral inſtances drawn from the hiſtory of Great-Britain, that a ſtanding army, in time of peace, was ever fatal, either to the prince or to the nation. But hereunto was urged, that thoſe who are veſted with the legiſlative power, ought not, on all occaſions, to govern themſelves by precedents, but rather, by the preſent ſituation of affairs, becauſe it is very difficult to find examples perfectly agreeing with the various circumſtances of times: that it was judged, the number of troops which the commons had thought fit to keep ſtanding, was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity and ſafety of the government and nation; and therefore it was no leſs neceſſary to make a law to keep that army within the rules of duty and diſcipline, unleſs they would render uſeleſs thoſe forces which muſt he owned to be neceſſary. Hereunto ſomewhat was again ſuggeſted, about the danger of a ſtanding army made ſubject to martial law; but it was maintained, on the contrary, that the forces then on foot were neceſſary both for the ſupport of the government, and the protection of our allies; that their lordſhips ought to conſider, that, when the late rebellion broke out, they had double the number of regular troops, and yet the government was obliged not only to ſend for ſome regiments from Ireland, but alſo for a body of auxiliary troops from Holland; and that, ſince the ſaid forces were neceſſary, the bill in queſtion, which was only to render them uſeful, was no leſs neceſſary. A lord hereupon, among other things, ſaid, that, before the noble peer, who ſpoke laſt, was born, he had ſeen the time, when the nation was in danger of loſing their liberties by a ſtanding army; and then his lordſhip endeavoured to ſhew, that the power of life and death, which by that bill was given to a court-martial, was unneceſſary, unuſual, and unjuſt. After this followed the ſpeeches of lord Harcourt and the lord Carteret, as above in the context.

conſidered the affair now in agitation, not as a perſon in a public ſtation, but as a private unprejudiced man; and he was convinced in his judgment and conſcience, that it is neceſſary both for the ſupport of the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and the ſecurity of the nation, to keep up the forces now on foot; and that he was confirmed in this opinion, by conſidering what thoughts the pretender and his friends had of this matter, and reflecting, that they have nothing more at heart, than to procure the diſbanding of thoſe forces, that have ſuppreſſed the late unnatural rebellion. That he doubted not, but the whole body of the nobility that made up that auguſt aſſembly, was inviolably attached to his majeſty king George: that his majeſty had alſo the beſt part of the landed and all the trading intereſt; that as to the clergy he would ſay nothing—but that it was notorious, that the majority of the populous had been poiſoned, and that the poiſon was not yet expelled. That the dangers which ſeemed to be apprehened from the preſent army may be chimerical, or, at leaſt, eaſily remedied in any ſubſequent ſeſſion of parliament; whereas the dangers with which the nation is threatened from the pretender and his friends, in caſe there were no army to oppoſe them, are real, and the miſchiefs that might enſue, upon the ſucceſs of their deſigns, irreparable. That, if there had been ſuch a ſtanding force as we now have, timely to ſuppreſs the tumults and riots which were raiſed ſoon after his majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, in all probability there had been no open rebellion; that, on the other hand, if there had not been troops ready at hand to aſſiſt the civil power, in ſuppreſſing the late riotous aſſemblies of the woolcombers and weavers in the counties of Devon and Somerſet, there had by this time been another rebellion. That the mentioning Magna Charta was, in his opinion, entirely foreign to the preſent debate: that the thing now in queſtion, and that wherein they were immediately concerned, was to ſecure and ſupport the government, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, againſt vigilant, bold, and reſtleſs enemies; and that they had the more reaſon to be upon their guard, in that the trumpeters of ſedition and rebellion had again forcibly intruded into ſeveral pulpits in Scotland.'

Objections being raiſed againſt the preamble of the bill, wherein it was ſuggeſted, that the number of ſixteen thouſand three hundred and forty-ſeven men was neceſſary, it was moved, that the number ſhould be reduced to twelve thouſand. But this motion was rejected; as was alſo another for leaving out the clauſe, which enabled the king to conſtitute articles of war. After this the whole bill was agreed to, and paſſed by a majority of eighty-eight againſt ſixty one. However, ſeveral lords entered the proteſt.[c]

[c] As ſoon as the parliament broke up, the ſpeakers againſt the mutiny-bill publiſhed their ſpeeches, for which they were ſeverely cenſured by the author of the critic, and their ſpeeches boldly examined. The king alſo, ſoon after the end of the ſeſſion, ordered articles to be publiſhed for the regulation and government of the army, purſuant to the power lodged in him by the act. The ſubſtance of the articles is as follows:

I. All officers and ſoldiers (not having juſt impediment) ſhall diligently frequent divine ſervice, in ſuch places as ſhall be appointed for the regiment, troop, or company to which they belong; and ſuch as either wilfully or negligently abſent themſelves from divine ſervice or ſermon, or elſe, being preſent, do behave themſelves undecently or irreverently during the ſame, if they be officers, they ſhall be ſeverely reprehended at a court martial; but, if private ſoldiers, they ſhall, for every ſuch offence, forfeit each man 1s. to be deducted out of their next pay; and for the ſecond offence ſhall forfeit 1s. and be laid in irons for twelve hours; and, for every like offence afterwards, ſhall ſuffer and pay in like manner; and the money ſo forfeited ſhall be applied to the relief of the ſick ſoldiers of ſuch troop or company, to which the offender does belong.

II. If any ſutler, in any of our forts, garriſons, camps, barracs, or guards, ſhall, during divine ſervice, or ſermon, preſume to ſell any beer, brandy, wine, or other liquors, or any kind of victuals, or other merchandize, he ſhall be delivered over to the civil magiſtrate to be puniſhed according to law.

III. Whoſoever ſhall uſe any unlawful oath or execration (whether officer or ſoldier) ſhall incur the penalties expreſſed in the firſt article.

IV. If any officer or ſoldier ſhall preſume to blaſpheme the holy and undivided trinity, or the perſons of God the father, God the ſon, or God the holy ghoſt, or ſhall preſume to ſpeak againſt any known article of the chriſtian faith, he ſhall be delivered over, by the commanding officer, to the civil magiſtrate, to be puniſhed according to law.

V. If any officer or ſoldier ſhall abuſe or prophane any place, dedicated to the worſhip of God, or ſhall offer violence to any chaplain of the army, or any other miniſter of God's word, he ſhall be liable to ſuch penalty or corporal puniſhment, as ſhall be inflicted on him by a court martial.

VI. If any officer or ſoldier ſhall preſume to uſe any traiterous or diſreſpectful words againſt the ſacred perſon of his majeſty, his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, or any of the royal family, or ſhall behave himſelf with contempt or diſreſpect towards the general, or other commander in chief of the forces, or ſpeak words tending to his hurt or diſhonour, he ſhall be puniſhed according to the nature of his offence, by the judgment of a regimental or general court martial.

VII. If any officer or ſoldier ſhall exite, cauſe or join in any mutiny or ſedition, in the company, troop, or regiment to which he belongs, or in any other campany, troop, or regiment in his majeſty's ſervice, or in any party or poſt, where the duty is done by detachment from ſeveral regiments, or otherwiſe, in the army, he ſhall ſuffer death, or ſuch other puniſhment as a general court-martial ſhall inflict.

And if any officer, non-commiſſion officer, or ſoldier, ſhall hear any words tending to mutiny, or ſedition, or, being any way privy thereto, do not immediately uſe his utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs the ſame, as alſo to diſcover it to his ſuperiors, if an officer, he ſhall be caſhiered; if a non-commiſſion officer or ſoldier, he ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed at the diſcretion of a court-martial.

VIII. If any officer or ſoldier ſhall refuſe to obey the lawful orders of his ſuperior officer, he ſhall be puniſhed with death, or otherwiſe, as a general court-martial ſhall think fit.

X. All officers and ſoldiers who have received pay, or have been duly liſted in our ſervice, and ſhall deſert the ſame, either in the field, upon a march, in quarters, or in garriſon, and be convicted thereof before a general court-martial, ſhall ſuffer death, or ſuch other puniſhment, as by the ſaid court ſhall be inflicted.

XII. If any officer or ſoldier ſhall perſuade or adviſe any other officer or ſoldier to deſert our ſervice, he ſhall ſuffer ſuch puniſhment, as ſhall be inflicted by the ſentence of a general court-martial.

XVI. If any officer, non-commiſſion officer, or ſoldier, ſhall be accuſed of any capital crime, or of any violence or offence againſt the perſon, eſtate, or property of any of our ſubjects, which is puniſhable by the known laws of the land; the commanding officers of every regiment, troop, or company, are hereby required to deliver over ſuch accuſed perſon to the civil magiſtrate, ſo ſoon as applied to; and are alſo to be aiding and aſſiſting to the officers of juſtice, in the ſeizing and apprehending ſuch offender, in order to bring him to trial, under pain of our higheſt diſpleaſure.

XIX. No officer or ſoldier ſhall uſe any reproachful or provoking ſpeeches or geſtures to another, upon pain of impriſonment, and aſking pardon of the party offended, in preſence of his commanding officer.

Nor ſhall any officer or ſoldier preſume to ſend a challenge to any other officer or ſoldier to fight a duel, upon pain of being caſhiered, if he be an officer; or ſuffer the ſevereſt corporal puniſhment, if a non-commiſſion officer or private ſoldier

And if any officer or non-commiſſion officer, commanding a guard, ſhall wittingly and knowingly ſuffer any perſon whatever to go forth to fight a duel, he ſhall be puniſhed as above: and all ſeconds alſo, and carriers of challenges, in order to duels, ſhall be taken as principals, and puniſhed accordingly.

All officers, of what condition ſoever, have power to part and quell all quarrels, frays, and other diſorders, though of another company, troop, or regiment; and to command officers to arreſt, and ſoldiers to priſon, until their proper officers be acquainted therewith.

And whoever ſhall refuſe to obey ſuch officers (though of inferior rank) or draw his ſword upon him, ſhall be puniſhed as a general court-martial ſhall appoint.

Nor ſhall any officer or ſoldier upbraid another for refuſing a challenge, ſince, according to theſe our orders, they do but do the duty of ſoldiers, who ought to ſubject themſelves to diſcipline; and we do acquit and diſcharge all men who have quarrels offered, or challenges ſent to them, of all diſgrace or opinion of diſadvantage in the obedience hereunto, and whoſoever ſhall upbraid them, and offend in this caſe, ſhall be puniſhed as a challenger.

XXI. Every non-commiſſion officer and ſoldier, who ſhall liniſt himſelf, in our ſervice, ſhall, at the time of his ſo liniſting, or within a month afterwards at the fartheſt, be taken before a juſtice of the peace by the liniſting officer commanding the troop or company into which he is liſted, and ſhall there take the following oath:

'I ſwear to be true to our ſovereign lord king George, and to ſerve him honeſtly and faithfully in defence of his perſon, crown, and dignity, againſt all his enemies and oppoſers whatſoever, and to obſerve and obey his majeſty's orders, and the orders of the generals and officers ſet over me by his majeſty.

So help me God.'

XXVIII. All officers and ſoldiers are to behave themſelves orderly on the march; and whoever ſhall commit any waſte or ſpoil, either on walks of trees, parks, warrens, fiſh-ponds, houſes, or gardens, corn-fields, incloſures, or meadows, or ſhall maliciouſly deſtroy any property whatever belonging to any of our ſubjects, or belonging to any perſon whatever, unleſs by order of the then commander in chief of our forces, to annoy rebels, or other enemies in arms againſt us, he or they, that ſhall be found guilty of offending herein, ſhall (beſides ſuch penalties as they are liable to by law) be puniſhed according to the nature and degree of the offence, by the judgment of a regimental or general court-martial.

XXIX. No officer ſhall demand billets for quartering of more than his effective men, nor quarter any women or children in the houſe aſſigned him for the quartering of officers and ſoldiers, without the conſent of the owner; nor ſhall take money for freeing of landlords from quartering of officers or ſoldiers, under pain of being caſhiered for it.

XXX. Every officer commanding a regiment, troop, company, or party, whether in ſettled quarters, or on the march, ſhall ſee his own quarters, and the quarters of every officer and ſoldier under his command, paid, according to the rates ſpecified in the act of parliament now in force.

And, upon every payment to be made in quarters, the ſaid officers ſhall give public notice thereof to the landlords, in order to ſee them ſatisfied as aforeſaid: and in caſe any ſuch regiment, troop, company, or party, ſhall be ordered to march, before money may be come to the hands of the commanding officer as aforeſaid, he is hereby required, before his departure out of any town or village, to make up the accounts with all perſons concerned in money due to them for quartering of officers and ſoldiers, for what time ſoever he ſhall have happened to remain there; and grant to every ſuch party a ſigned certificate for the ſame, therein ſpecifying the name of the regiment, troop, or company ſuch officers or ſoldiers do belong to, under pain of being caſhiered for it, upon proof of having wilfully offended herein.

XXXI. On marches, the commanding officers are to apply to the proper magiſtrates for the carriages neceſſary for the ſervice, and to pay for them according to the act of parliament in that behalf, taking care not to abuſe, nor to ſuffer any under their command, to beat or abuſe the waggoners, or other perſons attending ſuch carriages, nor to put more than twenty hundred weight on any wayne or waggon ſo furniſhed to them by the country.

And whatever officer ſhall be convicted of offending herein, or of refuſing to grant certificates in caſe of failure of money, as in the preceding article, ſhall, by the judgement of a general court-martial, be caſhiered, or otherwiſe puniſhed, according to the degree of his offence.

XXXII. All officers commanding in garriſons, in quarters, or on marches, ſhall keep good order, and redreſs all ſuch abuſes or diſorders as may happen to be committed by any officer or ſoldier under their command: and if on complaint made to any ſuch commanding officer, of beating of landlords, or extorting of more from them than they are obliged by law to furniſh; of ſoldiers diſturbing of fairs or markets, or committing of any other kind

The affair of the forfeited eſtates cauſed likewiſe great debates. A bill was brought in for veſting the forfeited eſtates in Great-Britain and Ireland in truſtees, to be ſold for the uſe of the public; and for giving relief to lawful creditors, by determining the claims; and for the more effectual bringing into the reſpective exchequers the rents and profits of the eſtates till ſold. This bill was attended with warm debates in both houſes, which, though they did not obſtruct its paſſage, produced ſome very equitable clauſes. The time of claiming was prolonged, and twenty thouſand pounds ſterling was reſerved, out of the ſale of the eſtates in Scotland, for erecting ſchools, and eight thouſand for building barracs. [e]

Before the ſeſſion ended, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons, which was read by the ſpeaker as follows:

'His majeſty being at preſent engaged in ſeveral negotiations of the utmoſt concern to the welfare of theſe kingdoms, and the tranquility of Europe; and having lately received information from abroad, which makes him judge that it will give weight to his endeavours, if a naval force be employed where it ſhall be neceſſary, does think fit to acquaint this houſe therewith; not doubting, but that, in caſe he ſhould be obliged, at this critical juncture, to exceed the number of men granted this year for the ſea-ſervice, the houſe will, at their next meeting, provide for ſuch exceeding.'

This meſſage was well received, and it was unanimouſly reſolved to preſent an addreſs to thank the king for his unwearied endeavours to promote the welfare of his kingdoms, and to preſerve the tranquility of Europe; and to aſſure him, that they would make good ſuch exceedings of ſeamen, as he ſhould find neceſſary to obtain thoſe ends.

On the 21ſt of March, the buſineſs of the ſeſſion being over, the king went to the houſe of peers, and, having paſſed all the bills, ordered the lord-chancellor to read the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I cannot put an end to this ſeſſion, without returning my hearty thanks to ſo good a parliament, for the diſpatch which has been given to the public buſineſs. You will, I hope, in your private capacities, feel the convenience of an early receſs; and, I am perſuaded, the public will receive great benefit, by the ſeaſonable zeal and vigour of your reſolutions in ſupport of my government.

'Nothing can add ſo much to the credit and influence of this crown, both at home and abroad, as the repeated inſtances of your affection to me. This ſteadineſs and reſolution of yours will, I hope, enable me to procure, againſt your next meeting, ſuch treaties to be concluded, as will ſettle peace and tranquility among our neighbours.

'If, through the bleſſing of God, my endeavours to this end prove ſucceſsful, I ſhall have the ſatisfaction to ſilence even thoſe, who will never own themſelves convinced; and to let all the world ſee plainly, that what I have moſt at heart, is the good and welfare of my people, who may then be eaſed in their taxes, and enriched by their trade.

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

'I muſt return you my particular thanks for the ſupplies you have ſo chearfully granted, and for the late inſtance of your confidence in me. I promiſe you, that my endeavours ſhall not be wanting to make uſe of both to the beſt advantage, for the good of my people.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The practices which are daily uſed by a moſt reſtleſs and unhappy ſet of men, to diſturb a government, by whoſe clemency they are protected, require our utmoſt attention and vigilance. I muſt therefore recommend it to you, that, in your ſeveral ſtations and countries, you will endeavour to quell that ſpirit of diſaffection, which our common enemies are ſo induſtrious to foment.'

Then the lord-chancellor prorogued the parliament to the 20th of May; and afterwards, by ſeveral prorogations, to the 11th of November.

About this time there were ſome changes in the miniſtry. Sir Edward Northey was removed, and mr. Lechmere was made attorney-general in his room. The earl of Sunderland was made preſident of the council, and firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. The other commiſſioners were, Aiſlabie, Wallop, Baillie, and Clayton. Mr Craggs, and the lord Stanhope (who and lord Cadogan were ſoon after created earls) were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate. The earl of Berkley was placed at the head of the admiralty, with ſir George Byng, ſir John Jennings, mr. Cockburne, mr. Chetwynd, ſir John Norris, and ſir Charles Wager. The earl of Holderneſs was made firſt commiſſioner of the board of trade. In April, the lord-chancellor Cowper (who had been made an earl) reſigned the great ſeal, and went immediately into the country. Though it had been reported ſome months that he deſired to retire, yet his reſigning his employment, at that juncture, was a great ſurprize to the public, and no ſmall grief to all unprejudiced perſons. The judges Tracy, Prat, and Mountague, were made commiſſiof riots, to the diſturbing or diſquieting our people; he, the ſaid commander, who ſhall refuſe or omit to ſee juſtice done no the offender, and reparation made to the party injured, ſo far as part of the offender's pay can enable him, he ſhall, upon proof thereof, be puniſhed by a general court-martial, as if he himſelf had perſonally committed the crimes or diſorders complained of.

XXXVII. If any officer ſhall protect any perſon from his creditors, otherwiſe than is allowed by the preſent act of parliament; or any one who does not actually ſerve in the ranks, and conſequently do all the duties of a ſoldier (according to the true intent and meaning of the ſaid act) he ſhall be caſhiered for it.

XLIV. In caſe any officer, non-commiſſion officer or ſoldier, be accuſed of any violence or offence againſt the perſon, eſtate, or property of any of our ſubjects, puniſhable by any of our civil courts or magiſtrates, the officer, to whom ſuch accuſation is brought, ſhall not proceed to the trial of ſuch offender or offenders by a court-martial, within the ſpace of eight days, unleſs at the deſire of the perſon or perſons injured; and in caſe no application be made to the commanding officer in quarters, during the ſpace of eight days, by the perſon or perſons injured; the offender or offenders may be tried by a court-martial for any offence mentioned in theſe articles; provided that, within the ſpace of the ſaid eight days, the perſon injured hath not proceeded to the proſecution of ſuch offender before a civil court or magiſtrate, and notice given thereof to the officer, commanding in the quarters where ſuch offence ſhall be committed.

XLV. theſe our rules and articles are to be obſerved by, and do in all reſpects regard our troops and regiments of horſe and foot guards as well as our other forces.

XLVI. The aforegoing rules and articles ſhall be read and publiſhed at the head of every regiment, troop, and company muſtered or to be muſtered in our ſervice, once every two months at fartheſt, and are to be duly obſerved by all officers and ſoldiers in our ſervice; and alſo by our companies of gunners, and other military officers of our trains of artillery, with ſuch alterations only as relate to the payment of ſoldiers quarters and carriages, which in the kingdom of Ireland are to be regulated by the lord-lieutenant thereof, and in our iſlands, provinces, and garriſons beyond the ſeas, by the reſpective governors of the ſame, according as the nature of the thing ſhall require: and notwithſtanding it is expreſſed in the 16th article of theſe our rules and orders, that every commanding officer is required to deliver up to the civil magiſtrate all ſuch perſons (under his command) as ſhall be accuſed of any crimes which are puniſhable by the known laws of the land; yet in our garriſon of Gibraltar, iſland of Minorca, forts of Placentia and Annapolis-Royal, where our forces now are, or in any other place beyond the ſeas, to which any of our troops may hereafter be commanded, and where there is no form of our civil judicature in force, the governors or commanders reſpectively are to appoint general courts-martial to be held, who are to puniſh criminals by their ſentence, as has been practiſed heretofore, and authorized by former articles of war.

[e] There was alſo a debate in the houſe of commons about the trade with Sweden, which had been interrupted by a proclamation. The merchants having preſented a petition for opening the trade, mr. Jackſon (late reſident at Stockholm) was called in and aſked by mr. Craggs, whether he was of opinion, that, if the trade were opened with Sweden, our merchants would be upon a better foot than they are at preſent? Mr Jackſon anſwered, 'that, in his opinion, the contrary would happen: for now that the Swedes are diſtreſſed for want of our commodities, particularly corn and ſalt, they are inclined to facilitate to us, underhand, the purchaſe of their iron; whereas, if the prohibition of trade with them was taken off, they would immediately provide themſelves with what they want; and, knowing at the ſame time, that there are amongſt us a ſet of men, who make it their ſtudy and buſineſs to embarraſs the government, the court of Sweden would be more ſtiff than ever, and render the purchaſe of the iron more difficult to us.' Some members of the houſe being offended at mr. Jackſon's reflection on a ſet of men (by which it was plain he meant the tory-party) cried out, cuſtody! cuſtody! but the more moderate contented themſelves with putting him upon explaining himſelf. Hereupon mr. Jackſon replied, that he meant the merchants, who preſented unreaſonable petitions. This being by ſome looked upon rather as an aggravation than an excuſe, the cry of cuſtody, cuſtody, was repeated; but mr. Walpole brought him off, by ſuggeſting, 'that that gentleman had lived ſo long in a deſpotic government, where petitions and repreſentations of that nature are accounted capital crimes, that he had forgot the rights and privileges of his countrymen; and therefore moved, that his unguarded expreſſions might be excuſed; and, nobody oppoſing mr. Walpole, mr. Jackſon withdrew. Then, the petitioners and ſome other merchants being called in, and farther heard, they repreſented, among other particulars, 'that, ſince the prohibition of trade with Sweden, they bought Swediſh iron of the Dutch, 4l. per ton dearer than before; and that, whereas the Engliſh were formerly about 30000l. per annum gainers by the trade with Sweden, they now loſt about 90000l.' But this was contradicted by mr. Craggs, who ſuggeſted, that the exports from Stockholm for England had never amounted to 120000l. in one year; and therefore the difference of the profit and loſs could not come up to this laſt ſum. After ſome other ſpeeches, the debate was adjourned till that day month, before which the ſeſſion ended.

There was another debate about a bill for erecting hoſpitals and workhouſes in Briſtol, in which there was a remarkable clauſe, abrogating the ſacramental teſt in the caſe of the guardianſhip of the charities. However, the bill paſſed with the clauſe.

A bill, directing that St. Giles's church ſhould be rebuilt, inſtead of one of the fifty new churches, occaſioned a debate in the houſe of lords, and was oppoſed by ſome of the biſhops, as a miſapplication of the money granted for pious uſes. They alſo propoſed that the words of pious memory ſhould be added in the preamble after the queen's name; but the bill paſſed without any amendment, upon which it was proteſted againſt by five biſhops and ſeveral lords.

oners of the great ſeal; but, about a month after, the lord Parker was made high-chancellor, and ſir John Prat chief-juſtice.

The great ſcene of action this ſummer was in the Mediterranean. Though the king of Spain had promiſed to ſuſpend all operations, after the conqueſt of Sardinia, and refer his differences with the emperor to the mediation of England, France, and Holland, he rejected all their propoſals for an accommodation, and continued his warlike preparations by ſea and land. By the care and diligence of his prime miniſter cardinal Alberoni, a formidable armament was ready, by the month of May, at Barcelona, conſiſting of thirty ſhips of the line and frigates, ſeven gallies, four bomb-veſſels, four hundred and forty tranſport-ſhips, forty mortars, fifteen hundred mules, one hundred and fifty thouſand faſcines, three hundred thouſand ſtakes for intrenchments, a vaſt quantity of warlike ſtores, and proviſions for many months. On board this fleet were embarked thirty-ſix battalions, ſix regiments of horſe, four of dragoons, one thouſand artillery men, a hundred and fifty carpenters and other mechanics, a company of ſixty miners, and a brigade of fifty engineers. To furniſh the ſupplies, the receivers of the revenue were ordered to pay in certain ſums to the royal treaſury: the grandees, prelates, provinces, cities, taxed themſelves voluntarily for this expedition, and raiſed regiments at their own expence. Theſe preparations had been the work of more than two years.

1718] This powerful fleet ſet ſail the beginning of June: the deſign of it was not known but by the event. It was not doubted, but the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples was aimed at, and all poſſible meaſures had been taken to prevent it. Alberoni had deceived all Europe; for Sicily was what the cardinal intended to attac, and the reaſons which determined him to it were very plauſible.

In the firſt place, Sicily not belonging at that time to the emperor, this expedition ſeemed to give no handle to the courts of London and Paris, ſince, by their late treaties, they had only engaged to aſſiſt the emperor, in caſe his dominions were attaced, and not the duke of Savoy, who was not ſuppoſed to be in danger. In the next place, the cardinal was informed of the duke's inclination to be reconciled with the emperor, and give him Sicily without any regard to the rights of Spain. Laſtly, Sicily not being in a ſtate of defence, the conqueſt would be eaſy, and prepare the way for the others he intended to make.

During theſe preparations in Spain, king George had ordered (as hath been ſaid) a ſtrong ſquadron to be fitted out in the ſpring. The marquiſs de Monteleone, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at the court of England, being alarmed at it, repreſented, in a memorial dated the 18th of March, 'that ſo powerful an armament, in time of peace, could not but cauſe umbrage to the king, his maſter, and alter the good intelligence that reigned between the two crowns.' The king anſwered, 'it was not his intention to conceal the ſubject of that armament: and he deſigned ſoon to ſend admiral Byng with a powerful ſquadron into the Mediterranean, in order to maintain the neutrality of Italy, againſt thoſe who ſhould ſeek to diſturb it.'

In the mean time, the negotiations were carried on with all poſſible diligence. The abbot du Bois, in the name of the duke of Orleans, agreed with the Britiſh miniſters at London upon the terms for an accommodation between the emperor and the king of Spain, and had frequent and long conferences on that ſubject with the king. Theſe negotiations produced at length the treaty called at firſt the triple alliance between Great-Britain, France, and Holland, and, after the acceſſion of the emperor, ſtiled the quadruple alliance. As this treaty is one of the moſt remarkable events of this reign, and an evident proof of the aſcendant, which two politic princes in conjunction may have over the reſt, it will not be improper to inſert the plan and principal articles.

The deſign of the negotiations was declared to be, the preſervation of the public tranquility, by removing the jealouſies which were increaſing between ſome of the princes of Europe. Then were ſettled the terms of a peace between the kings of Spain and Sicily and the emperor. Theſe terms, accepted by the emperor, were followed by a ſeparate treaty of alliance between him and the three powers who ſo far concerned themſelves in the peace, as to engage to compel by force of arms the kings of Spain and Sardinia to accept the condition offered them.

The terms impoſed on the emperor and Spain were contained in eight articles:

I. For quieting the diſturbances raiſed contrary to the peace of Baden, and the neutrality of Italy, the king of Spain was to reſtore to the emperor, within two month after the ratification of the treaty, the kingdom of Sardinia, and renounce all right and title to the ſame.

II. In conſideration of this, and of king Philip's renunciation to the crown of France for himſelf and poſterity, the emperor was alſo to renounce for himſelf, heirs and ſucceſſors, all rights and pretenſion to any dominions, of which the king of Spain was acknowledged rightful poſſeſſor by the treaty of Utrecht.

III. In conſequence of this renunciation, and becauſe the duke of Orleans had renounced all right to the crown of Spain, on condition the emperor ſhould never ſucceed to that kingdom, his imperial majeſty was to acknowledge Philip V. lawful king of Spain and the Indies, and to give him the titles and prerogatives belonging to him as ſuch.

IV. In return, his catholic majeſty was to renounce all rights and claims to the dominions of the emperor in Italy or the Netherlands; amongſt which the marquiſate of Final (yielded to the Genoeſe by the emperor in 1713) was to be comprehended He was likewiſe to renounce the right of reverſion of Sicily to the crown of Spain, which he had reſerved to himſelf in the treaty of Utrecht.

V. The duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia were to be accounted for ever as male fiefs of the empire, and were to deſcend in default of the male heirs to the queen of Spain's eldeſt ſon. As the conſent of the empire was neceſſary, the emperor was to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to obtain it. Leghorn was to remain a free port; and the king of Spain was to yield to his ſon the town Porto Longone, with what he poſſeſſed in the iſland of Elba, as ſoon as the prince of Spain ſhould be in poſſeſſion of Tuſcany. None of theſe duchies was to be poſſeſſed by a prince who ſhould at the ſame time be king of Spain, nor was the king of Spain ever to take upon himſelf the guardianſhip of that prince.

The mediators took ſeveral other precautions. It was never to be allowed, during the lives of the poſſeſſors of Tuſcany and Parma, that any forces of any country whatſoever, whether their own or hired, ſhould, either by the emperor, the kings of France or Spain, or even by the prince appointed to the ſucceſſion, be introduced in any garriſon, city, port, or town of thoſe duchies. But for ſecurity of the ſucceſſion ſix-thouſand Swiſs were to be put into Leghorn, Porto-Ferraro, Parma, and Placentia. His Britannic majeſty was ſo convinced of the neceſſity of this expedient that he offered to lend his own forces till the Swiſs could be raiſed.

VI. The next article was of greater importance, and was that with which king George and the duke of Orleans purchaſed (as may be ſaid) at the expence of Spain and Savoy, the aid the emperor was to furniſh in defence of the order of the ſucceſſion ſo favourable to them. By this article the king of Spain for the ſake of the public tranquility was to conſent, that the emperor ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Sicily, and renounce the right of reverſion of that kingdom ſettled by the inſtrument of ceſſion, and the treaty of Utrecht, on condition however of having the reverſion of Sardinia inſtead of it.

VII. and VIII. The emperor and king of Spain were to defend each other in the poſſeſſion of their dominions, and to perform the conditions of this treaty within two months after ratification. After which all other points were to be ſettled at a congreſs.

The treaty between the emperor and the king of Sicily was of the ſame nature, only the mediators ſpoke more like ſovereign arbiters from whom there was no appeal. The preamble ran in a very high ſtrain. The mediators began with obſerving, that the ceſſion of Sicily by the treaty of Utrecht to the houſe of Savoy, inſtead of promoting the peace, as was intended, had proved the chief obſtacle of the emperor's refuſing to accede to that treaty, as all Europe could witneſs. Wherefore (ſay the mediators) the powers, by whom the treaty of Utrecht was firſt ſet on foot, believe that article, which is not eſtential to the treaty, may juſtly be altered, even without the conſent of the parties concerned, as it tends to the perfection of the treaty by the emperor's renunciation, and as by the exchange of Sicily for Sardinia the war will be prevented with which Italy is threatened, in caſe the emperor ſhould attac Sicily, which he has never renounced, and which he has a right to recover after the breach of the neutrality of Italy by the ſeizure of Sardinia. It is therefore agreed,

I. The king of Sicily ſhall reſtore that kingdom to the emperor, within two months, at fartheſt, after the ratification of this treaty.

II. In return, the emperor ſhall give to the king of Sicily the iſland of Sardinia, which he ſhall enjoy, with the title of king; but the reverſion, in default of heirs-male, ſhall be reſerved to the crown of Spain.

As there was no proportion between Sardinia and Sicily, it was fit the emperor ſhould ſeem at leaſt to make ſome farther ſatisfaction. To this end, the mediators in the two next articles agreed, that the emperor ſhould confirm to king of Sicily all the ceſſions made to him by the treaty of Turin in 1703, on condition, however, that all other claims, which he might have by that treaty, ſhould be void. The emperor was likewiſe to acknowledge the right of the houſe of Savoy to ſucceed to the crown of Spain, in caſe of failure of heirs in Philip V. according to the renunciations and treaties of Utrecht.

But it ſignified little to make theſe regulations, if proper meaſures were not taken for their ſupport and execution. In this the mediators were not wanting. France and the emperor, in conjunction with Great-Britain, promiſed mutual aſſiſtance to put the emperor in poſſeſſion of Sicily, and to maintain the ſucceſſion of the Britiſh crown in the proteſtant branch, and to exclude the Spaniſh branch from the crown of Spain. To theſe engagements were added the particular meaſures that were to be taken, to induce or compel the kings of Spain and Sicily to ſubmit to what had been determined for them, in concert with their enemy.

It was agreed to allow them three months, to conſider, which time was deemed ſufficient to examine the conditions, and declare whether they would accept them, after the example of his imperial majeſty, as unalterable terms to extinguiſh the preſent, and hinder a future war. But, if contrary to the wiſhes of all Europe, theſe two princes, after the expiration of the two months, refuſed to comply, the mediators were to join their forces, and compel them to ſubmit.

It was expreſly agreed, that, if one of the mediators ſhould be attaced on account of the ſuccours lent the emperor, the others ſhould declare war againſt the aggreſſor, and not lay down their arms, till the emperor was in poſſeſſion of Sicily, and ſecure, as to his Italian dominions.

If one of the two kings ſhould accept of the terms, he was to join with the mediators to compel the other to do the like. If the king of Spain refuſed to comply, the emperor was to be aſſiſted in the conqueſt of Sardinia: If the king of Sicily refuſed, the emperor was to be enabled to ſubdue Sicily: if both ſtood out Sicily was firſt to be attaced, and then Sardinia, the cuſtody of which was to be left to the king of Great-Britain, till the duke of Savoy had agreed to the treaty.

After having ſettled the means of taking Sardinia from Spain, and Sicily from Savoy, the penalties were fixed, in caſe theſe two princes ſhould carry their reſiſtance ſo far, as to make it neceſſary to have recourſe to arms. The emperor was allowed to recover that part of Milan, yielded to Savoy by the treaty of Turin; and it was to be agreed to what other prince the emperor ſhould give the eventual inveſtiture of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, in excluſion of the queen of Spain's ſons.

To ſhew, however, that nothing but juſtice and peace was intended, it was agreed, that the emperor (whatever progreſs his arms might make) ſhould be contented with the advantages ſtipulated for him; but if he could not recover Sicily by arms or treaty, he was to be free from any engagement entered into by this treaty, of conſenting to make peace with the kings of Spain and Sardinia. It was moreover agreed, that the emperor, when in poſſeſſion of Sicily, ſhould renounce all pretentions to Spain and the Indies, whether king Philip conſented or not to the peace, ſince the guarantee of the mediators would be to the emperor a ſecurity equal to the renunciations of the king of Spain, for Sicily, the Italian dominions, and the Netherlands.

Such was the quadruple alliance, by which king George and the duke of Orleans intended to preſerve the tranquility of Europe: but, contrary to their expectations, it proved the occaſion of all the quarrels and diſputes which afterwards enſued between Great-Britain and Spain.

The ſtates-general, in whoſe name this deciſive treaty was made, did not abſolutely refuſe to ratify it, but under various pretences ſuſpended their conſent. They did not approve of ſuch violent meaſures; and having no particular intereſt in the quarrel, were willing rather to proceed by fair means.[f]

To this treaty were added ſtill more effectual methods: king George offered his mediation to the grand ſeignor for a peace between him and the emperor: the mediation was accepted, and a treaty ſigned at Paſſarowitz.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the king, as he had declared to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, ordered a fleet, ſtrong enough to oppoſe the progreſs of the Spaniards, to ſail for the Mediterranean, under the command of ſir George Byng.

The fleet being ready at Spithead, ſir George Byng went to Portſmouth, where he received his inſtructions, dated the 26th of may.[g] Theſe inſtructions were as follow:

I. Whereas the crown of Great-Britain, by the ſeveral treaties made at Utrecht, the 14th day of March 1713, N.S. with the emperor and the late moſt chriſtian king, became obliged to ſee an exact obſervation of the armiſtice and neutrality then eſtabliſhed in Italy, and was guarantee for the [f] A letter from a Swiſs to his friend at Geneva, concerning the part the ſtates-general ought to act, as to the differences between the emperor and Spain, was publiſhed about this time, wherein a brief account is firſt given of what had paſſed in the affair, and then the reaſons why the ſtates are not obliged to enter into any alliance about it:

'Whilſt the emperor (ſays the letter) was in the heat of war with the Turks, the king of Spain, thinking it a favourable opportunity for puſhing his pretenſions, reſolved not to let it ſlip. He armed with all poſſible diligence, and with all the ſecrecy things of that nature are capable of. He cauſed all the men of war he had, to be made fit for the ſervice, new ones to be built, others to be bought; he gathered together all the tranſports he poſſibly could; he reinforced conſiderably his old regiments, raiſed new; and, in ſhort, attaced the iſland of Sardinia, which you know he made himſelf maſter of.

What did the king of Spain do in this interval? Why, he drew up and publiſhed a manifeſto to juſtify his recourſe to arms.

The marquiſs Beretti Landi (whoſe departure is ſtill lamented here) preſented a memorial to the ſtates-general, wherein, after having exhibited the reaſons which prevailed with the king of Spain to attac Sardinia, he offered, in the moſt obliging manner in the world, in the king his maſter's name, to put all his concerns into their hands, and to accept of them for mediators.

The ſtates-general were, indeed, ſenſible of his catholic majeſty's generoſity; but conſidering, that it was an affair which did not particularly concern them, and that that mediation might directly or indirectly entangle them in the quarrel, they concluded, that it was not their buſineſs to undertake it at any rate; and thereupon they anſwered the marquiſs Beretti Landi in very general terms.

What happened afterwards? Why, England and France, acting with the laudable deſign of preventing the diſorders which this kindling war would infallibly be attended with, enter upon meaſures agreeable to ſuch a deſign. In this view, the abbot du Bois was ſent to London; the affair was there canvaſſed; projects of accommodation were formed; care was taken to let the emperor know ſoon what they were; colonel Stanhope was ſent to Madrid, to communicate the propoſals to his catholic majeſty, or at leaſt to ſound him upon them. But hitherto not one word was ſpoken to the ſtates-general: far from conſulting them, or hearing their ſentiments of the matter, or acting in concert with them, or deſiring them (in conjunction with themſelves) to contribute to the re-eſtabliſhment of the tranquility of Europe; far from all this, I ſay, a profound ſilence was kept as to their part; they were carefully deprived of the knowledge of whatſoever was done: in a word the ſtates-general were not in the queſtion.

But neither was this all; for, after having well examined and debated upon the articles of peace between the emperor and the kings of Spain and Sicily, they were committed to writing; and a treaty of alliance was thereupon concluded between France, England, and the ſtates-general, the chief end whereof was to engage, by all poſſible methods, the emperor and the kings of Spain and Sicily to ſubſcribe to the conditions expreſſed in the ſaid treaty.

This treaty being made between France and England, it was ſent to Vienna, Madrid, and Turin, to be approved and accepted; and then only, after all theſe ſteps, it was propoſed to the ſtates-general.

Thus you have an account, in a few words, how all things were tranſacted. I ſhall ſhew you by and by, that their high-mightineſſes are not any way obliged to enter into the ſaid treaty. For this purpoſe, we have nothing to do to examine whether the terms of accommodation, contained in the ſaid treaty, are reaſonable and equitable, or not; for even ſuppoſing, that they are both the one and the other, I affirm, that the ſtate is not obliged by any engagement to enter into that alliance, and that it is its intereſt not to meddle by any means; and that for ſeveral reaſons.

In the firſt place, as their high-mightineſſes never ſet up as guarantees for the neutrality of Italy, ſo nothing obliges them to make ſteps, in order to reſtore peace there.

Secondly, Since their high-mightineſſes refuſed to accept the mediation which the king of Spain ſo civilly offered them, becauſe they were afraid of bringing themſelves into a ſcrape, they have much ſtronger reaſons to refuſe to come into the treaty above-mentioned, now that the king of Spain appears unwilling to accept it, as it is; for them to act otherwiſe would be to declare themſelves parties, after having refuſed to be mediators, and without the leaſt neceſſity, to fall out with his catholic majeſty, of whom, hitherto, they have on manner of reaſon to complain.

In the third place, it is inconteſtably certain, that this ſtate ought, with all imaginable care, to avoid whatever may involve it in a new war.'

However the ſtates-general, after all the endeavours of the Spaniſh ambaſſador to retard the concluſion of the treaty, did at laſt accede to the quadruple alliance on the 22d of December, N. S.

[g] The inſtructions were incloſed in a letter from ſecretary Craggs:

Cockpit, May 27th, O. S. 1718.

SIR,

I incloſe to you his majeſty's inſtructions, as well with relation to your conduct in the Mediterranian, as to the treaty with the Moors.

After what paſſed yeſterday between my lord Sunderland, my lord Stanhope, you and me, when we were together at lord Stanhope's lodgings, there remains nothing for me but to wiſh you a good voyage, and good ſucceſs in your undertakings. I do it very heartily, and am with great truth,

Sir,

Your moſt obedient, humble ſervant,

full performance of the ſtipulations at that time ſolemnly agreed to on that head: and whereas, by a treaty made between us and our good brother, the emperor of Germany, at Weſtminſter, the 25th day of May 1716, we ſtand engaged to aſſiſt, maintain, and defend him in the poſſeſſion of all the kingdoms, provinces, and rights, which he then actually enjoyed in Europe: and whereas the catholic king hath, in an hoſtile manner, invaded the territories belonging to the ſaid emperor, and, by force of arms, hath taken from him the iſland and kingdom of Sardinia, and is ſtill making great and warlike preparations for carrying on his deſigns further againſt the other dominions belonging to his imperial majeſty in Italy, contrary to the tenor of the aforeſaid treaties; and whereas, ſince this unhappy rupture, we, as a friend to both parties, have not ceaſed to employ our beſt offices, in order to accommodate the differences, and put an end to this war, which, if continued, will endanger the public tranquility of the reſt of Europe: and whereas we have made particular and earneſt inſtances with our good brother, the king of Spain, that he would conſent to a ſuſpenſion of arms, during which the negotiations for peace might be more eaſily and effectually carried on: and whereas the ſaid catholic majeſty hath appeared to us not averſe to the ſuſpending his further enterprizes, and thereby facilitating our good offices towards a happy accommodation: we therefore, for the better fulfilling the ſeveral engagements we lie under by the treaties aforementioned, and for promoting, in the beſt and moſt effectual manner, the meaſures that may tend to the bringing about an entire reconciliation and perfect friendſhip between the ſaid parties now engaged in war, and thereby putting a ſtop to the fatal conſequences, which might otherwiſe enſue from theſe hoſtilites, have thought it fit and neceſſary, for the purpoſes aforeſaid, and for the welfare of Europe in general, to ſend a ſtrong fleet of our ſhips of war into the Mediterranean under your command.

II. You are therefore, upon the receipt of theſe our inſtructions, forthwith to proceed to the Mediterranean with our ſaid fleet; and, being arrived in the Streights, you ſhall immediately give notice to the catholic king, by our miniſter reſiding at his court, of your arrival in thoſe ſeas, and that you are inſtructed, in our name, to promote all meaſures, that may beſt contribute to the compoſing the differences that are riſen between him and the emperor.

III. You ſhall from thence, without loſs of time, wind and weather permitting, proceed to Port-Mahon, and being arrived there, you ſhall, by expreſſes, give advice of the ſame to the viceroy of the kingdom of Naples, and to the governor of the duchy of Milan, and let them know the purport of your inſtructions, that you are come with our fleet into thoſe parts, to make good our treaties with the emperor, and to hinder the further violation of the ſame by the arms of the catholic king: and to that end, you will hold a correſpondence with the ſaid viceroy and governor during your ſtay in the Mediterranean, and let them know, that you are to take meaſures in concert with them, for preventing any further breach of the neutrality of Italy, which, by our treaty, we are obliged to ſee preſerved: and, as you may probably, at Port-Mahon, get the beſt intelligence of the preparations and proceedings, both of the imperialiſts and the Spaniards, you will accordingly take ſuch ſtations with our fleet under your command, as may be moſt proper to obſtruct any new hoſtilities, and to put theſe our inſtructions in execution.

IV. And as a ſuſpenſion of arms, and a forbearance of all acts of hoſtilities on each ſide, in thoſe parts, is abſolutely neceſſary for the ſetting on foot and concluding the proper negotiations of peace, you are accordingly to make inſtances with both parties to ceaſe from uſing any further acts of hoſtility. But, in caſe the Spaniards do ſtill inſiſt with their ſhips of war and forces to attac the kingdom of Naples, or other the territories of the emperor in Italy, or to land in any part of Italy, which can only be with a deſign to invade the emperor's dominions, againſt whom only they have declared war by invading Sardinia; or if they ſhould endeavour to make themſelves maſters of the kingdom of Sicily, which muſt be with a deſign to invade the kingdom of Naples; in ſuch caſe you are, with all your power, to hinder and obſtruct the ſame. But, if it ſhould ſo happen, that at your arrival, with our fleet under your command, in the Mediterranean, the Spaniards ſhould already have landed any troops in Italy, in order to invade the emperor's territories, you ſhall endeavour amicably to diſſuade them from perſevering in ſuch an attempt, and offer them your aſſiſtance to help them to withdraw their troops, and put an end to all further acts of hoſtility. But, in caſe theſe your friendly endeavours ſhould prove ineffectual, you ſhall, by keeping company with, or intercepting their ſhips or convoy, or, if it be neceſſary, by openly oppoſing them, defend the emperor's territories from any further attempt.

V. And whereas we have thought it for our ſervice, to ſend four battalions of our forces on board our fleet under your command; upon your arrival at our town of Port-Mahon, you are to put the ſaid four battalions on ſhore there, to relieve the garriſons in our iſland of Minorca; and you are to take the ſaid garriſons on board your ſhips of war, in order to employ the ſame in ſuch a manner, and according to ſuch inſtructions as you ſhall receive from us.

VI. And whereas we have thought fit to recal our truſty and well beloved Charles Cornwall, eſq. whom we had appointed our plenipotentiary for concluding a peace with the Moors, and have impowered you to renew that negotiation, you are therefore to diſpoſe of the ſhips now under the command of the ſaid vice-admiral Cornwall, and employ the whole ſquadron, or any part thereof, in the manner you ſhall judge moſt proper for promoting the ſeveral reſpective ſervices, wherein you are employed in the Mediterranean.

The admiral ſailed the 4th of June from Spithead with twenty ſhips of the line, two fire-ſhips, two bomb-veſſels, a hoſpital-ſhip, and a ſtore-ſhip. Being got into the ocean, he ſent the Rupert to Liſbon for intelligence, and arriving on the 30th N.S. off Cape St. Vincent, he diſpatched the Superbe to Cadiz with mr. Allix, his ſecretary, who carried a letter from him to colonel Stanhope (the preſent earl of Harrington) the king's envoy at Madrid, wherein he deſired that miniſter to acquaint the king of Spain with his arrival in thoſe parts, in his way to the Mediterranean, and to lay before him the inſtructions he was to act under with his ſquadron, of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter. The envoy ſhewed the letter to cardinal Alberoni, who, upon reading it, told him with ſome warmth, 'that his maſter would run all hazards, and even ſuffer himſelf to be driven out of Spain, rather than recal his troops, or conſent to any ſuſpenſion of arms:' adding, 'that the Spaniards were not to be frightened; and he was ſo well convinced of their fleet's doing their duty, that if the admiral ſhould think fit to attac them, he ſhould be in no pain for the ſucceſs.' Mr Stanhope, having in his hand a liſt of the Britiſh ſquadron, deſired his eminence to peruſe, and to compare its ſtrength with that of their own ſquadron; which the cardinal took, and threw on the ground with much paſſion. Mr Stanhope, with great temper, deſired him 'to conſider the ſincere attention, which the king his maſter had always had to the honour and intereſt of his catholic majeſty, which it was impoſſible for him to give greater proofs of than he had done by his unwearied endeavours, through the whole courſe of the preſent negotiations, to procure the moſt advantageous condition poſſible for Spain, in which he had ſucceeded even beyond what any unprejudiced perſon could have hoped for; and that, though by the treaty of Utrecht for the neutrality of Italy, which was entered into at the requeſt of the king of Spain himſelf; as alſo by that of Weſtminſter the 25th of May, 1716, his majeſty found himſelf obliged to defend the emperor's dominions, when attaced, he had hitherto only acted as a mediator, though ever ſince the enterprize againſt Sardinia, by his treaties he became a party in the war, and for this year laſt paſt had been ſtrongly called upon by the emperor to comply with theſe engagements; and that even now, when it was impoſſible for him to delay any longer the ſending his fleet into the Mediterranean, it plainly appeared by the admiral's inſtructions, which he communicated to his eminence, and by the orders he had himſelf received, that his majeſty had nothing more at heart, than that his fleet might be employed in promoting the intereſts of the king of Spain; and hoped, that his catholic majeſty would not, by refuſing to recal his troops, or conſent to a ceſſation of arms, put it out of his power to give all the proofs of the ſincere friendſhip be always deſired to cultivate with his catholic majeſty.' All that the cardinal could be brought to promiſe, was to lay the admiral's letter before the king, and to let the envoy know his reſolution upon it in two days; but it was nine days before he could obtain and ſend it away, the cardinal probably hoping, that the admiral would delay, in expectation of it, in ſome of the ports in Spain, and thereby give time for their fleet and forces to ſecure a good footing in Sicily. The anſwer was wrote under the admiral's letter, in theſe words: 'his catholic majeſty has done me the honour to tell me, the chevalier Byng may execute the orders, which he has from the king, his maſter.

Eſcurial, 15th July, 1718. The cardinal Alberoni.'

Mr Stanhope, ſeeing things tending to a rupture, gave private and early notice of his apprehenſions to the Engliſh conſuls and merchants, ſettled in the Spaniſh ſea-port towns, adviſing to guard and ſecure their effects againſt any danger of a breach between the two crowns.

The admiral purſuing his voyage with unfavourable winds, it was the 8th of July, N. S. before he made cape Spartel, where the Superbe and Rupert rejoined him, and brought him advice of the mighty preparations which the Spaniards had made at Barcelona, and of their fleet ſailing from thence the 18th of June, N. S. to the eaſtward. In paſſing by Gibraltar, vice-admiral Cornwall came out and joined him, with the Argyle and Charles galley. The ſquadron wanting water, and the wind continuing contrary, they anchored off cape Malaga, where, having compleated their watering in four days, they proceeded to Minorca, where the admiral was to land four regiments of foot, which he carried out from England, in order to relieve the ſoldiers there in garriſon, who were to embark, and ſerve in the ſquadron. On the 23d of July, N. S. he anchored with the ſquadron off Port-Mahon. Here he received advice, that the Spaniſh fleet had been ſeen, the 30th of June, within forty leagues of Naples, ſteering ſouth-eaſt: upon which he diſpatched away expreſſes to the governor of Milan, and viceroy of Naples, to inform them of his arrival in the Mediterranean; and, having ſhifted the garriſons of Minorca, he ſailed from thence the 25th of July, N. S. and arrived the 1ſt of Auguſt in the bay of Naples.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the joy of thoſe people, at the long-wiſhed for ſight of a fleet, which alone could aſſure their ſafety. They had been under the greateſt terrors, expecting that the prodigious armament of Spain would have fallen upon that kingdom: and though their fears were relieved for the preſent, by the deſcent of the Spaniards into Sicily, yet the rapidity with which they had over-run the greateſt part of that iſland, and a reaſonable ſuſpicion, that the duke of Savoy would not much expoſe his troops to defend the remainder of a country, which, by the terms of the quadruple alliance, was to be taken from him, and given to a potentate, whoſe power in Italy he dreaded, made them look for the enemy ſoon in Naples, where the ſtrong party that had appeared among the Sicilian nobility for Spain, made them apprehend, that no leſs a faction would riſe in their favour, upon their invading that kingdom, where the Germans had but twelve (ſome ſay eight) thouſand men, and the whole country was ill provided for defence. The common people indeed were generally in the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, which was greatly owing to the prudent government of the marſhal count Daun, their viceroy, a man endowed with all the qualities fit for that high employment, and the ſame perſon who had defended Turin ſo well, when it was beſieged by the duke of Orleans in 1706, till it was relieved by the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene. He was of a courteous and affable diſpoſition, but exact and ſteady in the adminiſtration of juſtice; by which means he had ſuppreſſed the banditti, who uſed to infeſt the country; and had put a ſtop to the murders that were ſo frequent in the city, not ſuffering the churches to exerciſe their infamous claim of ſanctuary for ſuch flagitious crimes. He did not indeed affect that ſhew of grandeur, which the Italians are fond of; but, as his frugal manner of living freed him from the neceſſity of oppreſſing them, ſo there was never any complaint of that kind againſt him. He was very zealous for the intereſts of his maſter, which he promoted by juſt and wiſe meaſures; and a certain conformity of manners, wherein he and the admiral reſembled each other, begat ſuch a quic confidence and friendſhip between them, as helped to carry on the ſervice of the common cauſe with unuſual harmony and diſpatch.

The fleet ſailing with a gentle gale into the bay of Naples, conſiſting of twenty-one ſail of the line of battle, moſt of them great ſhips, and three of them bearing flags, afforded ſuch a ſpectacle, as had never been ſeen in thoſe parts before. The whole city was in a tumult of joy and exultation. The ſhore was crouded with multitudes of coaches and people; and ſuch an infinite number of boats came off, ſome with proviſions and refreſhments, others out of curioſity and admiration, that the ſea between the fleet at anchor and the ſhore was literally covered. The viceroy, being incommoded with the gout, ſent colonel count Hamilton to make his compliments to the admiral, and to let him know the feeble condition he was in; but that, nevertheleſs, he intended to come off, and make him a viſit. The admiral returned the civility by his firſt captain, who, waiting on the viceroy, told him, the admiral was ſenſible of the honour he intended him, but deſired he would not give himſelf the trouble, eſpecially as he was ill; and that he would immediately wait on his excellency. The admiral going aſhore, attended by the flag-officers and captains in their boats, was ſaluted, at his landing, by all the cannon round the city and caſtles, and was carried to the duke de Matalone's palace, which had been prepared for his reception during his ſtay at Naples. From thence he was conducted to court, through an infinite throng of people, with the greateſt acclamations of joy, and all the honours and ceremonies paid to a viceroy; where, entering into conference with count Daun, he learnt, that the Spaniſh army, conſiſting of about thirty thouſand men, commanded by the marquis de Lede, had landed the 2d of July, N. S. in Sicily, and had ſoon made themſelves maſters of the city and caſtles of Palermo, and of great part of the iſland; that they had taken the town of Meſſina, and were then carrying on the ſiege of the citadel; that the viceroy did not know how far the Piedmonteſe garriſon was to be depended on; but that they muſt ſoon be obliged to ſurrender, if not relieved. That the laſt letters he had received from Vienna gave hopes, that the king of Sicily might be entered, by this time, into a particular alliance with the emperor, having deſired the aſſiſtance of his troops, and agreed to receive them into the citadel. The next morning the viceroy viſited the admiral, and, renewing their conference on the meaſures to be taken in that conjuncture of affairs, it was agreed, that the viceroy ſhould ſend general Wetzel with two thouſand German foot in tartans to Meſſina, to relieve the citadel and fort St. Salvador; and, as the admiral was directed by his orders to obſtruct any attempts of the Spaniards on Sicily, he conſented to take thoſe troops under his protection; and, accordingly, the tranſports being got ready, he ſailed with them the 6th of Auguſt, N. S. from Naples, and arrived the 9th in view of the Faro, off Meſſina.

Here the admiral pauſed. He ſaw with concern a new war re-kindled in Europe by the ambition of Spain: he weighed with deep conſideration the conſequences of his inſtructions, which made a rupture with that nation unavoidable, if they perſiſted in their enterprize on Sicily; and being ardently deſirous of trying every method of negotiation, before he proceeded to the extremity of his orders, he diſpatched captain Saunders, his firſt captain, to Meſſina, with a letter to the marquis de Lede, acquainting him, 'that the king, his maſter, being engaged by ſeveral treaties to preſerve the tranquility of Italy, had honoured him with the command of a ſquadron of ſhips, which he had ſent into thoſe ſeas; and that he came fully impowered and inſtructed to promote ſuch meaſures, as might beſt accommodate all differences between the powers concerned. That his majeſty was employing his utmoſt endeavours to bring about a general pacification, and was not without hopes of ſucceſs. He therefore propoſed to him to come to a ceſſation of arms in Sicily for two months, in order to give time to the ſeveral courts to conclude on ſuch reſolutions, as might reſtore a laſting peace.' But he added, 'that, if he was not ſo happy to ſucceed in this offer of ſervice, nor to be inſtrumental in bringing about ſo deſirable a work, he ſhould then hope to merit his excellency's eſteem in the execution of the other part of his orders, which were, to uſe all his force to prevent farther attempts to diſturb the dominions his maſter ſtood engaged to defend.' The next morning the captain returned with the general's anſwer, 'that it would be an inexpreſſible joy for his perſon to contribute to ſo laudable an end as peace; but, as he had no powers to treat, he could not of conſequence agree to any ſuſpenſion of arms, even at the expence of what the courage of his maſter's arms might be put to; but ſhould follow his orders, which directed him to ſeize on Sicily for his maſter, the king of Spain. That he had a true ſenſe of his accompliſhed expreſſions; but his maſter's forces would always be univerſally eſteemed in ſacrificing themſelves for the preſervation of their credit, in which caſes the ſucceſs did not always anſwer the ideas that were formed.'

The admiral had received intelligence, that the Spaniſh fleet departed from Paradiſe (which is a road at the entrance of the harbour of Meſſino) the day before his arrival off the Faro, which made him conclude, that they were retired to Malta; and therefore, upon receiving the marquis de Lede's anſwer, he immediately ſailed, with intention to come with his ſquadron before Meſſina, in order to encourage and ſupport the garriſon in the citadel; but, as he ſtood in about the point of the Faro towards Meſſina, he ſaw two of the Spaniſh ſcouts in the Faro; and being informed at the ſame time by a fellucca, which came off from the Calabrian ſhore, that they ſaw from the hills the Spaniſh fleet lying by, the admiral altered his deſign, and ſending away general Wetzel with the German troops to Reggio, ander the convoy of two men of war, he ſtood through the Faro with his ſquadron, with all the ſail he could, after their ſcouts, imagining they would lead him to their fleet, which accordingly they did; for before noon he had a ſight of their whole fleet lying by, and drawn into a line of battle, conſiſting of twenty-ſeven ſail of men of war, ſmall and great, beſides two fire-ſhips, four bomb-veſſels, ſeven gallies, and ſeveral ſhips laden with ſtores and proviſions, commanded by the admiral Don Antonio de Caſtaneta, and under him four rear-admirals, Chacon, Mari, Guevara, and Cammock. On the ſight of the Engliſh ſquadron, they ſtood away large, but in order of battle. The admiral followed them all the reſt of that day, and the ſucceeding night with ſmall gales north-eaſterly, and ſometimes calm, with fair weather. The next morning early, the 11th of Auguſt, N. S. the Engliſh being got pretty near up with them, the marquis De Mari, rear-admiral, with ſix Spaniſh men of war, and all the gallies, fire-ſhips, bomb-veſſels, and ſtore-ſhips, ſeparated from their main fleet, and ſtood in for the Sicilian ſhore; upon which admiral Byng detached captain Walton, in the Canterbury, with five more ſhips after them; and, the Argyle and Canterbury getting within gun-ſhot of the headmoſt ſhip, about ſix in the morning, the Argyle fired a ſhot to bring her to; which ſhe not minding, the Argyle fired another, and the Canterbury, being ſomething nearer, fired another, upon which the Spaniſh ſhip fired her ſtern-chace at the Canterbury, and then the engagement began. The admiral purſuing the main body of the Spaniſh fleet, the Oxford, captain Falkingham, and the Grafton, captain Haddock, came up firſt with them about ten o'clock, at whom the Spaniards fired their ſtern-chace guns. The admiral ſent orders to thoſe two ſhips not to fire, unleſs the Spaniards repeated their firing; which they doing, the Oxford attaced the Santa Roſa of ſixty-four guns, and took her. The St. Carlos of ſixty guns ſtruc next, without much oppoſition, to the Kent, captain Matthews. The Grafton attaced warmly the Prince of Aſturias of ſeventy guns, formerly called the Cumberland, in which was rear-admiral Chacon: but the Bredah, captain Barrow-Harris, and the Captain, captain Archibald Hamilton, coming up, Haddock left that ſhip much ſhattered for them to take, and ſtretched a-head after another ſhip of ſixty guns, which had kept firing on his ſtarboard-bow, during his engagement with the Prince of Aſturias. About one o'clock the Kent, and ſoon after the Superbe, captain Maſter, came up with, and engaged the Spaniſh admiral of ſeventy-four guns, who with two ſhips more fired on them, and made a running fight till about three, and then the Kent bearing down upon him, and under his ſtern, gave him her broadſide, and fell to the leeward. Afterwards the Superbe, putting for it to lay the admiral aboard, fell on his weather-quarter, upon which the Spaniſh admiral ſhifting his helm, the Superbe ranged up under his lee-quarter, on which he ſtruc to her. At the ſame time the Barfleur, in which was the admiral, being aſtern of the Spaniſh admiral within ſhot, and inclining on his weather-quarter, rear-admiral Guevara, and another ſixty gun ſhip, which were to windward, bore down upon him, and gave him their broadſides, and then clapped upon a wind, ſtanding in for the land. The admiral immediately taced and ſtood after them, until it was almoſt night; but there being little wind, and they galing away out of his reach, he left purſuing them, and ſtood in to the fleet, which he joined two hours after night. The Eſſex, captain Rowzier, took the Juno of thirty-ſix guns; the Mountague, captain Beverly, and the Rupert, captain Field, took the Volante of forty-four guns; and rear-admiral Delaval, in the Dorſetſhire, took the Iſabella of ſixty guns. This action happened off Cape Paſſaro about ſix leagues diſtance from the ſhore. The Engliſh received but little damage. The ſhip, that ſuffered moſt, was the Grafton, which being a good ſailor, her captain engaged ſeveral ſhips of the enemy, always purſuing the headmoſt, and leaving thoſe ſhips, which he had diſabled or damaged, to be taken by thoſe, that followed him. Admiral Byng lay by ſome days at ſea, to refit the rigging of his ſhips, and to repair the damages the prizes had ſuſtained; and the 18th received a letter from captain Walton, giving an account, that he had taken four Spaniſh men of war, one of ſixty guns, commanded by rear-admiral Mari, one of fifty-four, one of forty, and one of twenty-four guns, with a bomb-veſſel, and a ſhip laden with arms; and burnt four men of war, one of fifty-four guns, two of forty, and one of thirty guns, with a fire-ſhip and a bomb-veſſel. [h]

The admiral, having thus received a full account of the whole tranſaction, diſpatched away his eldeſt ſon, mr. Byng, to England; who arrived at Hampton-court in fifteen days from Naples, brought the agreeable confirmation of what public fame had before reported, and upon which the king had already written a letter to the admiral with his own hand. [i] Mr Byng met with a moſt gracious reception from the king, who made him a handſome preſent; and ſent him bac with plenipotentiary powers to his father to negotiate with ſeveral princes and ſtates of Italy, as there ſhould be occaſion, and with his royal grant to the officers and ſeamen of all the prizes taken by them from the Spaniards.

The conduct of the Spaniards in the action of Paſſaro did not anſwer the vigour of the reſolutions they had taken before it. Upon notice of the approach of the Engliſh ſquadron, they held a conſultation, in which the queſtion was not, whether they ſhould fight or retreat, but in what ſtation they ſhould expect them; whether go out from Meſſina to meet them, or paſs through the Faro to the ſouthward, and, lying by in order of battle, receive them there? which latter opinion prevailed. But, when the admiral came up near them, they ſoon abandoned their order of battle, and falling into confuſion and uncertainty, whether to reſiſt or fly, by doing neither they became an eaſy prey, and the Engliſh might be rather ſaid to have made a ſeizure, than to have gained a victory. There was indeed ſome diſproportion in the ſtrength of the two fleets; but the inequality was not ſuch, as deterred the Spaniards from a reſolution of fighting, though it was but ill ſupported afterwards in the execution. But this juſtice is due to the admiral Caſtaneta, and to rear-admiral Chacon, that they made as good a defence with their own ſhips, as could be expected, and the former was wounded in both legs. It was reported, that, at a conſultation of the Spaniſh admirals, rear-admiral Cammock gave his opinion, that they ſhould remain at anchor in the road of Paradiſe, ranging their ſhips in a line of battle, with their broadſide to the ſea; which meaſure would certainly have given the Engliſh admiral infinite trouble to attac them. For the coaſt is ſo bold, that the largeſt ſhips could ride with a cable aſhore; and, further out, the currents are ſo various and rapid, that it would have been hardly practicable to get up to them, but impoſſible to anchor or lie by them in order of battle. Beſides, they lay ſo near the ſhore, and could have received ſuch aſſiſtance of ſoldiers from the army to man and defend them; and the annoyance, which the Spaniards might have given from the ſeveral batteries they could have planted along the ſhore would have been ſuch, that the only way of attacing the ſhips ſeemed to be by boarding and grappling with them at once, to prevent being caſt off by the currents; which would have been a very hazardous undertaking, wherein the Spaniards would have had many advantages, and the Engliſh admiral have run the chance of deſtroying his fleet, or buying a victory, if he ſucceeded, very dear. [k]

Admiral Byng, having collected his ſhips after the acti-

SIR,

'We have taken and deſtroyed all the Spaniſh ſhips and veſſels, which were upon the coaſt, the number as per margin. I am, &c.

Canterbury, off Syracuſe,
16 Aug. 1718. G. WALTON.'

[i] The letter was in French, and may thus be tranſlated:

Monſieur le chevalier Byng,

'Though I have not yet heard from you directly, I am informed of the victory which the fleet has gained under your command, and I was unwilling to delay the ſatisfaction that my approbation of your conduct might afford you. I thank you for it, and deſire you to expreſs my ſatisfaction to all the brave people who have ſignalized themſelves on this occaſion. Secretary Craggs has orders to inform your more at large of my intentions, but I was pleaſed to aſſure you myſelf that I am,

Monſieur le chevalier Byng,
Hampton-court, Your good Friend,
Aug. 23. 1718. GEORGE R.'

[k] Mr Corbet, in his account of the expedition to Sicily, inſerts here the following digreſſion concerning the affairs of the Spaniards:

'The councils of Spain were, at this time, under the management of two Italians, the queen and the abbot Alberoni, whom ſhe had raiſed to the dignity of cardinal and prime miniſter. They had vaſt deſigns in their view, and by ſecret intrigues with the king of Sicily, and other Italian princes and ſtates, had laid no leſs a ſcheme, than to exterminate the houſe of Auſtria and the imperial power out of Italy. And it was thought to be owing to the doubts they had of the ſincerity of the king of Sicily, that the ſtorm fell firſt upon his dominions, which was intended elſewhere. The armament they fitted on, put into Syracuſe the 19th of Auguſt, N. S. where he found captain Walton and his prizes. Syracuſe was at that time bloced up by a detachment of the Spaniſh army, into which city count Maffei, the duke of Savoy's viceroy, had retreated with difficulty from Parlermo, and had in the place a numerous garriſon. But the firſt and principal point of the Spaniſh general was to get Meſſina into his hands, as the ſafeſt port for their fleet, and the moſt proper place to facilitate and ſecure the conqueſt of the reſt of the iſland, and from whence they deſigned to tranſport their numerous horſe, and the greateſt part of their foot, over to Calabria, and to have carried the war into the kingdom of Naples. The citadel of Meſſina was defended by a Pidemonteſe garriſon, commanded by the marquiſs d'Andorno; but the duke of Savoy, being unable to ſupport the ſiege, had ſollicited the emperor for his aſſiſtance, and a convention was made between the viceroy of Naples and the count de Bourge, reſident of Savoy, whereby the viceroy was to ſend a detachment of German troops, to be admitted into the citadel on joint and equal terms of command; for which ſervice baron Wetzel was diſpatched away with two thouſand foot, as has been before related. But the ſucceſs of the Engliſh fleet had raiſed ſuch a confidence in the garriſon, of their ſecurity againſt any attempts from the Spaniards, that the reſident endeavoured to elude an agreement, the neceſſity of which he thought no longer ſubſiſted; pretending want of power to make ſuch a conceſſion without an equivalent, but that he would write to his court for farther orders. This coming to Admiral Byng's knowledge, he repreſented, in ſtrong terms, to count Maffei, 'the unfairneſs of ſuch a proceeding, and how contrary it was to what he himſelf had agreed to, in their conference together the day before, upon that ſubject. That ſuch a diſagreement, at a time that the citadel was ſo vigorouſly attaced by the enemy, might be a means of their taking it, which the reputation of the Engliſh fleet would not ſuffer him to be an idle ſpectator of; and therefore, if he was reſolved to ſtay till he had inſtructions from the court of Turin, he ſhould likewiſe ſend to his court for farther orders; and, in the mean time, would retire from the iſland to ſome other place, to refreſh his men, and refit his ſhips, till he ſhould receive new directions from England.' This had ſuch an effect upon the viceroy, that he gave immediate orders for putting the agreement in execution, and for admitting German troops into the citadel. This point being adjuſted the admiral (having ſent away vice-admiral Cornwall, with ſuch of his ſhips as wanted refitting, and all the prizes, to Port-Mahon, with orders not to ſuffer the leaſt embezzlement to be made, but to preſerve every thing intire, till the king's pleaſure ſhould be known) ſailed himſelf, on the 23d of Auguſt, N. S. from Syracuſe, and arrived, the 26th, at Reggio, where general Wetzel informing him, that he hourly expected a reinforcement of four thouſand men from Naples, which, with thoſe he had with him, and the garriſon in the citadle, would make up nine thouſand men, and, upon their arrival, he ſhould form a project for raiſing the ſiege of the citadel, if the admiral would ſtay to countenance and protect him with his fleet; he readily conſented, knowing the extreme importance of not letting Meſſina fall into the hands of the enemy, and being directed by freſh orders from England to do all he could to prevent it. But, thoſe forces proving inſufficient for the execution of the intended project, the general contented himſelf, with ſupplying the citadel from time to time with freſh troops from Reggio; notwithſtanding which, the Spaniards puſhed on the ſiege with ſo much vigour and ſucceſs, that the gover-nor ſurrendered the citadel by capitulation, on the 29th of September, N. S. to the great ſurprize and diſſatisfaction of the Germans. The Piedmonteſe part of the garriſon was tranſported by ſea to Syracuſe, and the Germans to Reggio.

Admiral Byng receiving advice, that the rear-admiral Cammock, with three Spaniſh men of war, and as many frigates, which had eſcaped from the battle, was at Malta, and that a rich Engliſh merchant-ſhip, homeward bound from Turkey, was detained in the port, and in ſome danger; as likewiſe five Sicilian gallies, which had taken refuge there ever ſince the arrival of the Spaniſh fleet in Sicily; he ſtood over to that iſland, where he learnt that rear-admiral Cammock had ſailed from thence five days before with four ſhips, which he had cleaned there. The marquiſs de Rivaroles, general of the Sicilian gallies, coming off to the admiral, made great complaints of the partiality and ill uſage of that government, in ſuffering him to be expoſed to daily affronts from the Spaniards, and prayed his protection and aſſiſtance to get away from thence; upon which the admiral ſent his firſt captain with his compliments to the grand maſter, and deſired, that thoſe gallies might have free liberty to come out to him. The grand maſter ſent off three great croſſes of the order to the admiral, and with much politeneſs gave him all the aſſurances poſſible of freedom for the gallies to do what they pleaſed; upon which the admiral ſent word to the marquiſs to come out. But he returning an anſwer, that the Spaniſh ſhips had laid themſelves in the way to ſtop his paſſage, and threatning to ſink him, if he offered to ſtir, the admiral ſent to the grand maſter a ſecond meſſage, that, if he ſuffered the neutrality of the ports to be violated, or any ill treatment to be given to the gallies, he ſhould take the meaſures, that would be neceſſary on that occaſion; but the grand maſter proteſting, that no violence ſhould be uſed, and that he would be anſwerable for it, the admiral ſent again to the marquiſs to come out, aſſuring him, that, if the Spaniards offered the leaſt obſtruction, he would aſſiſt him to deſtroy them in the very port. But, the marquiſs continuing under great perplexity and terror, the admiral tired with his delay, ſent him word, that he was well ſatisfied of the honour of the grand maſter in preſerving the privilege of the port; and therefore, if he would not make uſe of the preſent opportunity, he ſhould ſuſpect, that his fears were affected, and uſed only as an artifice to ſtay there, and would give himſelf no farther trouble about him; and accordingly weighed, in order to depart; but this meſſage wrought ſo upon the marquiſs, that he immediately haſtened out with the gallies, without any obſtruction from the Spaniards; but they were in ſo miſerable condition, that the admiral was forced to lend them ſeamen and pilots to navigate them, and caulkers to ſtop their leaks. The Turkey ſhip came out likewiſe, and joined the admiral, who ſent the gallies under a convoy to Syracuſa; and having ſeen the Turkey merchant-ſhip clear of danger, he arrived the 2d of November, N. S. in the bay of Naples, from whence he ſent rear-admiral Delaval, with two eighty gun-ſhips and a fire-ſhip, home to England. Here the count de Luzon, ſon-in-law to the marquiſs de Rialp, ſecretary of ſtate at Vienna, brought the admiral a gracious letter from the emperor written with his own hand, and his picture ſet round with large brilliant diamonds.

The taking of Meſſina was a point of great conſequence, as it made the Spaniards maſters of all Sicily, except Syracuſa, Trapani, and Melazzo (where the duke of Savoy out was ſuitable to the greatneſs of the undertaking; never any nation ſent to ſea an army ſo numerous, ſo well appointed, and ſo provided with all neceſſaries for a diſtant expedition; the leaſt implement was not forgotten. All which was owing to the indefatigable care of don Joſeph Patinho, a man of great abilities, who went in the expedition, and had the abſolute direction and management of the whole enterprize, except the military command. The world was amazed to ſee Spain exerting a vigour, ſhe had not ſhewn for above a century paſt. Some of the principal priſoners, and Caſtaneta himſelf, aſſured the admiral, that they intended, the ſummer following, to have at ſea fifty ſail of the line of battle; which the great preparations in the ports of Biſcay, and other ports of Spain, made very probable. Thoſe in Biſcay, which were one man of war of ſeventy guns, and two of ſixty, newly built, with an increditable quantity of timber, pitch and tar, and other naval ſtores, for building more, were all deſtroyed by an Engliſh ſquadron, aſſiſted by a detachment which the duke of Berwick ſpared from his army, at the ſollicitation of colonel Stanhope the Engliſh miniſter, who contrived the deſign, and, ſerving as a voluntier in the enterprize, principally contributed to the execution of it.

It ſhould ſeem but ill policy in a court, intent on ſuch mighty deſigns, to provoke and irritate, without cauſe, a nation, the moſt capable in the world of thwarting and defeating them. And yet they ſeemed to make it a ſtudied point to vex and diſtreſs the Engliſh by all manner of ways in their commerce, inſomuch that their trade with Spain was almoſt ruined and loſt. They demanded arbitrary and heavy duties from the Engliſh factories reſiding in their ports, from which the treaties expreſſly exempted them; and, upon refuſal of payment, their houſes were ſurrounded by ſoldiers, their warehouſes and cheſts broken open, and their goods ſold at public outcry. The royal officers uſed them with ſuch injuſtice and inſolence, as if they knew they made their court by doing ſo. Every poſt brought complaints to the Engliſh miniſter at Madrid, of new grievances and oppreſſions. The memorials delivered to that court for redreſs were numberleſs, without the leaſt regard had to them. When any tranſportation of troops was intended, they immediately embargoed all the Engliſh merchant-ſhips in their ports, compelling their maſters, with great circumſtances of ſeverity, to enter into their ſervice, impriſoning them in common goals, if they refuſed, and obliging them to unload their cargoes, though periſhable, and conſigned to other markets. They proceeded ſo far in their unjuſt treatment, that the cruizers brought into the ports of Spain whatever Engliſh merchant-ſhips they met with in the open ſea, though bound to Italy, or other parts, and compelled them to unload their cargoes, and enter into their ſervice. Such, as were not uſed by them for tranſports, had their ſeamen taken away to ſerve in their men of war. Rear-admiral Cammock preſſed no leſs than ſixty for his own ſhip, and one of the maſters, endeavouring to keep his men, had both his ears cut off. The battle of Paſſaro was fortunate to thoſe poor people, for, when the iſſue of it was known, forty-five Engliſh tranſports made their eacape from Meſſina to Reggio, ſeveral of them laden with military ſtores and proviſions; and, their maſters applying to the admiral, he granted them a convoy to the ports in Italy, where they deſired to go; but ſome choſe to ſtay and enter into the emperor's ſervice, to tranſport his troops from Genoa and Naples to Sicily.

had ſtill garriſons) and as it deprived the Engliſh fleet of a port to winter in, there being no other good harbour in thoſe parts. The emperor ſaw before him a difficult taſk, to get poſſeſſion of an iſland, which the quadrupe alliance had deſigned for him. The duke of Savoy had only the three aforementioned towns to deliver up, which he ſcrupled doing without the promiſed equivalent; and the emperor had it not to give him. But, though the emperor had gotten theſe places, the recovery of the reſt of the iſland was to be a work of conqueſt. The Spaniards had an army well appointed, well paid, and the affections of the people on their ſide. They would have little feared any enterprizes of the Germans, if the ſea had been neutral between them.

The duke of Savoy finding himſelf under circumſtances of difficulty, the Spaniards on the one hand, taking moſt of his towns in Sicily from him, and the emperor, on the other, by virtue of the quadruple alliance, demanding his evacuation of the reſt, whilſt the iſland of Sardinia, allotted to him by the ſame treaty, remained in the hands of the enemy; and having jealouſy, that, when the imperialiſts had obtained their iſland, he ſhould be left to get the other as he could, and deſiring to have ſome reaſonable ſecurity for the one, before he departed with his intereſt in the other, a convention was made between thoſe princes at Vienna (Monſieur de St. Saphorin, the king's miniſter, aſſiſting) dated 29th of December, 1718, whereby it was agreed to form an army for an expedition to Sardinia as ſoon as poſſible, towards which the emperor was to furniſh ſix thouſand five hundred foot, and ſix hundred horſe, at his own expence, and the duke of Savoy was intirely to evacuate Sicily, and join five thouſand men of his troops from that iſland to act with the imperialiſts on that ſervice; and in the mean time, till they could be tranſported from Sicily, they were to co-opperate with the Germans againſt the common enemy: this treaty of convention was ſent to Naples for the viceroy, the duke of Savoy's miniſter, and admiral Byng, to conſult together of the beſt means to put it in execution. The buſineſs hung long perplexed with difficulties on the part of the miniſter of Savoy, from a jealouſy and diſtruſt of the Germans; but the admiral interpoſing, and removing by degrees all ſcruples, an agreement was at laſt concluded and ſigned between them, upon which the miniſter of Savoy delivered to the viceroy his maſter's orders to count Maffei to evacuate the towns in his poſſeſſion to the imperialiſts. But the expedition againſt Sardinia did not go on, as will be ſhewn hereafter.

The winter being now ſet in, the viceroy and admiral Byng held frequent conſultations together, about the farther operations againſt the enemy. It was judged abſolutely neceſſary to maintain the poſt of Melazzo, which had been long blockaded, and was now beſieged by the Spaniſh army, both ſides making this their principal point during the winter, the one holding their footing in the iſland by means of this place; the other, by taking it, to ſhut them out. All the troops from Reggio, and ſome horſe from Naples, being got into the town, under the command of the generals Caraffa and Veterani, it was reſolved, in a council of war, held the 14th of October, to ſally out upon the enemy. Accordingly, the next morning, by break of day, they marched out in two columns, the firſt conſiſting of ſix, and the other of five battalions, and attaced the Spaniſh intrenchments, which they carried, after an engagement of four hours, and got poſſeſſion of their camp in the center and on the left, with three pieces of cannon. But, the ſoldiers falling to plunder, the Spaniards rallied on their right; and the marquis de Lede coming up at the ſame time with freſh troops from Meſſina, who had lain ſhort the night before, they attaced the Germans in their turns, and drove them bac into their camp, under the walls of the town, whoſe artillery protected the retreat, and prevented a greater ſlaughter. In the action, about twelve hundred men were killed and wounded on each ſide, and general Veterani was taken.

Melazzo is an ill fortified town, on the north ſide of the iſland of Sicily, not far diſtant from the Faro, ſtanding on a nec of land, which runs out into the ſea like an Iſthmus. Caraffa being recalled to Naples, baron Zumjungen arrived at Melazzo the 27th of November, N. S. to command the forces; and being followed by the generals Wachtendonck and Seckendorf, with large ſupplies of troops from Italy, and the place being too ſtrait to contain them, they carried their intrenchments out of the town, within leſs than piſtol ſhot of thoſe of the Spaniards; ſo that, neither ſide being able to advance farther, both lay all the winter in an unwholeſome ſituation, it being low bad ground, and the trenches filled with water in rainy, and by the ſea blowing weather; ſo that great numbers of men periſhed on both ſides. The Germans had no proviſions but what came from time to time in ſmall imbarkations from Calabria, and other ports of Naples. Rear-admiral Cammock, who was got with his ſquadron into Meſſina, and the inhabitants of the iſland of Lipari, who are eſteemed bold mariners, and have many armed veſſels, lay in the way of intercepting thoſe ſupplies; and the leaſt diſappointment muſt have ſtarved the garriſon, for their conſumption was very great, and they had no magazines. It was very hard ſervice, unknown and aſtoniſhing to the pilots of that country, to employ ſhips cruizing in thoſe dangerous ſeas, during the rigour of the winter. For when the weſterly or northerly winds blow, there is ſo little ſea-room in that narrow ſtation, and the currents ſet in ſo ſtrong upon the Calabrian ſhore, accompanied with a vaſt rolling ſea, that it is extremely difficult for ſhips to work to windward, or indeed to hold their own, and avoid ſtanding on a lee-ſhore. The admiral had appointed a ſquadron, under the command of captain Walton, to cruize upon this ſtation, to hinder rear-admiral Cammock from coming out of the Faro, and to ſecure the paſſage of the veſſels with proviſions for the German camp. It chanced to prove ſuch tempeſtuous weather, that no proviſions had arrived in a month at Melazzo, and captain Walton was blown off from his ſtation, and had not been ſeen nor heard of in ſix and twenty days. Rear-admiral Cammock took hold of this opportunity to get out of Meſſina, the moment the weather abated, and appearing before Tropea with Engliſh colours, ſent a letter a-ſhore to the governor, under a fictitious name of one of the Engliſh captains, acquainting him, that he was come thither by admiral Byng's orders, to convoy the imbarkations with proviſions to Melazzo, and preſſed him to diſpatch them away, the place being in the utmoſt diſtreſs. Had this ſtratagem ſucceeded, it would have intirely ruined the emperor's affairs in Sicily; but the governor happened to be a wary man, and obſerving the letter to be written on Genoa paper, from that ſingle circumſtance conceived a ſuſpicion, which made him refuſe to ſend the imbarkations out to him. In the mean time, the admiral being made ſenſible of the extremities the Germans were reduced to, had no other way left, than to fill four men of war, (juſt arrived at Naples from Port-Mahon) with proviſions, directing their captains to attempt, at all hazards, to get to Melazzo, which three of them did with much difficulty and danger (the fourth being diſabled by bad weather) and came providentially to the relief of the garriſon, at a time they muſt otherwiſe have ſurrendered to the enemy, or periſhed by famine. A few days after, captain Walton recovered his ſtation, upon the ſight of whom, rear-admiral Cammock retired into Meſſina.

Melazzo being reſcued from danger, and reinforced daily with freſh ſupplies of men and proviſions, the Spaniards, deſpairing to take the place, turned the ſiege into a blockade, and worked hard in fortifying their own intrenchments, in order to keep the Germans pent up in the town, and obſtruct the deſcent of the army expected in the ſpring.

The admiral having made a proper diſpoſition of ſhips in different ſtations round the iſland, to keep the ſea open to the Germans, and ſhut to the Spaniards, was preparing to depart with the reſt, that had ſuffered by bad weather, to refit at Port-Mahon, when the viceroy intreated him to aſſiſt at a conference to be held at the palace, where he met the general Caraffa, Wetzel, and the marquis de Fuencalada, general of the Neapolitan gallies. The viceroy opened it by acquainting them, 'that, a truce with the Turks being concluded, prince Eugene was ſending from Hungary a body of about ſix thouſand horſe, and ten thouſand foot, which, added to the troops in Melazzo, was thought a ſufficient number for the conqueſt of the iſland. That they would probably arrive at Naples in the beginning of March, and he ſhould be glad to know their ſentiments of the propereſt place for their landing in Sicily, and touched on ſeveral propoſitions about it, as at Syracuſa or Taormina, on the eaſt-ſide of the iſland, or at Patti on the north-ſide, not far weſtward from Melazzo.' General Caraffa objected to the landing at Syracuſa, 'as it would be a means of prolonging the war: that the place was too diſtant from Melazzo; and, Auguſta and Catania lying in the way, the ſiege of thoſe places would coſt more time and men, than could be ſpared, beſides the garriſoning them afterwards. That their march from thence lay for the moſt part over barren mountains, amongſt a diſaffected people, where they ſhould find no ſubſtance but what they carried with them; and that paſſing afterwards through narrow defiles into the plain of Melazzo, where the enemy lay, was to attac them at two great a disadvantage: and therefore he concluded for seeking the enemy as soon as possible, and for that end to land as near to them as might be.' General Wetzel, being next to speak, preferred the landing at Syracusa, 'as it would be a work of ease and safety, and done without interruption: that it would probably draw some of the enemy's force that way, and to relieve the troops in Melazzo: that it would expose the army too much to land in the neighbourhood of the enemy, who, seeing them approaching from the sea, would easily guess at the place they designed to land, and leaving a guard in their camp, marched a sufficient body of troops to oppose the descent, which was a difficult and tedious work in itself, especially with regard to the imbarking the horse.' Caraffa asking him, how long he thought the enemy might be marching to the landing-place, after they knew where it would be, and Wetzel allowing eight hours, Caraffa replied, the foot could be all landed in that time, and formed into proper order to receive the enemy, and the landing the horse might be afterwards a work of leisure. But Wetzel adhered to his opinion. The general of the gallies next, in a very long discourse, 'excused himself from giving any opinion upon a subject, that related to the land-service, and, referring himself to what the two generals had said before him, concluded, the great caution ought to be taken, which ever opinion should be followed.' The admiral gathering from their discourse, that part of the expected troops were to embark at Fiume and Trieste, and to come round by sea to Reggio, and probably pass on through the Faro, to Naples, told them, 'that land-forces should be trusted to the the sea as little as possible, especially in the early and uncertain season: that, if they landed at Manfredonia on the Atlantic side, the traject would be short, and their march more certain to the rendezvous at Naples.' He then went on to deliver his opinion, 'that the troops they expected were not sufficient to recover the island from the enemy. That it was a great error to hold the Spaniards in contempt, whose behaviour hitherto in Sicily had given no reason for it. That they were become used to arms and hardships, and the Germans would find them like other men. That, according to a calculation he had made, when those troops should be joined to the forces in Melazzo, they would not be able, after leaving the necessary garrisons in the towns, which the duke of Savoy was to deliver up, to bring into the field a greater number than what the Spanish army was reported to be; and that, without a considerable superiority, little success was to be expected in a country, where the ill-will of the people towards them, and their inclinations to the Spaniards, were so very evident, that they were to hope for no assistance, but expect every distress from them.' He added, 'that they were not to look upon the enemy as a mouldering army, for, notwithstanding the care of the cruisers, they received frequent recruits from Spain and Sardinia, and even from Italy, in open vessels and boats, which was not always in his power to prevent. And besides, the marquis de Lede had lately raised four regiments of foot, and one of horse, in the island itself.' The viceroy acknowledged the force of the admiral's reasoning, but lamented the distance of the court of Vienna, which hindered them from seeing into, and considering enough these difficulties, and who pursued only one maxim, that, if they sent men, they ought to conquer. The admiral proposed, that an officer should be sent to Vienna, to represent the posture of affairs to that court in a better light than they seemed to view them in, and to bring bac their final resolutions concerning the operations of the war; and count Hamilton was pitched upon for that purpose.

The conference being ended, the admiral took his leave of the viceroy, and set sail the 3d of February for Port-Mahon, to refit his ships, and put them in a condition to go on early with the operations of the campaign, leaving his eldest son at Naples to manage his correspondence with the viceroy, and to inform the court of England of all occurrences in those parts.

The defeat of the Spanish fleet made a great noise, and England was upbraided with it as inconsistent with the rules of good faith, for the observance of which she had always been so famous.

Cardinal Alberoni, in his letter to the marquis de Monteleone at London, called it an unworthy action. 'His majesty (says the cardinal) approves of the justness of your expressions,[1] to expose the breach of faith of that ministry, in relation to the over-hasty proceedings of admiral Byng, when nothing was pretended to but a mediation, to facilitate the project of peace, or, at most, to defend the territories actually in the possession of the archduke in Italy, when my lord Stanhope was in Spain, at a small distance from the court, to propose projects of peace and a suspension of arms. In truth (added he) no impartial person can hear, without surprize, that the fleet of his Britannic majesty did, without any provocation, necessity, or pretence, and forgetting the title of peaceful mediator, which his master assumes, attac the fleet of Spain, only to frustrate the expedition against Sicily, after having been at Naples to concert with count Daun so base an action; received great sums of money, by way of supposed arrears; and, finally, after having come near to Messina, and sent trusty officers to confer with the commanders of the king's army, and to assure them, that he would commit no act of hostility.'

The best part of Europe (continued the cardinal) is impatient to hear how the British ministry can justify so rash a violence. He said, the preserving the neutrality of Italy was a weak argument, since every one knew, that neutrality had long been at an end, and that the princes, guarantees of the treaty of Utrecht, were entirely free, not only by the scandalous breaches of the Austrians, in the evacuation of Catalonia and Majorca, but also becaufe the guaranty was no longer binding, than till a peace was made with France. He reproached the British ministry for reviving and supporting the neutrality, not by an amicable mediation, but by open force, and by artfully abusing the confidence and security of the Spaniards. In proof of what he advanced, he observed, that admiral Byng, struc with remorse of his unjust conduct, alledged, in his account of the engagement, contrary to the truth, that the Spanish ships drew up first, in a line of battle, and fired upon the English. If he had no design to attac them, why did he pursue them from the Faro to Syracusa? Why did he send four of the prime sailors of his fleet to come up with them?

On the contrary, mr. secretary Craggs, in his answer to [1] Soon after the news of the action in the Mediterranean, the marquis de Monteleone wrote a letter to mr. secretary Craggs, to which the cardinal here refers. The letter begins thus:

SIR,

'The news that is spread in the world of admiral Byng's having attaced the Spanish fleet, and obtained considerable advantages over them, obliges me naturally not to act in any affair, till I receive orders and instructions from the king, my master, concerning an action so surprizing and unexpected, and that even seems to agree but very little with the declarations made to the court of Madrid by the said admiral; since they gave to understand, that the English fleet would proceed no farther than as a guarantee to defend the dominions of the archduke, in case they were invaded.

Nevertheless, as I cannot doubt in the least but that your excellency makes serious reflections on the just resentments which the king, my master, and all the Spaniards, must needs have, to see themselves thus assaulted and abused, with so much animosity, by a nation to whom they have shewn the most favour, and see them act contrary to reason, politics, and even against their own interest, to increase the exorbitant power of the Germans in Italy, I cannot dispense with my not acquainting your excellency with the good and generous intentions of the king my master, that were communicated to me by his letters of the 20th of August, N. S. as also the orders he gave concerning the arrival of the fleet of Mexico at Cadiz, which, in silver and other effects, is valued at nine millions of crowns.

His majesty informs me, that notwithstanding admiral Byng's declaration, and the intimation that has been given him of the articles lately signed, whereof I send a copy to your excellency, and that although the said declaration and articles rather denote an obvious design of making war, than that of maintaining a perfect understanding between the two nations, and undertaking an impartial mediation; yet it is resolved not to make the least change in any thing that relates to trade; that the effects arrived in the said flota shall be delivered as before to those to whom they belong; and, in a word, that it is his majesty's will and intention that the treaty of peace and commerce should be religiously observed, and that the English should continue to enjoy all the advantages and grants that were given them heretofore.

This last and so singular instance of his majesty's justice and moderation ought not certainly to have been prevented by the said event, of which he must have received the news a few days after he had given so evident a mark of his favourable dispositions towards the English nation.'

The articles mentioned in this letter were delivered by earl Stanhope to the court of Madrid, a day or two after the action of Syracusa, and were as follows:

I. That the catholic king shall have three months to accept of the treaty, reckoning from the day it was signed.

II. That, if his catholic majesty does not accept of the same within the said term of three months, then the confederates shall supply the emperor with such forces as are stipulated in the treaty of alliance.

III. That if, in consequence to the assistance given to the emperor, the king of Spain should declare or make war against any one of the confederates, either by invading his dominions, or seizing his subjects ships, or effects, then the other confederates shall immediately declare and make war against his catholic majesty, and shall carry on the same till such time as satisfaction shall be given to their wronged ally.

IV. That, in case his catholic majesty should refuse to accept of the said treaty, the confederates shall unanimously dispose of his expectations on the dominions of Tuscany and Parma, in favour of some other prince.

V. That the emperor shall not act within the said term of three months, upon condition that the king of Spain does not act on his side; but that, if his catholic majesty, instead of accepting the said treaty, should within the said term act any hostilities, which might prevent the execution of any disposition of the said treaty, then the allies shall immediately, and without waiting the expiration of the said term, supply the emperor with such forces as are therein stipulated.

the marquis de Monteleone's letter (referred to by the cardinal) ſaid, that it appeared by the admiral's account that the Spaniards began the hoſtilities: that the action might well be expected by his catholic majeſty, and therefore ought not to have ſurprized him, ſince admiral Byng, by his letter of the 20th of June, O. S. plainly informed him of his inſtructions, to which a haughty anſwer was returned, bidding him follow his orders. [m]

Whether hoſtilities were begun by the Engliſh or by the Spaniards, or whatever irregularities there were in the proceedings on either ſide, the action was not only deciſive, but neceſſary to diſconcert the cardinal's projects, which tended to no leſs than the involving all Europe in a war, the flames whereof had been ſo lately extinguiſhed. This is ſufficient to juſtify, in the eyes of true politicians, a ſlight breach of faith, ſuppoſing there had been any. The cardinal could never recover this ſhoc; his complaints and invectives, to which he had recourſe, could not reſtore his deſigns, and ſerved only to throw him from that high ſtation, where chance much more than merit had placed him. But, before his fall, he made thoſe two princes very uneaſy, whoſe ſuperior genius had defeated his projects.

As king George had ſeveral reaſons for aſſembling the parliament, he fixed the day of meeting by proclamation to the 11th of November. He not only wanted to have the ſteps he had taken approved, but alſo to be authoriſed to ſupport them. Beſides, he was acquainted with the enterprizing genius of cardinal Alberoni, knew, he breathed nothing but vengeance, and was preparing ſome deſign in favour of the pretender, as appeared by ſome expreſſions which had dropped from him. He was not ignorant that too many were ready for a ſecond rebellion, which perhaps might ſucceed, unleſs proper meaſures to prevent it were taken. All theſe conſiderations induced him to have a ſpeedy recourſe to the parliament.

On the day appointed, the king came to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech, which was read by the lord chancellor to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'Since your laſt receſs, I have, by the bleſſing of Almighty God, concluded ſuch terms and conditions of peace and alliance between the two greateſt princes of Europe, as will, in all human appearance, induce others to follow their example, and make any attempts to diſturb the public tranquility, not only dangerous, but impracticable.

Theſe engagements, I am perſuaded, will be ſo much the more agreeable to all my good ſubjects, as they bind the contracting powers to ſupport the ſucceſſion to theſe kingdoms in my family, to which ſome were not at all, and others not ſo fully bound by any former treaties.

During the whole courſe of theſe negotiations, a moſt ſtrict regard has been had to the intereſt of Spain, and better conditions have been ſtipulated for that king, than were inſiſted upon in his behalf, even at the treaty of Utrecht. But the war in Hungary (which by our mediation, is ſince happily ended) having tempted the court of Spain unjuſtly to attac the emperor, and the hopes they have ſince conceived of raiſing diſturbances in Great-Britain, France, and elſewhere, having encouraged them to believe that we ſhould not be able to act, in purſuance of our treaties, for the defence of the dominions invaded by them, nor even to the ſupport of thoſe other eſſential and neceſſary conditions of the treaty of Utrecht, which provided againſt the great monarchies of Europe being at any time hereafter united under one ſovereign; they have not only perſiſted in ſuch a notorious violation of the public peace and tranquility, but have rejected all our amicable propoſals and have broke through their moſt ſolemn engagements for the ſecurity of our commerce.

To vindicate therefore the faith of our former treaties, as well as to maintain thoſe, which we have lately made, and to protect and defend the trade of my ſubjects, which has in every branch been violently and unjuſtly oppreſſed, it became neceſſary for our naval forces to chec their progreſs. It was reaſonable to hope, that the ſucceſs of our arms, the repeated offers of friendſhip, which I have never ceaſed to make in the moſt preſſing manner, and the meaſures taken in concert with the emperor and the moſt chriſtian king to reſtore the public tranquility, would have produced a better diſpoſition in the court of Spain; but I have received informations, that, inſtead of liſtening to our reaſonable terms of accommodation, that court has lately given orders at all the ports of Spain, and of the Weſt-indies, to fit out privateers, and to take our ſhips.

I am perſuaded, that a Britiſh parliament will enable me to reſent ſuch treatment, as becomes us; and it is with pleaſure, that I can aſſure you of the ready and friendly reſolution of our good brother the regent of France, to concur and join with me in the moſt vigorous meaſures.

The firm confidence I repoſe in the affection of my people, together with my earneſt deſire to eaſe them of every charge not abſolutely neceſſary, determined me, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of our great alliance, to make a very conſiderable reduction of our land-forces; nor could I better expreſs, than by ſo doing, how little we apprehend the attempts of our enemies to diſturb the peace of my kingdoms, even though Spain ſhould think fit to continue ſome time in war. Our naval force, employed in concert with our allies, will, I truſt in God, ſoon put a happy end to the troubles, which the ambitious views of that court have begun, and ſecure to my ſubjects the execution of the many treaties in force relating to our commerce.'

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

'I muſt deſire you to grant me ſuch ſupplies, as will enable me to carry on the ſervice of the year. I have given orders to have the proper eſtimates laid before you, whereby you will perceive, I have reduced the expence as much as our circumſtances can well admit. I have the pleaſure to obſerve to you, that the funds, appropriated for ſinking the public debts, have anſwered above expectation. I muſt, however, recommend to you to conſider of proper methods for improving them, by preventing the frauds and abuſes daily committed in the public revenues, not doubting, in all your proceedings, you will have that regard to the inviolable preſervation of the public credit, which may quiet the minds of all thoſe, that have truſted to parliamentary engagements.'

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'There never was a time when your unanimity, your vigour and diſpatch, were more neceſſary to ſo many good ends, as thoſe we have now in view. I have done my part. It remains with you to give the laſt finiſhing to this great work. Our friends and our enemies, both at home and abroad, are waiting the event of your reſolutions. And I dare promiſe myſelf, that the firſt have nothing to apprehend, nor the other to hope from your conduct in this important juncture, who have, during the whole courſe of my reign, given ſuch lively proofs of your zeal and affection to my perſon, and of your love to your country.'

How plauſible and important ſoever this ſpeech might be, it occaſioned great debates. The addreſſes that were to be preſented drew the attention of both parties: On the manner in which they ſhould be expreſſed, depended, as it were, the operations of the ſeſſion.

The king was no ſooner withdrawn, but the lord Carteret moved for 'an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, for his care in preſerving the public peace, and the ballance of power in Europe: For the conſiderable reduction of the land-forces; and for having obtained further ſecurities of the ſucceſſion in his family: as alſo to congratulate the ſeaſonable ſucceſs of his naval forces; and to aſſure him, that the houſe would ſupport him in the purſuit of thoſe prudent and neceſſary meaſures he had taken to ſecure the trade and and quiet of theſe kingdoms, and the tranquility of Europe.' The lord Carteret was ſeconded by the lord Tenham; but ſeveral lords excepted againſt the congratulating the king

[m] As to the favours ſhewn the Engliſh, in regard to their trade (mentioned in Monteleone's letter) mr. Craggs ſaid, he had the king's commands to repeat the following grievances:

1. Impoſts have been laid on our merchandizes, directly contrary to our treaties of commerce with the crown of Spain.

2. Several kinds of goods have been prohibited, which are expreſly allowed by the ſame treaties.

3. The ſchedules for their annual veſſels have been denied the South-Sea company, contrary to the expreſs letter of the treaty; without any better reaſon given for it, than that it was not for the convenience of the court of Madrid to grant them.

4. Our merchant-ſhips have been ſeized in all the ports of Spain: the Spaniſh men of war and privateers have brought them in by force; have obliged them to take out their cargoes, and, to their inexpreſſible loſs, have conſtrained them to tranſport the troops, horſes, ammunition, &c. for this very expedition which has diſordered the affairs of all Europe. I am even aſſured what I can ſcarce believe, that owners of theſe veſſels, for endeavouring to ſtruggle with ſuch unheard of proceedings, have had their ears cut off: and that the firſt thing done by the Spaniards, upon their entering Meſſina, was to thruſt the king's conſul into priſon. He then deſires him to examine how conſiſtent theſe things are with the favourable declaration he had made for the trade of Great-Britain.

upon the ſeaſonable ſucceſs of his naval forces, and the promiſe to ſupport him in the purſuit of thoſe prudent and neceſſary meaſures he had taken, becauſe it was, in effect, to approve a ſea-fight, which might be attended with dangerous conſequences, and give the ſanction of that auguſt aſſembly to meaſures, which, upon examination, might appear either to claſh with the laws of nations or former treaties, or to be prejudicial to the trade of Great-Britain. That, according to the conſtant uſage of that houſe, they ought to proceed with the utmoſt caution and matureſt deliberation, in an affair, wherein the honour, as well as the intereſt of the nation, were ſo highly concerned. And lord Strafford inſiſted, 'that, before they approved the ſea-fight, they ought to be ſatisfied whether the ſame happened before or after the ſigning of the quadruple alliance; and therefore moved for an addreſs, that ſir George Byng's inſtructions might be laid before the houſe.'

To this it was anſwered by earl Stanhope 'that there was no manner of occaſion for ſuch an addreſs, ſince, by his majeſty's command, he had already laid before the houſe the treaties, of which the late ſea-fight was a conſequence; and, in particular, the treaty for a defenſive alliance between the emperor and his majeſty, made at Weſtminſter the 25th of May, 1716; and the treaty of alliance for reſtoring and ſettling the public peace, ſigned at London the 22d of July, O. S. after this, he accounted at large for the juſtice and equity of thoſe treaties, which were calculated to preſerve, reſtore, and ſettle the peace of Europe, by rendering the treaty of Utrecht effectual, particularly in preventing the union of the two great monarchies of France and Spain under one ſovereign, and ſecuring the ſucceſſion of theſe kingdoms in his majeſty's family. At the ſame time he ſhewed, how the court of Spain had violated the treaty of Utrecht, and acted againſt the public faith, in attacing the emperor's dominions, while he was engaged in a war againſt the enemies of Chriſtendom; and in what manner they had rejected his majeſty's friendly offices, and repeated offers of mediating an accommodation between the emperor and his catholic majeſty. To which purpoſe he gave the houſe an account of his late journey to, and negotiations in, Spain. He added, that it was high time for Great-Britain to chec the growth of the naval power of Spain, in order to protect and ſecure the trade of the Britiſh ſubjects, which had been violently oppreſſed by the Spaniards: To which purpoſe ſeveral letters were read. He concluded with obſerving, that both with relation to ſir George Byng's inſtructions, and in all other reſpects, in this whole affair his majeſty had acted by the advice of his privy-council: that he was one of that number: and he thought it an honour to have adviſed his majeſty to theſe meaſures, becauſe he was perſuaded they intirely agreed with the honour and intereſt of his country: that he doubted not, but, upon the ſtricteſt examination, thoſe meaſures would be approved by all true Engliſhmen, and that he was ready to anſwer for them with his head.' This ſpeech made a great impreſſion on the whole aſſembly; and though ſeveral peers ſtill urged, that the making war, before the declaring of it, was a manifeſt violation of the laws of nations; and others raiſed leſs material objections; yet, after a five hours debate, it was carried for the addreſs as moved by the lord Carteret, by eighty-three votes againſt fifty. The principal ſpeakers on the court-ſide were, the lords Carteret and Tenham, and the earls of Sunderland and Stanhope; and, on the other ſide, the dukes of Bucks, Devonſhire, and Argyle; the earls of Nottingham, Cowper, Orford, and Ilay, the lords North and Grey, and Harcourt.

In the mean time the ſame affair was debating in the houſe of commons. The lord Hinchinbroke moved, that the houſe in an addreſs of thanks ſhould declare their entire ſatisfaction in thoſe meaſures, which the king had already taken for ſtrengthening the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and eſtabliſhing a laſting tranquility in Europe; and particularly in relation to the crown of Spain; and their reſolution to inable him, in concurrence with his allies, not only to reſent the injuries that crown had already done to our commerce, in breach of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two nations, but to ſupport him in the moſt effectual manner, in ſuch further meaſures, as he ſhould judge neceſſary to compleat the public tranquility in Europe, and to chec the growth of that naval power which muſt otherwiſe prove dangerous to the trade of theſe kingdoms, and to the repoſe of Europe. This motion was attended with a very warm debate. [n] The oppoſing ſide chiefly objected to the words entire ſatisfaction in theſe meaſures which his majeſty had already taken. In order to have theſe words left out of the addreſs, it was alledged, 'that it was unparliamentary and unprecedented, on the firſt day of a ſeſſion, to enter upon particulars. That the buſineſs in queſtion being of the higheſt importance, peace or war, deſerved the matureſt deliberation. That, before they approved the meaſures that had been taken, they ought to examine the treaties, and the reaſons, on which thoſe meaſures were founded, which muſt needs take up ſome time; and therefore they ought, for the preſent, according to the uſual cuſtom, to content themſelves with returning his majeſty thanks for his moſt gracious ſpeech, with general aſſurances of their zeal and affection for his perſon and government; and then appoint a day to take the ſpeech into conſideration.' To this it was anſwered, 'that, though all applications from this houſe to the throne differed according to the various circumſtances of affairs, yet there were not wanting precedents to ſupport the expreſſions excepted againſt, of which ſome inſtances were produced. That the meaſures, which had been taken, were grounded on treaties, that had been laid before them, and which might be examined into as ſoon as the houſe thought fit. But that it was neceſſary, at this critical juncture, when the eyes of all Europe were fixed on this parliament, early to come to a vigorous reſolution, which would not fail having its due weight abroad.' This was warmly oppoſed by mr. Walpole, who urged, 'that it was againſt the common rules of proceeding in that houſe, to approve a thing before they knew what it was: that he was thoroughly convinced of, and as ready as any perſon in that auguſt aſſembly, to acknowledge his majeſty's great care for the general peace of Europe, and the intereſt of Great-Britain: but that the giving ſanction, in the manner propoſed, to the late meaſures, could have no other view than to ſcreen miniſters, who were conſcious of having begun a war againſt Spain, and who would now make it the parliament's war. He concluded with obſerving, that, inſtead of an entire ſatisfaction, they ought to ſhew their entire diſſatisfaction, with a conduct, that was contrary to the laws of nations, and a breach of ſolemn treaties.' Upon this, mr. Craggs gave the houſe an exact account of the meaſures, which the king and his miniſters had purſued for reſtoring and ſecuring the tranquility of Europe; and ſaid, in particular, 'that, upon that view, a treaty of defenſive alliance between his majeſty and the emperor had been ſigned in May, 1716, and by that very gentleman, then in high ſtation, who now excepted againſt theſe meaſures. That, at the ſame time, his majeſty ſincerely deſired and endeavoured to maintain a perfect friendſhip with the king of Spain, and had even propoſed a defenſive alliance to him, before he made one with any other power. That, notwithſtanding the engagements his majeſty was under to guarantee the neutrality of Italy, and to defend the emperor in the poſſeſſion of his dominions, which, upon the invaſion of Sardinia, might have juſtified his majeſty's aſſiſting him againſt Spain, yet the king choſe rather to act as a friendly mediator, and, in concert with the regent of France, endeavoured to find out means of reconciling the intereſts of the emperor and the king of Spain, as the only way to put a ſtop to the war, that threatened Italy, and in which all Europe might be involved. That the catholic king was often ſollicitated by the Britiſh miniſters at Madrid, to concur with his majeſty's good intentions, and to give ſuch inſtructions to the Spaniſh miniſter here, as would put it in his majeſty's power to ſtand up for the intereſts and advantages of Spain in the enſuing negotiations. That the catholic king having declined to concert meaſures with Great Britain, and demanding, in general, ſatisfaction for the breaches he pretended the emperor had made upon the treaty of Utrecht, the balance of power in Europe, and the ſecurity and liberty of the princes and ſtates of Italy; all that his majeſty, with the regent's aſſiſtance, could do, was to obtain of the emperor ſuch conditions, as were thought moſt agreeable to his catholic majeſty; namely, an abſolute renunciation of the monarchy of Spain and the Indies, and a very conſiderable ſettlement in Italy for a prince of Spain, particularly the great duchy of Tuſcany. That, as the emperor's pretenſions to Sicily were the principal reaſons of his oppoſing the treaty of Utrecht, from which he could not afterwards be brought off by the treaty of Baden, it became neceſſary, towards an accommodation, to diſpoſe of that iſland in favour of his imperial majeſty, of whom, upon that conſideration, his majeſty and the regent of France obtained the diſpoſition of Sardinia in favour of the king of Sicily. That theſe were the principal articles of the treaty of alliance, for reſtoring and ſettling the public peace, commonly called the quadruple alliance, which was a long while depending, and at laſt ſigned here, on the 22d of July, 1718. That, in order to ſupport the views of this treaty, and to add weight to the endeavours to reſtore the tranquility of Europe, his majeſty acquainted the commons, towards the end of the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, that he intended to employ a naval force, when it ſhould be neceſſary; whereupon this houſe unanimouſly reſolved to return his majeſty their thanks for his unwearied endeavours to promote the welfare of his kingdoms, and to preſerve the tranquility of Europe, and to aſſure his majeſty, that they would make good ſuch exceedings of men for the ſea-ſervice, of the year 1718, as his majeſty, in his royal wiſdom, ſhould find neceſſary to obtain thoſe deſirable ends. [o] That this unanimous reſolution undoubtedly implied an entire ſatisfaction in the meaſures his majeſty was, at that time, concerting for preſerving the tranquility of Europe; and, if an action has ſince happened, and in conſequence of thoſe meaſures, this cannot, with any juſtice, be called the war of the miniſters, but the war of the parliament. That, however, it was not with deſign of making war, but only of reſtoring peace, that his majeſty ſent a ſtrong ſquadron into the Mediterranean. That, purſuant to this view, as ſoon as ſir George Byng reached the coaſt of Spain, he wrote a letter to that king, deſiring him to accept his majeſty's mediation, and to deſiſt from the hoſtilities already begun; offering him his ſervice, either to withdraw his troops, or even to aſſiſt him, in caſe the emperor ſhould not conſent to a ſuſpenſion of arms, which the admiral propoſed, while an accommodation ſhould be negotiated. That the Spaniards having with haughtineſs rejected his majeſty's repeated amicable projects, and not only perſiſted in the violation of the public peace, by the invaſion of Sicily, but likewiſe broke through the moſt ſolemn treaties for the ſecurity of our trade, it became neceſſary for his majeſty's naval forces to chec theſe inſolent and violent proceedings, as well to maintain the faith of his majeſty's engagements, and prevent the conſequences of this war, as to protect and defend the trade of the Britiſh ſubjects, which labours under the heavieſt hardſhips and difficulties.' And this particular was confirmed to the houſe by colonel Bladen, who produced a liſt of many merchant-ſhips taken or detained by the Spaniards. Several members on the oppoſing ſide, having, like mr. Walpole, made ſolemn profeſſions of their duty and affection to the king, and of their readineſs to acknowledge his care and conſtant endeavours for the ſecurity and welfare of his people, and the tranquility of Europe; diſtinguiſhed between his majeſty and his miniſters, and ſhewed an unwillingneſs to approve the meaſures purſued by the latter, till the treaties, on which theſe meaſures were founded, had been fully and maturely examined. Mr Craggs readily admitted of the diſtinction between the king and his miniſters; adding, 'that he obſerved, with a great deal of pleaſure, how unanimous they were all for the king; and that he ſhould be extremely ſorry, if the miniſters ſhould be the occaſion of any delay in the houſe's expreſſing their duty and affection to him. That, he owned, miniſters were not infallible: that he had the honour to be one of his majeſty's ſervants, and had gone as great lengths as any in the meaſures that had been taken; but that he was poſitive, that, in the courſe of this whole affair, nothing had been done, that was not entirely conſiſtent with the faith of treaties, and the honour and intereſt of the nation. That he durſt promiſe, both for himſelf and the reſt of the miniſters, that, if the houſe came into this vote, which he thought of the higheſt importance at this critical juncture, no manner of advantage would be taken of it to palliate any faults, which, through human frailty, might have been committed; and that, for his own part, he was ready to undergo the ſevereſt examination, whenever the houſe ſhould think fit to enquire into the conduct of the miniſtry.' This ſpeech had great weight with the majority of the houſe; and mr. Craggs was ſo ſtrongly ſupported, that the addreſs, as moved by the lord Hinchinbroke, was at laſt carried by two hundred and ten voices againſt one hundred and fifty-five. And, on the 13th of November, the commons, as well as the lords, preſented their addreſs to the king.

The commons purſuant to their addreſs immediately voted a ſupply. They allowed for the ſea-ſervice thirteen thouſand five hundred ſailors at 4l. a month each, amounting to 702,000l. Twelve thouſand four hundred thirty-five men were voted for the land-ſervice, whoſe pay amounted to 526,964l. 11s. 8d. Theſe ſums, with what was voted for making good deficiencies, for the ordinary of the navy, and other things, amounted in all to 2,257,581l. 19s. This ſupply was raiſed by a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound, the malt-tax, and a lottery for 500,000l. The bills for the land and malt-tax were preſented, and both paſſed in one day, a diſpatch not to be paralleled in any parliament ſince the revolution.

The king judging by the diſpoſition of the parliament, that it would be a proper time to execute a deſign, he had long been meditating, reſolved to attempt it this ſeſſion. Ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne he had aſſured the church of England of his protection, but at the ſame time declared for a juſt toleration, by removing the odious diſtinctions between churchmen and non-conformiſts. In the former ſeſſion he had plainly enough diſcovered his intention, but the proſecution of it was prevented, by the miſunderſtanding among the whigs. The diſſenters, beſides the occaſional and ſchiſm bills, lay under the weight of the ſacramental teſt. As they had been zealous aſſerters of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, they expected to be relieved from theſe burdens as ſoon as that ſucceſſion took place. To that end conſultations had been held the laſt year, but without any effect. [p] The affair was now reſumed, and debated by the diſſenters in many meetings, in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. The majority in theſe meetings were for a general repeal of the acts that they thought hardſhips upon them, or leaving matters as they ſtood. But they were aſſured that the king had preſſed the affair to the utmoſt with the miniſters, and that the lord Sunderland ſaid, 'it was impracticable, and to attempt a repeal of the teſt would ruin all.' [q] Upon this the teſt was given up, after aſſurances that the teſt-act ſhould alſo be repealed in a more proper time. Earl Stanhope therefore was to move for a repeal of the occaſional and ſchiſm acts paſſed in the latter end of the reign of queen Anne. Accordingly, on the 13th of December, he told the houſe of lords, that, in order to unite the hearts and affections of the well-affected to the preſent eſtabliſhment, he had a bill to offer under the title of 'an act for ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt in theſe kingdoms,' which he deſired might be read. The bill was read, importing in ſubſtance a repeal of the acts againſt occaſional conformity, and the growth of ſchiſm, and of ſome clauſes in the corporation and teſt-acts. Many of the peers were ſurprized at the bringing in this bill at a time, when none but ſuch as were in the ſecret expected any ſuch thing; and earl Stanhope having moved, that it might be read a ſecond time, it occaſioned a long debate. The author of the bill endeavoured to ſhew 'the equity, juſtice, reaſonableneſs, and advantage of reſtoring diſſenters to their natural rights, and of eaſing them of theſe ſtigmatiſing and oppreſſive laws, that had been made againſt them in turbulent times, and obtained by indirect methods, for no other reaſon, than becauſe they ever ſhewed their zealous and firm adherence to the revolution and proteſtant ſucceſſion;' urging, 'that this deſirable union of all true proteſtants, as it would certainly ſtrengthen the proteſtant intereſt, ſo would it rather be an advantage, than any prejudice to the church of England by law eſtabliſhed, which would ſtill be the head of all the proteſtant churches; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury become the patriarch of all the proteſtant clergy.' He was ſeconded and ſupported by the earls of Sunderland and Stamford, and ſome other lords: but the dukes of Bucks, and Devonſhire, the earls of Nottingham, Aylesford, Oxford, Cowper, and the lord North and Grey, either ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the bill, or endeavoured to put off the ſecond reading to a long day. It was alledged in general, 'that this bill, if paſſed into a law, inſtead of ſtrengthening, would certainly weaken the church of England, by plucing off her beſt feathers, inveſting her enemies with power, and ſharing with them the civil and military employments of which churchmen only are now in poſſeſſion.' The duke of Devonſhre in particular ſuggeſted, 'that it was irregular to bring in a bill of ſo great conſequence, without previouſly acquainting the houſe.' But it was readily anſwered by earl Stanhope, 'that his grace had forgot, that about two years before he had brought in himſelf in the ſame manner, a bill of much greater conſequence:' meaning the bill for ſuſpending the act for triennial parliaments. The earl of Nottingham ſaid, among other things, 'that the church of England is certainly the happieſt church in the world, ſince even the greateſt contradictions contribute to her ſupport; for nothing could be more contradictory, than a bill, which is ſaid to be calculated to ſtrengthen the proteſtant intereſt, and the church of England, and which, at the the ſame time, repeals two acts, that were made for her further ſecurity.' After which he gave his reaſons againſt the repealing thoſe laws. Earl Cowper made alſo a long ſpeech againſt ſome parts of the bill, and among other things, ſaid, 'that he had no manner of prejudice againſt the diſſenters, but rather a tender regard for them: that as he had been bred in, ſo he had ever communicated with, the church of England, which he believed to be the beſt proteſtant church, and the moſt agreeable to the primitive pattern of chriſtianity. But that, however, if he had happened to be at Geneva, he would not have ſcrupled to have communicated with the proteſtants there. That he was for giving the diſſenters as much eaſe, as was conſiſtent with the ſafety of the conſtitution in church and ſtate, and would readily give his vote for the repealing of the ſchiſm act; but that he could not but oppoſe that part of the bill now laid before them, whereby part of the teſt and corporation acts were effectually repealed with relation to the diſſenters, becauſe he looked upon thoſe acts as the main bulwark of our excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate, and therefore would have them inviolably preſerved and untouched.' The earl of Ilay ſaid, 'that every body knew he was educated in a different way from the church of England; but, nevertheleſs, he could not but be againſt this bill, becauſe, in his opinion, it broke the pacta conventa of the treaty of union, by which the bounds both of the church of England, and of the church of Scotland were fixed and ſettled; and he was apprehenſive, if the articles of the union were broke with reſpect to one church, it might afterwards be a precedent to break them with reſpect to the other.' The lord North and Grey urged, 'that this was an affair of ſo great importance, that it ought to be maturely conſidered and debated in a full houſe,' and therefore moved, 'that the ſecond reading be put off for a month.' The duke of Bucks was of his opinion, but the friends of the bill, being unwilling to let the affair cool by adjourning it ſo long, propoſed, that the ſecond reading might only be put off till the 18th of December, which was agreed to without dividing.

[q] The king told the lord Barrington (a diſſenter) 'that, if there were any hopes of carrying the whole, he would not be againſt it; but, if there were no hopes, as he was aſſured by his miniſters, he believed the diſſenters were too much his friends, to inſiſt upon a thing which might be infinitely prejudicial to him, without doing them any good; but, on the contrary, a great deal of hurt.'

Upon that day, the bill was read a ſecond time, and a motion made for committing it; but this being oppoſed by the earl of Nottingham, and ſome other peers, the earl of Cholmondley ſuggeſted, 'that before they proceeded any further in an affair, wherein the church was ſo nearly concerned, he thought it very proper to have, in the firſt place, the opinion of that venerable bench, pointing to the biſhops. This being unanimouſly aſſented to, the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſtood up, and declared againſt the bill, for which he gave his reaſons, importing in ſubſtance, 'that the acts, which by this bill were to be repealed, are the main bulwark and ſupporters of the eſtabliſhed church. That he had all imaginable tenderneſs for all the well-meaning conſcientious diſſenters; but he could not forbear ſaying, that ſome among them made a wrong uſe of the favour, and indulgence that was ſhewn them upon the revolution, though they had the leaſt ſhare in that happy event: and therefore it was thought neceſſary for the legiſlature to interpoſe, and put a ſtop to the ſcandalous practice of occaſional conformity, which was condemned by the ſobereſt part of the diſſenters themſelves. And, as to the act againſt ſchiſm, though it might carry a farce of ſeverity, yet it ſeemed needleſs to make a law to repeal it, ſince no advantage had been taken of it againſt the diſſenters ever ſince it was made.' The archbiſhop of York (ſir William Dawes) ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and ſaid, 'that the arguments uſed the other day for this bill had no more weight with him, than they had with his brother of Canterbury. He urged in particular the danger of truſting the diſſenters, the open and avowed enemies of the church, with power and authority; and endeavoured to account for the acts againſt occaſional conformity and ſchiſm, by ſaying, they were never to be gained by indulgence.' To that purpoſe he quoted a paſſage out of a treatiſe, intitled, 'a perſuaſive to lay-conformity,' written by dr. Hoadley, biſhop of Bangor, who, as he ſaid, had, ſince the writing of that book, embraced and maintained other principles. The biſhop of Bangor anſwered the archbiſhop of York, particularly with relation to the paſſage quoted out of his treatiſe. He ſaid, 'he was ſo far from having altered his principles, that, both before and after he had been promoted to the ſtation he held in the church, he had endeavoured to bring over the diſſenters; but that he ever was of opinion, that gentle means are the moſt effectual for that purpoſe. After this, he ſhewed at large the unreaſonableneſs and ill policy of impoſing religious teſts, as a qualification for civil or military employments, which abridges men of their natural rights, deprives the ſtate of the ſervice of many of his beſt ſubjects, and expoſes the moſt ſacred inſtitutions and ordinances to be abuſed by profane and irreligious perſons. He alſo endeavoured to prove, that the occaſional and ſchiſm acts were, in effect, perſecuting laws; and that, by admitting the principle of ſelf-defence and ſelf-preſervation, in matters of religion, all the perſecutions of the heathens againſt the chriſtians, and even the popiſh inquiſition, may be juſtified. As to the power, of which ſome clergymen appeared ſo fond, and ſo jealous, he owned, that the deſire of power and riches is natural to all men; but that he had learned both from reaſon and the goſpel, that this deſire muſt be kept within due bounds, and not intrench upon the rights and liberties of their fellow-creatures and counrymen.'

After theſe and ſeveral other ſpeeches of the biſhops, [r] the debate was adjourned to the next day, when, after

[r] Dr Smalridge, biſhop of Briſtol, urged, 'that the late king William having recommended to both houſes from the throne, that they would leave room for the admiſſion of all proteſtants, that were willing and able to ſerve; and a clauſe having been thereupon offered to be inſerted in a bill depending in the lords houſe, to take away the neceſſity of receiving the ſacrament, to make a man capable of enjoying any office, employment, or place of truſt; the clauſe was rejected by a great majority, as well as another clauſe (offered alſo to be inſerted in that bill) to prevent the receiving the ſacrament of the lord's ſupper upon any other account than in the obedience to the holy inſtitution thereof:' adding, that ſoon after the lords addreſſed king William, 'that he would maintain the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.' All which he applied to the preſent caſe, and ſo voted againſt the bill. He was anſwered by the biſhop of Gloceſter, who, among other things, endeavoured to remove the imputation of hypocriſy caſt upon the diſſenters. The biſhop of Lincoln made an hiſtorical deduction of the affair, and commended the zeal of a noble earl, when ſecretary of ſtate, in promoting a comprehenſion, according to king William's deſire. He alſo took notice, that religion was ever uſed by crafty men as a blind and pretence to carry on political deſigns; and he remembered, in particular, in the late reign, 'that, while our arms were victorious abroad, the church was in danger at home; but no ſooner was a ſtop put to that glorious war, than the church was in a flouriſhing condition.' The earl of Nottingham, who was meant by that prelate, and was the promoter of the occaſional bill, and had oppoſed the bill now in queſtion, thought proper to juſtify his conduct, by ſaying, he was in thoſe days but a young man, and had wanted opportunities to know the diſſenters, whom he had ſince found to be an obſtinate ſort of people, never to be ſatisfied. After which he entered upon the merits of the bill, and voted againſt it. The biſhop of London did the ſame, and urged, 'that in all wiſe governments, all offices and places of truſt are in the hands of thoſe of the national church; which his lordſhip confirmed by what is practiſed in Sweden.' The biſhop of Rocheſter ſpoke alſo on the ſame ſide, and ſaid in ſubſtance, 'that he was not in the houſe at the firſt reading of this bill, but that the laſt ſeſſion of parliament he foreſaw from the bill about an alms-houſe at Briſtol, and the bill for applying part of the fund for the building of new churches to the rebuilding of an old one (St. Giles's) both which he had oppoſed, that ſomething of this nature would be attempted. That he was ſorry he had been a prophet, ſince, in his opinion, this bill overturned the foundation of the ſecurity of the church. That this bill even ſtruc at the act of uniformity, which was confirmed by the act of union, and ſo was levelled againſt the church of Scotland, as well as againſt the church of England. For which reaſon he hoped thoſe peers, who repreſented the nobility of Scotland, would be againſt this bill, particularly a noble lord, who was too great an enemy to prieſtcraft, to ſuffer himſelf to be aſſembly-ridden.' He concluded with obſerving, 'that we live in a changeable country; and that the hardſhips which the diſſenters now being upon the church, may one day or other be ſeverely and with more juſtice retaliated upon them.' Hereupon dr. Kennet, the new biſhop of Peterborough, ſpoke ſtrenuouſly for the bill, and refuted moſt of the arguments uſed on the other ſide. He ſaid, in ſubſtance, 'that he did not deſign to reflect on any of his brethren for ſpeaking againſt this bill, becauſe he ſuppoſed they did it out of a ſincere zeal for the church: that, for his own part, he did not believe this bill to be againſt the church, but rather for its advantage and ſecurity; and therefore he was for it: that he obſerved from hiſtory, that the church was moſt ſafe and flouriſhing, when the clergy did not effect more power than falls to their ſhare, and were tender of the rights and liberties of their fellow-ſubjects; but that, when the clergy promoted arbitrary meaſures and perſecutions, as ſome did in king Charles the firſt's reign, they firſt brought ſcandal and contempt upon the clergy, and at laſt, ruin both upon the church and ſtate.' Then he ſhewed the abuſe of the word church, which in a true ſenſe is venerable; and illuſtrated the matter by the words holy, and the temple of the Lord, which were ſacred among the Jews; but, when thoſe words came to be abuſed ſo far as to countenance rebellion, as in caſe of Dathan, Corah, and Abiram, and other wicked practices, then they rather became words of execration. That, in like manner among us, the words church and the church's danger, had often been made uſe of to carry on ſiniſter deſigns; and then theſe words made a mighty noiſe in the mouth of ſilly women and children; but that in his oppinion the church, which he defined to be a ſcriptural inſtitution upon a legal eſtabliſhment, was founded upon a roc, and could not be in danger as long as we enjoyed the light of the goſpel, and our excellent conſtitution. After this he gave his reaſons for his being for this bill, and animadverted upon three things, which had been advanced by other prelates. 1. That the diſſenters got more than the church by the revolution, though they had the leaſt ſhare in it. For he ſhewed, 'they only got a toleration, which they might have had under king James, if they would have complied with his meaſures, whereas the church ſecured all ſhe now enjoys, which would have been irrecoverably loſt, had not the revolution happened. 2. That the churchmen, and even the clergy, ſhewed more affecſome clauſes concerning the teſt and corporation acts were agreed to be left out, the bill was committed, and, being read a third time, paſſed the houſe, and was ſent down to the commons, where it was alſo warmly debated; but at laſt carried by a majority of two hundred and twenty-one againſt one hundred and ſeventy. [f]

The manner in which the king had, in his ſpeech, mentioned Spain, and his ſaying, that he was perſuaded a Britiſh parliament would enable him to reſent ſuch treatment, were plain intimations of his intention to declare war againſt that crown. On the 17th of December, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons to acquaint them, that all his endeavours, as well as thoſe of the king of France, to procure redreſs for the injuries done to his ſubjects by the king of Spain, to the unſpeakable detriment of their trade, or even to obtain a diſcontinuance of his unjuſt hoſtilities, having proved ineffectual, he had found it neceſſary to declare war againſt Spain.

After the reading of this meſſage, it was moved for an addreſs to aſſure the king, that they would, with the greateſt chearfulneſs, and the utmoſt vigour, aſſiſt and ſupport him in the war, till Spain was reduced to accept of reaſonable terms of peace, and agree to ſuch conditions of trade and commerce as the nation was juſtly entitled to by their ſeveral treaties. Mr Shippen and ſome others excepted againſt the motion, or againſt ſome expreſſions in it, which occaſioned a warm debate. They alledged, they did not ſee the neceſſity of declaring war againſt Spain, but were rather inclined to believe, the grievances complained of by the merchants might be amicably redreſſed. Mr Stanhope aſſured the houſe, that he had preſented, at leaſt, five and twenty memorials to the court of Spain upon that ſubject without any ſucceſs. Mr Methuen endeavoured to account for the dilatorineſs of the court of Madrid in the diſpatch of commercial affairs, occaſioned by the different regulations in the ſeveral provinces and ports of Spain; which might be the reaſon why the grievances had not been redreſſed ſo ſoon as might have been expected. It was alſo ſuggeſted, that the miniſters had ſhewn no great concern for the trade and intereſt of the nation, ſince it appeared, by the anſwer from a ſecretary of ſtate to the marquis de Monteleone's letter, that they would have paſſed by the violations of the treaties of commerce, provided Spain had accepted the terms of the quadruple alliance; and that his majeſty did not ſeek to agrandize himſelf by any new acquiſitions, but was rather inclined to ſacrifice ſomething of his own, to procure the general quiet and tranquility: that nobody could yet tell how far that ſacrifice was to extend; but certainly it was a very uncommon piece of condeſcenſion. [t] Mr Horatio Walpole made alſo a long ſpeech, wherein he found fault with the treaty of quadruple alliance, particularly as to the diſpoſition of Sicily, in favour of the emperor, which was a breach of the treaty of Utrecht. Mr Walpole, his brother, likewiſe exclaimed againſt the injuſtice of attacing the Spaniſh fleet before a declaration of war. They were anſwered by mr. Craggs, and ſir Joſeph Jekyll cloſed the debate with ſaying: 'that ſome weeks before, when this affair was firſt mentioned in the houſe, he was ſhy of giving his opinion, becauſe he had not then examined the ſeveral ſteps that had been taken in it; but that now he was fully convinced, that, if there was any injuſtice, it was on the ſide of the king of Spain; and that the conduct of his majeſty and his miniſters was entirely agreeable to the law of nations, and the rules of juſtice and equity. Was it juſt, added he, in the king of Spain to attac the emperor's dominions (Sardinia) while he was engaged in a war with the Turks, without any declaration of war? was it juſt in the ſame prince to invade the dominions of one of our allies, the king of Sicily, without the leaſt provocation? and was it not juſt in his majeſty to vindicate the faith of his treaties, and to defend and protect the trade of his ſubjects, which had been violently oppreſſed?' After theſe ſpeeches, the addreſs was carried by a majority of a hundred and ſeventy-eight, againſt a hundred and ſeven, and preſented the next day.

Earl Stanhope brought the ſame meſſage to the houſe of peers, and, the like addreſs being moved for, it was carried without a diviſion.

The declaration of war was publiſhed with the uſual ſolemnities, but not with the ſame acclamations as when war was proclaimed againſt France in the two former reigns. The declaration was well drawn, and began with an artful turn, which ſeemed to intimate as if the action of Syracuſa had been a conſequence of the ill ſucceſs of the earl of Stanhope's negotiations at Madrid. For after the king had mentioned his being guarantee of the neutrality of Italy, his engagement to defend the emperor's dominions, and the king of Spain's invaſion of Sardinia: 'we did ſend (ſays he) our fleet into the Mediterranean this laſt ſummer, with a full and earneſt intention to make uſe of its appearance there for ſetting on foot negotiations of peace towards reconciling the parties engaged in war, and thereby preventing the many calamities that muſt enſue therefrom. And whereas we did likewiſe, to teſtify our moſt ſincere inclinations to peace, ſend our right truſty and right well beloved couſin and councellor James, earl Stanhope, one of our principal ſecretaries of ſtate, to Madrid, with full power and commiſſion to offer our moſt hearty endeavours for re-eſtabliſhing the quiet of Europe, and for cultivating and improving the friendſhip of the king of Spain. And whereas, notwithſtanding all the inſtances we could poſſibly make, all the tenders of amity and affection we could uſe, our plenipotentiary returned without the leaſt hopes of peaceable diſpoſitions in the court of Spain; and our admiral in the Mediterranean, finding alſo no tendency to amicable meaſures, was obliged to aſſiſt and protect the emperor's dominions by force, which were in eminent danger by the further invaſion of the kingdom of Sicily, and by the great fleets and armies which the king of Spain had in thoſe parts.'

To ſhew that the war was not purely on the emperor's account, the declaration ſet forth the ſeizing of the effects and perſons of the Engliſh, in violation of treaties and antient privileges; and then touched upon the true motives of the war, the diſabling the king of Spain to unite the crowns of France and Spain, or to aſſiſt the pretender. Thoſe were juſt motives, which though perſonal to king George, and the duke of Orleans, yet were of the utmoſt concern to the nations they governed.

Cardinal Alberoni was not idle whilſt meaſures were taken to cruſh him. He raiſed troops, fitted out ſhips, put the coaſts in a poſture of defence, ſent ſuccours to Sicily, and provided for the ſafety of Sardinia. But, what efforts ſoever Spain might make, he was ſenſible of the impoſſibility to reſiſt the three moſt powerful ſtates of Europe combined againſt him. To efforts therefore he joined plots and intrigues to ſupport his undertakings. He began with the duke of Orleans, believing, if he could remove him, the forces of France would be at his diſpoſal, at leaſt they would not be employed againſt him, and king George, deprived of ſo powerful and ally, would be obliged to moderate his zeal for the emperor's intereſts.

The plot was eaſy to be laid, and was ſo well conducted, that the ſucceſs ſeemed infallible. France abounded with mal-contents, and the regent had many enemies who either wiſhed his removal, or the execution of the late king's will. Theſe mal-contents, in order to be ſupported, had on to the preſent government than the diſſenters during the late rebellion:' to which he anſwered, that by the laws, which by this biil were to be repealed, the diſſenters were then under an incapacity to ſerve the government, which evinced the neceſſity of this bill: and as for a clergyman, who had given ſignal proofs of his zeal for the government in the north, that it was well known he was never rewarded for it, but rather diſregarded ever ſince by his neighbours. 3. As to what had been ſuggeſted, that all offices and places of truſt ought to be in the hands of thoſe of the eſtabliſhed church, his lordſhip ſaid, he hoped they ſhould never draw precedents from Sweden. He concluded with returning thanks to the lay-lords for bearing ſo long and ſo patiently with that bench leaving the iſſue of this debate to their judgments; and only taking notice, that as the wiſdom of Solomon never more eminently appeared than in diſcovering the true mother of the child; ſo their lordſhips might eaſily know the reaſon, why ſome perſons ſpoke with ſo much tenderneſs for the acts, which, by this bill, were to be repealed. Dr Gaſtrel, biſhop of Cheſter, was of the contrary opinion, and, in particular, excepted againſt a clauſe in the bill, whereby a puniſhment or cenſure was to be inflicted on ſuch clergymen, as ſhould refuſe to adminiſter the ſacrament to any, that deſired to receive it; which, he ſaid, was againſt the canons of the church.

[f] Sir William Thompſon having urged againſt the ſchiſm-bill, that it deprived parents of their natural right of educating their children as they pleaſed, mr. Shippen anſwered, 'it was ſomewhat ſtrange to ſee ſo able a lawyer inconſiſtent with himſelf: for, when the twelve judges were conſulted in a caſe relating to a great family, he was of the opinion of ten of them, that children may be taken from their parents, and educated as the good of the nation required.' To this ſir William readily replied, 'that, as he never was conſulted, ſo had he never declared his thoughts, in that nice caſe hinted by that gentleman, and therefore he could not, with any colour of juſtice, be ſaid to have changed his opinion: but that the member who taxed him with it, and who thereby declared againſt the opinion of the ten judges, if he would be conſiſtent with himſelf, muſt now be for the bill that repeals the ſchiſm act, which reſtores parents to their natural right.'

The lord Guernſey propoſed the inſerting a clauſe, that any perſon, when he came to take the abjuration oath, in order to his qualification, ſhould acknowledge, that the old and new teſtament were given by divine inſpiration, and profeſs his belief of the ever-bleſſed trinity. But this motion was rejected. Pr. H. C.

It was obſerved that the archbiſhop Wake had proteſted againſt paſſing the very bill, the repeal of which he now oppoſed, as did alſo the earl of Notingham the duke of Devonſhire, and ſome others.

[t] By the ſacrifice was meant the ceſſion of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, which, it was reported, the regent of France had offered to the king of Spain, in caſe he would accede to the quadruple alliance.

recourſe to the Spaniſh court, where the reſentment againſt the duke of Orleans procured them a favourable hearing. The prince de Cellamare, the Spaniſh embaſſador at Paris, was ordered to treat with them. The plot was ſoon formed; biſhops, magiſtrates, nobles, prieſts, monks, officers, and governors, were ready for the undertaking, and were numbered among the conſpirators. The project was to ſeize the regent in ſome party of pleaſure, which he frequently made about Paris with his miſtreſſes, the king's perſon was at the ſame time to be ſecured, and proper orders were to be iſſued to the governors of the provinces and towns to aſſemble the parliaments, for ſettling the government, whilſt the ſtates of the kingdom ſhould meet, and make a final determination of matters. Many papers were kept in a readineſs to juſtify theſe undertakings, and encourage the people to ſupport them.

The mines were charged and ready to ſpring, when the affair was diſcovered. The firſt advice came from king George, who warned the regent of ſome attempt contriving againſt his perſon and government. This notice, though general only, was of great uſe. The duke of Orleans and the abbot du Bois were very vigilant. Several perſons were ſuſpected, particularly the duke and dutcheſs of Maine, and the Spaniſh embaſſador, all whom were narrowly watched, till the whole affair was diſcovered by the following accident. The prince de Cellamare, for the greater ſafety, entruſted his diſpatches to the abbot de Portocarrero, nephew of the cardinal of that name, and to one of the ſons of the marquis de Monteleon. Theſe gentlemen (with only ſir Joſeph Hodges, who paſſed for an Engliſh lord) ſet out from Paris in a poſt-chaiſe. They had not gone above two leagues before the chaiſe broke down in a ſlough. The poſtilion obſerved, the abbot ſhewed much more concern for his portmanteau than for himſelf, and heard him ſay, he would not have loſt it for a hundred thouſand piſtoles. The poſtilion, having conducted them to the firſt ſtage, returned to Paris, and gave immediate notice to the government, of what he had ſeen and heard. Upon which they were purſued and overtaken at Poictiers. Their perſons were ſeized, and the portmanteau ſent to Paris, wherein were found two letters which plainly diſcovered the plot. The prince de Cellamare was put under a guard, and his papers were ſealed up with his and the regent's ſeals, to be delivered to the perſons the king of Spain ſhould ſend to receive them. A few days after the prince was conducted to the frontiers of the kingdom. The marquis de Pampadour and ſeveral other perſons of note were impriſoned. The duke of Maine was ſent priſoner to the citadel of Dourlens in Picardy, and the dutcheſs to the caſtle of Dijon in Burgundy. The cardinal de Polignac was ordered to his abby of Auchin, that place being allowed him for his priſon.

On the 29th of December, war was declared at Paris againſt Spain. The declaration was accompanied with a long manifeſto, ſhewing the cauſes of rupture between France and Spain, and concluded with the following paragraph, in relation to cardinal Alberoni's plot: 'we now ſee with horror what it was that made the miniſter of Spain inacceſſible to all projects of peace. He would thereby have ſeen all the odious plots which he formed againſt us prove abortive: he would have loſt all hopes of laying this kingdom deſolate, of raiſing up France againſt France, of having the management of rebels among all the orders of ſtate, of kindling a civil war in the boſom of our provinces; and, in fine, of becoming to us the ſcourge of heaven, by putting in execution thoſe ſeditious projects, and ſpringing that mine which was, according the words of the embaſſador's letter, to ſerve as a prelude to the conflagration. What a recompence is this to France, for the treaſures and blood of which ſhe has been ſo profuſe for the ſake of Spain!'

1718-19.] To ſupport the reaſons alledged in the manifeſto, armaments were prepared in France and England. The beginning of January, an army of thirty-ſix thouſand men were on the march towards Spain. Ships of war were fitted out for ſeveral expeditions. The barrenneſs of the country, where the war was to be carried, occaſioned great expences, eſpecially for proviſions. The duke of Orleans was at ſome loſs for a general: marſhal Villars, to whom he offered the command, refuſed it, affirming he would never draw his ſword againſt the houſe of Bourbon, but the duke of Berwick, not being ſo ſcrupulous, accepted of the command.

Cardinal Alberoni's intrigues were not confined to France, he had formed the ſame deſigns againſt king George. The pretender was treated with, who readily came into the cardinal's views to annoy his enemy. The duke of Ormond repaired to Spain the latter end of the year, and meaſures were taken to ſtir up their friends in Great-Britain, and engage them to ſupport the deſigns of Spain.

The pope was doubtleſs in the ſecret, and his affection for the chevalier de St. George hindered him from conſenting, that he ſhould be expoſed, till it was ſeen what ſucceſs the firſt attempt might have. He ſuffered him, however, to go into Spain. The pretender was watched, and there was need of addreſs to eſcape the vigilance of the Germans, who were ſpread over the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. He had lately left Urbino, where he reſided, and was come to live at Rome. He went from thence on a ſudden, and cauſed it to be reported, that he was gone to Bologna. He ſent thither the earls of Mar and Perth, with one Paterſon, who was to paſs for their maſter. This artifice was attended with the expected ſucceſs: all three were arreſted at Voghera by the imperialiſts, but preſently after releaſed. As for the pretender, he came to Nettuno without any accident, and embarked for Cagliari, from whence he came to Roſes in Catalonia, the beginning of March.

He was magnificently received at Madrid, where he entered in one of the king's coaches, attended by the guards, and was conducted to the palace of Buen-retiro. On the morrow he was viſited by the king, the queen, the prince of Aſturias, and the great officers of the crown, and complimented by them as king of Great-Britain. Upon his arrival, the ſquadron, which had been fitting out ſome time for this expedition, ſailed from Cadiz towards England, conſiſting of ten men of war and tranſport-ſhips, with ſix thouſand regular troops on board, moſtly Iriſh, with arms for ten or twelve thouſand men. The duke of Ormond was the conductor of this undertaking, with the title of captain-general of the king of Spain: he was to publiſh, in the proper places, a declaration in that king's name, wherein he ſaid, that for many very good reaſons he had reſolved to ſend part of his land and ſea-forces into England and Scotland, to ſerve as auxiliaries to king James: what had confirmed him in his reſolution, was the certain advices he had received, that many of the two nations, notwithſtanding their ſtrong inclination to acknowledge that prince for their ſovereign, durſt not openly declare for him, becauſe they did not ſee him ſupported by any of the ſtates of Europe who had either power or will to aſſiſt them: that, to remove this difficulty, and others that might ariſe, he declared he was determined to uſe all his power for the reſtoration of a prince, to a country belonging to him by undeniable right: that he hoped providence would favour ſo juſt a cauſe; but, that the fear of ill ſucceſs might not hinder any perſon from declaring readily for him, he promiſed a ſecure retreat in his dominions, to all that ſhould join him, and, in caſe they were forced to leave their country, he declared, that every ſea or land officer ſhould have the ſame rank as he enjoyed in Great-Britain, and the ſoldiers ſhould be received and treated like his own.

Theſe preparations had not been ſo ſecret, but the king had received timely notice to take the neceſſary precautions: the duke of Orleans, in return for the ſame favour, had acquainted him with all he could diſcover. A proclamation was publiſhed againſt the duke of Ormond, and the other lords that were with him, with a reward of 5000l. for ſeizing the duke, and of 1000l. for each of the reſt, and of 500l. for every gentleman.

As the rumour of the invaſion increaſed, ſome forces were ordered into the north and into the weſt of England: the ſtates-general had notice to have two thouſand men ready to tranſport into England when occaſion required; and were, at the ſame time, deſired not to ſuffer the ſuſpicious embarkations of ammunition and men that were making at Amſterdam, which they agreed to, notwithſtanding the endeavours of the Spaniſh miniſters to the contrary. Above all, the naval armament againſt the Spaniſh ſquadron was haſtened; and, upon the repeated advices of the regent, the king came to the houſe of peers, and ſaid, that he had given orders to the lord-chancellor to declare to both houſes a matter of the greateſt importance. Upon this the lord-chancellor read the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'Having received from our good brother and ally, the moſt chriſtian king, repeated advices, that an invaſion will ſuddenly be attempted from Spain againſt my dominions, in favour of the pretender to my crown, I have judged it convenient to make you acquainted with it, and ſhall, on my part, take all the neceſſary meaſures to defeat the deſigns of our enemies.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'This attempt, if it proceed, muſt engage me in ſome farther expences by ſea and land than proviſion has been made for. I muſt therefore recommend it to you, that I be enabled in ſuch manner, as you ſhall judge convenient, to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions for our ſecurity; and you may depend upon it, that I ſhall upon this, and all other occaſions, have as much regard to the eaſe of my people, as ſhall be conſiſtent with their ſafety.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The many proofs, I have had of the affection and loyalty of this parliament, leave me no room to doubt of your ſteady and vigorous perſeverence in ſupport of my perſon and government upon this occaſion.'

This ſpeech had all the effect the king could expect or deſire. Both houſes aſſured him of their ſupport; and the commons deſired him to augment his forces by ſea and land, in ſuch manner as he ſhould think fit, promiſing to make good any increaſe of expence on that account. With theſe aſſurances of the parliament, the king had the ſatisfaction to ſee his allies exert their zeal in his defence. The States ſent over the two thouſand men; and the marquis de Prie, governor of the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſix battalions of imperialiſts. The duke of Orleans offered no leſs than twenty battalions, but it was not thought proper to accept his offer. Theſe precautions taken by the king were very juſt, but, as it happened, they proved needleſs. The Spaniſh fleet came with a fair wind as far as cape Finiſtere, when a violent ſtorm aroſe, which laſted two days and two nights. The fleet was entirely diſperſed, and diſabled from purſuing their courſe. The admiral's ſhip of ſixty-four guns, having loſt all her maſts, made for the coaſt of Spain, as did all the reſt in the beſt manner they could. By this ſtorm, the men and horſes were for the moſt part rendered unſerviceable.

Though the Spaniſh ſquadron miſcarried, the frigates arrived at Kintail in Scotland. Theſe frigates ſailed from Port-Paſſage the latter end of February, and came to Kintail the 16th of April, without having ſeen any of the Spaniſh fleet in their way. They brought with them the earls of Seaforth and Mariſchal, and the marquis of Tullibardine, with three hundred and ſeven Spaniards, being a detachment of twelve men in a company of Don Pedro de Caſtro's regiment of foot, commanded by a lieutenant-colonel with ſix captains, ſix lieutenants, and as many enſigns. They brought alſo arms for two thouſand men. The lieutenant-colonel was aſſured there were ten thouſand men in arms ready to join him, but, very few appearing, he kept the frigates two days, reſolving to go off again, but he was at laſt prevailed with to let them ſail. The two earls and the marquis, who had ventured themſelves with ſo ſmall a force, went with the Spaniards and joined the rebels. After this junction, they poſſeſſed themſelves of Donan-Caſtle, and put in it a garriſon of fifty men; but captain Boyle, in the Worceſter, and ſome other ſhips came before the place, and took the garriſon priſoners. In the mean time, general Wightman was ordered by the lord Carpenter, to march with the forces under his command in queſt of the rebels. He marched from Inverneſs the beginning of June, and, having halted one day at the head of Lochneſs, came up with them at a place called the paſs of Glenſhill, which they gave out they were reſolved to defend; but, upon the approach of the king's troops, they immediately deſerted it, and retired to another paſs called Strachell, where they were more advantageouſly poſted. The general, having viewed their ſituation, made the following diſpoſition for the attac: on the right were poſted all the grenadiers under the command of major Milbourn, being about a hundred and fifty in number, who were ſuſtained by Mountague's regiment, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Laurence, and a detachment of fifty men commanded by colonel Harriſon; the reſt of the regiment being in garriſon at Inverlochy. Theſe were ſupported by Haffel's Dutch regiment, and four companies out of Amerongon's. This wing had fifty-ſix of lord Strachnaver's men in the flank, under the command of enſign Mackey; and the whole wing was commanded by colonel Clayton, who acted as brigadier upon this occaſion. The left wing conſiſted of Clayton's regiment, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Reading, and had on the flank about fourſcore men of the Monroes, under the command of mr. Munroe of Calcairn. The dragoons, which were a hundred and twenty in number, commanded by major Robertſon, and had made their march from Inverneſs without the loſs of a ſingle horſe, or the leaſt inconvenience, were ordered to keep the road, having four cohorns placed in their front. The major-general himſelf was poſted in the centre, where every one had free acceſs to him for orders.

The rebels forces conſiſted of one thouſand ſix hundred and forty Highlanders, beſides three hundred Spaniards, and a body of five hundred Highlanders, who were poſted on a hill, in order to make themſelves maſters of the baggage of the king's troops, it being always one of their chief aims. From this diſpoſition it is evident, that the king's forces, actually engaged, did not exceed eight hundred and fifty men, beſides the one hundred and twenty dragoons, and one hundred and thirty-ſix Highlanders. The left wing was ordered to begin the attac; and the rebels always, as they had fired their muſkets, ſkipping off, and never venturing to come to a cloſe engagement, were driven from roc to roc, the king's forces chaſing them above three hours, till they gained the top of the hill, where the rebels were immediately diſperſed. The earl of Seaforth and lord George Murray were wounded. There were twenty-one men killed, and an hundred and twenty-one wounded, officers included, of the king's troops, who lay on their arms all night, in order to bring off the wounded; and marched the next morning to Glenſhill, where about two in the afternoon the Spaniards ſurrendered themſelves priſoners at diſcretion and deliverd up all their arms and ammunition. Their commander ſaid, the earl of Seaforth and all the reſt were ſhifting for themſelves, and believed, they would endeavour to get off as ſoon as poſſible at the ſea-port towns were they could hope to have friends to let them eſcape. General Wightman acquainted the lord Carpenter, that he had taken two hundred and ſeventy-four Spaniards priſoners, and was making a tour through the difficult part of Seaforth's country, to terrify the guilty, and preſerve the well affected, and that he had utterly diſperſed the rebels, the chiefs of whom Seaforth, Tullibardine, Mariſchal, and others, were gone off to the Lewis or Orkney iſlands. Thus ended Cardinal Alberoni's enterprize upon Great-Britain.[u]

When the king ſent the meſſage to both houſes about the Spaniſh invaſion, the lords were debating upon the famous peerage bill. This bill, by which the number of peers was to be limitted, is ſaid to have been chiefly intended to put a reſtraint on the prince of of Wales, when his ſucceſſion ſhould take place, from whom the preſent miniſtry could expect but little favour. Be this as it will, the whigs had exclaimed againſt the numerous promotion of the peers by queen Anne, particularly the creation of twelve peers at once, in order to gain a ſuperiority in the houſe of lords, and to prevent the like for the future, it was reſolved to bring in a bill, to fix the number of peers.[v] The perſon by whom this bill was moved for, was the duke of Somerſet, who, on the laſt day of February, repreſented in the houſe of lords, that the number of peers being of late years very much increaſed, eſpecially ſince the union of the two kingdoms, it ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary to fix the ſame, [u] A marriage was this year agreed upon for the pretender, with a daughter of prince Sobieſki, eldeſt ſon of John Sobieſki, king of Poland, who had gained ſo much honour by raiſing the ſiege of Vienna. But the court of Vienna thought fit to intereſt itſelf ſo much in preventing this intended marriage, that the princeſs was ſtopped in paſſing through Tirol into Italy, and carried into confinement at Inſpruck. Great application was made to the emperor for her releaſe; but he continued inflexible, and ſeemed the more to extend his authority in this affair, as the whole family of Sobieſki lay under great and uncommon obligations to him, on account of penſions and conſiderable allowances, which they received from him, in acknowledgment of the great ſervices of the late king of Poland to the empire. Prince James Sobieſki, father of this young princeſs, held his ſubſiſtance chiefly at the emperor's pleaſure. On this occaſion he went therefore to Vienna, to make his ſubmiſſion to the emperor, whom he underſtood to be highly diſpleaſed with him; but his imperial majeſty would be no ways reconciled to him, or agree to a continuance of his cuſtomary allowance upon any other terms, but his entirely breaking off the match.

Whilſt interceſſion was making for her liberty, the princeſs Sobieſki eſcaped from her confinement in the beginning of May, in man's cloaths, and, repairing to Bologna, was there married by proxy to the pretender, then in Spain. A few days after ſhe went to Rome, where ſhe was very kindly entertained by the pope and ſome of the cardinals. She ſeemed impatient to be conducted to her ſpouſe; but the hazard of the preſent conjuncture, and the uncertainty of his reſidence, till his projects were brought to ſome criſis, made the pope continue her under his care at Rome. No other opportunity of correſpondence could therefore be obtained but by letters; and, about the latter end of June, an account was brought to England of one Maſſy, who was ſent from Rome with diſpatches from her to the pretender and cardinal Alberoni; and, quicly after, earl Cadogan had notice of a perſon of the ſame name in Holland, with letters and papers of conſequence; whereupon, at his inſtances, Maſſy's lodgings were ſearched, and his perſon and papers ſecured.

[v] The ſame day this bill was brought in, there was printed and delivered to the lords, a liſt of the peers exiſting at the time of king James I's acceſſion to the crown, and of thoſe who have ſince been advanced to the peerage; both to preſerve the dignity of the peerage, and to prevent the inconveniences that may attend the creation of a great number of peers to ſerve a preſent purpoſe; of which they had a remarkable inſtance in the late reign. He therefore made a motion for bringing in a bill to ſettle and limit the peerage in ſuch a manner, that the number of Engliſh peers ſhould not be enlarged beyond ſix above the preſent number, which, upon failure of male iſſue might be ſupplied by new creations; and that, inſtead of ſixteen elective peers, twenty-five ſhould be made hereditary on the part of Scotland, whoſe number upon failure of heirs male ſhould be ſupplied by ſome other Scots peers. The duke of Argyle (who was now lord-ſteward of the houſhold) ſeconded this motion, which was alſo ſupported by the earls of Sunderland and Carliſle, before they came to any reſolution; and thereupon his lordſhip, the earl of Oxford, excepted againſt it, and ſaid, 'as it tended to take away the brighteſt gem from the crown, it was matter of wonder to ſee it ſupported by thoſe, who, by the great employments they enjoyed, ſeemed under the ſtricteſt obligation to take care of the royal prerogative. That therefore there muſt be a ſecret meaning in this motion; but for his own part, though he expected nothing from the crown, yet he would never give his vote for lopping off ſo valuable a branch of the prerogative, becauſe this would put it out of the power of the crown to reward merit and virtuous actions.' To this the earl of Sunderland anſwered, 'that though the number of peers were limited, yet the crown ſhould ſtill be the fountain of honour, and preſerve its prerogative of creating new peers upon the extinction of old titles for want of male iſſue, which happened frequently; and that thoſe extinctions would give the prince on the throne ſufficient opportunities to beſtow honours upon commoners of diſtinguiſhed merit and abilities.' The debate being adjourned to the 2d of March, upon that day, earl Stanhope delivered to a full houſe the following meſſage from the king:

George R.

'His majeſty being informed, that the houſe of peers have under conſideration the ſtate of the peerage of Great-Britain, is graciouſly pleaſed to acquaint this houſe, that he has ſo much at heart the ſettling the peerage of the whole kingdom upon ſuch a foundation, as may ſecure the freedom and conſtitution of parliaments in all future ages, that he is willing, that his prerogative ſtand not in the way of ſo great and neceſſary a work.'

A motion being made for an addreſs of thanks for this meſſage, the earl of Nottingham excepted againſt it, ſaying, 'it was unuſual for the king to take notice of any thing depending in parliament, before the ſame was laid before him in a parliamentary way.' But the duke of Bucks over-ruled this objection, and ſaid, 'it could not be ſuppoſed, that the king alone ſhould be ignorant of what every body elſe knew; and that, ſince his majeſty pleaſed, for the good of his ſubjects, to ſuffer his prerogative to be reſtrained, they ought readily to accept, and thankfully acknowledge, ſo great and ſo gracious a condeſcenſion.' Upon this the addreſs was agreed to, and the debate was put off to the next day; when the earl of Sunderland, in a long ſpeech, ran over the ſeveral changes, that had happened in the peerage, ſince the reign of queen Elizabeth to this time; urged the neceſſity of limiting the number of peers; and propoſed the duke of Somerſet's ſcheme, with relation both to the Engliſh and Scotch peers. Earl Cowper in anſwer to this ſpeech endeavoured to ſhew, 'that what was intended to be done, with relation to the Scots peerage, was a manifeſt violation of the treaty of union, and the higheſt piece of injuſtice; for it was no leſs than to deprive perſons of their right without being heard, and without any pretence of forfeiture on their part; urging, that the Scots peers, who ſhould be excluded from the number of twenty-five hereditary, would be in a worſe condition than any other ſubjects, ſince they would be neither electing nor elected, nor repreſenting nor repreſented, which could not fail of raiſing dangerous diſcontents amongſt them. That beſides it would be a breach of truſt in thoſe, who repreſented the Scots peerage, wholly to diveſt their principles of a power, with which they had intruſted them only for a few years: and therefore he was of opinion, that the Scots peers ought to have been conſulted, before any ſteps were made in ſo nice and ſo important an affair.' Theſe objections were anſwered by the earls of Sunderland, Stanhope, and Cadogan, the dukes of Bucks and Newcaſtle, the biſhop of Gloceſter and ſome other Engliſh lords, who were ſupported by ſeveral Scots peers, particularly the dukes of Roxburgh and Montroſe, the marquis of Annandale, and the earl of Ilay. In the firſt place, it was alledged, 'that the ſettling the peerage, in the manner propoſed, was rather a benefit than a diſadvantage to the Scots peerage, whoſe repreſentatives were threby increaſed by nine, and all made hereditary: and as for thoſe peers, who, for the preſent, would be excluded, they would afterwards have a chance to come in upon failure of any of the twenty-five: that this regulation could not be looked upon as a violation of the union, two things only being made unalterable fundaments of that contract, religion, and the proportion of public taxes: that the conſulting of the Scots peers in this affair, would be altogether improper and unparliamentary, and attended with great inconvenience. The earl of Ilay in particular repreſented, 'that the bringing in a number of peers into that houſe, by election, was certainly derogatory to the dignity of that auguſt aſſembly, and of the higheſt tribunal in the united kingdoms: and therefore he had long before wiſhed to ſee this defect in the union rectified, and the Scots peers freed from that ignominious mark of diſtinction, which made them be looked upon as dependant on the court and miniſtry, and not at liberty to vote like the other members, for the good and intereſt of their country.' The earl of Nottingham, the lord Townſhend, and ſome other peers, declared, 'that they were not againſt the ſettling and limiting the peerage, but only againſt the doing it in ſuch a manner, as, in their opinion, was unjuſt, and might be attended with dangerous conſequences.' But, after a long debate, reſolutions agreeable to the duke of Somerſet's motion was agreed to, and the judges were ordered to prepare and bring in the bill.[w]

[w] The reſolutions about the Scots peers were theſe ſix:

I. That, in lieu of the ſixteen elective peers to ſit in this houſe on the part of Scotland, twenty-five peers to be declared by his majeſty, ſhall have hereditary ſeats in parliament, and be the peers on the part of the peerage of Scotland.

II. That ſuch twenty-five peers ſhall be declared by his majeſty, before the next ſeſſion of parliament.

III. That nine of the ſaid twenty-five ſhall be appointed by his majeſty to have immediate right to ſuch hereditary ſeats in parliament, ſubject to the qualifications requiſite by the laws now in being.

IV. That none of the remaining ſixteen, ſo to be declared by his majeſty, or their heirs, ſhall become ſitting peers of the parliament of Great-Britain, till after the determination of this preſent parliament, except ſuch as are of the number of the ſixteen peers now ſitting in parliament on the part of Scotland and their heirs.

V. That if any of the twenty-five peers, ſo to be declared by his majeſty, and their heirs, ſhall fail, ſome one or other of the peers of Scotland ſhall be appointed by his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, to ſucceed every ſuch peer ſo failing, and every peer ſo appointed ſhall be one of the peers on the part of the peerage of Scotland, in the parliament of Great-Britain, and ſo, toties quoties, as often as any ſuch failure ſhall happen.

VI. That the hereditary right of ſitting in parliament, which ſhall accrue to the twenty-five peers of Scotland, to be declared by his majeſty, ſhall be ſo limited, as not to deſcend to females.

The reſolutions concerning the Engliſh peers (which were agreed to the next day) were theſe five:

I. That the number of peers of Great-Britain, on the part of England, ſhall be enlarged, without precedent right, beyond ſix above what they are at preſent: but, as any of the ſaid preſent peers, or ſuch new peers, in caſe they be created, ſhall fail, their number may be ſupplied by new creations of only the generality of the Scots peers, but alſo many of the Engliſh commoners, a pamphlet, ſaid to be written by mr. Benſon, called the Plebian, was publiſhed againſt the bill, which was anſwered by mr. Addiſon, in his paper called the Old Whig. In theſe papers, the chief arguments, on both ſides of that important queſtion, are largely and fully diſplayed.[x]

1719] Whilſt the public was in expectation of the iſſue of this affair, a ſudden ſtop was put to all farther proceedings. Earl Stanhope, when the bill came to be read the third time, made a ſpeech, wherein he obſerved, 'that this bill had made a great noiſe, and raiſed ſtrange apprehenſions: and ſince the deſign of it had been ſo miſrepreſented, and ſo miſunderſtood, that it was like to meet with great oppoſition in the other houſe, he thought it adviſable to let the matter lie ſtill till a more proper opportunity.' Upon this, the third reading was put off a fortnight, by which means the bill was dropped for this ſeſſion: for the king, four days after, came to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech, which the lord-chancellor read to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am now come to put an end to this ſeſſion, in which you have ſhewn many great and ſeaſonable proofs of your duty and affection to my perſon and government, and of your care and ſafety and welfare of your fellow-ſubjects.

By the bleſſing of God on our endeavours, we have hitherto diſappointed the ill deſigns of our enemies, who flattered themſelves with ſucceſs from our unhappy diviſions.

We perceive by the raſh and wicked counſels which have lately prevailed in the court of Spain, that the deſperate and extravagant projects of one ambitious man, though not capable of giving fears to their neighbours, may occaſion to them ſome expence and trouble.

That court being influenced by counſels odious and deſtructive to the Spaniards, who find themſelves neglected and oppreſſed, after having endeavoured to fomet conſpiracies and ſeditions both here and in France, and ſtooped to practices unuſual, accompanied by manifeſtoes of a ſtile unheard of among great princes, has at laſt proceeded to acknowledge the pretender.

As this news has given great ſurprize to all Europe, I queſtion not, but it will be received by every good Briton with indignation and contempt.

It is our happineſs, at this juncture, to find ourſelves aſſiſted by the greateſt powers in Europe againſt an enemy, that has no allies, but thoſe, who would betray the government, under which they live, and are protected.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I thank you very heartily for the ſupplies you have granted me this year. The manner, in which you have raiſed them, without any new burden to my people, the great addition you have made to the fund for ſinking the debts of the nation, the diſcharge of the exchequer bills, and the proviſions you have made to pay whatever remains juſtly due to foreign ſtates and princes, are the ſtrongeſt proofs of your wiſdom, as well as of your zeal for my ſervice, and the good of your country. You may obſerve, I have hitherto been very cautious of making uſe of the power you have given me, to increaſe our forces by ſea and land. If our enemies ſhould oblige me to a greater expence, it ſhall be employed for your ſervice. This is what the truſt you repoſed in me requires at my hands, and what I owe to ſo dutiful and affectionate houſe of commons.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'There being nothing more deſirable, at all times, than a firm union between proteſtants, I reflect with ſatisfaction upon the law you have paſſed this ſeſſion, which will, I hope, prove effectual to that purpoſe. As it is a ſignal inſtance of moderation and indulgence in our eſtabliſhed church, ſo I hope it will beget ſuch a return of gratitude from all diſſenting proteſtants, as will greatly tend to her honour and ſecurity, both which I ſhall ever have near at heart.

I have always looked upon the glory of a ſovereign, and the liberty of a ſubject, as inſeparable; and think it is the peculiar happineſs of a Britiſh king, to reign over a free people. As the civil rights, therefore, and privileges of all my ſubjects, and eſpecially of my two houſes of parliament, do juſtly claim my moſt tender concern: if any proviſion deſigned to perpetuate theſe bleſſings to your poſterity remains imperfect, for want of time, during this ſeſſion, maturely to diſcuſs and ſettle matters of ſo great importance, I promiſe myſelf, you will take the firſt opportunity to render my wiſhes for your happineſs compleat and effectual, and to ſtrengthen the union, which is of ſo much conſequence to the welfare of this kingdom.

'If the circumſtances of my affairs ſhall allow of my going abroad this ſummer, I ſhall take the ſame care of your intereſts, as if I remained here. The many negotiations, which will be on foot, to reſtore the peace of the north, in which the trade and tranquility of this kingdom may be very much concerned, will make my preſence there of great uſe to theſe my dominions. And, as in that caſe I deſign, by the bleſſing of God, to meet you early next winter, I will only recommend to you moſt earneſtly, that, laying aſide all animoſities, you would, in your reſpective counties and ſtations, uſe your utmoſt endeavours to preſerve the public peace, and ſee a due execution of the laws.'

After this ſpeech the parliament was prorogued to the 19th of May; and afterwards, by ſeveral prorogations, to the 23d of November.[y]

Soon after the prorogation, the king declared his intention of going to Hanover, and appointed for lord juſtices, in his abſence, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord-chancellor Parker, the dukes of Kingſton, Argyle (now alſo Greenwich) Newcaſtle, Bolton, Marlborough, and Roxburgh; the earls Sunderland, Berkley, and Stanhope, and ſecretary Craggs. The prince and princeſs of Wales, not being appointed regents, retired into the country, and appeared no more till the king's departure, a few days after which they came to St. James's to ſee the young princeſs, who kept a levee twice a week: and to them it was, that the lords juſtices, and a numerous appearance of foreign miniſters, nobility, and gentry, made their compliments on the king's birth-day, who was entered into the ſixtieth year of his age.

As the king thought his preſence in Germany neceſſary to forward the many negotiations that were on foot, he ſet out the 11th of May, and, after a ſhort paſſage of ſeventeen hours, arrived in Holland. With the king embarked earl Stanhope, the dutcheſs of Munſter (now dutcheſs of Kendal) and the lord and lady How, with ſome others. The king ſtaid two days at Oſnabrug, and came to Herenhauſen, the 18th of May.

The death of the king of Sweden having removed the chief obſtacle to the peace of the north the king turned his thoughts firſt that way. The new queen, who had ſucceeded her brother Charles XII, as well as the whole nation, were deſirous of peace; drained of men and money, they were unable to make war: almoſt the whole army, led by the late king to the fatal expedition of Norway, miſerably periſhed. But it was not ſufficient to give peace to Sweden, it was neceſſary alſo to diſarm her other enemies, and bound their pretenſions. Theſe enemies were the czar, and the kings of Denmark, Pruſſia, and Poland. King George, diſpleaſed with the czar, whom he ſuſpected of having entered into all the projects which had been formed againſt him, reſolved to keep no meaſures with him. He began with a ſincere reconciliation with Sweden, then commoners, natural born ſubjects of this kingdom, and ſo, toties quoties, as often as ſuch failure ſhall happen.

II. That no perſon be at any time hereafter created a peer by writ, nor any peerage granted by patent for any longer eſtate than for the grantee, and the heirs male of his body.

III. That there be not any reſtraint on the crown to create any of the princes of the blood peers of Great-Britain, with right to ſit in parliament.

IV. That, whenever any of the lords now ſitting in parliament, whoſe ſons have been called by writ, ſhall die, then it ſhall be lawful for his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, to create a peer to ſupply the number ſo leſſened.

V. That every creation of a peer hereafter to be made contrary to theſe reſolutions ſhall be null and void to all intents and purpoſes.

[x] The Plebeian has the following expreſſions: 'the greateſt traitor to civil ſociety, that ever yet appeared, will be the man, if ſuch a one can be found, who ſhall contend for ſuch a bill, ſhould it be propoſed among the commons, with the aſſurance in his pocket of being a peer, as ſoon as the bill paſſes. And ſhould he ſucceed, which God forbid, that honour, which is to be the reward of ſo baſe a treachery, will be a laſting mark of infamy to the family that bears it, whilſt any notion of honour remains among mankind.'

Mr Benſon was ſoon after removed from his poſt of ſurveyor-general of his majeſty's works, and was ſucceeded by ſir Thomas Hewet.

[y] An act paſſed after the reſtoration, obliging all mayors and aldermen, &c. at their admiſſion into offices, to ſign a declaration againſt the ſolemn league and covenant, on a conſiderable penalty. As this act was ſtill in force and all the magiſtrates liable to the penalty of it, becauſe the declaration had been univerſally neglected, on a petition of the lord mayor and aldermen of London, an act paſſed this ſeſſion to repeal it, under the title of 'an act for quieting and eſtabliſhing corporations.'

The truſtees of the forfeited eſtates delivered in an account of the value of the eſtates of papiſts, which had, in purſuance of an act, for that purpoſe, been regiſtered in the ſeveral counties of England, amounting to 375,284l. 15s. 3½d.

endeavoured to ſoften the king of Denmark, and induce the two others to proceed with great moderation, to acknowledge him for mediator, and join with him, if neceſſary, to compel the czar to accept of equitable conditions.

The duke of Orleans, in concert with king George, had offered his midiation to Sweden for a reconciliation with that prince. The offer was accepted, and, in July, a proviſional treaty was ſigned, by which a peace was to be concluded as ſoon as poſſible, agreeable to the plan, and terms agreed upon with the mediator. This was punctually performed, and in November, the ſieur de Baſſewitz, miniſter of his Britannic majeſty, as duke and elector of Brunſwick, ſigned the peace with the plenipotentiaries of queen Ulrica.

By this treaty Sweden gave up for ever, to the royal and electoral houſe of Hanover, the duchies of Bremen and Verden, with all their rights and dependencies, according to the treaty of Oſnabrug, of the 23d of October, 1648, by virtue of which the kings of Sweden had enjoyed them. On the other hand, the elector of Hanover engaged to continue to his new ſubjects their rights, privileges, effects, and religion; and to diſcharge the engagements of his predeceſſors in thoſe duchies. Moreover, he obliged himſelf to pay to the queen of Sweden a million of rix-dollars at two payments; the firſt before the ſigning of the treaty; the ſecond, five or ſix weeks after the exchange of the ratifications. He engaged likewiſe to renew, both as king of Great-Britain, and elector of Hanover, the alliances formerly eſtabliſhed with his predeceſſors and the kingdom of Sweden. Laſtly, the treaty of Weſtphalia was renewed with a reſervation of demanding and accepting the guarantee of the emperor, and, according to circumſtances, of ſome other powers.

At the ſame time the lord Carteret, embaſſador plenipotentiary from Great-Britain to the court of Sweden, was employed to negotiate the confirmation of this treaty of peace, by an alliance between the two crowns, ſtill under the mediation and guarantee of France. But this alliance was not concluded till the next year, as will be related.

Theſe negotiations with the queen of Sweden were not the moſt difficult; ſhe readily agreed to a peace, and conſidered it as the ground of her ſafety, and the end of her miſeries. But it was not the ſame either with the king of Denmark or the czar, who looked upon theſe negotiations as the ruin of their ſchemes, and an obſtable to their conqueſts. As for king Auguſtus, he entered entirely into the views of the king of Great-Britain, and was contented with being acknowledged king of Poland; he did not even require, that the intereſts of his competitor ſhould be abandoned, and conſented, that, in the proviſional treaty, the queen of Sweden ſhould reſerve to herſelf the liberty of demanding for him what ſhe ſhould think proper.

The king of Pruſſia was a little more difficult; but he complied at laſt, and, accepting the mediation of Great-Britain, granted a ſuſpenſion of arms till the concluſion of the peace.

The king of Denmark had made great preparations for an expedition againſt Sweden, which he was to execute in perſon: he had already had ſome ſucceſs, but of a ſudden he deſiſted, and, conſenting to a ſuſpenſion of arms for ſix months, accepted of the mediation of France and Great-Britain, and, after numberleſs diſputes, gave way to the inſtances of the mediators, and accepted of a ſum of money by way of ſatisfaction for the conqueſts, which he was obliged to reſtore. The czar was the only prince who would not comply, but ſent his fleet to the Scheuron or Batſes of Sweden, where twelve or fifteen thouſand Muſcovites landed, and made a dreadful ravage. The Engliſh fleet, which, under ſir John Norris, was in thoſe ſeas to ſupport the negotiations, had orders to treat the Ruſſian fleet, as admiral Byng had done that of Spain; but the czar recalled his fleet, and prevented the blow. Thus ſtood affairs in the north; it was time now to ſee what was done in the Mediterranean this ſummer.

Whilſt admiral Byng and the viceroy of Naples were waiting for the return of count Hamilton, whom they had agreed to ſend to Vienna, to repreſent the poſture of affairs and bring bac the final reſolutions of that court concerning the operations of the war, the admiral ſailed to Port-Mahon to refit his ſquadron. [z]

Signior Patinho had hitherto reſided in Meſſina, directing the affairs of the iſland for the intereſt of his maſter with great prudence; but, his preſence being wanted at the court of Spain, he embarked on board a felucca, on the 16th of January in the night, and put to ſea, attended by two gallies. If the darkneſs had continued an hour longer, he would have undoubtedly fallen into the mouths of two of the Engliſh cruizers, which chaſed his gallies into a bay near Palermo; but the felucca eſcaped, and landed him in Italy, from whence he proceeded to Madrid, and, by his councils and induſtry, all methods were uſed for ſupporting their army in Sicily with recruits of men, and all neceſſaries of war. The Venetians and Genoeſe, and even the French conſuls in the ports of Italy, notwithſtanding the ſevere prohibitions of the regent, were corrupted to give them all the aſſiſtance poſſible; and, though many veſſels were taken many eſcaped. As to the French, admiral Byng found himſelf under a difficulty how to treat the ſhips of a nation, that was in ſtrict alliance with England. He made loud complaints of their partiality, till at laſt the regent gave him leave to confiſcate all thoſe he met with in the ſervice of Spain, which put ſome ſtop to their clandeſtine proceedings. [a]

Admiral Byng, having refitted moſt of his ſquadron at Port-Mahon, haſtened away from thence with four men of war, the 30th of March, leaving the reſt to follow him, and arrived the 4th of April at Naples, where he hoped to find the army from Hungary arrived, and in a readineſs to embark; but, contrary to his expectations, he ſaw every thing in extreme backwardneſs, partly for want of money.

On the 23d of April, count de Mercy arrived at Naples from Vienna, to take upon him the command of the whole army. He was a native of Lorrain, but brought up in the emperor's ſervice, where he had riſen to the rank of general of the horſe. He was of a tall graceful preſence, with a very ſoldier-like appearance, but had the misfortune of being ſhort-ſighted, almoſt to purblindneſs. He had great ſtrength of body and mind, and was indefatigable in the uſe of both, when neceſſary. He was full of fire, and his con-

[z] Captain Matthews being left with a ſquadron at Pentemelia, to obſerve rear-admiral Cammock, and hinder his eſcaping out of Meſſina to the ſouthward, had the good fortune to run one of them a-ſhore, a ſhip of ſixty-four guns, called the S[ta] Roſelia; and another called the St. Pedro of ſixty guns was caſt away in Tarento-bay. Cammock himſelf, endeavouring to get away to Spain in a ſmall frigate of twenty-two guns, was chaſed the 6th of February by a ſhip of captain Matthews's ſquadron, and eſcaped with much difficulty in his boat to Catania, but the frigate was taken, with all his effects and papers, amongſt which was a commiſſion from the pretender, appointing him admiral of the white ſquadron.

This unhappy man was a native of Ireland, and, being bred up at ſea, had raiſed himſelf to the poſt of a captain, and ſerved in queen Anne's war, with no bad character. But aſſociating himſelf with thoſe who were enemies to the houſe of Hanover, and becoming obnoxious to the government, on the acceſſion of that family to the crown, he abandoned his country, and entered into the ſervice of Spain, where he was promoted to the rank of a rear-admiral, and ſerved in that poſt in the expedition againſt Sicily. He had never been noted to want courage, but, in the action of Paſſaro, he ran away among the firſt, and eſcaped to Malta, affording an inſtance, how much a conſciouſneſs of guilt and dread of puniſhment depreſſes the heart, more than the fear of an enemy. He was a vain boaſting man, with a roving unſettled head, filled with airy ſchemes and projects, without any judgement or diſcretion. He aſſured ſignor Patinho, that he could put moſt of the Engliſh fleet into his hands, in recompence for that which he had loſt; and, in that ſenſeleſs confidence, wrote a letter to the admiral, to let him know, that he had the pretender's commands to aſſure him, if he would bring over the greateſt part of his fleet to Meſſina, or to any port in Spain, he would create him duke of Albemarle, with a royal bounty of one hundred thouſand pounds to ſupport the honour and dignity of that rank; and that every captain ſhould have ten thouſand pounds, and the ſeamen a gratuity of two months wages. That ſignor Patinho would ſatisfy him of the king of Spain's ecurity for the performance of this agreement, and that no body elſe but the dukes of Ormond and Mar were in the ſecret. Whether he wrote by direction or not, does not appear, but the letter met with the contempt it deſerved. He likewiſe ſent another letter to captain Walton, with the promiſe of a reward of ten thouſand pounds, a commiſſion of admiral of the blue, and to be made an Engliſh peer, if he would bring his ſhips into Meſſina, which the honeſt captain brought to the admiral, with vehement expreſſions of abhorrence and indignation.

[a] Mr Corbet mentions here an inſtance or two of the unfair practice of other nations at this time upon the Engliſh trade, and which, it is apprehended, will always be the caſe, whenever England is engaged in foreign wars. The admiral having intelligence from Genoa, that a privateer of twenty-four guns had been fitted out by French merchants of that place, and was cruizing with a Spaniſh commiſſion off of cape Corſo, and having no ſmall frigates with him, he converted the Loo hoſpital ſhip into a frigate, and, putting twenty guns and one hundred men into her, ſent her, under the command of captain Prothero, in queſt of the ſaid privateer. The captain fortunately met with her off the iſland of Capraia, and after a ſmart engagement took her. She had one hundred and thirty men, moſt French, of whom fifty-ſix were killed, and nineteen wounded, with the loſs only of two men in the Loo, and four wounded. The admiral directed the priſoners to be ſent to Thoulon, and delivered into the cuſtody of the intendant; and he wrote to the Engliſh embaſſador at Paris to repreſent thoſe proceedings to the regent, to whoſe juſtice he left the priſoners. Another ſhip was fitted out at Venice, with fifty guns, and two hundred and fifty men, all Venetians, except three Spaniards, and eight Engliſh; and having taken a Spaniſh commiſſion at Malta, which ſignor Patinho had lodged there for her, ſhe went a cruizing on the coaſt of Spain. The admiral, being informed of it, ſent the Orford and Rupert after her, the latter of which, meeting with her off of Peniſcola, engaged and took her by boarding, having killed ſixty-one men, and wounded twenty-nine, with the loſs only of one man killed and three wounded.

verſation abounded with wit and humour. He had great ſkill in courting and careſſing perſons, when he wanted to gain any point, but, at other times, his behaviour diſcovered much haughtineſs. He had an inſatiable thirſt for glory, which was ſeconded by a bold and moſt reſolute temper, always headed his troops himſelf, and ſeemed to have a ſort of paſſion for fighting. He was ſeldom in any action but he was wounded, and was not eſteemed a fortunate officer. He deſpiſed an enemy too much, was impatient for engaging, and had the character of not caring what men he ſacrificed to obtain his purpoſe, when a few days pacience might perhaps have ſucceeded as well without it; which opinion made the ſoldiers uneaſy under him, as they were in continual apprehenſions of being led to the ſlaughter. Upon the whole, as he had great parts, and great experience of ſervice, he muſt have been made a great general (as he was a complete fine gentleman) if he had had a cooler temper, or could have commanded it better. But with all his faults he was certainly in the ſuperior rank of men, of which there needs no better proof, than that he was a favourite of prince Eugene. He was now going to encounter an old ſchool-fellow in the marquis de Lede, who was a Fleming by birth, and a good general under a quite oppoſite character, being as different from the other in perſon, as he was in temper. He was of a low miſhapen ſtature, not affable nor open in his diſpoſition, but much eſteemed for his judgment and prudence, and was of great military experience too. He was as cautious and circumſpect, as the other was bold and enterprizing; and, in this reſpect, both ſeemed to be in their proper employment, the one in a ſituation of defence, and the other of attac. It was thought, that in the courſe of this war, he ſlipped ſome opportunities, which the overſight, or wants of the Germans, gave him of acting upon them to advantage; but, he conſidered, that he was in a country, where he was ſhut up from receiving any conſiderable ſupplies of men, while the enemy poured in what numbers they pleaſed, and that any large diminution of his troops might endanger the whole, and therefore made it a principal point to preſerve his army as much as poſſible, and with the advantage of the paſſes, and the affection of the country people, to diſtreſs and diſable his adverſary, which he effected with much ſkill and wiſdom, and maintained the honour of the arms of Spain with great reputation; and at laſt, when the king his maſter was forced by the weight of the alliances againſt him, to relinquiſh the iſland, he brought a gallant army bac into Spain. [b]

Whilſt the troops were arriving, and the veſſels to tranſport them getting ready, admiral Byng aſſiſted at ſeveral conferences with the viceroy of Naples and general Mercy, about the intended decent on Sicily. All agreed, that Syracuſa was out of the way, but it was not ſo eaſy to determine, whether it would be beſt to land at Palermo, or near Melazzo. Palermo was judged ſafeſt, and would not only make them maſters of the capital city, but alſo of the fertile province of Mazzara, from whence they might eaſily draw proviſions and neceſſaries for the ſubſiſtance of the army. But Melazzo was moſt expeditious, as it would preſs the enemy cloſer, and bring matters more quicly to a deciſion; and this opinion prevailed. But, when they came to examine into the ſtate of their military ſtores, they were ſo deficient in a train of artillery, that the admiral yielded to ſupply them with cannon, powder, and ball from the Spaniſh prizes, rather than ſuffer time to be loſt for want thereof.

All things being at length got ready, the army embarked, conſiſting of ten thouſand foot, and three thouſand five hundred horſe, all choice troops, and the flower of thoſe that had lately ſerved victoriouſly in Hungary. The admiral ſailed from the bay of Baiæ, the 22d of May, N.S. with eight men of war, and above two hundred tranſports; and, on the 27th in the evening, arrived before Melazzo, from whence general Zumjungen came off, and adviſed count de Mercy to land in the bay of Patti, about twenty miles weſtward, the coaſt to the eaſtward being all guarded by the enemy. Upon this, ſo good a diſpoſition and order was made, that, the next morning early, all the foot landed in leſs than two hours, and moſt of the cavalry by three in the afternoon, having loſt only two horſes in the voyage.

Upon the landing of the imperialiſts, the marquis de Lede decamped with precipitation, and marched, without halting, to Franca Villa, a ſtrong poſt, thirty-two miles diſtant, in a mountainous country, and from whence three roads led to Palermo, Meſſina, and Syracuſa. Count de Mercy arrived, by eaſy marches, at Melazzo, and found in the Spaniſh camp ſome cannon, with ammunition and utenſils of war, which the haſte of the Spaniards had left behind.

Whilſt matters were preparing here for the further operations of the army, count Seckendorf was detached with a body of two thouſand five hundred foot, and one hundred and fifty horſe, to reduce the iſlands of Lipari to the emperor's obedience, which he effected, after ſome reſiſtance, in four days time. This conqueſt was abſolutely neceſſary to keep open the navigation between Naples and Sicily, which had been diſturbed by the armed veſſels of thoſe iſlands. Lipari, the principal iſland, is ſaid to contain eight thouſand inhabitants, a bold people, addicted to pillage, and the beſt mariners in thoſe parts.

It was now under deliberation, whether the army ſhould go and beſiege Meſſina, or follow the Spaniards, who were ſtrongly intrenching themſelves at Franca Villa. Meſſina had a numerous garriſon, and was well provided for a long ſiege, which might waſte away the ſummer, whilſt the Spaniards got in the corn, now near ripe, and kept the magazines of the iſland in their poſſeſſion. It was therefore determined to march towards the enemy, and endeavour to bring them to battle. The haſty retreat they had made from Melazzo animated count de Mercy ſo much, that he did not imagine they would make any great ſtand at Franca Villa, but that he ſhould trample them under foot (which was his expreſſion) when he came up with them. The way to the enemy lay through a barren mountainous country, and it took up ſo much time to get together a few mules and horſes for carriage from Calabria, that the army did not move from Melazzo till the 17th of June, N. S. amounting to about twenty-one thouſand men. They ſuffered a moſt painful march of three days, through wild unknown roads, broken up, and rendered almoſt unpaſſable by the enemy, conducted by ignorant guides, and climbing over cragged rocs and precipices, the ſoldiers oppreſſed with the weight of their ammunition, and ſix days bread, which they carried, beſides their arms, with a fiery ſun burning over their heads, and harraſſed and aſſaulted all along the heights and eminences by the armed peaſants of the country, mixed with ſome Spaniſh foot; but arriving, the 19th in the afternoon, on the top of the mountain of Tre Fontane, they diſcovered the enemy incamped below, in the valley of Franca Villa. At the ſight of their camp, a ſhout of joy ran through the whole army, in hopes of coming to a deciſive action, which ſeemed to promiſe favourably to them, it not being imagined, that the enemy could poſt themſelves in a bottom, with ſo much advantage againſt an army deſcending from higher ground upon them.

The ſituation of the Spaniſh camp was in this manner. The rapid river Cantara, whoſe banks are of a ſteep quic roc, from ſix to eight feet perpendicularly deep, and runs through the valley of Franca Villa, was in their front. Their left was on the riſing grounds about Franca Villa (the town lying behind in their center) and extended to a high mountain, where they had placed ſome armed peaſants, and a few foot. On the other ſide of the river (but joined by a bridge to the town of Franca Villa) was a ſteep roc, with a convent of Capuchins upon it. Here they placed five battalions of their beſt troops, in as many rows of intrenchments cut into the roc, one above the other; and at the point of the roc was a ſmall battery of two pieces of cannon of three pounders. On their right they had carried on a fortification of large ſtones, like a wall, all along the river, as far as a high rocky hill, which had a convent on the top, as advantageouſly fortified, as that of the Capuchins; and, cloſe behind the hill, the ſteep river Caſtiglione runs into the Cantara, by means of whoſe confluence, and the neighbouring mountains being guarded by armed peaſants, the Spaniards were ſecure from any danger in their rear. It was unfortunate to the Germans, that not one deſerter, nor even a peaſant of the country (who were all up in arms in favour of the Spaniards) came over to give them the leaſt information, ſo that they knew little of the ſtrength and advantage of the enemies poſt, till they came to action, and were within muſket-ſhot of their trenches.

[b] The city of Naples was at this time full of general officers, and perſons of high quality and diſtinction, and abonded in all the pleaſures of that delightful climate. The viceroy was ſtudious of making the place agreeable to the admiral, as much out of affection, as politeneſs. On the feſtival day of St. Januarius, he appointed him a box near his own, to behold that famous ceremony. The blood continued long without liquifying, at the approach of the head of the ſaint. The vaſt concourſe of people began to ſhew ſigns of concern: they fell firſt to praying, afterwards proceeded to groans and lamentations; and at length, ſuch a confuſed murmuring and uneaſineſs was perceived among them, that the viceroy, being apprehenſive of ſome ill conſequences, ſent count Hamilton to the admiral, to beg he would not take it ill, if he deſired him to retire, not knowing what effect it might have upon the populace, if they ſhould take it into their heads to attribute the failing of the miracle to the ſaint's being diſpleaſed at his preſence. The admiral had no ſooner quitted his box, and was ſtepping into the viceroy's coach, but he heard a prodigious ſhout of, é fatto, é fatto! it is done, it is done! and ſuch joy and exultation appeared in every countenance, as if they had been delivered from ſome terrible calamity.

Count de Mercy made a diſpoſition for attacing the enemy that evening at three different places. He detached all the firſt line of foot, conſiſting of ſixteen battalions and twenty-three companies of grenadiers, with three hundred Huſſars, under the command of general Zumjungen, to an adjoining hill on the left. He had under him the lieutenant-generals Wallis, Wachtendonck, and the prince of Holſtein. Upon that hill general Zumjungen was to ſeparate his men in two bodies, the one under the command of Wallis, conſiſting of eight battalions and eleven companies of grenadiers, being to deſcend on the right, whilſt Zumjungen did the ſame on the left with eight battalions, twelve companies of grenadiers, and the Huſſars. All the horſe and ſecond line of foot, this conſiſting of twelve battalions under lieutenant-general Seckendorf, and the horſe under lieutenant-general count de Eck, conſiſting of thirty-five ſquadrons, including three companies of horſe-grenadiers, and as many carabiniers, were at the ſame time to deſcend from the mountain of Tre Fontane, and join the other bodies below. Before all this could be effected, night came on, which obliged them to put off the attac till the next morning; and at break of day the ſecond line of foot being got down, and meeting with ten or twelve ſquadrons of the enemy in the valley, they obliged them, as they advanced, to retire towards their intrenchments. When the army was got down to the places appointed in the valley, count de Mercy perceiving, that the enemy poſſeſſed ſeveral conſiderable poſts on a hill to his right, from whence they would flank him in his attac, he ordered lieutenant-general Seckendorf, and the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, with ſix battalions, to endeavour to diſlodge them from thence, and then to deſcend and rejoin the army in the general attac, which the generals Zumjungen and Wallis were ordered to defer till they ſaw Seckendorf engaged, and deſcending towards them. The hill being very ſteep and difficult, and the enemy being very advantageouſly poſted, Seckendorf was obliged to make many windings, which took up much time to get up to them. In the mean while the enemy, ſeeing that detachment, ſent more foot thither, which made count de Mercy ſtrengthen him with four battalions more; ſo that it was four in the afternoon before they all arrived on the top of the mountain. Seckendorf, having his ten battalions together, drove the enemy down from thence to their intrenchments; and, if night had not came on too ſoon, it was thought he would have been able to have forced his way into their lines, which at that place were weakeſt, and moſt eaſy to be penetrated. At the ſame time four companies of grenadiers of Wallis's body attaced a poſt of the enemy on the bac of the ſame hill, and drove them thence, whilſt the reſt of the grenadiers (being ſeven companies) ſuſtained by the battalions of the ſame body, and the regiment of dragoons of Anſpach, attaced a ſmall intrenchment, which the enemy had made acroſs the valley, and, having carried it, they advanced on towards the roc of the Capuchins, which they attaced about ſix in the evening, being reinforced by two battalions of Leffelholtz, which count Mercy had drawn from the left to ſuſtain them. Here was very warm and bloody work, the Germans being expoſed to a continual fire from the ſeveral trenches of the enemy on the ſides of the roc. During this attac, count d' Eck, with the carabiniers and horſe-grenadiers, followed by the regiments of horſe of Liege, Hanover, and Portugal, traverſed the valley within half muſket-ſhot of the enemy, and placed himſelf to the left of Zumjungen, the plain there appearing large enough for the horſe to act, and to ſuſtain Zumjungen's attac, and penetrate with him into the enemies intrenchments. But this motion of the horſe croſſing Zumjungen in his march, did very much retard his attac, ſo that it was late before he attaced three caſſines, which ſtood near the river, within eighty paces of the enemies lines, which he took, not without loſs of men. Here the prince of Holſtein was mortally wounded, and, being left on the field of battle, he ſent to the marquis de Lede, who cauſed him to be carried into Franca Villa, where he died three days after. While Zumjungen was diſpoſing his troops to attac the intrenchments, by the way of a mill, which lay on the river oppoſite to the caſſines, he perceived the Heſſian battalions on the right following by miſtake the two battalions of Leffelholtz to the roc of the Capuchins, which diſappointed his deſign, for it was night before they returned. Count de Mercy animated his troops every where by his preſence and example, heading himſelf the two battalions of Leffelholtz at the attac of the Capuchins, and after having one horſe killed under him, and two diſabled, he was at laſt himſelf dangerouſly wounded in the reins with a muſket-ball. Night coming on put an end to the action, and left things undecided, except that the Germans maintained ſome ſmall poſts they had gained, which ſerved to ſtraiten the enemy in their camp. In this action the Germans had eight hundred and forty-ſix men killed, and two thouſand four hundred and forty-nine wounded; amongſt the latter admiral Byng's ſecond ſon very dangerouſly, who ſerved as a volunteer. The Spaniards had about one thouſand five hundred men killed or wounded.

Count de Mercy, having withdrawn his wounded men in the night, ranged his army in order to renew the attac next morning; but, the action of the day before having convinced the other generals of the ſtrong ſituation of the enemy, and perceiving the ſoldiers extremely diſpirited and dejected with their hardſhips and ill ſucceſs, they, with much difficulty, prevailed upon him not to perſiſt in that reſolution, but, by extending to the left, endeavour to cut off the enemy from Meſſina, and open a communication with the Engliſh convoy, which (according to agreement) was to rendezvous in Schiſo-bay, near Taormina, a ſea-port town, about three hours diſtant from Franca Villa, with the tranſports laden with proviſions, ammunition, baggage, and other neceſſaries, which the army ſtood in extreme need of. Here was a contingency of great hazard and danger, which gave the Germans much fear and uneaſineſs. For it might have happened, that the winds had hindered the convoy from paſſing through the Faro. Or, if they ſhould have gained their paſſage into Schiſo-bay, Taormina and all that coaſt was poſſeſſed by the enemy, and it was poſſible, that the ſhips might not be able to open a communication with the ſhore. Or ſtill, if both theſe points ſucceeded, the eſtabliſhing a correſpondence between the ſea and the camp, through an hoſtile country, was another work of hazard and difficulty; and a diſappointment, in any one of them, was the inevitable ruin of the whole army, who ſaw themſelves near the end of their proviſions, without any other poſſibility of getting more. But they were ſoon delivered from their fears, by hearing, that the convoy was ſafe arrived in Schiſo-bay; that the ſailors had taken and deſtroyed a ſmall fort of two guns, which had endeavoured to moleſt their anchoring; and that the guns of the men of war had diſperſed a body of troops, which the marquis de Spinola had ſent from Meſſina to the ſea-ſide, to oppoſe them. Upon this reviving news, count de Mercy ſent general Wachtendonck, with three thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, down to incamp on the ſea-ſide, where the ſhips lay at anchor, and ordered the roads, which were hardly paſſable, to be repaired, under the direction of engineer-general Schmettau; and, having got ſome field-pieces from the ſhips up to the camp, he greatly annoyed the enemy, who lay beneath him. This communication was too important for the marquis de Lede not to endeavour to interrupt it; and, amongſt many ſkirmiſhes that daily happened, a party of ſeven hundred Spaniſh horſe fell in with the bread-waggons and mules, that were returning from the ſea-ſide, laden with proviſions for the camp, and guarded only by three hundred horſe. The defence, which the Germans made, was reckoned a gallant action. A ſmall party of foot, that happened to be in the neighbourhood, hearing the fire, and coming up to their aſſiſtance, they put the Spaniards to flight, and conducted the waggons and mules ſafe to the camp.

When count Mercy parted from the admiral Byng at Melazzo, to go in queſt of the Spaniſh army, it was the admiral's deſign to return to Naples, and put things there in motion for an intended expedition to Sardina, which the duke of Savoy had much at heart, and was no leſs preſſed by the courts of England and France. But reflecting within himſelf, that the impetuous temper of the German general, and the contempt he ſaw he had of the enemy, might poſſibly bring about ſome occaſions that would want his aſſiſtance, he tarried a few days on the coaſt, in uneaſy expectation of the news of the ſucceſs of their march from Melazzo. The armed peaſants had cut off all communication between Franca Villa and Melazzo; ſo that the firſt miſdoubt he entertained, that things had not gone well, was from hearing the firing of the guns at Meſſina and at the Faro, and ſeeing great illuminations made along the coaſt. Soon after he perceived the Neapolitan gallies rowing out of the Faro, and the general of them, coming on board, gave him an imperfect account of the action, but enough to ſatisfy him, that it had not been fortunate; upon which he immediately embarked two battalions from the garriſon of Melazzo, and about a thouſand recruits, who were juſt arrived there, and ſent them, the ſame day, under a convoy, through the Faro to Schiſo-bay. In the evening he received letters from count de Mercy, informing him of the particulars of the whole action, with the great difficulties he laboured under, and uncertainty what to do; earneſtly preſſing him to come to the camp, that they might confer and conſult together. Upon this, the admiral ſent his firſt captain with his own ſhip and two others to Naples, by whom he ſent a letter to the viceroy, giving his opinion, that all thoughts of an expedition to Sardinia ſhould be laid aſide for the preſent, and the troops, which could be ſpared from his government, ſent immediately into Sicily, till whoſe arrival all things there would be at a ſtand; and that he had ſent his officers and ſhips to promote that ſervice. He then embarked on board the general of the gallies, laying aſide the ceremony of his flag and character, and in his way to Schiſo, count de Ligneville came to him in a felucca, bringing freſh letters from count de Mercy, which expreſſed his great impatience to ſee him. Being landed at Schiſo, general Wachtendonck renewed the ſame intreaties, which the admiral's zeal did not want; who accepting that general's horſes, and forgetting for a while his own ſtation and element, ſet out under a ſtrong eſcourt, attended by captain Matthews and his eldeſt ſon, and paſſing through roads ſtrewed with dead bodies of men and horſes, that had fallen in ſkirmiſhes the day before, between the ſea-ſide and the camp, he alighted at count de Mercy's tent in the evening, where a guard of grenadiers being drawn out for his reception, one of them was ſhot through the head by a muſket-ball from the enemy's camp, at the door of his tent, and fell down dead at his feet. He found the general very weak and faint with his wound, the ball ſtill remaining in his reins; but as he had a magnanimity of ſpirit ſuperior to his condition, it did not hinder them from entering into converſation on the melancholy ſituation of their affairs. The general made great complaints of Zumjungen, to whoſe ſlowneſs in marching, and coming ſo late into action, he attributed his ill ſucceſs. He ſaid, 'he himſelf was ſtill of opinion to make another attac upon the enemy, rather than decamp and retire; but that his officers in general were againſt it; and in that caſe he ſaw nothing left for them to do, but to go down, and join the forces at the ſea-ſide, and march into the country about Catanea and Syracuſa, for their better ſubſiſtance. That he had wrote for two battalions of Savoyards to be ſent to him from Syracuſa, which, with the troops the admiral had ſent from Melazzo, would repair his loſs of men: but that the loſs of his officers was irretrieveable; for beſides many killed, a conſiderable number of the beſt and principal were wounded, and incapable of preſent ſervice.' After many propoſitions and ſchemes ſtarted and diſcuſſed between them, without any being concluded on, the count deſired the admiral to ſtay in the camp that night, to be preſent at a conſultation of general officers next morning. The converſation being ended, the admiral went to ſee his ſon, who (as mentioned before) was wounded in the action, and whom he found languiſhing in his tent, in a way that gave little hopes of his recovery, not ſo much from the malignity of the wound (though that was in a dangerous part) as from the unſkilfulneſs of thoſe who attended him, the German army being very ill provided with ſurgeons and medicines.[c]

Such an univerſal detection had reigned throughout the army, on account of the ill ſucceſs of the late action, and for the loſs and diſability of ſo many brave officers, and they had ſuch continual apprehenſions, that the fiery temper of their general would order them on another attac, that their joy on the arrival of the admiral was inexpreſſible. They looked on him as their deliverer, who alone, they thought could extricate them from their preſent difficulties and misfortunes, and influence their general with cool and prudent counſels. In the morning early he viſited general Zumjungen, the ſecond perſon in the army, whoſe ſedate deliberate temper had procured him great eſteem and confidence among the ſoldiery. He complained much 'of the general's raſh impatience, in not giving time to all the troops to come up; which if he had done, and had delayed the attac till next morning, they would have had the whole day before them, have judged better of the meaſures for carrying it on, which would then have been diſpoſed in another manner, and with more reaſonable expectation of ſucceſs; and that this was not his own ſingle opinion, but that of all the other officers. He bewailed the little regard the general gave to the advice of his officers; and intreated him to oppoſe any overture he might make at the conſultation for another attac, which he feared was not out of his head, and what he (the admiral) only had credit enough to diſſuade him from it.'

The principal officers of the army being met in the general's tent, the firſt point he put in queſtion was, whether the enemy ſhould be attaced again? the officers keeping a long ſilence, and directing their looks to the admiral, he addreſſed his ſpeech to the general, wherein he 'reminded him of the warning he had formerly given him not to deſpiſe the enemy, whoſe numbers and reſolution he now experienced to be otherwiſe than what he expected. He ſaid, that he had viewed the ſituation of the enemies camp, the night before; and, though he did not pretend to much judgment in the operations of the land ſervice, yet it ſeemed to his plain underſtanding, that for one army to attac another equal in number, under the ſhelter of ſtrong and almoſt impregnable intrenchments, was rather an undertaking of deſpair than diſcretion, and could not be attended with any reaſonable hopes of ſucceſs.' All the other officers declaring themſelves of the ſame opinion, that queſtion was laid aſide. It came next under deliberation, what the army was to do? The general opinion was, 'that it was inſufficient for a ſpeedy conqueſt of the iſland, in regard the enemy had as numerous an army, with all the ſtrong holds and magazines in their poſſeſſion, and the affection of the people on their ſide. That, as they could not continue where they were, it was his opinion, they ſhould march into the fertile country about Catanea, and endeavour to make themſelves maſters of Auguſta; or elſe canton themſelves about Syracuſa for their better ſubſiſtance, till new and effectual ſupplies of troops were ſent from Germany.' To this the admiral replied, 'that he was ſo much of his opinion, that they wanted a further reinforcement of men, that, upon the firſt news of the ill ſucceſs of the battle, he had wrote to the viceroy of Naples his ſentiments accordingly: that indeed the courts of London and Paris did earneſtly preſs the carrying on the enterprize againſt Sardinia; but, when they ſhould come to be informed of the ſtate of affairs, they would probably conſent to have the army, deſigned for that expedition, paſs firſt into Sicily, which, as things ſtood, he thought the neareſt way to the conqueſt of both iſlands. That, after his departure from them, he would immediately go to Naples, and labour that point with the proper courts, with all the earneſtneſs and application poſſible. That, as to their marching in the mean time into the country about Catanea for ſubſiſtance, he apprehended, it would give the world a worſe opinion of the late action than it deſerved, and make it be concluded, that they had been defeated and diſabled; which would blemiſh the credit of their arms, and give too much ſpirit to the enemy, and to the Sicilians in their intereſt. That being now joined by the recruits he had ſent them, and the battalions from Syracuſa being daily expected, they would be in a condition to act offenſively, and advance the emperor's affairs: that Auguſta was out of the way, and not worth their attention, and delaying their time there was drawing the war into unneceſſary length; but that the way was open to Meſſina, the beſieging of which city would ſupport the character of their arms, and the taking of it make the reduction of the reſt of the iſland eaſy. That, as to what regarded the fleet, the experience of the laſt winter in keeping two ſquadrons, one within, the other without the Faro, to bloc up the ſhips in Meſſina, and ſecure the paſſage of the proviſions, which the army at Melazzo drew from Calabria and Apulia, had determined him never to hazard again the deſtruction of his maſter's ſhips on a ſea-ſervice of ſuch evident danger in that tempeſtuous ſeaſon, without having a port to ſhelter or befriend him. That the reduction of Meſſina was their mutual intereſt, as his ſhips would then clean there, and be more at hand to aſſiſt them; and, the cauſe of the blocade being removed, he ſhould be able to ſend a detachment to cruiſe on the coaſt of Spain, which would ſtreiten the enemy, and obſtruct their ſending ſuccours into Sicily.' This remonſtance had the weight it deſerved, and not only convinced, but gave great ſatisfaction to the general and his officers; eſpecially after his removing an objection of their being in want of cannon for battery, by agreeing to ſpare them out of the Spaniſh prizes twenty-ſeven cannon of twenty-four pounders, twelve of eighteen, and as many of twelve pounders; with a proportionable quantity of powder and ball, to enable them to begin the ſiege, and promiſing to ſollicit ſtrongly at Naples for remitting to the army all things neceſſary for carrying on that important ſervice with ſucceſs.

[c] Mr Corbet obſerves here, it may be wondered that the emperor is ſo well ſerved in the courage of his troops, when ſo little care is generally taken of their preſervation in accidents of wounds or ſickneſs. Surgeons and medicines are few and bad in their armies, and there is little difference between being wounded and killed in action, except that of a lingering or a ſudden death. After the battle of Franca Villa, the wounded men were laid on the ground, with their ammunition-bread ſet by them, and left expoſed to the ſun and fortune. The general himſelf had only his own valet de chambre to dreſs his wound, and attend him. It was a moving ſpectacle to the admiral, to meet with great numbers of poor wretches in his way up to the camp, ſome endeavouring, with the ſupport of their wives or comrades, to crawl down to the ſea-ſide, in order to get a paſſage over to the hoſpital at Reggio; others unable to go on from pain or faintneſs, falling down on the earth, and left to die there. This is a great blemiſh of their ſervice, and gives handle to the maxim which their enemies would fix on them, that they account it cheaper to get a man than to cure one, and ſo give themſelves little concern for his recovery.

The conference being over, the admiral took his leave, the general and all his officers expreſſing the greateſt eſteem and affection for him at their parting, and being eſcorted down to the water-ſide, he embarked in the neareſt man of war, and, without regard to his own dignity of moving at the head of a fleet, ſailed away with two ſhips only, and after an impatient paſſage of eleven days, a time tedious to a mind active and charged with emportant affairs, he arrived at Naples, where the firſt thing he heard, with great ſurprize and concern, was, that his friend count Daun was removed from the government, and departed for Vienna, though his time was not expired, and that count de Gallas was come thither in the room. The diſplacing at that juncture a man ſo experienced in military affairs was a ſtep very inconvenient to the emperor's intereſt, and an unhappy effect of court faction; for, though the new viceroy was a man of undoubted worth and honour, and had ſuſtained the character of ambaſſador at the courts of England and Rome, with proper dignity and magnificence, and in quieter times might have filled his government with greater ſufficiency and applauſe, yet, not being bred a ſoldier, it was not to be expected, he could ſo readily comprehend the ſprings of motion in armies, or foreſee every proviſion neceſſary for military opperations, the timely ſupplies of which are the ſureſt foundations of ſucceſs in war.

After the firſt civilities, the admiral, entering into conconference, with the viceroy, painted out to him in very lively colours the ſtate of the imperial army in Sicily, where the event of things, he ſaid, had not anſwered the ſanguine hopes they had flattered themſelves with, on their landing on that iſland; that, inſtead of trampling over the enemy, they had received ſuch a ſhoc themſelves, as very much humbled their ſpirits and expectations, and had been ſo far from making impreſſion on an army favoured and aſſiſted by the natives, that they were reduced to think of their own preſervation, being entangled among barren mountains, depending on a precarious ſubſiſtance from the ſea, and in a country, where every man they ſaw was their enemy; and finally, that, without a reinforcement equal to another army, the conqueſt of the kingdom was impracticable.' The admiral having proceeded thus far, was cautious of touching on the army, that lay in the Milaneſe, deſigned for Sardinia; for, by the laſt letters, the courts of England, France, and Turin, were ſtill very preſſing for that great expedition: but he demanded of the viceroy, whether the emperor had any conſiderable number of troops in Italy, beſides thoſe deſigned for Sardinia? To which he replyed, he believed not: the admiral aſked, whether, if thoſe troops deſigned for Sardinia were immediately ſent over to Sicily, they could ſoon be replaced by other troops from Germany, to go on that expedition? which the viceroy doubting, he then ſpoke out his opinion plainly, 'that the expedition to Sardinia ought to be laid aſide for the preſent: that the carrying on both undertakings together would end in the failure of both; and that the ſhorteſt way of getting both iſlands was by conquering one firſt.' The viceroy replied, 'that the propoſitions was ſo much for his maſter's intereſt, that his concurrence with it was not to be doubted, but that he feared, he was not at liberty to divert thoſe troops, without the conſent of the other courts in alliance; and prayed the admiral to make the proper repreſentations thereupon to them, as he would do himſelf to the emperor.' The conference being over, the count de Ligneville, whom count de Mercy had ſent with the admiral to Naples, was diſpatched away to Vienna, with inſtructions to lay before that court the ſtate of their affairs in Sicily, and the meaſures propoſed for retrieving them.

Naples ſeemed to be at this time, the center of affairs in Europe. All the powers in the quadruple alliance, as well as thoſe, who had any concerns with them, had miniſters there to watch over their reſpective intereſts, and drew their meaſures from information of what paſſed there. The admiral went with the viceroy to viſit the marquis de Breille, the king of Sardinia's miniſter; and ſhewing him the weak condition of the imperial arms in Sicily, and that the expedient of ſending the troops deſigned for Sardinia thither, was the effect of invincible neceſſity, and not a pretence for poſtponing his maſter's intereſts, which the courts of England and France had as much at heart as thoſe of the emperor, he convinced that miniſter of the reaſonableneſs of the meaſure, who, at his requeſt, repreſented the matter in a true light to his own court, and obtained his maſter's concurrence.

During the admiral's ſtay at Naples, the Grafton brought in two Genoeſe ſhips, which ſhe had taken off Palermo, with ſix hundred Swiſs recruits on board for the Spaniſh army, who were committed priſoners to the caſtles. The Lenox ran a third a-ſhore, with about two hundred more ſoldiers, and burnt her, but moſt of the men eſcaped.

There being nothing more to do at Naples, till the ſentiments of the ſeveral courts were known, upon the propoſed alteration of meaſures, the admiral determined, in the mean time, to paſs over again into Sicily, hoping to find the army before Meſſina, in which caſe his aſſiſtance would be wanting. He had then a ſtrong feveriſh diſorder hanging on him, which had reduced him to a very low condition; a little reſt ſeemed neceſſary for his recovery; but his heart was with the army, and his health had no part in his thoughts. The viceroy too was ill in bed of a fever; they were deſirous of ſeeing each other before the admiral departed, having ſome neceſſary points to ſettle together. The admiral, ſcarce able to ſtand, was carried to the viceroy's bed-ſide, where being ſeated, they could do little more than give broken and imperfect hints to each other, of what their minds laboured with, and were ſoon obliged to put an end to a conference, wherein the weakneſs of their bodies did not ſecond the zeal of their hearts for the public. The admiral complimented the viceroy with as many of the Swiſs priſoners, as would be neceſſary to exchange what Germans were priſoners in Sicily; and taking a final leave of him, embarked for that iſland. The viceroy died two days after, whoſe ſickneſs the Italians attributed to his travelling through the Campania of Rome in the dog-days, which they eſteem fatal. His death threw the affairs of that kingdom into great confuſion; the collateral council aſſuming the goverment, and the military power refuſing to obey their orders, which proved no ſmall diſſervice and retardment to the affairs in Sicily.

During the admiral's abſence, count de Mercy, being ſtruc blind with an apoplectic fit, was obliged to quit the camp, and paſs over to Reggio for advice, leaving the command of the army to general Zumjungen, general Wachtendonck had taken by ſtratagem the town of Taormina, a ſtrong paſs in the way to Meſſina, upon which encouragement Zumjungen broke up from Franca Villa with his army, on the 17th of July, without any moleſtation from the enemy, and forcing the ſtrong paſſes of Alexis and la Sceletta, with leſs oppoſition than was expected, after a painful march through a mountainous country and exceſſive heats, but aſſiſted by the tranſport veſſels coaſting along with the proviſions, artillery, and heavy baggage, he ſat down, the 20th, before Meſſina; in which the enemy had three thouſand men, under the command of the marquis de Spinola, an officer of great reputation, and well furniſhed with proviſions and all neceſſaries for a long and obſtinate defence. In the mean time, count de Mercy burning with impatience to lie idle at Reggio, notwithſtanding the anguiſh of his wound, and the ſurgeon's not being able to get the ball out of his body, as ſoon as ever he began to ſee a little with one eye, returned to the camp before Meſſina. The admiral, after a paſſage of five days, anchored, the 28th, off of the point of the Faro, and being too weak to go out of his ſhip, ſent his firſt captain a-ſhore to the general to acquaint him with his proceedings at Naples; and learning, that he was in great want of powder, ſent him a conſiderable ſupply.

The imperialiſt having taken the caſtle of Gonzaga, which ſtands on a hill over the city; and the baſtion of the town, called Secreto, having a conſiderable breach made in it, and the governor having withdrawn his troops from the town into the citadel, the ſenate of the Meſſina ſent out deputies to capitulate upon articles; but the general deſiring to know whether he was to treat with them as ſubjects of the emperor, or as enemies; if as the former, he bid them open the gates, and receive his troops, and he would interpoſe his good offices with the emperor in their favour; but, if he was to treat with them as enemies, they were to get the beſt terms they could for themſelves; and he gave them leave to go bac into the town to conſider with their principals about it. They returned the ſame evening, and told the general, that the next morning, as ſoon as it was day, they would open the gates, and rely on the emperor's clemency; and accordingly the troops marched on the 8th of Auguſt, N. S. and took poſſeſſion.

The city being taken, the admiral landed ſome Engliſh grenadiers, who took the tower of the Faro; which opening a free paſſage for his ſhips, he came to an anchor in Peradiſe Road, which the officers of the Spaniſh men of war in the Mole perceiving, and deſparing now of getting out to ſea, they unbent their ſails, and unrigged their ſhips, expecting their fate with that of the citadel. This gave the admiral great eaſe, and enabled him to employ ſhips on other ſervices, which had long attended the blocing up of that port. It came now to be matter of debate, what was to be done with thoſe ſhips, when the citadel ſhould be taken, and they fall into their hands. Signor Scarampi, general of the king of Sardina's gallies, firſt ſtarted the queſtion, and claimed the two beſt of ſixty and ſixty-four guns, new ſhips, which had belonged to his maſter, and were ſeized by the Spaniards in the port of Palermo. He grounded his right on a convention made at Vienna, the 29th of December, 1718, in which it was ſaid, 'that as to the ſhips belonging to the king of Sardinia, if they be taken in the port, they ſhall be reſtored to him: but that this ſhall be referred to admiral Byng to anſwer.' To this the admiral replied, 'that this convention having been only a ground-work for another to be made at Naples, he could be directed by none but that, which was made in conſequence thereof in April 1719, between the viceroy of Naples, the marquis de Breille, miniſter of Sardinia, and himſelf, in which no mention is made of thoſe ſhips; and, as to the reference to his opinion, he did freely declare, he could not think the king of Sardinia had any ſhadow of title to them: that they had been taken by the enemy, and were now fitted out, and armed at their expence, and under their colours: that they would put out to ſea, if he did not hinder them, and attac all Engliſh ſhips they met with; and, if ſtronger, take them; ſo that he could not conſider them in any light, than what they were, the ſhips of an enemy.' Count de Mercy put in his claim for the emperor, alledging, 'that as thoſe ſhips would be found within the port of a town taken by his maſter's arms, according to the right of nations, they belonged to him.' The admiral replied, 'that it was owing to his keeping two ſquadrons on purpoſe, and at a great hazard, to watch and obſerve theſe ſhips, that they were now confined within the port, which if he was to withdraw, they would ſtill be able to go to ſea, and he ſhould have a chance of meeting with and taking them.' But reflecting afterwards with himſelf, that poſſibly the garriſon might capitulate for the ſafe return of thoſe ſhips into Spain, which he was determined never to ſuffer: that, on the other hand, the right of poſſeſſion might breed an inconvenient diſpute among the princes concerned; and if it ſhould prove, that they did not belong to England, it were better they belonged to nobody, he propoſed to count de Mercy to ſet up a battery, and deſtroy them as they lay in the baſin; who urging, that he had no orders concerning thoſe ſhips, and muſt write to Vienna for inſtructions about it, the admiral replied with ſome warmth, that he could not want a power to deſtroy every thing that belonged to the enemy, and inſiſted on it with ſuch firmneſs, that the general, being concerned in intereſt not to carry matters to a diſagreement, cauſed a battery to be erected, notwithſtanding the proteſtations of Scarampi, which in a little time ſunk and deſtroyed them, and completed the ruin of the naval power of Spain.

In five days after the taking of the city, the imperialiſts obliged the caſtles of Caſtellazzo and Matagriffone to ſurrender; and, being thus become maſters of all the caſtles and eminences about the city, they applied themſelves to the ſiege of the citadel, where from the ſtrength of the place, the numerous and well-provided garriſon, and the great reputation of the governor, they were ſure to meet with a very warm and vigorous reſiſtance, and the more, as the Germans were ill provided with neceſſaries for ſuch an undertaking.

On the the 13th of Auguſt, N. S. the count de Ligneville arrived in the camp from Vienna with the good news of the emperors's having diſpatched orders to the governor of Milan to ſend his troops, which lay in the Milaneſe, and were deſigned for Sardinia, down to Vado, in order to be tranſported into Sicily. He brought a gracious letter from the emperor to the admiral, wherein he ſignified to him 'his approbation of a project, that was the effect of his zeal and activity; the ſatisfaction he had in his wiſe conduct, and for his love and attachment to his imperial perſon and auguſt houſe; and on all occaſions he ſhould give him marks of his affection and eſteem, and of his good remembrance of the ſervices he had done him.'

The tranſportation of the troops from Genoa to Sicily was a ſervice of ſuch moment, and diſpatch in it ſo neceſſary, that the admiral determined to conduct that affair himſelf, well knowing from his experience of the ſlowneſs of the Germans in all their undertakings, how much his weight and credit were neceſſary to give their motions that quicneſs, which their affairs required; and having intimated his reſolution to count de Mercy of paſſing over to Naples, and from thence to Genoa for that purpoſe, he prayed the admiral to repreſent plainly his wants to the government of Naples; which no body knew or underſtood better than himſelf, and, giving him a liſt of what particulars he wanted, added jocoſely, 'that, as the ſiege was a child of his own begetting, he ought to nurſe it, as well for his own ſake, as for the common intereſt.'

The admiral ſailed the 16th of Auguſt, N. S. and anchored the 23d before Naples, where the cardinal de Schrottenbach was newly arrived by ſea from Rome in quality of viceroy. The next day the admiral went to the palace, and entering into conference with the cardinal, repreſented to him, 'how much the army had ſuffered from the diviſions of the government during the interregnum. That the ſiege they were employed in was a deciſive point, on which the fate of the iſland depended;' and ſetting before him the evil conſequences, that would attend a miſcarriage by the want of neceſſary ſupplies from his government, he put into his hands a liſt of particulars he had received from the general. The cardinal was an honeſt good-natured man, and very willing to forward buſineſs but had no great talents for it. His high quality had advanced him to the purple, being lord of a principality in Bohemia, with ſome marks of ſovereignty. He was appointed to manage the emperor's affairs at Rome, after the departure of count Gallas, and, at his death, ſucceeded him in his government. He told the admiral, 'that, by the accounts he had received from the proper officers there was not in the ſtores the quantity of cannon and ammunition, which the general demanded: that he would ſend to Mantua for cannon, which might be tranſported down the Po into the Adriatic, and ſo on by ſea to Meſſina, where poſſibly, if no croſs accidents happened, they might arrive in two months time.' The admiral coming to know that thoſe cannon had no carriages, the cardinal thought he ſatisfied that objection by ſaying, 'he would ſend ſome carpenters into the woods of Abruzzo to cut down timber for carriages.' Thoſe and the like unſoldier-like propoſals gave the admiral a ſenſible regret of the loſs of count Daun, in whoſe room he found himſelf co-operating with a viceroy better qualified for his breviary than for council in operations of war, and whoſe court was crouded with monks, and prieſts, and ſuch like diſagreeable objects, inſtead of men of buſineſs and ſervice. [d]

The admiral perceiving, that the army had no reſource, but what lay in himſelf, generouſly ſent them twenty-four pieces of cannon of eighteen pounders, belonging to the Spaniſh prizes, and a proportionable quantity of powder and ſhot, contenting himſelf with the ſingle credit of the [d] The viceroy returned the next day the admiral's viſit, and, upon reconſidering the ſeveral points in the general's demands, the ſame difficulties recurred about complying with them, eſpecially as to the cannon and ammunition. The viceroy ſaid, 'he would ſummon all the general officers in town, and conſult with them about finding out expedients to ſatisfy the wants of the army, which was all that was in his power to do.' Upon which the admiral deſired his eminence, 'that, after they had attended him, and taken thoſe matters into conſideration, he might have a conferrence with them.' Accordingly the next day the general officers came to the admiral's houſe, and entering into converſation together, upon the particulars of the general's demands, which lay before them, the articles relating to corn and recruits were ſoon got over; but the main difficulty was the demand of cannon and ammunition. The admiral told them, 'that count de Mercy had not above twenty cannon in battery: that he was within two hundred paces of the counterſcarp of the citadel; and hoped he ſhould not be forced to ſtop in ſo fair a way, for want of neceſſary ſupplies; and that he would be contented, if they could ſend him but ten or twelve cannon from Naples, with a proportionable quantity of powder and ball.' The officer of the ordinance attending gave in a liſt of eight cannon, which he ſaid might be taken from the mole and batteries of the city, and ſent to Meſſina; but, upon enquiry, they appeared to be of fifty or ſixty pounders, ſome without ball, others without carriages, all of them too unwieldy and unfit for battery. He then delivered in to them a ſtate of all the ordinance-ſtores in the kingdom; upon examining of which the general officers unanimouſly confeſſed, that the whole country was not able to furniſh the cannon and ammunition, which count de Mercy wanted. This was ſuch a declaration of weakneſs, as was not to be expected in ſo fine a kingdom.

general for repayment to the captors, and at the ſame time wrote to Genoa and Leghorn, to purchaſe one thouſand barrels more of powder, engaging his own ſecurity to the Britiſh conſuls for their repayment.

During theſe tranſactions, a number of tranſports having been provided at Naples, the admiral ſent them under a convoy to Vado, and, having diſpatched his other affairs with the cardinal, departed after them, and arrived at Genoa the 7th of September, N. S.

He had been made to believe, that, by the time of his arrival there, the army would be ready to embark; but he found every thing in extreme bacwardneſs. The troops had not ſo much as begun their march from the Milaneſe, nor could get to Vado in leſs than a fortnight: very few proviſions or neceſſaries had been brought up, and none ſhipped, nor were the tranſport-veſſels properly fitted for the reception of the troops. Count de Bonneval, who was to command his body, arriving the next day, went on board the admiral, and underſtanding that he intended to tranſport his army to Melazzo, and even to Meſſina, if count Mercy ſhould think it neceſſary, he was mortified to the laſt degree. He had been appointed to command theſe forces on the intended expedition to Sardinia, and the diverting them to a different ſervice ſo diſguſted him, that, inſtead of forwarding the embarkation of the troops, he reſolved to retard it all he could. Accordingly, whilſt the admiral gave himſelf incredible pains at Genoa and Vado, to quicken their departure, he threw in the way all the ſecret obſtructions he could, till he knew the iſſue of the ſollicitations he was carrying on at Vienna, to be continued in a ſeparate command. However, the admiral, after twenty days labour and pains, and at laſt ſuch menances as even Bonneval himſelf began to be afraid of the admiral, ſhipped off the troops to the number of about ſix thouſand, on the 27th of September, N. S. with ſuch proviſions as could be got, and, leaving a man of war to convoy the remainder when ready, ſailed the 28th from Vado. [e] The admiral receiving letters in his paſſage, from count de Mercy, requeſting, that the troops might not land at Melazzo, but go on to Meſſina, he ſtood away for the Faro, and arrived before Meſſina, the 8th of October, N. S. which ſo elevated the ſpirits of the army, that, upon the firſt ſight of the fleet, lieutenant-general Wallis, with five thouſand men, made a vigorous attac upon the half-moon, which was neareſt to their approaches, and carried it with the loſs of only one hundred and three killed, and eight hundred and thirty wounded. The admiral, going a-ſhore to the general's quarters, was embraced by him, and all the general officers, with the moſt tender marks of affection and gratulation, the whole army being overjoyed to to ſee a man, who always brought them relief and ſucceſs, and every good, that attended them. On the 17th at ten in the morning, the imperialiſts aſſaulted the counterſcarp, and mounted to the top of the breach with great gallantry; but, after two hours very warm work, were repulſed with the loſs of one hundred and twenty men killed, and ſix hundred and ſeventeen wounded. The governor having acquitted himſelf with great honour in this repulſe, as well as in the general defence of the place, and finding himſelf unable to hold it longer, beat a parley the next day, and ſurrendered it upon articles. The Spaniſh garriſon marched out through the breach, and were tranſported by ſea to Auguſta. Thus ended a ſiege of twenty-one days, which coſt the Germans above five thouſand men killed or wounded.

Whilſt the ſiege of the citadel was depending, the Spaniſh army decamped from Franca Villa, the 31ſt of Auguſt, and, marching towards Rametta, the marquis de Lede gave out, that he would attac the imperialiſts, and appeared upon the hills in ſight of the camp, attended by a great number of peaſants he had drawn together; but finding it well guarded, and his army being ſicly, he fortified a ſtrong and advantageous poſt at Caſtro Giovane, in the center of the iſland, where he laid in large magazines, in order to retire thither in caſe of neceſſity; and in the mean time cantoned his troops about Aderno, Palermo, and Catanea. [f]

The imperialiſts having ſpent ſome time in levelling the lines, trenches, and batteries before Meſſina, and in putting the place into a poſture of defence, they held ſeveral conſultations, at which the admiral aſſiſted, concerning what meaſures were next to be taken. The reduction of Meſſina had brought Val Demona under the obedience of the emperor; but the whole province, being mountainous and barren, was ſo little able to ſupply the army with proviſions and forage, that the inhabitants of Meſſina and other towns daily petitioned the general for their own ſubſiſtance, ſince they could draw no corn, as they uſed to do, from the plentiful parts of the iſland, which were in poſſeſſion of the Spaniards. To march after the enemy in a wintry ſeaſon, with their horſe already harraſed, and almoſt ſtarved, through an adverſe country, and without any proviſions but what they carried; and, if they ſurmounted all theſe difficulties, to attac them in the ſtrong camp of Caſtro Giovane, was judged too raſh to be attempted, after the experience of Franca Villa. To march to Palermo, and get poſſeſſion of the capital, was more deſirable than eaſy of execution. It was a march of ſeventeen days, along the northern coaſt of the iſland, through an unknown, mountainous, ſterile country, where they ſhould be expoſed to ſudden inſults, great part of the way being ſo narrow, that two men could hardly go a-breſt; and, if they met with no enemy, they had no forage for their horſe, no magazines in the way of their march, nor a ſufficient number of beaſts of burthen to carry proviſions along with them, nor money to buy them, if they could be got. The next project, that occurred was

[e] Bonneval, finding his troops incorporated with the army, and his projects of a ſeparate command vaniſhed, pretended ſickneſs, and, getting leave to go to Reggio for advice, he repaired to Vienna, and returned no more to the army. He was a native of France, and had all the ſprightlineſs and levity of that nation. He was a gallant officer, had received many wounds, and ſtill feels the painful remembrance of a moſt terrible one he got in Hungary. He had no zeal for the ſervice of his prince, any further than it ſuited his own intereſt or ambition, to which he willingly ſacrificed his duty. Corbet.

[f] It was during this ſiege, that the admiral having received information, that veſſels belonging to Malta had gone to ſea with Spaniſh commiſſions, and taken ſome Engliſh merchant-ſhips, ſent a letter to the grand maſter, 'complaining of his partiality and injuſtice, demanding ſatisfaction for the damages the merchants had ſuſtained, and his giving ſtrict orders to prohibit the like unfair proceedings for the future.' He wrote, at the ſame time, to mr. Alexander Young, the Engliſh conſul at Malta, to make a ſtrict enquiry what merchant-ſhips had been taken by privateers fitted out from Malta, or wherein Malteſe ſubjects had been concerned, and to lay a ſtate thereof before that government, with a demand for reparation, and to let him know their anſwer. The grand maſter and his council, being alarmed at this meſſage, ſent the chevalier Balbini to the admiral, to repreſent and excuſe the proceedings of their government in the points complained of, and to lay before him the difficulties they were under, from their dependance on Spain, and to endeavour to remove all cauſes of his diſſatisfaction with them. But the admiral, not having yet received any ſpecific account of the particular loſſes of the merchants, and ſo not able to ſettle the terms of reſtitution with Balbini, ſent his firſt captain, Saunders, with two men of war to Malta, directing him 'to make an exact enquiry into the ſeveral captures that had been made, and to lay the ſame before the grand maſter and his council, and to demand reparation, ſo far as their ſubjects had been concerned therein; and, in caſe he found them willing to give reaſonable aſſurances of doing juſtice for what was paſt, and of a better behaviour for the future, he was to enter into a convention with them for that purpoſe, and for eſtabliſhing a good agreement with them; but, otherwiſe, he was to take all ſhips and veſſels he ſhould meet with belonging to that iſland.' Captain Saunders, arriving at Malta, found a fair diſpoſition in thoſe people to give the admiral and the Engliſh nation all reaſonable ſatisfaction in their proceedings. They ſhewed, 'that they had never conſented to, or approved of their ſubjects entering into the ſervice of Spain, but had iſſued ſtrict proclamations, prohibiting them to be any ways concerned on either ſide in the war. They did not deny, that one of their veſſels had taken a commiſſion from the marquis de Lede, to cruiſe upon the enemies of Spain, but made appear, that they had ſent one of their order to intreat him to revoke that commiſſion, and had made the ſame application to the court of Madrid, but had been anſwered with great roughneſs and menaces. That, to avoid as much as they could all occaſions of complaint, they had called in all their privateers, which had been cruiſing in the Levant againſt the Turks, in order to diſarm them; but they could not always govern the unruline's of their people, when they would enter into the ſervice of any chriſtian prince, whoſe colours protected them from their enquiry or viſitation, which was the misfortune of their condition, as they depended upon the chriſtian princes of Europe for their revenue, and, in particular, drew at that time their daily ſubſiſtence of proviſions from that part of Sicily, which was under the ſubjection of the Spaniſh general; and, finally, that they received no part or benefit from the prizes, which had paſſed entirely through the hands of the Spaniſh agent, and in which they had no manner of intereſt or concern.' The captain was convinced of the ſincerity and truth of their declaration; but, on the other hand, told them, 'that it was not his buſineſs to enquire into the nature or dependance of their government; and it was for them to accommodate their grievances with Spain as they could. That his inſtructions were plain, and founded in juſtice, demanding redreſs for the loſſes his countrymen had ſuſtained, from thoſe, who occaſioned them, who were their ſubjects; and that, if they would not enter into a negotiation for that purpoſe, he ſhould be obliged to put his orders in execution.' Intimidated by theſe threats, they immediately appointed two commiſſaries to treat with him; and it being made out by proof, that five Engliſh merchant-ſhips had been taken by Malteſe ſhips under Spaniſh colours, they ſubmitted to pay the full value of them and their lading, within twelve months after application from the claimants. But thinking themſelves aggrieved by this treaty, and proteſting themſelves to be under a force to ſign any terms, rather than feel the effects of the admiral's diſpleaſure, they reſerved to themſelves a liberty of appealing to the equity of the admiral, and from him to the king, for a mitigation of the ſeverity of the conditions. They diſpatched away, accordingly, the chevalier de la Val to the admiral, who not thinking he had any right to compound for other men's properties, the deputy paſſed on to the Engliſh court at London, to execute his commiſſion. He had likewiſe a private inſtruction, to implore the king's intereſt with the ſeveral princes at the approaching congreſs, that Malta might be freed from its ſubjection to Sicily, and enjoy the rights and privileges of a free and neutral port in time of war, among the chriſtian powers.

to go to Trapani, where the Piedmonteſe had a garriſon. This would be changing the ſcene of the war to great advantage; for, inſtead of being confined and famiſhing in the mountains, they ſhould be able to enlarge themſelves in a plentiful country, and, by acting on equal terms with the enemy, have a reaſonable chance to drive them out of the iſland. But to go thither by land was impracticable; and, as their tranſport-veſſels could not carry above a third part of the army at a time, the diviſon of their troops was hazardous, and might be fatal. For, Trapani being ſituated on an iſthmus, and having no magazines of corn, the marquis de Lede might march, and pen up the firſt detachment within that narrow nec of land, where they would ſtarve for want of proviſions, before the reſt of the army could join them. The only choice remaining was to go to Syracuſa; but that too was impracticable by land, by reaſon of the ſame objections, as are already mentioned; and beſides, there lay in the way ſeveral deep and rapid rivers, where the enemy might defend the paſſages with great advantage. And, though it was not difficult to tranſport the army thither by ſea, yet it was an uncomfortable reflection, that they ſhould be then the whole length of the iſland diſtant from Palermo, and could only propoſe to ſubſiſt themſelves from day to day during the winter, the enemy lying between them and the great Caricatori, or ſubterraneous magazines, where the inhabitants uſually lay up their corn, which were ninety miles diſtant. With theſe diſagreeable proſpects they paſt away ſome days under uncertainty what to do; when, one evening, the generals Mercy and Zumjungen repairing on board the admiral, and renewing the ſubject of their late conferences, they told him, in a very deſponding manner, 'that, having thoroughly weighed the ſituation of their affairs, and finding they could neither ſubſiſt nor undertake any action where they were, they had come to a reſolution to leave a ſtrong garriſon in Meſſina, and tranſport the horſe over by ſea to Calabria, and the foot to Syracuſa, where they might be able to maintain themſelves during the winter, and be ready to make uſe of ſuch advantages as might offer, for acting againſt the enemy in the ſpring; and prayed his aſſiſtance in that ſervice.' The admiral replied, 'that he hoped, their affairs were not ſo deſperate, as they apprehended: that he had been employing his thoughts for their ſervice, and believed he ſhould be able to extricate them out of their preſent circumſtances: that of all the late propoſitions, the tranſporting the army to Trapani pleaſed him beſt, as it would turn the difficulty upon the Spaniſh army, by obliging them to make uneaſy marches, and to keep the field in the winter. That, when the whole army was at Trapani, they ſhould be able to enlarge their quarters; the granaries of corn would fall into their hands, and their neighbourhood to Palermo keep that place in awe, till the ſeaſon ſhould favour their marching towards it, the reduction of which would bring the war to a ſpeedy iſſue. That he had conſidered of the difficulty of ſubſiſting one part of the army at Trapani, till the reſt arrived; and, as England was in peace with the governments of Barbary, he would ſend his ſecretary to Tunis, which was the neareſt African port to Trapani, and employ him, and the Engliſh conſul, to buy up whatever quantity of corn was neceſſary, and tranſport the ſame to Trapani. That he knew very well they had no money, and therefore would employ his own caſh, and credit, to procure this ſupply, depending upon their honour for repayment, and did not doubt to lodge the corn at Trapani, before the firſt detachment of troops arrived there.' Count de Mercy penetrating immediately into the facility, and advantageous conſequences of this ſcheme, roſe up, and, embracing the admiral in a kind of tranſport, acknowledged, 'that he had hit on the only method practicable, not only for the preſervation of the army, but even for puſhing on the war with ſucceſs. That, as it was a proteſtant ſcheme, he ſhould have proteſtant troops, and proteſtant generals to put it in execution.' And accordingly general Zumjungen, with count Seckendorf, the prince of Heſſe, and general Schmettau, embarked the 23d of November, with ſeven thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, and arrived fortunately in three days at Trapani, where finding a plentiful remittance of corn ready arrived from Tunis, they not only poſted themſelves there in ſecurity, but, enlarging their quarters into the country, brought the cities of Marſala and Mazzara to ſubmit to the obedience of the emperor. The tranſports and convoy returning, brought thither more troops. Count de Mercy and the admiral departing with the laſt convoy from Meſſina, on the 19th of January, conſiſting of five thouſand four hundred foot, and eleven hundred horſe, they were overtaken by a violent ſtorm off the iſle of Alicuda, which drove all the tranſports into Melazzo and Meſſina, the admiral, with the general on board his ſhip, getting with difficulty to Trapani, on the 29th, but the whole convoy did not arrive there till the 2d of March, many ſoldiers dying in the paſſage, and amongſt them general Wachdonck, regretted by every body. The whole army, being got together, amounted to fourteen thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, beſides the garriſons left in Meſſina, Melazzo, Syracuſa, and the adjacent parts.

Theſe motions of the imperialiſts made the marquis de Lede quit the poſts of Mola, Taormina, and Catania, and leaving a detachment in his ſtrong camp at Caſtro Giovane, to ſecure the magazines he had erected there, he marched and fixed his camp from Alcamo to Salama, with his head quarters at Caſtel Vetrano, from whence he continually ſent out detachments to deſtroy the country about Marſala and Mazzara, and to carry off all the cattle, grain, and wine, which Zumjungen could not at firſt prevent; but, being ſtrengthened with new ſupplies by ſea, he at laſt obliged their parties to retire, and, on the arrival of count de Mercy, the Spaniſh general was reduced to fortify his camp with ſtrong intrenchments and redoubts, with batteries of cannon.

Count de Mercy making a motion of extending his quarters beyond Mazzara, the marquis de Lede quitted Caſtel Vetrano, and retired with his army to Alcamo, from whence he ſent his mareſchal de camp ſignor d'Aponte, on the 6th of February, 1719-20, N. S. with overtures to count de Mercy and the admiral for evacuating Sicily, on condition of leave to tranſport his army into Spain, and in order thereto deſired a ſuſpenſion of arms. This propoſition contained nothing diſagreeable to the Germans, who would thereby obtain all they wanted, by becoming maſters of the kingdom, without any further trouble; but the admiral proteſting againſt it, and declaring, that not a man of the Spaniſh army ſhould paſs out of that iſland, until a general peace was made, for that it would be to furniſh Spain with a body of their beſt troops to ſtrengthen their army acting againſt France, or elſe they might be employed in diſturbing England, he was diſmiſſed with this counter-propoſition from the count de Mercy, that, if the marquis would ſurrender Palermo, and the ſouth-ſide of the iſland, and retire with his army into the middle of the country towards Caſtro Giovane, or to any other paſs proper for his ſecurity, he would conſent to a ſuſpenſion of arms for ſix weeks, till the ſentiments of the ſeveral courts might be known; which being an advantage more than equivalent to the operations of ſix weeks in that early ſeaſon, the admiral conſented thereto, with this reſtriction, that, if the Spaniards attempted to withdraw any of their men in the mean time, the ſuſpenſion ſhould be void, and he would act againſt them with all his force. Count de Mercy diſpatched lieutenant-colonel Bellaire to Vienna, to acquaint that court with theſe overtures, and bring bac their directions; the admiral ſent away thither his eldeſt ſon, mr. Byng, with inſtructions, if the imperial court liſtened to the propoſals of the Spaniſh general, to declare, that his father could never ſuffer any part of the Spaniſh army to depart out of the iſland, till the king of Spain had acceeded to the quadruple alliance, or till he received poſitive inſtructions from England for doing ſo.

The 12th of February, N. S. count de Mercy marched towards Caſtel Vetrano, for the more commodious ſubſiſtance of his cavalry, from whence he detached general Seckendorf, with fifteen hundred men, and ſome cannon, to reduce Sacca, where there was a large caricatore of corn. The town immediately ſurrendered, but the Spaniards, to the number of three hundred, retired into the caſtle.

The marquis de Lede, finding his firſt propoſitions ineffectual, ſent two general officers, the marquis de San Vicenzo and ſignor d'Aponte, to the imperial camp, the 19th of February, N. S. with inſtructions to treat about the ſurrender of Palermo, and a conſiderable part of the adjacent country, in conſideration of a ſuſpenſion of arms for three months. But, whilſt the negotiation was depending, the marquis received an expreſs from Madrid, on the 28th, with advice, that a general peace was made, he ſent immediately to break off the treaty. This ſeemed matter of great ſurprize; but the ſecret reaſon was, that Spain was at that time treating with France to reſtore Fontarabia, St. Sebaſtian, and other places taken in the war, and hoped to get in exchange, for the evacuation of Sicily and Sardinia, the reſtitution of thoſe towns, and of Gibraltar, or, at leaſt, to have one and the other referred to a congreſs. Upon this, count de Mercy gave freſh orders for attacing the caſtle of Sacca, which had been retarded by the great rains. The caſtle being battered with four pieces of cannon, and not very ſtrong, ſurrendered, the 6th of March, the garriſon being made priſoners of war. The taking of this place gave great relief to the imperial army, who found there twenty thouſand ſolms of wheat.

During theſe tranſactions, a courier diſpatched from Paris by the earl of Stair, the Britiſh ambaſſador there, brought the admiral information, that the marquis de Beretti Landi, the Spaniſh miniſter at the Hague, had ſigned the quadruple alliance the 17th of February, N. S. and he brought likewiſe a packet from that miniſter to the marquis de Lede, and another from the emperor's miniſter to count de Mercy, to acquaint them therewith. A trumpet was ſent with the Spaniſh miniſter's packet to the marquis de Lede, and to know his ſentiments thereupon. He returned anſwer, 'that, his maſter's miniſter having ſigned the quadruple alliance, he looked upon the peace as a thing concluded, and was therefore ready to treat of a ceſſation of hoſtilities by ſea and land, until they ſhould receive farther orders from their reſpective courts.' To this it was replied by the admiral and count de Mercy, 'that, as the evacuation of Sicily and Sardinia was to be performed within two months after the ſaid ſigning, they were ready to conſent to a ſuſpenſion of arms, upon his delivering up the city and caſtles of Palermo, at which place tranſports would be beſt provided, and other neceſſary meaſures concerted for the tranſportation of their army into Spain.' The marquis returned anſwer, 'that, as he underſtood, the plenipotentiaries of their maſters at the Hague were in treaty for ſettling the terms of evacuating thoſe iſlands, he did not think himſelf authorized to agree to a ceſſation on any other condition, than that each party ſhould remain on the ground they occupied, and expect further orders from their reſpective principals.'

The diſadvantages ariſing from ſuch an agreement were too obvious to be ſubmitted to; for the men of war and tranſports lay very inconveniently at Trapani, an unſafe road, where they had ſuſtained conſiderable damage, and ſome of the tranſports had been loſt. It was therefore neceſſary to have poſſeſſion of Palermo, as a ſecure retreat for the fleet, and the moſt commodious port for ſhipping off the troops. Beſides, it was a pledge of the ſincerity of the intentions of Spain to evacuate the iſland. In the next place, it put the Germans under a manifeſt inequality, to be confined to the ground they occupied, while the Spaniards were in poſſeſſion of the principal caricatori of corn, and plundered and rifled at pleaſure a country they were ſoon to leave. Nor could they comprehend, how an enemy, who, ſix weeks before, offered to leave the whole iſland, on condition of being ſent bac into Spain, ſhould now ſcruple to ſurrender Palermo; and therefore, as it had the appearance of chicaning, they reſolved to go on with the operations of the war. But, before they proceeded to action, they agreed to ſend a joint letter to the marquis, propoſing an interview between them at the Caſſine de Roſſignola, half way between the two armies, where accordingly they met the 2d of April, N. S. at noon, with an eſcorte of two hundred horſe on each ſide. In the conference the marquis de Lede owned 'that he knew the king his maſter had ſigned the quadruple alliance, and did not doubt of his intention to evacuate Sicily; but declared, he had no orders yet about it: that he expected full powers and inſtructions ſoon, and wiſhed they would, in the mean time, come to a ceſſation of arms.' He was aſked, 'what propoſals he had to make for that purpoſe?' He anſwered, 'none, but that both armies might hold the country, that was in their poſſeſſion, until he received orders to treat about the evacuation.' Count de Mercy thinking it unreaſonable to be tied down to a ſmall tract of the country, where he could not ſubſiſt, aſked him, 'whether, in caſe they ſhould conſent to his keeping poſſeſſion of Palermo, he had power to deliver up Auguſta, and the other poſts they held on that ſide of the iſland, which were now of no uſe to him, but it would be rather a conveniency to him to draw away the garriſons and troops he had in thoſe parts, to join his army, in order to the intended evacuation?' He confeſſed, 'he could not give up, nor quit the poſſeſſion of any part he had of the iſland, until he received further orders from his maſter;' and read part of his inſtructions to them. Count de Mercy, on the other ſide, ſhewed him part of the emperor's orders, which directed him 'to agree to a ſuſpenſion of arms, in order to the evacuation of Sicily and Sardinia, and to concert with the marquis de Lede the neceſſary conditions for facilitating the ſame, and to adjuſt that affair by all reaſonable meaſures: but that, if the marquis de Lede ſhould not own his having orders, or endeavour to evade them, and gain time, by pretending to ſend to Madrid for further inſtructions, and not name a reaſonable time for beginning to embark part of his troops, in that caſe he was to make uſe of his arms to oblige him to execute the treaty, which the Spaniſh miniſter had ſigned at the Hague.' He farther told the marquis, that the 17th of April was underſtood to be the time they ſhould go upon the evacuation; but, if it was not poſſible for him to begin ſo ſoon, he would not differ about a few days, provided they entered now into ſome agreement about the manner of doing it. He offered him the tranſports he had in his ſervice, and aſſured him, that he ſhould be accommodated with proviſions, and every thing he could in reaſon demand. The admiral, on his part, gave him the like aſſurances, and that he ſhould be eſcorted by as many of his maſter's ſhips, as he ſhould deſire. The marquis owned, that all they ſaid was reaſonable; but, complaining of the want of orders, the conference broke off, without coming to any iſſue. At parting, the marquis deſired the admiral to releaſe the biſhop of Mazzara, who was his priſoner, which the admiral readily conſented to.

During theſe debates, one of the Engliſh ſhips, cruiſing off Palermo, took a felucca, ſent by cardinal Aquavia from Rome, with packets of letters from Spain, to the marquis de Lede, which he delivered to the admiral; who, ſeeing the king of Spain's ſeal to the letters, generouſly ſent them unopened to the marquis, and ſet the falucca and crew at liberty.

The conference being broke off, the admiral returned to the the fleet at Trapani, and count de Mercy, reſolving to attac the Spaniards, marched towards Alcamo, where he arrived the 8th of April, N. S. the marquis having retreated the night before with precipitation, leaving ſome ſick men behind, whom he could not carry away. The marquis encamped at Valguernea and Sala di Partenico; but fearing to be followed by the imperialiſts, he retired on to Monreale. The retreat of the Spaniards made count de Mercy reſolve on the ſiege of Palermo: in order to which he ſent colonel baron Neyperg to confer with the admiral about the neceſſary aſſiſtance to be given by the fleet in facilitating the march of the army towards that place, by coaſting along with the proviſions and neceſſaries they ſhould want in their march, as well as in the ſiege, and ſupplying them with cannon and ammunition for that enterprize. The neceſſary diſpoſitions being concerted between the army and fleet, the count decamped from Alcamo the 18th of April, N.S. and followed the marquis de Lede, who retreating towards Monreale, kept poſſeſſion of that and other advantageous poſts, which led into the plains before Palermo, fortifying at the ſame time a ſtrong paſs by the ſea-ſide, called Sferra Cavallo, which was another way between the ſea-ſhore and the mountains into the ſame plan. Count de Mercy being arrived at Sala di Partenico, and not judging it adviſeable to attempt the paſſes, which the enemy poſſeſſed on the road of Monreale, he divided his army into two bodies, ſending general Zumjungen, with all his cavalry (except the Huſſars, and a regiment of dragoons) and ſeven battalions of foot, with the artillery and baggage, to the ſea-ſide, with orders to force the paſs of Sferra Cavallo, and enter that way into the plain of Palermo, whilſt he himſelf with the reſt of the army aſcended the difficult mountains about Carini, in order to get down that way into the ſame plain, judging, that, if the marquis drew his army to defend the paſs of Sferra Cavallo, he ſhould get between him and Palermo, or, at leaſt, have the advantage of falling upon his rear. The count having gained the heights of the mountains, from whence are diſcovered the plain and city of Palermo, perceived the Spaniſh army encamped in the bottom, intending to obſtruct his deſcent, and occupying all the paſſes in the way. Here count de Mercy ſent Zumjungen to rejoin him, which he did by the aſſiſtance of guides, provided by the magiſtrates of Carini, leaving a detachment under the command of colonel baron de Witgenau, to convoy the artillery and baggage by the way of the ſea-ſide, who, arriving at the paſs of Sferra Cavallo, found it abandoned by the Spaniards. On the 21ſt, the Germans began to deſcend from the mountains, and, forcing the ſeveral paſſes with leſs oppoſition than was expected, were almoſt all got down before night to the bottom. The whole was a moſt difficulty and fatiguing march, through ways, that that the inhabitants themſelves had really practiſed, but which the count ſurmounted with great expedition and military judgment.

The admiral coaſting along, in conformity to the motions of the army, came to an anchor with the fleet the 20th, in Mondello-bay, and ſent ſome of his ſoldiers to take poſſeſſion of a tower on the point, and another at the landing-place, as alſo three caſſines, that ſtood between, in order to preſerve their communication. On the 22d, the marquis de Lede ſent colonel Lacy, his aid de camp, with a letter to the admiral, incloſing a Spaniſh gazette, wherein was publiſhed the treaty of ſuſpenſion of arms at ſea, concluded at the Hague between the miniſters of Great-Britain, France, and Spain, which was to take place on the 10th inſtant; and therefore he propoſed to the admiral, 'to come to an agreement with him, for a ſeparate ceſſation of hoſtilities, as they had both full powers for that purpoſe; and proteſted againſt any violences he ſhould commit, contrary to the plain inſtructions of their ſovereigns.' This ſnare, laid to ſeparate the admiral from the German army, had no effect, the admiral returning anſwer, 'that he could give no regard or credit to a pretended convention, publiſhed in a foreign newſpaper, and even in which there was a clauſe, that nothing in it ſhould derogate from what ſhould be agreed between him and the marquis, for what concerns the Mediterranean ſea. That, as the Spaniſh miniſter had ſigned the quadruple alliance ever ſince the 17th of February laſt, it was ſurpriſing, that in all this time the marquis had received no orders for treating about the evacuation of the iſland, which was the neceſſary conſequence of it that he ſtill maintained every point and poſt with the ſame zeal and ardour, as before his maſter's acceſſion to the alliance. That the time for beginning the evacuation was elapſed; and therefore, without ſome reaſonable ſecurity, that he really intended it, he could come into no agreement for ſuſpenſion of arms; but whenever he ſhould be impowered to treat for both, he would moſt gladly go more than half-way to meet him, and not only agree on ſuch meaſures, as might put an end to the preſent differences, but which might reſtore and cultivate a good underſtanding, which no body more ardently wiſhed for, than he did. This was an adventurous proceeding in the admiral; for his inſtructions from England directed him to come to a ſuſpenſion of arms with Spain, without ſtaying for ſettling the terms of evacuation, which might take up time. But his penetration ſhewed him, that if a ſuſpenſion took place at ſea, the Spaniards might introduce what ſuccours and troops they pleaſed into the iſland, which would unravel all they had been doing; and if any inrerruption happened in the negotiations on foot, put the Spaniards in a better ſtate of proſecuting the war, and perhaps protract it another year. Their late conduct had made him jealous of their artifices, ſeeing them to lay hold of every advantage to evade the evacuation of the iſland, which the ſeparation would encourage and render the way to peace more diſtant and difficult. He determined therefore, as the convention for a ceſſation of arms at ſea, ſigned at the Hague the 29th of February, N.S. left him at liberty of treating as he thought proper, to remain united to the Germans, which he prudently ſaw, was the quickeſt way to bring the Spaniards to a compliance, and to come into real meaſures for the evacuation of the iſland. The event juſtified his precaution, and his conduct received at home the approbation it deſerved.

The march of the imperialiſts had made the Spaniards change the ſituation of their camp, which they pitched acroſs the plain before Palermo, extending their left to Monte Caputo, and their right to the ſea near the mole of Palermo, the whole army being under the cannon of that city, and having ſtrong entrenchments before them, lined with forty pieces of cannon. They were provided with plenty of all things, and ſeemed determined to ſtand the fate of a battle. The Germans encamped on the ſame plain, in the front of the enemy, and within a mile and a half diſtance, with their right at the foot of the mountains, from whence they had deſcended, and their left reaching to Monte Pelegrino, near the ſea-ſide, the artillery and baggage being arrived in their camp by the way of Sferra Cavallo. Count de Mercy ſeeing himſelf ſtraitened in room, and under difficulty of ſubſiſting, whilſt the enemy plundered and enric'ed themſelves with the ſpoils of a country they were quicly to abandon, he determined to bring matters to an engagement as ſoon as poſſible. In order to it, his ſcheme was to endeavour to get poſſeſſion of the mole, by which means he ſhould flank the enemy, and oblige them either to come to a battle with diſadvantage; or elſe to retire to Termini. For this purpoſe he detached baron Neyperg on the 26th, with ſix companies of grenadiers, to diſlodge the enemy from ſome poſts, which they had fortified on the ſea-ſide; and to facilitate the ſame, ſent baron de Witgenau, with ſix other companies of grenadiers, to ſeize on Monte Pelegrino. At the ſame time the admiral detached three ſhips, to cannonade the poſts on the ſea-ſide, their fire made the Spaniards abandon them, and the imperialiſts took poſſeſſion of them without any loſs. Theſe advantages confirmed count de Mercy in his reſolution to puſh his point that way; and having made the neceſſary diſpoſitions, the next day he cauſed to be attaced a caſſine, that ſtood a little diſtance from the enemy's trenches, but ſtrongly fortified with lines and ſome cannon, drawing out his whole army at the ſame time in order of battle, in caſe the enemy ſhould come out of their camp to ſupport it. The lines were ſoon taken, but the caſſine was not carried till after a very vigorous defence of above an hour, wherein the Germans had about one hundred and forty men killed or wounded; among the former a prince of Anhalt, and lieutenant-general Seckendorf wounded in the ſhoulders. On the 2d of May, about two in the afternoon, the weather being very hot, and the Spaniſh guard taking a Sieſto, according to the cuſtom of that nation, the Germans ſurprized a redoubt near the enemy's lines, entering the ſame without firing a ſhot, and puſhing the Spaniards out with their bayonets in their pieces. The Marquis de Lede, being informed of it, roſe from table, and ordered the army to be immediately drawn out, in order to retake that fortification, which commanded the whole line of the camp. On the other hand, count de Mercy being determined to maintain his hold, both armies were in motion, and juſt on the point of engaging, when fortunately a courier arriving in the very inſtant from Spain, in a falucca, delivered to the marquis a packet, containing full powers from the king of Spain to treat and agree about the evacuation of the iſlands of Sicily and Sardinia, and the tranſportation of the army into Spain. The marquis upon this drew off his army, and ſent letters by a trumpet to the general and admiral, to inform them of his orders. The next morning early, the admiral repairing to the German camp, officers were appointed on each ſide to treat of the ſuſpenſion of arms, and to regulate the manner of evacuating both iſlands; and conventions were drawn up for that purpoſe, and ſigned; that for Sicily on the 6th of May, and that for Sardinia two days after.

In purſuance of theſe conventions, the Germans were put in poſſeſſion of Palermo and the citadel of Caſtelamare the 10th, and the Spaniſh army marched to Termini, a ſea-port about twenty-five miles diſtant, from whence the firſt embarkation, conſiſting of about twelve thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe, ſailed the 20th of June, for Barcelona, and the remainder arrived at the ſame place the 25th of Auguſt following.

Nothing now remained to be done, but to put the duke of Savoy in poſſeſſion of the iſland of Sardinia: in order to which four battalions of Piedmonteſe troops embarked at Palermo, under the command of baron St. Remi, and ſailed under the convoy of ſome Engliſh men of war to Cagliari, where the admiral arriving as ſoon as he had ſettled all affairs in Sicily, he aſſiſted at the conferences with the miniſters and generals of the ſeveral powers concerned, wherein was regulated the manner of ſurrendering the iſland by the Spaniſh viceroy to the emperor, and the ceſſion of the ſame from the emperor to the duke of Savoy; and, at the inſtance of this prince, the admiral did not depart, till he had ſeen the whole fully executed, the Spaniſh troops returned into Spain, and the duke of Savoy put into quiet poſſeſſion of his new kingdom.

Thus ended the war of Sicily, wherein the fleet of Great-Britain bore ſo illuſtrious a part, that the fate of the iſland was wholly governed by its operations, both competitors agreeing that the one could not have conquered, nor the other have been ſubdued, without it. Never was any ſervice conducted in all its parts with greater zeal, activity, and judgment; nor was ever the Britiſh flag in ſo high reputation and reſpect in thoſe diſtant parts of Europe.[g]

During theſe tranſactions in the Mediterranean, the [g] As this hiſtory will not go down ſo low as the admiral's death, it may not be improper to inſert here what mr. Corbett ſays of him: king George, who had named him for the expedition to Sicily, and knew his abilities, uſed to ſay to his miniſters, when they applied for inſtructions to be ſent to him for his guidance, on certain important occaſions, that he would ſend him none, for he knew how to act without any; and indeed all the meaſures he took abroad were ſo exact and juſt, as to ſquare with the councils and plan of policy at home. The cauſe of the emperor being become the cauſe of his maſter, he ſerved the intereſts of that prince with a zeal and fidelity, that ſtood a pattern to his own ſubjects. He lived in ſuch harmony with the imperial viceroys and generals, as has been ſeldom ſeen among fellow-ſubjects united in command, the want of which has proved the ruin of many important expeditions. He was incapable of performing his duty in a cold or negligent manner; and, when any ſervice was committed to his management, he devoted his whole time and application to it; nor could any fatigue or indiſpoſition of body ever divert or interrupt his attention from any point that required preſent diſpatch. To this it might be in great meaſure owing, that he was never unfortunate in any undertaking, nor miſcarried in any ſervice that was entruſted to his direction. For whoever will trace upwards, to the ſprings and cauſes of public or private events, ſhall find (except where the immediate finger of providence is viſible) that what is uſually called ill-luc, is generally the effect of negligence, or imprudence. He always

French army, under the command of the duke of Berwick, advancing to the frontiers of Spain, took Fort-Paſſage, where they deſtroyed ſix men of war on the ſtocs. Then the duke formed the ſiege of Fonterabia, which was taken the 5th of June. The king of Spain made an unſucceſsful attempt to relieve the place, and approached with an army of nine thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe: but it was in the hands of the French before he could draw near enough to it; ſo he marched bac to Pampeluna, doubly diſappointed, both of raiſing the ſiege, and of the French forces deſertion: for he depended as much on the inſurrection in France, as on a rebellion in England; upon both which cardinal Alberoni's projects were founded. The cardinal ſtill refuſing to accede to the quadruple alliance, the duke of Berwick took St. Sebaſtian; and a party of French, joined by two hundred Engliſh ſeamen, made themſelves maſters of Port Antonio, in the bottom of the bay of Biſcay, where two ſixty-gun ſhips were deſtroyed on the ſtocs, and all the naval ſtores were burnt by the Engliſh.

About this time the cardinal received the news of the action at Franca Villa, in a letter from the marquis de Lede, who aſſumed to himſelf the victory. The cardinal choſe that occaſion to yield to the preſſing inſtances of the Dutch ambaſſador to conſent to a peace: he declared to him, that his catholic majeſty's intention was, that the ſtates-general ſhould be mediators.

A few days after, he ſent the marquis de Scotti to Paris, from whence he was to paſs into Holland, to carry inſtructions to the marquis de Beretti Landi, how to proceed with the States. The duke of Orleans, to whom he had orders to declare his intentions, refuſed him a paſſport, ſaying, he could not do it without the knowledge of the emperor and king George, who were ſtill more concerned than himſelf in this affair, and that the paſſport would be a tacit approbation of the conduct of the ſtates-general, and a ſort of acceptance of their mediations; deciſions, ſaid the regent, that become me not to make. And indeed, the emperor and king George, being conſulted on that head, abſolutely rejected it.

Beſides that, they were unwilling the States (with whom they were diſpleaſed for their ſlowneſs in acceding to the quadruple alliance) ſhould have the honour of this mediation, and reap, as it were, the fruit of their conduct, they had each their particular hopes and views, which a ſudden peace would have diſappointed. The emperor wanted to repair the glory of his arms by the conqueſt of Sicily; and king George had a mind to be revenged for the uneaſineſs given him, on account of the intended invaſion of Scotland. He was reſolved to make ſome conqueſt, that ſhould indemnify his ſubjects for the charge they had been at. He formed two projects, to take the Corunna, the beſt port of Biſcay, and to make himſelf maſter of Peru in America. Great preparations were made, fifty tranſports were provided, with three bomb-veſſels, and four thouſand men were ordered to be in readineſs to embark in the iſle of Wight.[h] The lord Cobham was appointed to command in chief, with the title of captain-general.[i] Theſe forces being embarked ſailed from St. Helens the 21ſt of September, under the convoy of five or ſix men of war, commanded by admiral Mighels, who was to be joined by captain Johnſon, then cruiſing off Fonterabia. But this junction was never made, and the important and ſecret (as it was called) expedition upon the Corunna ended only in the taking of Vigo, which ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons; the citadel made ſome reſiſtance, but ſurrendered likewiſe in a few days. On the 10th of October, the garriſon marched out, conſiſting of about three hundred men, beſides one hundred and fifty peaſants, there having been above three hundred killed or wounded by the bombs. The Engliſh loſt but two officers, and three or four men. There were in the town about ſixty pieces of large cannon, which, when the enemy abandoned, they nailed and damaged them, as much as the time would give them leave. In the citadel were forty-three pieces, of which fifteen were braſs guns, and two large mortars; beſides above two thouſand barrels of powder, and ſeveral cheſt of arms, amounting to about eight thouſand muſkes. All theſe ſtores and the braſs ordinance had been lodged there from on board the ſhips, which were to have viſited Great-Britain, and the very troops, which gave up Vigo, were likewiſe of that expedition. The lord Cobham had ſummoned the adjacent country to furniſh proviſions, and pay contribution, on pain of military execution; and had ſent a party to Redondella, where they found the old fort abandoned, and run to ruin, and the inhabitants fled. That part of the province was under ſuch conſternation, that it was thought half the people had run away into Portugal. There were but few regular troops in the province; but the marquis de Riſburg had drawn together as many as he could get near Tuy, which is within three or four leagues of Vigo.

Two days after the ſurrender of the citadel of Vigo, one thouſand men were ordered on board four tranſports under the command of major-general Wade, to ſail to the upper end of the bay of Vigo, and to march from thence to Pont a Vedra, ten leagues off. The magiſtrates of the town met them with the keys; and there were found in the place two forty-eight pounders, four twenty-four pounders, ſix eight pounders, and four mortars, all braſs; beſides ſeventy pieces of iron cannon, two thouſand ſmall arms, and ſome bombs. The Biddeford man of war, and two tranſports, were ſent thither, to bring away the braſs cannon, arms, and ſtores; after which the detachment under major-general Wade was ordered on board their ſhips, and the major-general returned to Vigo the 23d of October. Four days after, the troops being embarked, the fleet ſailed for England.[k]

Vice-admiral Hoſier was to ſail to the Weſt-Indies with a ſquadron of men of war, where he was to be joined by all that were in thoſe parts; but this expedition was fruſtrated by the winds, and Peru was not ſo much as attaced.

Spain, oppreſſed on all ſides, and drained by the great efforts ſhe had made, began to think ſeriouſly of peace. A plan was ſent to the marquis de Beretti Landi, which he delivered to the States the 22d of December. By this plan, England was to reſtore Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, and France all the conqueſts ſhe had lately made: the ſucceſſiproceeded upon ſolid principles, and left nothing to fortune, that could be accompliſhed by foreſight and application. His firmneſs and plain dealing were ſo apparent to the foreigners, who treated with him upon buſineſs, that it contributed much to the diſpatch and ſucceſs of his tranſactions with them; for they could depend upon what he ſaid, and as they ſaw he uſed no arts or chicanes himſelf, and had too diſcerning a ſpirit to ſuffer them to paſs unobſerved in others, they often found it their beſt policy to leave their intereſts in his hands and management, being very ſure of a moſt impartial and punctual performance of whatever he engaged in. His reputation was ſo thoroughly eſtabliſhed in this particular, that in the frequent diſputes and altercations which aroſe between the Savoyards and Germans in the courſe of the wars, and between the latter and the Spaniards at the concluſion of it, wherein little faith or confidence was given to the promiſes or aſſeverations of each other, he was the common umpire between them, always ſtemming and oppoſing any extravagant or unjuſt demands (which the over-bearing temper of the German general was very apt to ſuggeſt, where he had the ſuperior hand) and reconciling, as much as poſſible, the violences of war, with the rules of honour and juſtice. When he departed from Italy to attend his late majeſty at Hanover, the king, among many gracious expreſſions, told him, that he had found out the ſecret of obliging his enemies as well as friends, and that the court of Spain had mentioned, with great acknowledgment, his fair and friendly behaviour in the proviſion of tranſports and other neceſſaries for the embarkation of their troops, and in protecting them from many vexations and oppreſſions that had been attempted. No wonder, that a man, endowed with ſuch talents and ſuch a diſpoſition, left behind him in Italy and other foreign parts, the character of a great ſoldier, an able ſtateſman, and an honeſt man.

To give ſome deſcription of his perſon, he was of a ſlender conſtitution, but well ſupplied with ſpirits, which did not diſplay themſelves ſo much in gaiety of converſation (for he was modeſt in his nature) as in activity in all the duties and functions of life or buſineſs in which he was indefatigable, and, by a continued habit of induſtry, had hardened and inured a body, not naturally ſtrong, to patience of any fatigue. He had made no great proficiency in ſchool-learning (which the early age of going to ſea ſeldom admits of) but his great diligence, joined with excellent natural parts, and a juſt ſenſe of honour, made him capable of conducting difficult negotiations and commiſſions with proper dignity and addreſs. In his younger days he was both in the ſea and land-ſervice, being an officer of foot in the garriſon of Tangier, but preferring the ſea, he was ſoon diſtinguiſhed and favoured by that great ſeaman admiral Ruſſel (afterwards earl of Orford) who made him his firſt captain at the age of twenty-nine, a poſt equal in rank to a rear-admiral, and, by degrees, he arrived to be a commiſſioner of the admiralty, and firſt admiral of the fleet, in which quality he commanded in the war of Sicily. On his repairing to Hanover, his late majeſty was pleaſed to expreſs his regard to his eminent ſervices, by making him treaſurer of the navy, and rear-admiral of Great-Britain, and ſoon after a privy-counſellor, and peer of Great-Britain, with the title of viſcount Torrington; and afterwards knight of the Bath, upon the revival of that order. When his preſent majeſty came to the crown, he was pleaſed to place him at the head of his naval affairs, as firſt lord-commiſſioner of the admiralty, in which high ſtation he died, in the year 1733, in the 70th year of his age.

[h] Seven companies out of each of the three regiments of guards; colonel Chudleigh's regiment, lieutenant-general Wells's regiment, lord Hichinbrook's regiment; and the regiments of Howard, Grove, Hurley, and Barrel, and fifty dragoons.

[i] He had under him major-general Wade, the lords Mark Ker and Dunmore, colonel Honeywood, brigadier-general; colonel Armſtrong, quarter-maſter general; and colonel Leigonier, adjutant-general.

[k] While the Engliſh were at Vigo, captain Johnſon, commander of the Weymouth, the Wincheſter, and another Engliſh man of war, came up with a Portugueze carval from Ribadeo, and being informed that there were two Spaniſh men of war in that port, about ſixteen leagues to the eaſt of cape Ortegas, he made thither; ſent the boats in a-head to ſound, and followed with the ſhips. He anchored within muſket-ſhot of the enemy's ſhips, and a battery of eight guns fired on both, and ſoon beat the Spaniards out of the battery, which he took poſſeſſion of, and entirely demoliſhed. In the interim, the two Spaniſh men of war blew up; and after ſome ſmall firing on the town, he ſailed out of the harbour, taking with him a Spaniſh merchant-ſhip, which he found there.

ons of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia were to be ſettled on the queen of Spain's ſon, without being held either of the emperor or empire: all the ſhips taken this war were to be reſtored to Spain; Sicily, in the hands of the emperor, was to be ſubject to the ſame right of reverſion, as when granted to the duke of Savoy: the pope was to be obliged to reſtore to the duke of Parma the duchy of Caſtro, and the country of Roneiglione, uſurped by Innocent X. from the houſe of Farneſe: laſtly, the dominion and commerce of the Weſt-Indies ſhould be regulated, according to the treaty of Utrecht.

Theſe propoſals had been preceded by a ſtep very grateful to the allies. The ambition of cadinal Alberoni had rendered him perſonally odious to the emperor, to king George, and to the duke of Orleans. All three had declared, at leaſt intimated, that they would hearken to no peace as long as he was in place: the king of Spain thought it proper to make him a ſacrifice, and purchaſe the tranquility of his people, at the expence of a miniſter ever unfortunate. The king writ to him with his own hand, forbidding him to meddle with the affairs of ſtate, to appear any where in his preſence, to remain in Madrid above eight days, and in Spain above three weeks.

The plan of the court of Madrid was rejected as ſubverſive of the treaty of London, and nothing leſs would be accepted, but a full acceſſion to the quadruple alliance; which, after immenſe charges, and many mortifications, was ſubmitted to by the king of Spain. The war with Spain has been thus related, without regard to the order of time, that an idea of the whole might be formed, without having recourſe to different parts of the hiſtory.

Whilſt the king was at Hanover, memorials full of grievances were preſented to him by the proteſtants from Hungary, Poland, Spire, Mentz, and particularly from the Palatinate. In Poland, contrary to the fundamental conſtitutions of the kingdom, and the expreſs tenor of the treaties, the popiſh clergy had engaged the diet of Grodno to make ſome of the reformed towns their right of ſuffrage. In Hungary, by the credit and practices of the jeſuits, many books of divinity, brought from England and Holland, were confiſcated. At Spire and Mentz, ſeveral churches were taken from them, and given to the catholics.

The greateſt complaints came from the Palatinate. The catechiſm of Heidelberg was ſuppreſſed, after having been received above a hundred and ſixty years as a formula of union among the reformed. The church of the Holy Ghoſt at Meidelberg was alſo taken from the proteſtants, on pretence of its belonging to the court, and likewiſe the church of Creutzpach, with the revenues of ſeveral others; and, what ſeemed ſtill more intolerable, the diſpoſal of the alms of the reformed were given to the catholics, who forced them moreover, to contribute to the popiſh ceremonies, and forbid them to open their ſhops, or to work on the holidays.

Almoſt all the proteſtant ſtates and princes interpoſed in behalf of the oppreſſed. King George diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal on this occaſion, and writ very preſſing letters, which were ſupported by memorials from his miniſters. But this affair ſucceeded not to his wiſh; his repreſentations were well received, as they could not fail to be, conſidering his great weight; the elector of Palatine gave favourable anſwers, and made fair promiſes; but the grievances were not redreſſed.[l]

During the king's abſence all was quiet at home, and the regency had little to do. There was, however, a kind of diſpute with the czar's miniſter about his ſecretary, who had been committed to priſon by a juſtice of peace. But, upon the firſt complaint of his maſter, the ſecretary was releaſed, and the juſtice put out of his office, and obliged to beg pardon for his imprudence. There was alſo a great riot in June, raiſed by the journeymen weavers about Biſhopſgate and Aldgate. They inſulted the women for wearing calicoes, and tore their gowns off their backs. The militia was ordered out to ſuppreſs the rioters, of whom ſome of the ringleaders were taken and condemned to ſtand in the pillory.[m]

The parliament of Ireland met the 1ſt of July. The duke of Bolton, lord-lieutenant, pointed out in his ſpeech the ſubjects of their deliberation. He ſaid, they were called together to conſult of proper meaſures, and make neceſſary proviſions to repeal or ſuppreſs any attempt to involve the kingdom in the calamities of a rebellion, or a foreign invaſion. He repreſented it as a deluſion to imagine, that the deſigns of their enemies did not extend to Ireland, as well as to England and Scotland: and though theſe deſigns had been hitherto prevented by the king's counſels and indefatigable endeavours, yet it would be prudent to provide ſuch effectual remedies as might render it impracticable to proceed further with any proſpect of ſucceſs.

'It is obvious and viſible to every conſidering man, that a good agreement and union among all proteſtants will greatly contribute to this end: and the numbers, as well as ſtrict union, of the papiſts, among themſelves, together with their apparent inclinations and attachment to the intereſt of the pretender, ſeem to make it more immediately neceſſary at this time. In what manner a thing ſo deſirable may be obtained, his majeſty leaves to your conſideration, and has commanded me to acquaint you, that as he has the welfare of the church, by law eſtabliſhed, under his peculiar care, and reſolves always to ſupport and maintain

[l] The king, in his letter to the king of Poland, in behalf of the proteſtants, expreſſed himſelf thus: 'that they may enjoy, for the future, their former liberty of conſcience, which cannot be forced by any human power, and over which God had reſerved to himſelf the ſole command.'

At his return to England, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, accompanied with ten other biſhops, in a congratulatory ſpeech ſaid, among other things, 'I am alſo directed by my lords the biſhops, to return our moſt humble acknowledgement to your majeſty, for the protection your majeſty hath been pleaſed to give to our brethren, the proteſtants of the Palatinate, and of Poland, and Lithuania, perſecuted for the faith of Chriſt. We are perſuaded, that his royal charity will draw down innumerable bleſſings from heaven, upon the perſon of your ſacred majeſty, and your affairs.'

In the addreſs from the univerſity of Cambridge, preſented by dr. Gooch, the vice-chancellor, were the following words: 'it is with particular pleaſure we behold your majeſty, in conjunction with other powers, aſſerting the cauſe of liberty, and ſupporting the intereſt of our proteſtant brethren abroad, whoſe deplorable condition every day convinces us, that the proteſtant profeſſions muſt ſtand or fall with the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

[m] During the king's abſence died mr. Joſeph Addiſon, June 17. He was ſon of dr. Lancelot Addiſon, dean of Litchfield; and being educated at the Charter-houſe ſchool, was ſent from thence to the univerſity of Oxford, where he finiſhed his ſtudies in Magdalen college: he became firſt known to the world by the excellency of his Latin poems, which he publiſhed in the Muſæ Anglicanæ, and dedicated to Charles Montague, earl of Halifax, who, together with the lord Sommers, then lord-keeper (to whom he inſcribed the firſt piece he publiſhed in Engliſh, viz. A poem to his majeſty king William III. on the taking of Namure, in the year 1695) recommended him to that prince, who gave him a penſion of 300l. per ann. and ſent him to travel. At his return from his travels, he was made commiſſioner of appeals in the exciſe; afterwards he was under ſecretary to two ſecretaries of ſtate, and ſecretary of ſtate himſelf in Ireland, under two lord-lieutenants. Upon the death of queen Anne, he was made ſecretary to the regency, after that one of the lords-commiſſioners for trade and plantations, and then advanced to be one of the principal Secretaries of ſtate to king George; which office by reaſon of his ill ſtate of health, he was obliged to reſign ſome time before his death. He married Charlotte, daughter of ſir Thomas Middleton, of Chirk-caſtle, in the county of Denby, bart. and relict of Edward Rich, earl of Warwick, by whom he left iſſue only one daughter.

July 6, died Meinhardt Schomberg, duke of Schomberg and Leinſter, marquis of Harwich, &c. knight companion of the moſt noble order of the garter, and count of the ſacred roman empire: he married Charlotte, eldeſt daughter of Charles Lewis, elector-palatine, by whom he left iſſue only two daughters; Frederica, married to Robert d'Arcy, earl of Holderneſs (the preſent counteſs Fitzwalter) and Mary, married to count Dagenfeldt of the empire.

July 24, died Heneage Finch, earl of Aylesford, ſecond ſon of Daniel Finch, earl of Nottingham. He was ſucceeded by his ſon of the ſame name.

While the king was abroad, a great diſpute and difference aroſe between the diſſenting miniſters in London, about ſubſcribing and non-ſubſcribing articles of advice for the conduct of their congregations.

The diſſenters at ſeveral places, but more eſpecially at Exeter, being jealous that their miniſters were not as orthodox as themſelves, in the article of the trinity, had demanded of them a confeſſion of faith; and upon advice of the differences between their paſtors and them, on this occaſion, the diſſenting miniſters, in and about London, held a Synod, to conſult of articles of advice for peace. They met at Salters-hall. The main debate was inſerting in the advice the firſt article of the church of England, and the anſwer to the fifth and ſixth queſtions in the aſſembly's catechiſm. But upon the queſtion it was carried by a majority of fifty-ſeven againſt fifty-three, 'that no human compoſitions or interpretations of the doctrine of the trinity ſhould be made a part of theſe articles of advice,' which they were met to draw up. How far the heats carried them on both ſides, may be ſeen by what happened at the diviſion. One of thoſe, who were againſt human compoſitions, ſaying, as he went out, 'you that are againſt perſecution come up ſtairs:' and another, who was for them, 'you that are for the doctrine of the trinity ſtay below.'

The ſubſcribers withdrew from the aſſembly, notwithſtanding the queſtion had been carried againſt them, and ſet their names to a paper containing the firſt article, and the two anſwers before-mentioned.

At the ſame time the non-ſubſcribers made the following declaration:

'We freely declare that we utterly diſown the Arian doctrines, and ſincerely believe the doctrine of the trinity, and the proper divinity of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which we apprehend to be clearly revealed in the holy ſcriptures; but are far from condemning any who appear to be with us in the main, though they chuſe not to declare themſelves in other than ſcripture terms, or not in ours.'

Which they farther explain thus:

'The human words, trinity and proper divinity, in this declaration of our faith, are uſed only to notify the things we ſpeak of; and we do not preſume in way of teſt to go into any particular explanations of thoſe things either in our own, or other men's words: but for that we refer to the holy ſcriptures, whence it may appear, that we take the ſcripture account of thoſe things, to be the beſt and fitteſt we can uſe on ſuch occaſions.'

Whilſt theſe matters were tranſacting at London, three congregations at Exeter proceeded to the actual excluſion of their paſtors, mr. Pierce, mr. Withers, and mr. Hallet, for refuſing to ſubſcribe certain articles of faith, which had been prepared for them.

It is not unlikely, ſays a certain author, (old Mixon) that a leading man or two among the ſubſcribers had private encouragement from a great prelate to proceed as they did.

it; ſo it would be very pleaſing to him, if any method could be found (not inconſiſtent with the ſecurity of it) to render the proteſtant diſſenters more uſeful and capable of ſerving his majeſty, and ſupporting the proteſtant intereſt, than they now are; they having, upon all occaſions, given ſufficient proofs of their being well affected to his majeſty's perſon and government, and to the ſucceſſion of the crown in his royal houſe: and this I am ordered to lay before you as a thing greatly importing his majeſty's ſervice and your own ſecurity.'

The method here mentioned was already found. The act paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion in England was an ample direction to proceed by. Both houſes aſſured, that they thought it their duty and intereſt to promote a good underſtanding and union among all proteſtants, to enable them to withſtand the deſigns of ſuch numerous and malicious enemies, and therefore they would readily enter into the conſideration of ſuch methods, as might render the proteſtant diſſenters more eaſy and capable of ſupporting the proteſtant intereſt. Accordingly, an act paſſed for that purpoſe, under the title of, 'a bill for exempting the proteſtant diſſenters of the kingdom of Ireland from certain penalties, to which they are now ſubject.'

The parliament made other uſeful regulations, for preventing the marriage of infants againſt the will of the parents or guardians; for encouraging the cultivation of lands; for preventing tumults and ſeditious aſſemblies; for ſuppreſſing tories, robbers, and rapparees; and for the better maintenance of ſchools and teaching the Engliſh tongue throughout the kingdom.

In Scotland there appeared no remains of rebellion. The cheifs being retired, the Highlanders ſurrendered their arms, and the regency ſeemed to fear no diſturbance from that quarter, nor had they any orders to give. However, the evil was not quite cured, of which were ſeen now and then ſome ſtrange proofs. At Edindurgh alone, five miniſters, cited before the magiſtrates, refuſed to acknowledge king George, and their churches were forced to be ſhut up.

After ſix months abſence, the king returned to London, the 14th of November, more reſpected than ever, on account of the great things he had done for the welfare and intreſt of his dominions. He was received with demonſtrations of the livelieſt joy, and thoſe who were not forward to ſhew it were puniſhed by the populace, and the windows broke that were not illuminated. Whilſt in Germany, he had ſent orders for the meeting of the parliament on the 23d of November, and for the members to be all there, by reaſon of the importance of the affairs he had to communicate to them.

On that day the ſeſſion was opened with the following ſpeech, read by the chancellor to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The ſatisfaction, with which I always met you, is very much increaſed at this time, when it has pleaſed Almighty God ſo to ſtrengthen the arms of Great-Britain and our confederates, and ſo to proſper our ſeveral negotiations, that, by his bleſſing on our endeavours, we may promiſe ourſelves to reap very ſoon the fruits of our ſucceſſes. I am perſuaded, it will be accounted by all my good ſubjects a ſufficient reward for ſome extraordinary expence, that all Europe, as well as theſe kingdoms, is upon the point of being delivered from the calamities of war, by the influence of Britiſh arms and counſels. One proteſtant kingdom (Sweden) has already been relieved by our ſeaſonable interpoſition; and ſuch a foundation is laid, by our late treaties, for an union amongſt other great proteſtant powers, as will very much tend to the ſecurity of our holy religion.

I believe you cannot but be ſurprized at the continuance of the war, where our enemies have nothing to hope, and ſo much to fear. It is indeed difficult to frame any judgment of thoſe councils, which have broke out of late in ſo many raſh and ill-concerted meaſures. If they depend upon our diviſions at home, I doubt not but, in a very ſhort time, their hopes, founded upon this expectation, will prove as vain and ill-grounded, as any of their former projects.

In congratulating with you on this happy poſture of affairs I muſt tell you, that, as I have been very juſt and faithful to my engagements, ſo I have met ſuch frank and powerful returns of aſſiſtance from my allies, as will, I doubt not, eſtabliſh a laſting friendſhip among us.

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

You will ſee, by the accounts I have ordered to be delivered to you, how moderate a uſe I have made of the power intruſted with me, to augment my forces by ſea and land. I depend upon the eminent duty and affection you have always ſhewn to my perſon and government, that you will be vigorous in diſpatching the neceſſary ſupplies for the year; to which purpoſe I have ordered the eſtimates to be laid before you. And, at the ſame time, I muſt deſire you to turn your thoughts to all proper means for leſſening the debts of the nation.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

You all muſt be ſenſible of the many undeſerved and unnatural troubles I have met with, during the courſe of my reign. Our diviſions at home have been magnified abroad; and, by inſpiring into ſome foreign powers a falſe opinion of our force, have encouraged them to treat us in a manner, which the crown of Great-Britain ſhall never endure while I wear it. The trouble and expence, which this has brought upon us, have been the moſt loudly complained of by thoſe, who were the occaſion of them. But with your aſſiſtance I have hitherto got through all theſe difficulties, and, by the continuance of your help, I hope very ſoon to overcome them, ſince the hand of God hath ſo viſibly been with us in all our undertakings.

If the neceſſities of my government have ſometimes engaged your duty and affection to truſt me with powers, of which you have always, with good reaſon, been jealous, the whole world muſt acknowledge they have been ſo uſed, as to juſtify the confidence you have repoſed in me. And, as I can truly affirm, that no prince was ever more zealous to increaſe his own authority, than I am to perpetuate the liberty of my people, I hope you will think of all proper methods to eſtabliſh and tranſmit to your poſterity, the freedom of our happy conſtitution, and particularly to ſecure that part, which is moſt liable to abuſe. I value myſelf upon being the firſt, who hath given you an opportunity of doing it; and I muſt recommend it to you, to compleat thoſe meaſures, which remained imperfect the laſt ſeſſion.

So far as human prudence can foretel, the unanimity of this ſeſſion of parliament muſt eſtabliſh, with the peace of all Europe, the glory and trade of theſe kingdoms on a laſting foundation. I think every man may ſee the end of our labours. All I have to aſk of you is, that you would agree to be a great and flouriſhing people, ſince it is the only means by which I deſire to become a happy king.'

The addreſſes were agreeable to the ſpeech, the king was thanked and congratulated for the great ſucceſs of his meaſures to eſtabliſh the peace of Europe. 'It is with the utmoſt pleaſure and ſatisfaction (ſay the lords) that we ſee the preſent happy union between your majeſty and the other great proteſtant powers, which does ſo viſibly tend to the ſecurity of our holy religion; and we deſire to expreſs the deep ſenſe which we have of your majeſty's ſeaſonable interpoſition for the poor perſecuted proteſtants abroad; and we humble beſeech your majeſty, that you would be pleaſed to continue your powerful protection and offices in favour of them.' They concluded with ſaying, 'we promiſe ourſelves, that the whole world will ſoon be convinced with how little foundation the enemies of your majeſty and your kingdoms have flattered themſelves to reap any benefit from our inteſtine diviſions.

We ſhould be wanting in our duty to your majeſty and our country, if we did not return your majeſty our moſt hearty thanks for that tender and unprecedented care and concern, your majeſty has been pleaſed to expreſs in your moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne, for the liberties of your people, and the freedom of our happy conſtitution.'

The commons, after thanks and congratulation, very ſtrongly expreſſed their aſſurances in theſe words:

'We crave leave to aſſure your majeſty, that we will, on our parts, by the vigour of our reſolutions, for the ſupport of your government, and by the diſpatch which we will give to the neceſſary ſupplies, convince the world, that, if our enemies have conceived any hopes from our diviſions at home, this hath been the vaineſt of all their projects. And we will enable your majeſty, in concert with your allies, effectually to ſupport and perfect thoſe juſt and equitable meaſures which have been taken to eſtabliſh a general peace.

And we farther aſſure your majeſty, that we will apply ourſelves to find out the beſt means for leſſening the debts of the nation, and ſupporting the public credit, and concur in all proper methods to eſtabliſh and preſerve the freedom of our happy conſtitution, for which your ſacred majeſty has given ſo many tender proofs of your care and affection.'

As the king had recommended in his ſpeech the thinking of proper methods to eſtabliſh the freedom of the conſtitution (by which was meant the peerage-bill) the duke of Buckingham, two days after the beginning of the ſeſſion, revived the bill for limiting the peers, which had been dropped by the prorogation. In oppoſition to this bill, earl Cowper ſaid, 'beſides the reaſons, that induced him laſt ſeſſion to be againſt this bill, he had now another, that weighed no leſs with him than all the reſt, the earneſtneſs, with which it was recommended, and the eagerneſs, with which it was brought before them at the beginning of a ſeſſion. He had obſerved both from hiſtory, and his own experience, that, in affairs of moment, precipitation was ever dangerous, and, in many caſes, to be ſuſpected; and, for his own part, he could not help being of opinion, that, if there were no ſecret meaning in this bill, ſome men would not be ſo preſſing for it.' To this the earl of Sunderland anſwered, 'that it could not with any juſtice be ſaid, that any precipitation had been uſed in this affair, ſince the bill in queſtion had been brought in the laſt ſeſſion, and then thoroughly examined; ſo that he doubted not, but every member of that houſe was fully apprized of it, and ready to give his vote for or againſt it. That the reaſon, why it was brought in ſo ſoon at this time, he conceived to be, that it might give no interruption to the other important affairs, which the king had recommended to his parliament. And, as for any ſecret meaning in this bill, he ſolemnly declared, he knew of no other, but what his majeſty had been pleaſed graciouſly to intimate in his ſpeech, the ſecuring the freedom of our conſtitution, by preventing, for the future, the abuſe of one branch of the royal prerogative, of which they had a fatal inſtance in the late reign, and which had given juſt offence, and terrible apprehenſions to all ſober men.' To this it was replied, 'that if it was foreſeen, that bill might interrupt the other important affairs, it had been adviſable to keep it till the middle, or towards the end of the ſeſſion, and to begin with the king's buſineſs.' But the duke of Bucks compromiſed the matter, by ſaying, 'that, for his own part, he apprehended no danger from this bill; and if it was attended with any inconveniencies, as all human affairs are apt to be, time would diſcover it; and then, as in all other caſes, they might apply a remedy to it. As to the time of bringing it in, he thought it no material objection, ſince this houſe had no other buſineſs to go upon; but that he foreſaw, that, whatever diſpatch they made in that bill, it would not get ſo quic a paſſage in the other houſe.' After theſe ſpeeches, the bill paſſed the lords without any farther oppoſition, and was ſent to the commons, where it was oppoſed by a great many members. Mr Craggs urged in favour of the bill, 'that his majeſty, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, had had no other view, than to procure the good and happineſs of his ſubjects, and to ſecure their rights and liberties. That having, in his royal wiſdom, conſidered the abuſe, that was made in the laſt reign of that branch of the prerogative, relating to the creating of peers, which abuſe had brought the liberties of Great-Britain, and of all Europe, into immediate danger, his majeſty, through a condeſcenſion worthy of a prince truly magnanimous, had graciouſly been pleaſed to conſent, that ſuch bounds be ſet to that part of the prerogative, as may prevent any exorbitant and dangerous exerciſes of it for the time to come. That it was only in the reign of good princes, that legiſlators had opportunities to remedy and amend the defects, to which all human inſtitutions are ſubject: and that, if the preſent occaſion of rectifying that apparent flaw in our conſtitution were loſt, it might perhaps never be retrieved.' Mr Walpole ſpoke on the other ſide, and endeavoured to anſwer all that had been offered for the bill. He took notice, 'that among the Romans, the wiſeſt people upon earth, the temple of fame was placed behind the temple of virtue, to denote, that there was no coming to the former, without going through the other. But that, if this bill paſſed into a law, one of the moſt powerful incentives to virtue would be taken away, ſince there would be no coming to honour, but through the winding-ſheet of an old decripit lord, and the grave of an extinct noble family. That it was matter of juſt ſurprize, that a bill of this nature ſhould either have been projected, or at leaſt promoted by a gentleman, who not long ago ſat among them, and who, having got into the houſe of peers, would now ſhut up the door after him. That this bill would not only be a diſcouragement to virtue and merit, but alſo endanger our excellent conſtitution: for, as there was a due balance between the three branches of the legiſlature, if any more weight were thrown into any one of thoſe branches, it would deſtroy that balance, and conſequently ſubvert the conſtitution. That the peers were already poſſeſſed of many valuable privileges; and to give them more power and authority, by limiting their number, would, in time, bring bac the commons into the ſtate of the ſervile dependency, which they were in, when they wore the badges of the lords. That he could not but wonder, that the lords would ſend ſuch a bill to the commons; for how could they expect, that the commons would give their concurrence to ſo injurious a law, by which they and their poſterities are to be excluded from the peerage? And how would the lords receive a bill, by which it would be enacted, that a baron ſhould not be made a viſcount, nor a viſcount be made an earl, and ſo on? That, beſides all this, that part of the bill, which related to the peerage of Scotland, would be a manifeſt violation of the act of union, on the part of England, and a diſhonourable breach of truſt in thoſe, who repreſented the Scots nobility. That ſuch an infringement of the union would endanger the entire diſſolution of it, by diſguſting ſo great a number of the Scots peers, as ſhould be excluded from ſitting in the Britiſh parliament. For as it was well known, that the revolution-ſettlement ſtood upon the principle of a mutual compact, if we ſhould break firſt the articles of union, it would be natural for the Scots to think themſelves thereby freed from all allegiance. And as for what had been ſuggeſted, that the election of the ſixteen Scots peers was no leſs expenſive to the crown, than injurious to the peerage of Scotland, it might be anſwered, that the making twenty-five hereditary ſitting Scots peers would ſtill increaſe the diſcontents of the electing peers, who thereby would be deprived of a valuable conſideration for not being choſen.' After theſe, and ſeveral other ſpeeches, the bill was at laſt rejected by a majority of two hundred and ſixty-nine againſt one hundred and ſeventy-ſeven. Thus the prerogative of increaſing the number of the peers, as the king ſhould think proper, which he ſeemed ſo willing to diveſt himſelf of, was, as it were againſt his conſent, preſerved to him. It was obſerved by an oppoſer of the bill, (ſir J. Packington) that ſome perſons had through indiſcretion occaſioned an unhappy difference [in the royal family] and he was apprehenſive if that bill, ſo prejudicial to the rights of the next heir, ſhould paſs into a law, it might render that difference irreconcilable. This was ſaid chiefly with regard to the earl of Sunderland, who promoted the bill with the greateſt eagerneſs. It was alſo reported that mr. Craggs was to have been one of the ſix Engliſh peers, to be created after the paſſing of the bill.

During this ſeſſion, a bill, for better ſecuring the dependency of Ireland upon the crown of Great-Britain, paſſed both houſes. This bill took its riſe, from an appeal to the houſe of peers in England, by Maurice Anneſley, againſt a decree of the houſe of peers in Ireland; which the Britiſh houſe of peers received, and ordered the barons of the exchequer in Ireland to cauſe mr. Anneſley to be forthwith put in poſſeſſion of certain lands in the county of Kildare, of which he had been diſpoſſeſſed by virtue of a decree of the houſe of peers in Ireland. Purſuant to this order, the barons of the exchequer in that kingdom iſſued out an injunction to Alexander Burrows, ſheriff of the county of Kildare, and ſet ſeveral fines upon him, for refuſing to put it in execution; which the houſe of peers in Ireland diſcharged, and voted, that Jeffery Gilbert, lord chief-baron of the exchequer, John Pocklington and ſir John St. Leger, the other barons of the exchequer in Ireland, had acted in manifeſt derogation to the king's prerogative, in his high court of parliament in Ireland, as alſo of the rights and privileges of this kingdom, and of the parliament thereof. Theſe barons were alſo ordered to be taken into cuſtody of the uſher of the blac-rod. [n]

1719-20] The houſe of peers in Ireland drew up a long repreſentation to be tranſmitted to the king, ſetting forth their right to the final judicature of cauſes in that kingdom; and the duke of Leeds, in a proteſt againſt a vote paſſed in the houſe of peers in England, gave fifteen reaſons to ſupport the claim of the houſe of peers in Ireland. But the houſe of lords in England reſolved, 'that the barons of the exchequer in Ireland had acted with courage according to law, in ſupport of his majeſty's prerogative, and with fidelity to the crown of Great-Britain;' and ordered an addreſs to the king, 'for conferring on them ſome marks of his royal favour, as may be a recompence for the ill uſage they have received, by being unjuſtly cenſured, and illegally impriſoned, for doing their duty.' Then it was that the bill, for better ſecuring the dependency of Ireland, was brought in, and, having paſſed the houſe of lords, was ſent down to the commons. Mr Pitt was the firſt, who ſpoke againſt the bill, becauſe, as he ſaid, it ſeemed calculated for no other purpoſe, than to increaſe the power of the Britiſh houſe of peers, which, in his opinion, was already but too great. He was ſeconded by mr. Plummer, who excepted, in particular, againſt the preamble of the bill, as incoherent with the enacting part; which was partly owned by ſir Joſeph Jekyll, who, in the main, ſpoke for the bill. Mr Hungerford, on the other hand, endeavoured to ſhew, that Ireland was ever independent with reſpect to courts of judicature; and he was ſupported by the lord Moleſworth, the lord Tyrconnel, and ſome other members; but, mr. Yorke having ſupported the maſter of the rolls, the bill was at laſt agreed to, and received the royal aſſent. °

About this time a miſunderſtanding happened between mr. Lechmere, attorney-general, and ſir William Thompſon, ſollicitor-general, which was carried ſo far in a grand committee of the commons, the 16th of March, that ſir William charged mr. Lechmere with breach of his oath, truſt, and duty, as a privy-counſellor; urging, 'that he acted as council, and received ſums of money for his advice, in matters to him referred by the privy-council, as attorney-general.' After this, he proceeded to the reading of ſeveral reports, made either by the attorney-general or himſelf, but was interrupted by mr. Craggs, who ſaid, 'they were not there to examine, who was the beſt lawyer; but that, a heavy accuſation having been raiſed againſt a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed merit, and in very eminent ſtations, it was incumbent upon the accuſer to produce clear evidence to make good his charge.' Upon this, mr. Lechmere ſtood up in his own defence, and ſaid, 'he had the honour to be a privy-counſellor, chancellor of the duchy, attorney-general, a member of that houſe, and a gentleman; and therefore ſuch a heinous accuſation could not but fall the heavier upon him: that he owned himſelf liable to a great many human frailties and imperfections; but, as his conſcience entirely acquitted him of the crimes laid to his charge, ſo he defied all the world, and the worſt of his enemies, to prove him guilty of corruption or any unwarrantable practices: that, though he was thus wrongfully accuſed in ſo ſolemn a manner, yet, as a good chriſtian, he did heartily forgive his accuſer, and was willing to believe, that he was prompted to this raſh action, rather by miſtake, or ignorance, than by malice; concluding, with deſiring that honourable aſſembly to ſift and weigh the whole matter with their uſual candour, impartiality, and equity, and to excuſe any unguarded expreſſions, that might eſcape him, in vindicating his innocence.' After this, ſeveral witneſſes were ſworn, and eight or nine of them examined; but, their depoſitions amounting to no more, than that mr. Lechmere had taken nothing but his uſual fees, as chamber-counſellor, the accuſation laid againſt him appeared groundleſs to the committee, and was declared by the houſe to be malicious, falſe and ſcandalous.

On the 8th of March, ſir Joſeph Jekyll preſented to the houſe a bill, to prevent the impious practice of duelling; which was occaſioned by a duel between mr. William Aldworth of Windſor, and mr. Owen Buckingham, member of parliament for Reading; who, quarrelling after having drank two freely, fought in the dark, and mr. Buckingham was killed. But this bill was dropped in the houſe of lords.

The king had earneſtly recommended, in his ſpeech, the conſideration of all proper means for leſſening the debts of the nation. Accordingly, a ſcheme was laid to reduce all the public funds into one, for diſcharging the national debt. The South-ſea company and the bank of England preſented their ſeveral propoſals to the houſe of commons. The liberty of taking in the national debts, and, in conſequence thereof, of increaſing their capital ſtoc and yearly fund, was looked upon as a very valuable benefit; and therefore the conteſt between the bank and South-ſea company was great. They endeavoured to outbid each other in parliament. The South-ſea company, for the liberty of taking into their ſtoc the irredeemable and redeemable debts, by purchaſe or ſubſcription (amounting to above thirty millions) offered at firſt 3,500,000l. to be paid into the Exchequer by four equal quarterly payments, beginning at Lady-day, 1721. And agreed that their whole capital ſhould be reduced to 4 per cent. after Midſummer, 1727, and be thenceforth redeemable by parliament.

The bank, for the like liberty, offered, upon the long and ſhort annuities, three years purchaſe, which (if the whole purchaſe was compleated) would amount to about 2,367,600l. and 20 per cent. upon the redeemable debts, amounting to about 3,180,000l. So their whole offer was above five millions and a half.

But the South-ſea company being reſolved, at any rate, to obtain the liberty of taking in the public debts, offered, in a ſecond ſcheme, not only 500,000l. more, but alſo four years and a half's purchaſe upon all the annuities they ſhould take into their capital ſtoc, which (if all the annuities were taken in) would amount to about 3,567504l. So that their whole offer was about 7,567,500l. They likewiſe offered to circulate 1,000,000l. in exchequer bills gratis, and pay 3 per cent. intereſt for that million; as alſo one year's purchaſe upon ſuch annuities, as ſhould happen not to come into the company's capital, before the 1ſt day of March 1721.

Though the bank made ſome farther advances, this ſcheme of the South-ſea company was approved by the commons, and a bill was ordered to be brought in.

1720] While this affair was debating in the houſe of commons, the ſtocs of the South-ſea company gradually roſe from 130 to above 300, and advanced to near 400; but, after ſome fluctuation, ſettled at about 330, in which ſtate, with little variation, they continued till the end of March. This great riſe was chiefly owing to the rejection of a motion for a clauſe in the South-ſea bill, to fix what ſhare in the capital ſtoc of the company the proprietors of the annuities ſhould have, who ſhould voluntarily ſubſcribe, or how many years purchaſe in money they ſhould receive upon ſubſcribing, at the choice of the proprietors. It was pretended, that the obliging the company to fix a price upon the annuities might endanger the ſucceſs of ſo beneficial an undertaking: that, as it was the intereſt of the company to take in the annuities, ſo it was not to be doubted, they would uſe all the endeavours for that purpoſe, and offer ſuch terms to the annuitants, as would encourage them to come in voluntarily: that therefore the company ought to be allowed a competent time to try what they could do; and if, in a ſubſequent ſeſſion of parliament, it ſhould appear, that the conditions offered to the annuitants were not reaſonable, and conſequently had been ineffectual, the commons, in ſuch a caſe, might give what directions they ſhould think proper about the matter. Upon theſe and other reaſons, the motion was rejected; and, ſoon after, the bill for enabling the South-ſea company to increaſe their capital ſtoc, paſſed the commons, by a majority of a hundred and ſeventy-two againſt fifty-five, and ſent to the lords for their concurrence, where it occaſioned a warm debate.

The lord North and Grey ſpoke firſt againſt the bill, which he repreſented to be 'unjuſt in its nature, and might prove fatal in its conſequences, ſince it ſeemed calculated for the inriching of a few, and the impoveriſhing of a great many, and not only made way for, but countenanced and authorized the fraudulent and pernicious practice of ſtock-jobbing, which produced an irreparable miſchief in diverting the genius of the people from trade and induſtry.' His lordſhip was ſupported by the duke of Warton, who endeavoured to ſhew, 'that the South-ſea project might prove of infinite diſadvantage to the nation: firſt, as it gave foreigners an opportunity to double and treble the vaſt ſums they had in our public funds, which could not but tempt them to withdraw their capital ſtoc, with their immenſe gains, to other countries, which might drain Great-Britain of a conſiderable part of its gold and ſilver. Secondly, that the artificial and prodigious riſe of the South-ſea ſtoc was a dangerous bait, which might decoy many unwary people to their ruin, and allure them, by a falſe proſpect of gain, to part with what they had got by their labour and induſtry,

° The act was as follows:

'Whereas attempts have been lately made to ſhake off the ſubjection of Ireland unto, and dependance upon, the imperial crown of this realm, which will be of dangerous conſequence to Great-Britain and Ireland.

And whereas the houſe of lords in Ireland, in order thereto, have, of late, againſt law, aſſumed to themſelves a power and juriſdiction to examine, correct, and amend the judgments and decrees of the courts of juſtice in the kingdom of Ireland: therefore, for the better ſecuring of the dependency of Ireland upon the crown of Great-Britain, may it pleaſe your majeſty, that it may be enacted; and it is hereby declared and enacted, by the king's moſt excellent majeſty, by and with the advice and conſent of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, and by the authority of the ſame, that the ſaid kingdom of Ireland hath been, is, and, of right, ought to be, ſubordinate unto, and dependent upon, the imperial crown of Great-Britain, as being inſeparably united and annexed thereunto; and that the king's majeſty, by and with the advice and conſent of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons of Great-Britain in parliament aſſembled, had, hath, and, of right, ought to have, full power and autho ity to make laws and ſtatutes of ſufficient force and validity, to bind the people and the kingdom of Ireland.

And be it farther enacted and declared by the authority aforeſaid, that the houſe of lords of Ireland have not, nor, of right, ought to have, any juriſdiction to judge of, affirm, or reverſe any judgment, ſentence, or decree, given or made in any court within the ſaid kingdom; and that all proceedings before the ſaid houſe of lords, upon any ſuch judgment, ſentence, or decree, are, and are hereby declared to be, utterly null and void, to all intents and purpoſes whatſoever.'

to purchaſe imaginary riches. And, in the third place, that the addition of above thirty millions capital would give ſuch a vaſt power to the South-ſea company, as might endanger the liberties of the nation, and in time ſubvert our excellent conſtitution, ſince by their extenſive intereſt they might influence moſt, if not all the elections of the members, and conſequently over-rule the reſolutions of the houſe of commons.' Earl Cowper ſpoke alſo againſt the bill, which he obſerved to be uſhered in and received with great pomp and acclamations of joy, but which was contrived for treachery and deſtruction. His lordſhip urged in particular, 'that in all public bargains, it is a duty incumbent on them, who are intruſted with the adminiſtration, to take care, that the ſame be more advantageous to the ſtate, than to private perſons; but that a quite contrary method ſeemed to have been followed in the contract made with the South-ſea company. For if the ſtocs were kept up to the advanced price, to which they had been raiſed by the oblique arts of ſtock-jobbing, either that company, or its principal members, would gain above thirty millions ſterling, of which they gave but one-fourth part towards the diſcharge of the national debts. That, though this ſcheme carried the face of public good, yet nothing could be ſo, that was founded on injuſtice; as his lordſhip took this bill to be. That he apprehended, in particular, that the main public intention of it, viz. The re-purchaſe of annuities, would meet with inſuperable difficulties; and that, in ſuch a caſe, none but a few perſons, who were in the ſecret, and had early bought ſtocs at a low rate, and afterwards ſold them at a high price, would, in the end, be gainers by this project.' The duke of Bucks and ſome other peers ſpoke on the ſame ſide; but the earl of Sunderland anſwered moſt of their objections; and among other things, ſaid, 'that, they who encouraged and countenanced the ſcheme of the South-ſea company, had nothing in their view, but the eaſing of the nation of part of that heavy load of debts it labours under. That, on the other hand, the managers for that company had undoubtedly a proſpect of private gain, either to themſelves, or to their corporation; but that, when that ſcheme was accepted, neither the one nor the other could foreſee, that the ſtocs would have riſed to the price they were now advanced. That, if they had continued as they were at that time, the public would have had the far greater ſhare of the advantage accruing from that ſcheme; and if the ſtocs were kept up to the price they had been raiſed to, which was not unlikely, it was but reaſonable, that the South-ſea company ſhould enjoy the profits procured to it, by the wiſe management and induſtry of its directors, which would enable it both to make large dividends among its members, and thereby compaſs the ends intended by this ſcheme. After theſe debates, the bill paſſed without any amendment or diviſion; and on the 7th of April, the king came on purpoſe to the houſe of lords, to give the royal aſſent to it. What were the effects of this famous act, will hereafter be largely ſhewn.

This act recites the ſeveral public debts and funds, the acts by which they were eſtabliſhed, the terms and conditions of their continuance, the amounts of the reſpective ſums of principal and intereſt due and payable, and dividing them into ſeveral claſſes and ſpecies of debt, namely, long and ſhort annuities, redeemable and irredeemable debts, and ſtating what rate of intereſt they bore, computes the principals and annuities at certain ſums, in order to ſettle the different rates and values at which they were to be eſtimated, to be redeemed, purchaſed, or taken in by the South-ſea company.

The redeemable debts are ſtated at 16,546,482l. 7s. 1¼d.[p] the irredeemable annuities, being for the remainder of ſeveral long terms of 89, 96, and 99 years, are computed to amount to 666,821l. 8s. 3½d. a year, beſides ſome unſubſcribed lottery annuities and ſhort annuites for 23 and 22½ years then ſtanding out.

The company is declared willingly, and is accordingly authorized to take in by purchaſe, or ſubſcription, the irredeemable debts, at ſuch time or times as they ſhall find convenent, before the 1ſt of March, 1721, and without any compulſion, on any of the proprietors, at ſuch rates and prices as ſhall be agreed between the company and the reſpective proprietors.

The company is likewiſe declared willing, and is authorized at ſuch time and times, as they ſhall ſee convenient (but ſubject to ſuch notices of redemption as are therein mentioned) to take in all and every the redeemable debts, amounting to 16,546,482l. 7s. 1¼d. either by purchaſe, taking ſubſcriptions or by paying them off.

Provided that the company for every annuity, part of the long annuities computed at 666,821l. 8s. 3d. ſo to be taken by them, may in lieu thereof, have an addition made to their capital ſtoc, after the rate of twenty years purchaſe; and ſuch reſpective additions to their preſent yearly fund or annuity, as is after limited.

And for all ſuch ſhort annuities, as ſhall be taken in, to have an addition to their capital ſtoc, after the rate of fourteen years purchaſe, with a proportionable addition to their preſent annuity or yearly fund.

And for all and every of the redeemable debts that ſhall be taken in by purchaſe, ſubſcriptions, or paying off, to have an addition of 100l. to their capital ſtoc, for every 100l. of the principal monies ſo taken in, with a proportionable addition to their preſent yearly fund.

Thus far it appears, that the proprietors of theſe public debts amounting to above twenty-ſix millions, that ſubſcriped into the South-ſea ſtoc, by virtue of this act of parliament, acted by their own choice and option without any compulſion. The irredeemables were left at full liberty to have remained in the condition they were, and an expreſs proviſion was made for the ſecurity of ſuch as did not ſubſcribe.

The redeemables had their option to have waited for the terms of redemption, to which they were before liable, and to have taken their money, when the public had been in in a condition to pay them.

So that ſubſcribing and accepting South-ſea ſtoc, in lieu and diſcharge of their former debts and annuities, was the voluntary act of them all, induced, no doubt, by the general infatuation that every where reigned, and the imaginary proſpect of great advantages.

For the liberty of thus taking in the national debts, and increaſing their capital ſtoc, the company, in the firſt place, have deſired and conſented that their preſent and to be increaſed annuity may be continued at 5l. per cent. till Midſummer, 1727, and from thence be reduced to 4l. per cent. and be redeemable by parliament. In conſideration of this and other advantages expreſſed in the act, the company are willing to make ſuch payments into the receipt of the Exchequer, as are herein ſpecified, for the uſe of the public, to be applied for paying off the public debts incurred before Chriſtmas, 1716.

The ſums, which they were obliged to pay, were 4,156,306l. 4s. 1d. for the liberty of taking in the redeemable debts, and four years and a half's purchaſe for all the long and ſhort annuities that ſhould be ſubſcribed, and one year's purchaſe for ſuch long annuities as ſhould not be ſubſcribed. Theſe ſums, upon the execution of the act, were found to amount to about 7,000,000l.

For enabling the company to raiſe this ſum, they are impowered to make calls for money from their members, or open books of ſubſcriptions, or grant annuities redeemable by the company, or by any other method they ſhall think fit in a general court. They might alſo borrow money upon any contract, bill, &c. under their common ſeal, or on the credit of their capital ſtoc. The money, called for from their members, ſhall (if thought proper) be an additional ſtoc, but there ſhall be no addition thereby to the company's annuities, to be paid out of the public duties.

Out of the firſt monies ariſing from the ſeveral ſums to be paid by the company into the exchequer, ſuch public debts carrying intreſt at 5l. per cent. incurred before the 25th of December, 1716, founded upon any former act of parliament, as are now redeemable, or may be redeemed before the 25th of December, 1722, ſhall be paid off in the firſt place: then all the remainder ſhall be applied towards paying off ſo much of the capital ſtoc of the company as ſhall then carry an intereſt of 5l. per cent. Proviſion is alſo made, that, after Midſummer, 1727, the company is not to be paid off in any ſums, being leſs than one million at a time.

Several projects were now ſet on foot, particularly for eſtabliſhing the two companies of the Royal Aſſurance, headed by the lord Onſlow, and of the London Aſſurance by the lord Chetwynd. The projectors had been very induſtrious to beſpeak the countenance of the houſe of commons, for which they had cauſed two letters to be printed and given to the members. But, theſe and all other ſollicitations having proved ineffectual, the managers for the two companies had recourſe to other methods, and being informed that the civil liſt was conſiderably in arrears (for which no proviſion had been, or could conveniently be made by the parliament, becauſe the grand committee of ſupply had been inadvertently diſmiſſed) they offered to the miniſtry 600,cool. towards the diſcharge of that debt, in caſe they might obtain the king's charter, with the parliamentary ſanction for eſtabliſhment of their reſpective companies. The miniſtry, being at a loſs for means to pay the civil liſt debt, readily embraced the offer, and, mr. Craggs having the day before prepared the leading members of the houſe of commons, mr. Aiſlabie preſented, May the 4th, to the houſe the following meſſage:

'His majeſty having received ſeveral petitions from great numbers of the moſt eminent merchants of the city of London, humbly praying, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to grant them his letters patents for erecting corporations to aſſure ſhips and merchandize; and the ſaid merchants having offered to advance and pay a conſiderable ſum of money for his majeſty's uſe, in caſe they may obtain letters patents accordingly: his majeſty being of opinion, that erecting two ſuch corporations, excluſive only of all other corporations and ſocieties for aſſuring of ſhips and merchandize, under proper reſtrictions and regulations, may be of great advantage and ſecurity to the trade and commerce of the kingdom, is willing and deſirous to be ſtrengthened by the advice and aſſiſtance of this houſe, in matters of this nature and importance: he therefore hopes for their ready concurrence to ſecure and confirm the privileges his majeſty ſhall grant to ſuch corporations, and to enable him to diſcharge the debts of his civil government, without burthening his people with any new aid or ſupply.'

Purſuant to the meſſage, a bill was brought in to enable his majeſty to grant letters of incorporation to the two companies, which paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

The buſineſs of the parliament being now finiſhed, the king came to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am now come to put an end to this ſeſſion, which, though it hath advanced ſo far into the ſummer, cannot be thought a tedious one, when we conſider how much buſineſs hath been done, and the great advantages that may be expected from it.

Your ſeaſonable vigour and perſeverance to ſupport me in the meaſures I have taken with my allies, for reſtoring the tranquility of Europe, have produced moſt of the effects I could deſire. Much the greateſt part of Chriſtendom is already freed from the calamities of war; and by what hath happened both abroad and at home my people muſt be convinced, that their welfare is inſeparable from the ſtrength and ſecurity of my government.'

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

'I return you my thanks for the ſupplies you have raiſed for the ſervice of the current year; and it is a particular ſatisfaction to me, that a method has been found out for making good the deficiencies of my civil liſt, without laying any new burthen upon my ſubjects. The good foundation you have prepared this ſeſſion for the payment of the national debts, and the diſcharge of a great part of them, without the leaſt violation of the public faith, will, I hope, ſtrengthen more and more the union I deſire to ſee among all my ſubjects, and make our friendſhip yet more valuable to all foreign powers.'

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'You will ſee the good effects, which our ſteadineſs hath produced. There remains but little on our part, to ſatisfy the world, that more credit, ſecurity, and greatneſs, is to be acquired by following the views of peace, and adhering ſtrictly to juſt engagements, than by depending on the advantages of war, or by purſuing the meaſures of ambition. To compleat what remains unfiniſhed, I propoſe very ſpeedily to viſit my dominions in Germany, hoping to put an end to thoſe troubles in the north, which are now reduced to a very narrow compaſs. I flatter myſelf, that my preſence this ſummer in thoſe parts will prove uſeful to our poor proteſtant brethren, for whom you have expreſſed ſuch ſeaſonable and charitable ſentiments.

I doubt not but to meet you again next winter, diſpoſed to put a finiſhing hand to all thoſe good works, which, by your aſſiſtance, I have brought ſo near to perfection. I could wiſh, that all my ſubjects, convinced by time and experience, would lay aſide thoſe partialities and animoſities which prevent them from living quietly, and enjoying the happineſs of a mild and legal government. It is what I choſe to recommend at this time, when I am ſenſible, that all oppoſition to it is become vain and uſeleſs, and can only end unfortunate for thoſe, who ſhall perſiſt in ſtruggling againſt it. I am perſuaded, that, during my abſence, every one of you will take particular care to preſerve the peace in your ſeveral counties; and that I ſhall find you at my return in ſuch a ſtate of tranquillity, as will ſhew mankind how firmly my government is eſtabliſhed, which I chiefly deſire, becauſe I think the ſecurity and preſervation of my people, and of this happy conſtitution, depends entirely upon it.'

After this ſpeech the parliament was prorogued to the 28th of July.

Before the proceedings of the South-ſea company are related, it will be proper to give ſome account of the foreign affairs during this ſeſſion.

The negotiations with Sweden, Pruſſia, and Denmark were far advanced, when the king left Germany to return to England. Soon after his arrival, he received an account of the concluſion of his treaty of alliance offenſive and defenſive with Sweden. The lord Carteret, aſſiſted by the French miniſter, had laboured with ſuch application, that the treaty was finiſhed and ſigned at Stockholm on the 20th of January. It contained one and twenty articles, ſeveral of which were expreſly againſt the czar.

The peace and alliance were to be perpetual and univerſal. The contracting powers were not only not to injure, but to procure to each other all kinds of advantages.

They were obliged to inform each other of every thing they ſhould diſcover, that might injure or diſturb them, and to aſſiſt each other with advice and forces againſt all enemies; and not to give protection, much leſs advice or ſupport to rebellious ſubjects, nor to permit them to continue in their dominions; and thoſe were to be eſteemed rebels, whom one of the contracting powers ſhould declare to the other to be ſo.

In caſe Sweden ſhould be attaced in any part of its dominions, in its rights and privileges, in its navigation or commerce, Great-Britain was to furniſh that kingdom with an aid of ſix thouſand foot, who were to be ſent four months after the demand ſhould be made, and to that place which ſhould be appointed. The diſpoſition of the enemy to peace, the good offices, that ſhould be employed to produce that diſpoſition, were not to prevent the ſending of that aid. The power, who was to ſend the troops, was obliged to pay and maintain them; but the other was to take care, that in his dominions they ſhould be furniſhed with every thing neceſſary, at the ſame price with his own troops.

The contracting powers were allowed to demand the aid, in whole or in part; to demand ſhips, proviſions, and ammunition for the ſurplus of the money; and it was ſettled, that a thouſand men a month ſhould be valued at four thouſand rix-dollars. Theſe troops and their commanders were to be ſubject, with reſpect to all the operations of the war, to the power, to whoſe aſſiſtance they came; and the ſhips were to bear his colours.

If this number of troops was not ſufficient for the preſſing occaſions, a more conſiderable aid was to be ſent. 'And as Sweden (ſays the treaty) is now in theſe unhappy circumſtances, with regard to the czar of Muſcovy, whom many fruitleſs attempts have been made to induce to a peace, Great-Britain, conformably to its engagements in the treaty of 1700, which is renewed by the preſent, obliges herſelf to ſend a ſtrong ſquadron in the ſpring, to the aſſiſtance of his Swediſh majeſty, to act in concert againſt the czar, in order to oblige him to deſiſt from his invaſions, and to conſent to the juſt and reaſonable conditions of peace, which have been offered him.'

This was the main article of the treaty; in order to obtain aſſiſtance againſt that formidable enemy, Sweden had reſigned to the elector of Hanover the duchies of Bremen and Verden; and, in order to be revenged for the czar's intrigues, the king of Great-Britain renewed the antient treaties, and entered into new engagements with the crown of Sweden.

The other articles related to commerce, the particulars of which were to be regulated afterwards, for the contracting parties were deſirous to put an immediate ſtop to the conqueſts of the Muſcovites, and oppoſe the execution of their deſigns. The ſuccours, that were to be ſent, did not amount to a declaration of war, nor hinder a communication with the prince, againſt whom they were ſent, provided however it was not prejudicial to the party aſſiſted. And therefore it was not permitted to furniſh the czar with any thing, that ſerved directly for attac or defence, as powder, artillery, or ammunition; and their ſubjects were likewiſe forbid to ſerve him as ſoldiers or ſailors.

If the ſuccours cauſed an open war, it was to be carried on in concert, no propoſition of peace or truce, or any accommodation and convention whatever, was to be hearkened to but by mutual conſent. If one of the contracting powers was engaged in war, he was diſpenſed with ſending the ſtipulated ſuccours, and had even a right to recal his troops three months after having given notice of the neceſſity he was under for ſo doing. 'But the king of Great-Britain (adds the treaty) as a ſtrong mark of his friendſhip, promiſes, that the war, which he is now engaged in with Spain, ſhall not prevent his ſending the next ſpring a ſquadron ſufficient to ſtop the progreſs of the czar, and induce him to peace, nor from furniſhing the ſupplies of money, as long as the war with Denmark ſhall laſt.'

Theſe obligations were reciprocal between the two crowns. Sweden, in particular, was obliged not to enter into any engagement with Spain, which might be contrary to the views of ſupporting the emperor againſt that kingdom. She undertook likewiſe to guarantee and maintain the ſucceſſion of Great-Britain in the houſe of Hanover, and not to give any protection, refuge, aid, or counſel, in any manner whatever, to the perſon, who, in the life-time of James II. ſtyled himſelf prince of Wales, and who, ſince that king's deceaſe had aſſumed the name of James III. king of Great-Britain.

Both crowns had it ſo much at heart to limit the pretenſions and undertakings of the czar, and to diveſt him by a peace, or by arms, of part of his conqueſts, that the following words were inſerted in the XVIIth article. 'As it is of the utmoſt concern to the proteſtant religion, to the commerce of the kingdoms of Great-Britain and Sweden, and even to the repoſe of Chriſtendom, that the czar ſhould not gain the aſcendant in the Baltic; if therefore that prince ſhall refuſe to make peace with Sweden, and to reſtore to that crown the cities and provinces neceſſary to eſtabliſh her ſecurity and the liberty of commerce, as they were before the preſent war; his Britannic majeſty engages, not only to furniſh Sweden with the ſuccours, which he is obliged to by the preſent treaty, but likewiſe to uſe all his endeavours and intereſt with his other allies, that, by their aſſiſtance, they may enable Sweden to repel the czar, and force him to agree to a peace upon ſuch conditions, as may ſecure that kingdom from inſults, and eſtabliſh the liberty of commerce in the Baltic.'

The ſame day, by the mediation of France and England, the peace was likewiſe ſigned between Sweden and Pruſſia. This treaty was the work of king George, who had laid the foundations of it in the preliminary treaty of the 25th of Auguſt, the laſt year. Sweden, by the advice and inſtances of the mediators, gave up to the king of Pruſſia the city of Stetin, the diſtrict between the rivers of Oder and Pehnne, with the iſles of Wollin and Uſedom, to poſſeſs and enjoy them for ever, with all their rights, and in the ſame manner, as the whole had been ceded and transferred by the emperor and empire to the crown of Sweden, by the tenth article of the peace of Weſtphalia, in the year 1648, except the right of ſitting and voting in the diet of the empire, and in thoſe of the circle.

The king of Pruſſia obliges himſelf, on his part, to preſerve to the inhabitants their liberties, rights, and privileges, as they now enjoy them, as likewiſe the free exerciſe of their religion, according to the confeſſion of Augſburg. He likewiſe undertook to pay the debts, and to diſcharge the obligations due from the crown of Sweden, to the inhabitants and communities of theſe countries. He alſo promiſed not to aſſiſt or ſuccour, in any manner, nor under any pretence, the czar, in his war againſt Sweden, to join with the king of Great-Britain, to engage the king of Denmark to make peace, and to reſtore that part of Pomerania he had ſeized.

Laſtly, the king of Pruſſia engaged to pay two millions of rix-dollars of Leipſic money of 1690. This was almoſt purchaſing what was ceded to him; but that prince abounded in ready money, and he could not better employ it, than in aggrandizing himſelf. Beſides, Sweden, exhauſted by a war, which had laſted twenty years, and was not yet ended, was very glad Pruſſia would purchaſe what ſhe was not in a condition to retake.

Numb. 75.

Thus king George, in concert with the regent of France, diſpoſed of the affairs of Europe at pleaſure, and obliged the foreign princes to ſubmit to his determinations. Spain, after having made ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to oppoſe him, was obliged to ſubmit to the ſtrict execution of the treaty of London of 1718: the emperor was put in poſſeſſion of Sicily; the duke of Savoy had Sardinia; Gibraltar and Port-Mahon remained in the hands of Great-Britain; the inveſtiture of the ſtates of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia was not given: the emperor continued to take the title of king of Spain, and to act as ſuch; the only favour, allowed that crown, was the reſtoration of two or three places, taken by France; but the emperor ſtill delayed the execution of his treaty with Spain, of which the mediators took little notice.

The czar was the only prince, who would not comply: inſtead of ſubmitting he continued the war a year or two longer, and made peace without any mediator. Whatever reproaches might be caſt upon him, he loudly complained of the elector of Hanover and king of Great-Britain, alledging, that king George in both qualities had failed in his engagements. His reſident at London preſented a long memorial, in which he repreſented, that the particular engagements, which the king had entered into the laſt ſummer with the queen of Sweden, and his negotiations with the kings of Poland, Pruſſia, and Denmark, in order to detach them from their alliance with his Czariſh majeſty, were inconſiſtent with the obligations, he had entered into as elector of Brunſwick, never to treat with Sweden without the participation of the czar, to uſe all poſſible means to procure him the ceſſion of Ingria, Carelia, Eſthonia, and Revel, and not to oppoſe in any manner the other pretenſions, he might form; obligations (added the memorial) contracted likewiſe as king of Great-Britain. Afterwards, by way of reproach, it was remarked, that the acquiſition of the duchies of Bremen and Verden was owing to the earneſt ſolicitations of the czar with the king of Denmark; that his Czariſh majeſty had moreover offered a treaty of defenſive alliance (like that of 1716) to maintain the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great-Britain in the proteſtant line: that the reſt of the czar's conduct had been anſwerable to theſe his proceedings: that notwithſtanding theſe advances ſo often repeated, and ever neglected, not to ſay deſpiſed, no endeavours had been omitted to ſtir up enemies againſt the czar, and to render him odious to the Engliſh, by making them believe, he intended to place the pretender upon the throne: that every thing had been done to embroil him with the court of Vienna: that no explanation or accommodation was ever liſtened to; and all his propoſals for a reconciliation remained without any anſwer: that a ſtrong ſquadron had been ſent to the Baltic: that, warned by what had happened on other occaſions, he had deſired to be informed of the deſign of that ſquadron. That his deſire had been haughtily received: that the ſquadron, at the end of the campaign, had joined the Swediſh fleet: and to compleat all theſe grievances, letters had been wrote to him in very imperious terms, and ſuch as ought not to be uſed to a ſovereign.

'Your majeſty, (ſaid the memorial,) who knows ſo well what is due to ſovereigns, when they are to be treated with, may judge by all that has paſſed on this occaſion, whether the manner, in which your miniſters proceeded in offering the czar your mediation, was agreeable to the friendſhip, which has ſubſiſted at all times between the crowns of Ruſſia and Great-Britain; and whether a mediation offered with circumſtances ſo little equitable can be conſidered as impartial. To tell a ſovereign, in an imperious and threatning manner (as your miniſters did) that he muſt put an end to the war, in order to obtain a reaſonable peace; and to propoſe to him the mediation of a power, at the ſame that he is told, that power is in league with his enemy, this is not endeavouring to induce him to peace, but rather ſeeking pretences for a rupture.'

The memorial concluded with demanding a poſitive anſwer, in order to know what was to be expected on the part of his Britiſh majeſty.

This memorial, though ſeemingly expreſſed in a plain manner, was very artfully worded. Accordingly it was anſwered very carefully by the miniſtry of Hanover, and of Great-Britain.

The Hanoverian miniſtry ſaid, it was the czar, who had violated the treaty of 1715, by coming with an army to ſettle in the empire, and by the ſeizing the provinces contiguous to Hanover. That the leaſt that could be done in thoſe circumſtances, was to ſhew, theſe proceedings were not approved of: that the inſtances which had been made for the withdrawing this army, were indiſpenſable, conſidering the rank the elector of Hanover bore in the empire: that, however, this was the ground of the czar's reſentments, of which he had given many proofs by his correſpondence with the enemies of king George, and by his endeavours to deprive him of his friends. The particulars were then given of the czar's intrigues with baron Gortz, with the pretender's emiſſaries, and with the court of Madrid, and eſpecially of the projects formed with the king of Sweden to carry the war into the empire, and to aſſiſt that crown to recover the dominions in Germany, which had been taken from him. That, beſides theſe deſigns, an invaſion of Scotland had alſo been concerted, and the czar was upbraided with having continually endeavoured to deceive and amuſe his allies.

It is therefore evident (concludes the anſwer) if the czar has been prevented by a treaty with Sweden, he gave juſt cauſe for it, by his proceedings, as he had long been treating for a ſeparate peace, and was upon the point of reducing Sweden, and carrying the war into the bowels of the empire.'

Earl Stanhope anſwered the complaints, which related to the king of Great-Britain. He repreſented the extravagant conditions, upon which the czar had offered to enter into a ſtrict alliance with Great-Britain. 'He required (ſaid the earl) that his conqueſts upon Sweden ſhould be guaranteed to him; that he ſhould be aſſiſted with an Engliſh fleet, and that the fleet ſhould be under his command, which would have made all accommodation with Sweden wholly impoſſible, and incenſed thoſe powers, who were concerned in the preſervation of that crown, and whoſe friendſhip was ſo neceſſary to accompliſh the projects formed for the tranquility of Europe.'

The earl then obſerved, that the czar's complaints were intended only to cauſe his own deſigns to be overlooked: 'for if it true (ſays the earl) that the czar, intimate ally of the king of Denmark, had meditated no leſs than to make himſelf maſter of the Sound, and of Copenhagen (inſtead of making the deſcent on Schonen, with which the public had been amuſed for ſome months) it is natural to endeavour to put the change upon the public in that particular, and to wipe off the impreſſions of ſuch notions, by recriminations deſtitute of all manner of ground: and, if the czar had really ſuch deſigns in view, it is probable, that nothing kept him from putting them in execution, but the juſt apprehenſion that the ſame ſhould be oppoſed by his majeſty's fleet; which would infallibly have happened in ſuch a caſe. And may not the czar's reſentment of the miſcarriage of ſo great a project, through the apprehenſion of the Britiſh fleet, be the cauſe of his great eſtrangement from his majeſty ſince that time; from whence one may date the beginning of the animoſity he has ſhewn againſt his majeſty on ſo many occaſions.

This was plainly perceived ſome time after, when, by the letters of baron Gortz and count Gyllenburg, it was diſcovered, that the czar was ſo offended with his majeſty, that he entertained ſerious thoughts of making a ſeparate peace with the king of Sweden, and aſſiſting the pretender. And indeed, whatever aſſurances have been given to the contrary, the czar's conduct ſeems to have been entirely agreeable to that plan. The negotiations of the Ruſſian miniſtry with the pretender's agents are well known.[q] All the world has ſeen the great number of Engliſh rebels, to whom the czar has given all manner of protection and encouragement. It is known, that the conferences at Aland, which were begun without his majeſty's participation, were the reſult of an interview at Loo with baron Gortz, in Auguſt 1717. That miniſter's papers have ſhewn, that the invaſion of Scotland was to have immediately followed the conqueſt of Norway; it is therefore no wonder, that the czar was not ſollicitous either to prevent that conqueſt, or to aſſiſt the king of Denmark on ſo preſſing an occaſion. In fine, information has been had of the propoſitions the czar has made, more than once, to the court of Spain, to engage them in an offenſive alliance againſt England, in favour of the pretender.

It was ſhewn likewiſe, that the czar had perſiſted in his deſigns ſince the death of the king of Sweden: that he had endeavoured to engage queen Ulrica in the ſchemes of her predeceſſor: and, not ſucceeding by his inſinuations, he had attempted to conſtrain her by force, and by almoſt unparalleled inſults. 'But, notwithſtanding all this, his majeſty (continues the earl) perſiſts in the ſame ſentiments of moderation towards the czar, and renews the offer of his mediation. Nothing is more conformable to the intereſt of that prince, ſince it is intended to procure him a peace, which will ſecure him a conſiderable part of his conqueſts. It is hoped that ſo wiſe a prince as the czar will not only be inclined, for the general good of peace, to moderate his pretenſions, but likewiſe acknowledge, that it is more conſiſtent with prudence to obtain by good treaties, and the conſent of other great powers, ſuch conſiderable territories as may be yielded to him by the crown of Sweden, than to expoſe the fruits of his ſucceſſes to the events of a war, which he will be obliged to ſupport alone. Sweden neither ought nor can give up to him Revel. If the czar, after ſuch offers, perſiſts in his unwillingneſs to reſtore Revel, he will only alarm all the other powers, and unite the moſt of them againſt him.

The ſincere deſire the king has to reſtore a general peace, and his zeal to be reconciled with the czar for that purpoſe, incline his majeſty to give him, on this occaſion, the advice of a friend, and to exhort him ſeriouſly to conſider it.

But if, contrary to all expectation, the king's good intentions ſhould prove fruitleſs by the czar's refuſal; and if his majeſty, by virtue of his engagements with Sweden (which he is fully reſolved to maintain) ſhould be obliged to take meaſures diſagreeable to Ruſſia, he will, however, have the conſolation of having neglected nothing to prevent the fatal conſequences, which may reſult from it.

Theſe memorials and anſwers produced no reconciliation between the two princes. The anſwers, however, made an impreſſion upon the nation in favour of the king. And, indeed, it muſt be confeſſed, that it was found policy to join with Sweden againſt the czar, and by that means make amends for uniting with that prince to ſtrip a crown, which religion and commerce ought always to endear to Great-Britain.

During the ceſſion of parliament, the reconciliation of the royal family was effected chiefly by the endeavours of the duke of Devonſhire and mr. Walpole. They had ſeveral conferences, for that purpoſe, with the miniſters, with ſuch ſucceſs, that on the 23d of April, the lord Lumley, gentleman of the prince of Wales's bed-chamber, waited on the king, to know his pleaſure, when the prince ſhould attend him. He was anſwered immediately; and mr. ſecretary Craggs having accompanied the lord Lumley to Leiceſter-fields, to acquaint the prince with it, he immediately went to St. James's houſe, and was half an hour in private conference with the king. Having made his ſubmiſſion in the manner agreed on, he went to ſee his eldeſt daughter, the princeſs Anne, who, five days before, was taken ill of the ſmall-pox. The prince, at his return to Leiceſter-houſe, was, by the king's command, attended by a party of the yeomen of the guard, and of the horſe-guards, and the foot-guards began alſo to mount the guard at his houſe. In the evening, the princeſs of Wales had an interview with the king; and, the next morning, the duke of Devonſhire, earl Cowper, the lord Townſhend, mr. Walpole, mr. Methuen, and mr. Pulteney, were admitted to kiſs the king's hand; and the duke of Devonſhire carried the ſword of ſtate before the king to the royal chapel, the prince of Wales accompanying them thither; and, at their return, the officers and retainers to the two courts congratulated each other upon this reconciliation. The next day, the great officers and miniſters of ſtate, and of the houſehold, and other perſons of diſtinction, waited on the prince of Wales, who, in the evening, went with his whole court to the apartments at St. James's, and had a long conference with the king. Moſt of the foreign miniſters had alſo, on this occaſion, a private audience of the prince of Wales.

Upon the riſing of the parliament, the king held a great council, in which he declared his deſign of viſiting his dominions in Germany, and named the lords-juſtices during his abſence. They were the ſame with thoſe of the laſt year: to whom were added the lord Townſhend (who was declared likewiſe lord-preſident of the council) and the duke of Devonſhire. The king, in the ſame council, conferred alſo ſeveral honours and preferments: the earl of Dorſet was created duke of Dorſet; the earl of Bridgewater, duke of Bridgwater; the lord viſcount Caſtleton, earl Caſtleton in the county of York; Hugh Boſcawen, Baron Boſcawen, and viſcount Falmouth in the county of Cornwall; John Wallop, baron Wallop of Wallop, and viſcount Lymington in the county of Southampton.[r]

On the 15th of June, the king embarked at Greenwich on [q] People (ſays the memorial) are not ignorant of the negotiations of one Jerneghan, and ſir Hugh Paterſon, brother-in-law to the late lord Marr, with the Ruſſian miniſter, during the czar's ſtay in Holland. Intelligence has been had of the ſame miniſter's intrigues, both with the late duke of Ormond, during the ſtay he made incognito at Mittau, and with ſir Henry Sterling and the ſaid Jerneghan at Peterſburgh, as well as of the correſpondence eſtabliſhed, by means of this laſt perſon, between the czar and the court of Spain.

[r] The reſt of the honours and preferments were: Matthew Ducie Morton, baron Ducie de Morton, in the county of Stafford; John Barrington of board the Carolina yatcht, and landed, the next morning, at Helvoet-Sluice, from whence he proceeded to Hanover. At his arrival in Germany, he found the peace concluded between Sweden and Denmark. This piece was of great importance; for the czar was left alone, and had reaſon to fear (as he had been threatened) that all his allies, who had been drawn off from him one after another, would unite againſt him, to reduce him within his antient bounds.

The treaty was ſigned at Frederickſtadt, on the 22d of June. The preamble did great honour to king George; ſetting forth, that it was reſolved to put an end to the cruel war, which had laſted ten years, by the preſſing inſtances of the king of Great-Britain, who has taken all imaginable pains to reconcile the parties, and has engaged them to conſent to a ſuſpenſion of arms, the more eaſily to come at a peace, for which his majeſty has offered them his mediation, which they have accepted. By this treaty, every thing, that had paſſed during the war, was to be buried in eternal oblivium; liberty of commerce was entirely reſtored; both ſides renounced in the ſtrongeſt manner, all treaties, agreements, and alliances made with other powers, as far as they ſhould be contrary to the preſent treaty of peace, and, for the future, neither party ſhould enter into any treaty or alliance, which might be prejudicial or inconvenient to the other.

As the czar and his pretenſions were chiefly aimed at in theſe negotiations, it was required of the king of Denmark, that he ſhould, in the moſt expreſs terms, oblige himſelf not to aſſiſt the czar, during the war, under any pretence whatever, either with advice or forces: 'and becauſe (added the treaty) it is the intereſt, not only of the king and crown of Denmark, but alſo of other nations, that this war ſhould end in ſuch a manner, that the liberty of commerce ſhould be reſtored in the Baltic, his Daniſh majeſty promiſes not to ſuffer any Muſcovite ſhips in any of his ports in the ſea of Denmark or Norway; nor will permit them to bring in thither prizes of any nation whatever; and if it ſhall happen, that theſe prizes ſhould enter into his ports, he will reſtore them to the owners.'

The king of Denmark was put in poſſeſſion of Sleſwick, and reſolved to keep it. It was neceſſary likewiſe, in order to engage him to peace, that the king of Great-Britain ſhould guaranty to him the peaceable poſſeſſion of it, which had been done the 30th of October the laſt year. On the other hand, Sweden, indiſpenſably engaged as ſhe was with the duke Holſtein, could not with any decency, give up that duchy to the king of Denmark. But the following expedient was made uſe of to ſurmount theſe difficulties: 'foraſmuch (ſays the treaty) as the duke of Sleſwick-Holſtein has been concerned in the war of the north; and as the ſtrict alliance, between that prince and the crown of Sweden, might be an obſtacle to peace with regard to the duchy of Sleſwick; his Swediſh majeſty declares for himſelf and the crown of Sweden, and promiſes not to oppoſe, either directly, or indirectly, what may have been ſtipulated concerning that duchy, in favour of the king of Denmark, by the mediating powers, which have co-operated in the preſent treaty; and Sweden will not give any aſſiſtance to the duke of Holſtein againſt Denmark, which may be prejudicial to this ſtipulation.'

The king of Pruſſia, in making peace with Sweden, had been enjoined by the mediators to purchaſe the countries, he had taken from that crown. The king of Denmark, on the contrary, was obliged to ſell his conqueſts to Sweden, or, what amounted to the ſame, to give them up for an equivalent.

Thus the king of Denmark conſented to reſtore upper Pomerania, the iſle of Rugen, the towns and fortreſſes of Marſtrand and Stralſundt, and all the other iſlands and dependences without any exception, which had been taken from Sweden, in the ſtate they were in at the publication of the ſuſpenſion of arms, with the artillery and magazines, which were there, when Denmark ſeized them. He likewiſe gave up the city of Wiſmar, with its territory and dependences.

In return for theſe reſtitutions, Sweden conſented, that, for the future, and from the day of the ratification of the treaty, there ſhould be no longer any difference of nation in the Sound and the two Belts; ſo that the kingdom of Sweden renounced the exemption from toll in thoſe parts, and conſented, that her ſubjects ſhould pay them to Denmark for their ſhips and cargoes, upon the ſame foot, as the ſubjects of Great-Britain and the United-Provinces paid them.

Moreover, Sweden, to give a ſtill more ſenſible proof of her deſire for peace, bound herſelf to pay to the king of Denmark ſix hundred thouſand rix-dollars at one payment. This ſum was to be put into the hands of the mediators, not to be delivered till after the ſtipulated ceſſions were executed by the court of Denmark. It was added, in expreſs terms, that all the pretenſions of Denmark upon Sweden ſhould be extinct, by the obligation to the payment of toll in the Sound and Belts, and by the payment of the ſix hundred thouſand rix-dollars. The other articles contained various regulations, all proper to ſtrengthen the peace, and prevent, as far as poſſible, all occaſions of complaint.

The mediators took great pains to prevail with the king of Denmark to grant Sweden ſuch moderate terms. Beſides the antient and natural antipathy between the two nations, which was to be ſurmounted, the conqueſts, which had coſt him ſo much, and were ſo very convenient for him, were to be renounced. Undoubtedly, the apprehenſion of ſeeing the forces of all the allies of king George united againſt him made a greater impreſſion upon him, than the hopes of aſſiſtance from czar, who would not hear either of peace or any mediation from the king of Great-Britain.

Admiral Norris had ſailed in April with a ſquadron ſtrong enough to give weight to the king's mediation. When he arrived at Copenhagen, he wrote to prince Dolgorouki, the czar's ambaſſador at the court of Denmark, to notify to him, 'that the king, his maſter, had ordered him to come into thoſe ſeas with a ſquadron of his ſhips, to procure a juſt and reaſonable peace between the crowns of Sweden and Ruſſia; and that his majeſty having at heart the welfare of his ſubjects, as alſo the concerns of ſuch nations, as live in amity with him, ardently wiſhes, that this affair may be accompliſhed in a chriſtian, effectual, and ſpeedy manner: that, for this end, he was commanded to notify to the miniſters, generals, and admirals of czar, the repeated offers of his Britannic majeſty's mediation of peace between the two crowns; and that his Czarian majeſty, duly conſidering the preſent ſtate of affairs, would liſten to reaſonable conditions for an accommodation; and leſt, for want of full powers, this affair ſhould be obſtructed, the ſame were ſent to his envoy at Stockholm, and likewiſe to himſelf as his admiral, to the end, jointly or ſeparately, they may act in the quality of his majeſty's plenipotentiaries, in order to effect a peace between the two crowns, by way of mediation.' Prince Dolgorouki returned for anſwer, 'that the czar had nothing more at heart than peace and tranquility, of which he had given clear proofs during the war; but, becauſe Sweden had never expreſſed the like ſentiments, the continuation of the war could be imputed only to that crown. That, as for the expreſſions in the admiral's letter about the means of a peace, he could return no anſwer to that; and, in caſe his Britannic majeſty had any propoſals to make to the czar, he hoped the admiral would excuſe him from doing it, ſince it could be done a more compendious way.'

Upon this anſwer, the Engliſh fleet joined that of Sweden, but however as auxiliaries only. The Ruſſian fleet had prevented them, and landed near Uma five thouſand men, who met with no reſiſtance; they ſet fire to that town, and to all the villages in the neighbourhood. As the inhabitants did not expect ſuch an attac, all their effects were ſeized by the Muſcovites, who, without any loſs, returned to their ſhips. The combined fleets did not arrive till the enemy had reached the port of Revel, where it was not judged proper to attac them, but rather to make a diverſion in Finland. Nothing material was done, and ſome Swediſh ſhips, having imprudently engaged a ſuperior force without being timely ſupported, were very near being deſtroyed.

Becket, in the county of Berks, baron Barrington of Newcaſtle, and viſcount Barrington of Ardglaſs, in the kingdom of Ireland; Thomas Gage, baron Caſtelbar, and viſcount Gage of Caſtle-Iſland, in the kingdom of Ireland; William Vane, baron Vane of Dungannon in the county of Tyrone, and viſcount Vane; ſir Marcus Beresford, baron Beresford of Beresford in the county of Cavan, and viſcount Tyrone in the kingdom of Ireland; John Blunt of the city of London, ſir William Chapman, and Thomas Coleby of Kenſington were created baronets. The duke of Kingſton was appointed lord privy-ſeal; the duke of Grafton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; mr. Robert Walpole, pavmaſter-general of the king's forces; mr. Methuen, comptroller of the houſhould; the duke of Queenſberry and the earl of Harold, gentlemen of the bed-chamber; the earl of Sunderland, John Aiſlabie, George Baillie, ſir Charles Turner, and Richard Edgecombe, commiſſioners of the treaſury; the earl of Weſtmorland, John Chetwynd, ſir Charles Cook, Paul Docminique, Martin Bladen, and John Aſhe, commiſſioners of trade and plantations; ſir Wilfred Lawſon, groom of his majeſty's bedchamber; ſir David Dalrymple, auditor of the exchequer in Scotland; Edward Elliot, commiſſioner of the exciſe; Henry Cartwright, commiſſioner of the victualling-office, Chr. Withers, ſurveyor-general of his majeſty's woods; colonel Charles Churchill, governor of Chelſea-Hoſpital; the lord Glenorchy, ambaſſador to the king of Denmark; and mr. Moleſworth, envoy to the court of Turin.

The czar was not ſo eaſy to be reduced as Spain had been. Poland, the only country contiguous to his dominions, did not think fit to attac him: and it was a great point gained, that king Auguſtus, notwithſtanding his obligations to the czar, had conſented to a ſeparate peace with Sweden.

Though king George could not at this time ſucceed in making peace between Ruſſia and Sweden, he had however at the end of the campaigne ſome hopes of it. Ulrica, who had been placed on the throne of Sweden in the room of her brother Charles XII. and had married the head of the family of Heſſe, was exteremely deſirous he ſhould be joined with her in the adminiſtration of the regal power. To this end ſhe writ with her own hand a letter to each of the four orders of the ſtates, repreſenting how neceſſary in the preſent difficult juncture, and how conducive to the public welfare, would be the aſſiſtance of his royal highneſs in the adminiſtration of the government, and therefore hoped the States would gratify her in conferring on him the regal dignity.

As the propoſal of placing the prince of Heſſe on the throne, jointly with the queen, met with great oppoſition from the nobles, ſhe writ a ſecond letter to the States, offering to reſign her ſhare of the regal power, and to be content that it ſhould be executed by her royal conſort alone. Upon this the States unanimouſly elected him king.[s]

The advancement of Frederick to the throne of Sweden gave him occaſion to ſend one of his principal officers to notify it to the czar, who, in return, ſent one of his generals to congratulate the new king. Upon this were grounded the hopes of a reconciliation. But the Ruſſian envoy was commiſſioned only to demand ſome paſſports, and propoſe an exchange of priſoners, and a ſuſpenſion of arms during the winter. He added however, and doubtleſs with a view to king George, that the czar was not ſo averſe to peace as might be thought, and only wanted reaſonable terms to be made him, for which there was no need of a mediator.

Theſe things, relating to the affairs of Sweden and Ruſſia, had for the moſt part paſſed before the king's arrival in his German dominions. All the foreign miniſters followed him to Hanover, where he did not want buſineſs or matter to exerciſe his talents for negotiation, which after all are the true talents of a ſovereign. Miniſters indeed generally ſupply what may be wanting in a prince; but the caſe was otherwiſe with king George. He looked into every thing himſelf: his miniſters did nothing without him, whilſt he did many things without them.

The treaties of peace to which ſeveral ſtates had been led, and in ſome meaſure compelled, were for the moſt part tranſacted in haſte. It was impoſſible to ſettle the particular intereſt of the contracting powers and their allies. Theſe treaties, properly ſpeaking, were only a ceſſation from hoſtilities, and an engagement to more exact and regular negotiations. To fix and aſcertain ſo many complicated intereſts, and prevent the flames of war from kindling afreſh, king George and the regent of France joined their endeavours to eſtabliſh two congreſſes; one at Brunſwick for the affairs of the north, and the other at Cambray for the reſt of Europe.

Whilſt the king was employed abroad in hearing and ſettling the grievances and intereſts of the nations and their ſovereigns, particularly thoſe of the proteſtants of Germany, the regency were no leſs employed at home in curbing the exceſſive deſire of gain, which the progreſs of the South-ſea company had raiſed, and in curing the deſpair which attended its fall. As theſe are the moſt conſiderable events of this reign, and ſuch as will never be forgot by Great-Britain, they deſerve to be related at large.

The South-ſea ſcheme ſeems to be taken from that of the Miſſiſſippi company in France, formed by mr. Law the laſt year. Mr Law was born at Edinburgh, and had propoſed to the parliament of Scotland, in 1705, a ſcheme for ſupplying the nation with money, which, though favoured by the duke of Argyle, then high-commiſſioner, and ſeveral members of parliament, was however rejected. Upon this he applied himſelf to the lord-treaſurer Harley, and tranſmitted to him another propoſal for the increaſe of trade and credit, but meeting with no encouragement, and not being able to get his pardon, for having killed Beau Wilſon in a duel, he was compelled to live abroad, where, after undergoing great variety of perſecutions from his enemies, he ſettled in France. During his ſtay in England he had informed himſelf fully of the management of the bank and Eaſt-India company, and in order to ſettle the fluctuating manner of things in France, he propoſed to the regent to lay the foundation of credit by erecting a bank. The regent approved of the ſcheme, the bank was eſtabliſhed: the king began the ſubſcription, the regent followed, with innumerable others. This project met with ſuch ſucceſs, that, in three ſubſcriptions, more than all the money in France was ſaid to be ſubſcribed to it: for, by the end of the year 1719, bills were given out for 640 millions of livres, which exceeds the value of the bills circulated by all the banks in Europe. There was added a circulation of 360 millions, and the whole amounted to 1000 millions of livres, making above 38 millions of pounds ſterling at the exchange then current.[t]

A bank being thus erected, and credit eſtabliſhed, mr. Law formed the project of the Miſſiſſippi or India company, who were to have the ſole privilege of the trade to Louiſiana, or the country of Miſſiſſippi, ſo called from a river of that name, which runs through it from north to ſouth. Purſuant to this ſcheme, a ſubſcription of ſtoc was opened, and all were admitted to ſubſcribe. The ſum firſt propoſed to be raiſed was only 60 millions of livres, to be ſubſcribed in ſtate-bills. Theſe ſtate-bills or public ſecurities were then very low, being from 57 to 63 per cent. diſcount; but, as they were received at par without any loſs in the company's ſtoc, the firſt ſubſcription of 60 millions was ſoon filled. The capital ſtoc was then enlarged to 100 millions, and the actions or ſhares roſe to 120. After this a new creation of actions was made for 25 millions more, which were delivered out at 110, and ſoon roſe to 200. As people appeared very eager to lay out their money this way, an arrêt of the council of ſtate was publiſhed for circulating bank-bills to the value of 25 millions, in the Miſſiſſippi company, upon which the actions, about Midſummer, 1719, run up 560. The company, finding their credit ſo well eſtabliſhed, propoſed to lend the king 50 millions, for which there was a new creation of actions for 25 millions, upon the foot of 200 per action. About the end of Auguſt, the company propoſed to the king another loan of 1200 millions, at three per cent. As the actions were now advanced to 1200, the company, in order to riſe the loan, opened their books for 500 millions, by the ſale of 50 millions of actions, at the rate of 1000 per action. The ſubſcriptions were filled in a few hours; and, in leſs than three weeks, two ſubſcriptions more, for the like ſum of 500 millions each, were opened with the ſame ſucceſs. The firſt payment of theſe three ſubſcriptions roſe ſo conſiderably, as to be ſold at 300 per cent. profit. From that time the actions roſe to 2050.[u]

The Miſſiſſippi ſtoc was in its greateſt proſperity during the months of November and December, 1719, and, in the January following, mr. Law, who was become the greateſt ſubject in Europe, was made comptroller-general of the finances of France. From that time the ſtoc began to decline, and by the end of May, all things fell into confuſion at Paris, occaſioned by an arrêt to reduce bank notes and actions of the company, mr. Law reſigned his place, and had two Swiſs officers given him for his guard. By this project the ſtate indeed gained immenſely, 1500 millions of the king's debts being tranſpoſed from him to the people, who were content to diſcharge the public, and owe

[s] The act of election, which was read to the king, was to this effect: that the king is elected according to the laws and conſtitutions of the kingdom, not out of any duty, but by the free-will of all the ſenators and the ſtates, who do declare the kingdom hereditary in the male-iſſue his majeſty ſhall have by the queen, and who, upon the deceaſe of their father, ſhall take upon themſelves the adminiſtration, without any farther election; but, in caſe both their majeſties ſhall die without male-iſſue, that all the ſtates ſhall proceed to a new election, without any previous ſummons, thirty days after the deceaſe of the ſurvivor. That they think themſelves well aſſured his majeſty will never ſuffer the ſovereignty (or abſolute power) which always proved ſo pernicious to the kingdom, to be introduced again; but that he, as well as the heirs of his body, will govern the kingdom according to the laws and conſtitutions, maintain it in the chriſtian evangelical religion, and let the ſubjects have the unprejudiced enjoyment of all their privileges, according to the aſſurances given in writing by his majeſty; in which caſe they will always behave themſelves as faithful and true liege ſubjects to his majeſty. Hiſt. Reg.

[u] Thus the capital ſtoc conſiſted of theſe ſeven ſubſcriptions:

60	millions of the firſt ſubſcription.
40	of the ſecond.
25	of the third.
25	of the fourth.
50	of the fifth.
50	of the ſixth.
50	of the ſeventh.
300	millions.

The total of the actions, which, when they ſold at 2050, the total amounted to above 6000 millions of livres, or 228 millions ſterling.

the money to one another. Conſequently, when the fall came (except a few great fortunes that were made) there was almoſt a general ruin through all France.

This revolution of the Miſſiſſippi ſtoc at Paris was not regarded in England, where the like infatuation univerſally prevailed, and was followed by the like conſequences.

When the bill paſſed in favour of the South-ſea company, it was expected the ſtoc would have greatly advanced, but the contrary happened; for, the day after, it fell from 310 to 290. In order to raiſe it, a rumour was ſpread, that earl Stanhope had received overtures in France to exchange Gibraltar and Port-Mahon for ſome places in Peru, for the ſecurity and enlargement of the Engliſh trade in the South-ſea; which had its effect in Exchange-alley. For, on the 12th of April, five days after the royal aſſent was given to the bill, the directors opened their books for a ſubſcription of a million, at the rate of 300l. for every 100l. capital. Such was the concourſe of perſons of all ranks, that this firſt ſubſcription was found to amount to above two millions of original ſtoc. It was to be paid at five payments of 60l. each, for one ſhare of 100l. In a few days the ſtoc advanced to 340, and the ſubſcriptions were ſold for double the price of the firſt payment. To raiſe the ſtoc ſtill higher, on the 21ſt of April it was declared in a general court, that the Midſummer dividend ſhould be ten per cent. and all ſubſcriptions ſhould be intitled to the ſame. Thoſe reſolutions anſwering the end deſigned, the directors, to improve the infatuation of the monied men, opened their books for a ſecond ſubſcription of one million, at 400l. per cent. In a few hours, no leſs than a million and half was ſubſcribed at that rate; and ſo great was the confidence which was placed in the directors, that many depoſited in their hands their annuities, without knowing what price the company would allow for them.

On the 19th of May, the directors thought fit to ſettle the terms and prices for the long and ſhort annuities, which had been ſubſcribed; and, the ſtoc being that day 375l. per cent. it was reſolved to allow, for every 100l. per annum of the long annuities, 700l. in the capital ſtoc (which at 375l. per cent. amounted to 2625l.) and 575l. in bonds and money: ſo the total for each 100l. per annum amounted to 3200l. or thirty-two years purchaſe. For every 90l. per annum of the ſhort annuities, they agreed to allow 350l. in the capital ſtoc, which, at 375l. per cent. amounted to 1312l. 10s. and in bonds and money 217l. 10s. which together made 1530l. or ſeventeen years purchaſe.

Theſe offers occaſioned at firſt great murmurings among the annuitants, who, having expected ten years, found they were to have but eight years and a quarter's purchaſe. Upon which ſome withdrew their orders, and others reſolved not to ſubſcribe. But, the South-ſea managers having found means to raiſe their ſtoc to 500l. per cent. moſt of the annuitants appeared eaſy; ſo it was computed, that, by the 29th of May, almoſt two-thirds of the annuities were ſubſcribed.

The arts of ſtoc-jobbers drew a great concourſe of perſons of all ranks into Exchange-alley, by whoſe unexampled eagerneſs of laying out their money in a fund, that promiſed ſo plentiful a return of gain, that ſtoc, which about the latter end of May, was at about 550, roſe on a ſudden ſo prodigiouſly, that on Thurſday, the 2d of June, it came up to 890. Many cautious perſons being willing to take this opportunity to ſecure their great profits, there appeared the next day ſo many ſellers in the alley, that, by two or three o'clock in the afternoon, the ſtoc fell to 640; at which the chief directors of the South-ſea company being alarmed, ſet their agents to work, by whoſe artful management the ſtoc was the ſame evening advancnd to 750; about which price, with ſome ſmall fluctuation, it continued till the cloſing of the company's books on the 22d of June. In the mean time, the South-ſea ſtoc ſuffered a conſiderable ſhoc. For many perſons, who were to follow the king to Hanover, and others, who found a difficulty of making their ſecond payment to the firſt ſubſcription, were both equally deſirous to turn their ſtoc into money; ſo that, for ſome days, the number of ſellers exceeded that of buyers. Wherefore the managers of the company formed two expedients: the firſt was their lending out money, or notes, to the proprietors of the capital ſtoc, to the ſum of 400l. upon 100l. original ſtoc (which ſhewed it to be worth above that ſum) at the rate of 4l. per cent. per annum. The ſecond was their giving public notice, 'that all perſons poſſeſſed of any of the company's bonds, which fell due on the 25th of June, might then have their money for the ſame of the company's caſhier: and that the bonds would be taken in on the ſecond payment for the 2,250,000l. South-ſea ſtoc, ſold by ſubſcription after the rate of 300l. for each 100l. original ſtoc.' By theſe means money being plenty, and the ſtoc-jobbers in good humour, the South-ſea company opened their books for a third ſubſcription, at the rate of 1000l. for each 100l. capital ſtoc, to be paid in ten equal payments, one in hand, and the other nine half-yearly. But, ſome men in power having taken this opportunity to oblige their friends, their liſts were ſo full, that the directors enlarged it to four millions capital ſtoc, which, at that price, amounted to forty millions ſterling. And, what is more ſtrange, theſe laſt ſubſcriptions were, before the end of June, ſold at above 200l. per cent. advance, and, after the cloſing of the transfer-books, the original ſtoc roſe to above 1000l. per cent. At the ſame time the firſt ſubſcriptions were at 560, and the ſecond at 6 per cent. advance, the bank at 260, and Eaſt-India 440.

The whole nation was become ſtoc-jobbers. The South-ſea was like an infectious diſtemper, which ſpread itſelf in an aſtoniſhing manner. Every evening produced new projects, which were juſtly called bubbles, and new companies appeared every day. Theſe were countenanced by the greateſt of the nobility. The prince of Wales was governor of the Welſh copper; the duke of Chandos, of York-Buildings; the duke of Bridgewater formed a company for building houſes in London and Weſtminſter. There were near a hundred different kinds of projects or bubbles; and it was computed, that above a million and a half was won and loſt by theſe unwarrantable practices, by which many unwary perſons were defrauded and impoveriſhed, and a few craſty men enriched, to the great detriment of domeſtic trade. The king had, the ſame day the parliament roſe, publiſhed a proclamation, declaring all theſe unlawful projects ſhould be deemed as common nuſances, and proſecuted as ſuch; with the penalty of 500l. for any broker to buy or ſell any ſhares in them. Notwithſtanding this proclamation, ſeveral of the illegal projects were ſtill carried on; upon which the lords-juſtices, on the 12th of July, to put a ſtop to all farther proceedings, ordered all the petitions, that had been preſented for patents and charters, to be diſmiſſed.

The ſeveral ſums, intended to be raiſed by theſe projects, amounted to no leſs than three hundred millions ſterling, a ſum ſo immenſe, that it exceeds the value of all the lands in England, at the rate of twenty years purchaſe. However, the eagerneſs of getting riches, by quic and eaſy methods, had, at that time, ſo intoxicated the minds of moſt people of all degrees, that the moſt extravagant bubbles found many ſubſcribers: ſome of whom ſold their firſt ſubſcriptions at a great profit, whereby the laſt buyers were conſiderable loſers.[x]

The transfer-book of the South-ſea company were ſhut up the whole month of July. During that time, there was no great variation, except only that the price of the capital ſtoc decreaſed gradually, from above 1000 to 930, in proportion as the third ſubſcription to 1000 roſe to 330 advance or clear profit. In the mean time, the directors, at a meeting on the 8th of July, reſolved to open their books, for taking in ſubſcriptions of the lottery tickets, and other ſhort annuities, to the amount of ſix millions ſterling; but, though they did not then think fit to declare at what rate they deſigned to take thoſe effects, yet the proprietors entirely truſted to their integrity; and readily ſubſcribed the ſame on the 14th and 15th of that month. After which the books were ſhut up. From that time to the end of July, the ſtoc fell gradually from about 1000 to 900, including the Midſummer dividend. In the mean time, it being confidently reported, that the capital ſtoc was to be enlarged by a fourth ſubſcription in money, ſome perſons in eminent ſtations deſired the principal managers to put off the ſubſcription, till the proprietors of the remaining part of the long annuities had ſubſcribed, ſince the taking in of thoſe public debts, in order to make them redeemable, was the main view, upon which the miniſtry and the parliament thought fit to encourage the South-ſea project. Some pretend, that the men in power made this ſtep, not only to free themſelves from the importunity of many, who ſued to be ſet down in their liſts, for a ſhare in the next ſubſcription; but alſo, in order to reſerve part of the to-be-increaſed capital ſtoc, till a new ſet of directors were choſen, who ſhould have a ſhare in the profits of future ſubſcriptions, in caſe the humour of buying up the ſame at an advanced price ſhould laſt ſo long. However that be, in a committee of the directors the 27th of July, it being conſidered, that ſeveral perſons, admitted as ſubſcribers to the third ſubſcription in money, had not yet made their firſt payment, it was reſolved, that none but the proprietors of their capital and increaſed ſtoc ſhould be admitted into the the next ſubſcription in money, at the rate of 20 per cent. ſo that a proprietor of 1000l. capital ſtoc ſhould be intitled to ſubſcribe 200l. In this reſolution, they who hitherto had carried on this great project with equal ſkill and ſucceſs, had undoubtedly two things in view; firſt, to allay the murmurings of many of the old proprietors, who complained, that the directors and great men at court had engroſſed for themſelves and their dependants moſt of the profits of the three firſt ſubſcriptions. And, ſecondly, that, in caſe the eagerneſs of buyers ſhould abate, which was to be apprehended from the daily ſinking of the price of South-ſea ſtoc, the company might be aſſured, that the new ſubſcribers would make the ſeveral payments, to which they ſhould ſubmit themſelves, and for for which their capital ſtoc would be a ſufficient ſecurity. On the other hand, many of the old proprietors were ſo far from looking upon this reſolution as a favour, that, on the contrary, they did not ſtic to ſay, 'that the directors, having had the cream for themſelves, would now give the proprietors the four milk.' This complaint ſeemed to be the better grounded, becauſe it was well known, that thoſe who had got moſt by the South-ſea, daily endeavouring to ſell out, and ſecure their vaſt profits; and, in particular, that the principal projector of this ſcheme had bought conſiderable eſtates in Norfolk and other counties.

[x] How great the general infatuation or thirſt of gain was, appears from the following inſtance: a propoſal was offered, 'for carrying on an undertaking of great advantage, but nobody to know what it is.' The projector formed a ſcheme for half a million, by which every ſubſcriber, paying down two guineas for ſubſcribing, was to have 100l. a year for every 100l. ſo ſubſcribed. But how this was to be done did not appear in the propoſals, where it was alſo ſaid, that in a month the particulars of the project ſhould be laid open and the money ſubſcribed was then to be laid in. As extravagant as this ſcheme was, the projector in a forenoon received 1000 ſubſcriptions, with which, amounting to 2000 guineas, he went off in the afternoon.

Purſuant to what had been deſired, it was reſolved on the 3d of Auguſt, at a court of directors, to receive ſubſcriptions of all the remaining long and ſhort annuities, lottery tickets, and other public ſecurities, both redeemable and irredeemable. For which purpoſe the books were opened the next day at the South-ſea houſe, and continued ſo till the 11th of Auguſt. The day after the directors publiſhed the terms they intended to allow to the proprietors. For every 1000l. a year of the long annuities, they offered 400l. in the capital ſtoc, which at 800l. per cent. (the price then of ſtoc, excluſive of the Midſummer dividend) amounted to 3200l. and in bonds or money 400l. making in all 3600l. or 36 years purchaſe. For every 90l. a year of the ſhort annuities they allowed 200l. ſtoc, which at 800l. per cent. amounted to 1600l. or 17 years purchaſe, and ſeven-ninths. The redeemable annuities and debts (as well as thoſe at 4 per cent. as thoſe at 5 per cent.) were to be taken in at 105 per cent. and allowed for the ſame in capital ſtoc at the rate of 800l. per cent. excluſive of the Midſummer dividend.

Many of the annuitants were not ſatisfied with theſe offers, which they ſaid, put ſo great a diſparity (no leſs than near half by half) between them and the former ſubſcribers; for, by the reſolution of the directors of the 19th of May, there was allowed, for every 100l. a year of the long annuities, 700l. in the capital ſtoc, beſides 10l. per cent. for the Midſummer dividend, and, in bonds or money, 575l. all which (computing the ſtoc at 800l. per cent. as it was given to the preſent ſubſcribers of the like annuities) amounted to 6735l. whereas, by theſe laſt reſolutions, there was allowed, for the ſame annuity, only 3600l. For this reaſon ſome of the laſt ſubſcribers went to the South-ſea houſe, in order to withdraw their effects; but they were told by the clerks, that there was no order from the directors for delivering them bac: ſo the affair reſted, for ſome time, undetermined.

The uneaſineſs of the annuitants put a freſh damp upon the South-ſea ſtoc; but what affected it more was the boldneſs of many perſons concerned in the illegal projects, who, in open defiance to the late acts of parliament, to the king's proclamation, and to the orders and prohibitions of the lords-juſtices, carried them on. Some of theſe companies, authoriſed either by charters or acts of parliament, did conſiderable prejudice to the South-ſea, by endeavouring to procure ſubſcriptions. Upon this, the principal directors of the South-ſea applied to thoſe at the helm, and obtained an order againſt them from the lords-juſtices, which was firſt publiſhed in the London Gazette of Auguſt the 20th, and which greatly affected the ſtocs of the York Buildings company, the Luſtring company, the Engliſh copper, and the Welſh copper and lead, and of their illegal projects. This very much alarmed the perſons concerned in theſe companies, ſome of whom ſuſtained conſiderable loſſes, and all of them ſaw their extravagant hopes and expectations entirely vaniſh. Upon the murmurings occaſioned by their diſappointment, the lords-juſtices ordered the directors of theſe companies to attend them at a general council, the 23d of Auguſt, where they condeſcended to tell them the reaſons, that had obliged them to order a proſecution againſt them. The directors, both of the Royal Exchange, and of the London Aſſurance, attended likewiſe, and were cautioned to keep ſtrictly to the limitation of their charters, that no complaint might lie againſt them.

The companies ordered to be proſecuted having recovered their fright, and conſulted able lawyers, ſeemed reſolved to ſtand trial, and aſſert their rights of managing their own affairs as they pleaſed. The Welſh copper miners were yet more bold and refactory, for that very day (Auguſt 23,) they opened their books, and made transfers of their ſtoc.

Before the lords-juſtices had cauſed their order to be publiſhed, they ſent a compliment to the prince of Wales, to acquaint him, that the company of Engliſh copper, of which he had been pleaſed to be choſen governor, being illegal, they were obliged to involve it in the order; upon which the prince ſent a meſſage to the company, deſiring them to chooſe another governor.

All this while the South-ſea ſtoc continued ſinking; ſo that on the 17th of Auguſt, it fell to 830, including the Midſummer dividend; which having given the directors no ſmall uneaſineſs, ſome of their agents were immediately detached into Exchange-alley, to buy a conſiderable quantity of ſtoc, which thereupon roſe to 880. But, the humour of felling out, continuing the two following days, the ſtocs fell again to about 820, at which price the transfer-books were opened on the 22d of Auguſt. That day, and the next morning, there was a great croud at the South-ſea houſe; and the directors obſerving that great quantities of ſtoc had been bought at a thouſand, and even at higher rates, for the opening of the books, and that many perſons would be obliged to ſell out, in order to pay the difference, which could not fail ſinking the ſtoc yet lower; they came to a ſudden and unexpected reſolution to ſhut the transfer-books; and the next day to open other books, for taking in a money ſubſcription of one million, to the capital ſtoc, at the rate of 1000l. for every 100l. capital ſtoc, to be paid in five payments, 20l. per cent. in hand, and the reſt in four equal payments. Accordingly the ſubſcription-books were opened the 24th of Auguſt; and there was ſuch a croud of ſubſcribers, and amongſt them not a few of the prime nobility, that in leſs than three hours, more than the intended ſum was ſubſcribed; and that very afternoon this fourth ſubſcription was ſold in Exchange-alley at 30 or 40 per cent. advance. The next day the principal directors, having conſulted together about their future management, came to ſeveral reſolutions, of which, that very evening they informed the public by the following advertiſement:

South-Sea Houſe, Auguſt 25th, 1720.

'The court of directors of the South-ſea company give notice, that the transfer-books of the company will be ſhut from the 31ſt day of Auguſt to the 21ſt of September, in order to the admitting as well the proprietors of the original capital ſtoc, and of the ſtoc for the laſt Midſummer dividend, as the proprietors of the ſtoc for all the long annuities, 9 per cents. and tickets of lottery 1710, and of the ſeveral redeemable debts, which have been ſubſcribed or depoſited, or authorized to be ſubſcribed into the capital ſtoc, and alſo the proprietors of the firſt, ſecond, third, and fourth money ſubſcriptions of the company into a ſubſcription of 20 per cent. of the capital ſtoc, upon the terms agreed upon by the court of directors. The company will lend the firſt payment for the intended ſubſcription to all the proprietors of the original and dividend ſtoc, and of the ſubſcription in the long annuities, 9 per cents. and tickets of lottery 1710, and in the redeemable debts; and of the firſt and ſecond money ſubſcriptions, without transferring their ſtoc, or depoſiting the ſubſcription receipts; which ſubſcription books will be opened on the 12th of September; and ſuch of the proprietors, as do not ſubſcribe within that time, will be excluded the benefit of the ſubſcription.'

The next day (Auguſt the 26th) the transfer-books were opened again; but, the South-ſea ſtoc, inſtead of advancing, being by this time fallen under 800, the directors, who had now large ſums of money in their hands, thought fit to lend to their proprietors 4000l, upon every 1000l. ſtoc for ſix months, at the rate of 4 per cent. which enabled ſome of thoſe, who had bought ſtoc at a higher price than the preſent, to ſatisfy their creditors. What ſtill embarraſſed the directors was the caſe of the annuitants, and others, who had lately ſubſcribed their public ſecurities, and who thought it a great hardſhip to have the ſtoc given them at 800l. per cent. when it was now little above 700, excluſive of the Midſummer dividend. In order to ſilence theſe and the like murmurings, after a long conſultation, on the 30th of Auguſt, the directors came to a reſolution, 'that 30 per cent. in money ſhould be the half-year's dividend due at Chriſtmas next; and from thence for twelve years, not leſs than 50 per cent. in money ſhould be the yearly dividend on their ſtoc.' What effect this reſolution had, was ſoon after manifeſt; for though it raiſed the ſtoc to about 800 for the opening of the books, yet it ſoon ſunk again, and in about three weeks fell gradually below 400.

The directors, having reſolved the future dividends, thought it time to procure the ſanction of the whole corporation; for which purpoſe they appointed (Sept. 8.) a general court to be held at Merchant-Taylor's-Hall, declaring, that this aſſembly would be one of the half-yearly general courts appointed by the charter; and to chuſe a committee of ſeven, to inſpect the by-laws.

On the appointed day, the friends of the directors took care to repair betimes to Merchant-Taylor's-Hall, which, by nine o'clock in the morning, was filled; and many proprietors and annuitants, who endeavoured to get in, could not gain admittance. The directors having taken their ſeats between eleven and twelve of the clock, ſir John Fellows, ſub-governor, acquainted the aſſembly with the occaſion of their meeting; read to them the ſeveral reſolutions of the court of directors; and gave them an account of their proceedings; of the taking in both the redeemable and unredeemable funds, and of the ſubſcriptions in money. This done, mr. Craggs ſenior made a ſhort ſpeech, wherein he commended the conduct of the directors; and urged, that nothing could more effectually contribute to the bringing this ſcheme to perfection than union among themſelves; and concluded with a motion, for thanking the court of directors for their prudent and ſkilful management, and for deſiring them to proceed in ſuch methods, as they ſhould think moſt proper for the intereſt and advantage of the corporation.

Mr Craggs was ſeconded by mr. Hungerford, who ſaid, 'that he had ſeen the riſe and fall, the decay and reſurrection of many communities of this nature; but that, in his opinion, none ever performed ſuch wonderful things in ſo ſhort a time, as the South-ſea managers had brought about: that they had done more than the crown, the pulpit, and the magiſtrate could do: for they had reconciled all parties in one common intereſt, and thereby laid aſleep, if not wholly extinguiſhed, our domeſtic jars and animoſities: that by the riſe of their ſtocs the monied-men had vaſtly increaſed their fortunes; the country gentlemen had ſeen the value of their lands doubled and trebled in their hands; and they had, at the ſame time, done good to the church, not a few of the reverend clergy having got great ſums by this project: that, in ſhort, they had enriched the whole nation; and he hoped they had not forgot themſelves.' One or two members of the aſſembly having offered to ſpeak in favour of the annuitants, and to cenſure the conduct of the directors, they were preſently hiſſed to ſilence; and mr. Hungerford, reſuming his ſpeech, continued juſtifying and applauding the directors, and concluded with ſupporting mr. Craggs's motion. The duke of Portland ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and ſaid, 'that he did not know what reaſons any body had to be diſſatisfied;' and gave in a draught of the motion for returning thanks to the directors; which being read by the clerk, it was unanimouſly approved. It was likewiſe agreed, that, according to the reſolution of the directors, 'the next Chriſtmas dividend on the ſtoc and ſubſcriptions in money ſhould be 30 per cent; and that a dividend of not leſs than 50 per cent. per annum be made from Chriſtmas next, in half-yearly payments, for not leſs than twelve years, upon the whole ſtoc and ſubſcriptions.' They likewiſe agreed with the court of directors to omit the 20 per cent. ſubſcription in money, which had been intended for the proprietors of the original ſtoc and former ſubſcriptions. After which a motion was made, 'that the laſt ſubſcribers, both of the redeemable and unredeemable funds, ſhould have the alternative, either to withdraw their orders, or to accept the terms offered them by the court of directors.' But, the queſtion being put, it was carried in the negative, three or four voices excepted. Then, upon the earl of Orkney's motion, the general court was adjourned.

But, though the directors carried their main point in the general court, yet the negative put upon the motion, in the behalf of the laſt ſubſcribers, highly increaſed the public diſcontent, and raiſed ſuch a diſtruſt of the honeſty of the managers, that the ſame day (Sept. 8.) the ſtoc fell to 640, and, on the morrow, to 550. Upon this, the directors reſolved to open the transfer-books the Monday following, which having thrown ſome damp upon the ſtoc-jobbing in the alley, the South-ſea roſe that day (Sept. 9.) to 640. On the other hand, ſeveral of the laſt ſubſcribers of annuities went with a public notary to the South-ſea houſe, to demand their orders; and, upon the refuſal of the officers to deliver them, the proprietors made their proteſts in due form, and reſolved to ſeek their remedy at law. In the mean time, they loudly complained of the unfair manner, in which they were drawn in to ſubſcribe their annuities; for, it ſeems, at the top of every page of the ſubſcription-book, there was a ſhort letter of attorney, whereby the ſubſcribers impowered three perſons, therein named, to accept ſuch terms, as the company ſhould think fit to give them for their effects; which they alledged to be a mere tric, not one in a hundred of the ſubſcribers having read the enſnaring preamble.

On the 10th of September, the directors cauſed the following advertiſement to be publiſhed: 'The court of directors give notice, that the dividends for Chriſtmas next, and afterwards, voted by the general court on the 8th of September, which ſhall become due on the four money-ſubſcriptions already taken for ſale of the ſtoc of the company, will be allowed in part of the payments, which ſhall become due on the ſubſcriptions; and that the 10 per cent. ſtoc for the laſt Midſummer dividend, on the firſt, ſecond, and third of the money ſubſcriptions, will be entitled to the like dividends, and be allowed in further part of the payment on thoſe ſubſcriptions. And whereas the transfer-books of the company were advertiſed to be ſhut from the 31ſt of Auguſt laſt to the 21ſt of September, in order to the making the ſubſcriptions of 20 per cent. intended for the proprietors; and the general court having ſince agreed that this ſubſcription be omitted, the court of directors give notice, that the transfer-books will be opened on the 12th inſtant, and will continue open as uſual.'

Some of the managers vainly expected, that this advertiſement would have contributed to the keeping up the ſtoc; but as it continued ſinking, they were obliged to have recourſe to more effectual methods. They made ſome ſecret advances towards an union with the Eaſt India company; but, a ſecret committee of that company, appointed to conſider of their offers, not having thought proper to accept them, they were forced to court the aſſiſtance of their rival, the bank of England. At the earneſt deſire, and by the zealous interpoſition of mr. ſecretary Craggs, ſeveral conferences were held between a ſelect number of the directors of thoſe two corporations; which raiſed ſo great an expectation, that, on the 12th of September, in the morning, upon a report, that they had come to an agreement for circulating ſix millions of the South-ſea company's bonds, the ſtoc roſe immediately to 670; but in the afternoon, as ſoon as that report was known to be groundleſs, the ſtoc fell again to 580; the next day to 570 and ſo gradually to 400; which increaſed the murmurings and complaints of the laſt ſubſcribers, and expoſed ſeveral of the directors to public inſults.

Mr Walpole (who was pay-maſter of the army, and lived the greateſt part of that ſummer in the country, to avoid giving offence to thoſe that had, with the directors, the management of the South-ſea affairs) being then thought to have great credit and influence with the bank, was ſent for out of the country, and importuned to uſe his intereſt to induce the bank to agree to a propoſal made by the South-ſea company, for circulating a number of their bonds.

It is to be obſerved that nothing of this kind aroſe from the bank, or was at their motion: and, as far as it appears, nothing but an apprehenſion of the people's reſentment, with which they were loudly threatned, could have prevailed with the bank to have treated at all with the South-ſea company, and involve themſelves in their calamities. But the clamour was irreſiſtible, and the bank, out of neceſſity, hearkned to the propoſals of the South-ſea company; for from them every ſtep and motion proceeded.

The firſt expedient was for the bank to circulate bonds of the South-ſea company to a certain value for a time to be agreed upon, and a propoſal to that effect was, on the 16th of September, ſent to the bank by the ſub and deputy governors of the South-ſea company.

This not being reliſhed immediately, it was propoſed, that there ſhould be a meeting of a committee conſiſting of five of each company at the poſt-maſter's houſe, where were likewiſe preſent, lord preſident, mr. ſecretary Craggs, the chancellor of the exchequer, and mr. Craggs, poſt-maſter-general [y]. The meeting was on the 19th of September, three days after the propoſal.

This conference laſted many hours with great reluctance on the part of the bank, but was preſſed with ſo much eagerneſs and authority on the other ſide, that the bank was prevailed upon to yield.

It was thought proper, before they parted, that ſomething ſhould be reduced into writing, as a minute of the ſubſtance of what had been under conſideration, and to ſerve as a foundation of a future agreement or contract between the two companies.

There was ſome little diſpute who ſhould draw the minute, but it being the general deſire of the company, that mr. Walpole ſhould do it, in the preſence of the whole meeting he put down in writing what has ever ſince been called, 'the bank contract,' and which was in the following words, 'that the bank of England ſhall undertake to circulate three millions of South-ſea bonds for one year, at a premium to be agreed upon by the two companies; a ſubſcription to be taken, for enabling the bank to carry on the circulation ——per cent. to be paid down by every ſubſcriber, and ——per cent. upon every call at a fortnight's notice; the contract with the ſubſcribers to be made in the nature and form with former contracts for circulating exchequer bills, and the charges of circulation to be borne by the South-ſea company. That, in conſideration of this undertaking, the South-ſea company ſhall pay the 3,700,000l. to be paid to the bank by notice of parliament, in South-ſea ſtoc, at a price to be agreed on between the two companies.

This paper (which was all that mr. Walpole ever wrote relating to the affair; for at the other meetings he was never once preſent) had no title or preamble, ſignifying what it imported: the premium for circulating, and what was to be paid down for the circulation, was left blank, and the moſt material part of the whole, at what price the bank was to take the South-ſea ſtoc for 3,700,000l. was referred to a ſubſequent agreement. So it could not with any propriety be called a contract, but rather a rough draught of an agreement void of all form or any manner of obligation.

The next day after this meeting (Sept. 20.) there was a general court of the South-ſea company at Merchants-Taylors-Hall, where ſir John Fellows, the ſub-governor, acquainted them, 'that, ſince their laſt meeting, their ſtoc having taken an unexpected turn to the diſadvantage of the company, the directors had been conſulted what might be moſt for the benefit of the corporation; and conſidering the great credit the bank of England had juſtly gained, both at home and abroad, they had thought it for their intereſt to treat with that company, for the circulating their bonds, and to grant them ſtoc at a moderate price, in lieu of the 3,700,000l. which the South-ſea company was to pay them at Lady-day, and Michaelmas, 1721. And that from the reſult of the meeting they had the night before with ſome gentlemen of the bank, and ſome perſons of the firſt rank, they doubted not but ſuch an agreement might ſoon be perfected.' Hereupon mr. Dawſon moved, 'that the directors be empowered to agree with the bank of England, or any other perſons, to circulate the company's bonds, or make any other agreement with the bank, which they ſhould judge proper:' and he was ſeconded by ſir John Eyles. Hereupon mr. Hungerford moved for amending the latter part of the queſtion, by making expreſs mention of that other agreement. But mr. Pulteney ſpoke for the queſtion, and thought it beſt to uſe a latitude of expreſſion, and ſo leave the directors at liberty to act as they ſhould think proper for the intereſt of the company. He added, 'that it was a matter of ſurprize to ſee what a panic had ſeized upon the minds of the people, at a time when the nation was in profound peace, and had nothing to fear, either at home or from abroad. That, indeed, a rumour had been univerſally ſpread, as if the armament of the Spaniards was deſigned either againſt Port-Mahon or Gibraltar; but that he took that report to be altogether falſe and groundleſs, and only intended to ſcandalize that potentate, and to terrify the people here; for he himſelf had ſeen and peruſed a copy of a letter, written by the expreſs command of the king of Spain by his ſecretary of ſtate, to the Britiſh miniſter at Madrid, abſolutely denying, in the ſtrongeſt terms, any deſigns of the Spaniſh forces againſt any of his Britannic majeſty's dominions. That he was as much concerned in the company as moſt people; but that, notwithſtanding this general and terrible alarm, he had not diſpoſed of any part of his ſtoc; for he would think it a ſcandal to be rich, if the nation were ruined. That, however, he hoped the caſe would be quite otherwiſe; and he doubted not but the company would ſoon be reſtored to its former flouriſhing condition, ſince it was like to be ſupported by the bank of England, a corporation, who by wiſe, though ſlow and cautious, meaſures, had eſtabliſhed its credit, not only at home, but even among foreigners.' Upon this the queſtion was unanimouſly agreed to. Sir John Fellows then farther acquainted the aſſembly, 'that, the proprietors of the ſeveral annuities lately ſubſcribed, as well as thoſe intereſted in the two laſt money-ſubſcriptions, being very much diſſatisfied, fearing thereby to be great loſers, the directors had thought it proper, that the terms ſhould be lowered to make them eaſy.' Whereupon ſir Matthew Decker moved, 'that power be given to the directors, to relieve the annuitants, who came in upon the laſt ſubſcription; as likewiſe the proprietors of the third and fourth money-ſubſcriptions.' He was ſeconded by mr. Craggs ſenior, who, among other things, ſaid, 'that nothing could be more reaſonable and juſt, than to give ſatisfaction to people, who had truſted their fortunes and eſtates with the company, and that it would be a notorious robbery to take any advantage of their confidence in the honour and integrity of the directors.' This gave occaſion to mr. Budgel to reflect, in a ſpeech, on the prodigious leap from a ſubſcription of 400l. to one of 1000l. which left ſuch a gap in the building, as would at laſt bring it to the ground. He then obſerved, that the fall of the ſtoc was owing to the malicious rumour, that two or three of the very directors had baſely betrayed the truſt repoſed in them. When he had done ſpeaking, mr. Cheſter, one of the directors, ſpoke in vindication of his brethren, and ſaid, 'that he knew of no proceedings among them, but what were intended for the good of the whole company: that, for his own part, he had not ſold any of his ſtoc, nor reſerved to himſelf any more of the ſubſcriptions, than what was allowed to each of the directors; and that his fortune would have been as large, if he had not been a director: that, as to the great gap between the ſecond and third ſubſcription in money, which was objected as a wrong ſtep in the management of the company's affairs, he could aſſure them, that it was none of the directors fault, ſince they deſigned to have made the third ſubſcription at five or ſix hundred; but, the humour and eagerneſs of the people having run up the South-ſea ſtoc to ſeven or eight hundred, they could not in prudence open a ſubſcription at leſs than a thouſand.' The aſſembly ſeemed to be very well pleaſed with mr. Cheſter's ſpeech; but many wondered, that none of his brethren took that opportunity to clear themſelves, as he had done. Upon the whole matter, the court unanimouſly agreed to the queſtion for relieving the laſt ſubſcribers, and then adjourned.

Two days after, (Sept. 22,) there was a general court of the bank of England, when the governor acquainted them, that this was one of their quarterly and half-yearly meetings and that their directors had come to a reſolution to declare the laſt half-yearly dividend at four per cent. to which the court having unanimouſly agreed, the governor proceeded, ſaying, 'he preſumed, none could be ignorant there had of late been divers meetings and conferences between the directors of this company, and the directors of the South-ſea, under the influence and interpoſition of ſome perſons of the higheſt figure and ſtation: that they had made no agreement yet with the South-ſea; but that the directors had thought fit to come to a reſolution upon the matter. Then the reſolution was read; and, without any perſon's ſpeaking to it, was immediately formed into a queſtion to this effect: 'that, for the better ſupport of the public credit, the directors of the bank of England be empowered to agree with the directors of the South-ſea, to circulate their bonds to what ſum, and upon what terms, and for what time, they ſhall think proper; and to make what other agreements with the South-ſea, they ſhall judge to be for the intereſt of this corporation.' Which queſtion was inſtantly agreed to with great unanimity. Then the governor acquainted them, that he believed books would be ready for a ſubſcription to be taken in the next day, for the purpoſe aforeſaid, and that it would be on the uſual terms, 15 per cent. depoſit, 3 per cent. premium, and 5 per cent. intereſt; and then the court adjourned.

The directors of the two companies being thus empowered, a committee of both met on the 23d of September, and a propoſal was made by one of the directors of the South-ſea company, 'that the 3,700,000l. (which the South-ſea company was to repay to the bank at Lady-day and Michaelmas, 1721) ſhould be ſubſcribed by the bank into the ſtoc of the South-ſea company, for which the bank was to have ſuch ſhares as the funds would produce, the ſtoc being valued at 400l. per cent.'

This propoſal was the next day reported at a court of directors of the bank; and, being agreed to, was the ſame day communicated, by a director of the bank, to the court of directors of the South-ſea company.

This, in ſhort, is the hiſtory of the famous bank contract which has made ſo much noiſe, the ſubſtance of all which is, that, in the day of diſtreſs, the bank was thought the only reſource to ſupport the ſinking ſtate of the South-ſea company.

Every one that was thought capable of giving any aſſiſtance was called in; at the firſt conference mr. Walpole aſſiſted, and the bank was perſuaded to undertake what was propoſed to them: the firſt part of the propoſition, and, indeed, the original propoſal for circulating the bonds upon which the firſt conference was held, was dropped by the South-ſea company; and the laſt article of taking South-ſea ſtoc at 400l. per cent. was carried on, and accepted by a committee of the bank: and this examble, it was hoped, by the managers of the South-ſea affairs, would fix the price of South-ſea ſtoc at that rate: but they were ſoon convinced, by the daily fall of the ſtoc, that this expedient would not anſwer: and the bank quickly found, they had been prevailed upon to conſent to what they were not able to perform, as will preſently be ſeen.

When the books were opened at the bank for taking in a ſubſcription for the ſupport of public credit, the concourſe of people, who readily brought in their money, was at firſt ſo very great, that it was judged, the whole ſubſcription (which was intended for three millions) would have been filled that very day: but it happened, that the fall of the South-ſea ſtoc, and the diſcredit of that company's bonds, occaſioned a run upon the moſt eminent goldſmiths and bankers, ſome of whom having lent out great ſums upon South-ſea ſtoc, and other public ſecurities were obliged to ſhut up their ſhops, and abſcond. The ſword-blade company (who hitherto had been the chief caſh-keepers of the South-ſea company) being almoſt drained of their ready-money, were forced to ſtop payment, and ſet up at their office written bills, giving notice, 'that they would pay any of their notes in South-ſea ſtoc at four hundred per cent. or pay part in caſh on the Monday following, and give five per cent. intereſt on the reſt till paid; and that they would take their own notes in payments for the monies they had lent.' This, being looked upon as a kind of bankruptcy, increaſed the public calamity, and occaſioned a great run upon the bank, who were obliged to pay out money faſter than they received it upon the ſubſcription. But the feſtival of Michaelmas, on which the bank was ſhut of courſe, gave it ſome breathing-time.

In the mean time, South-ſea ſtoc continued ſinking till Michaelmas day, when it was about 150, at which price it was on the 2d of February, the day after the houſe of commons accepted the propoſals of the South-ſea company; whoſe low credit appeared yet more plainly in that their bonds, payable on Michaelmas, 1721, were now at above 25 per cent. diſcount.

Purſuant to a former reſolution for relieving the laſt ſubſcribers, a general court was held the 30th of September, wherein, after the agreement with the bank was ratified, it was reſolved that the proprietors of the redeemable debts taken in on the laſt ſubſcriptions ſhould be allowed, for their ſeveral intereſts in the funds, the ſame terms, in all reſpects, as the bank; and that the laſt ſubſcription of the long annuities ſhould be valued at 32 years purchaſe; and of the ſhort at 17 years purchaſe; to be paid for in ſtoc at 400 per cent. and be intitled to the laſt Midſummer dividend: and that all the annuitants ſhould be allowed the intereſt of their annuities to the 29th of September. It was alſo agreed, that the third ſubſcriptions, which was taken at 1000 per cent. ſhould be reduced to 400 per cent. and the ſubſcription receipts given out accordingly. That the 100 per cent. already paid ſhould be taken in part of the payment; and that the remaining 300 per cent. ſhould be paid in nine payments, whereof the three next payments to be at 40 per cent. each, and the other ſix payments at 30 per cent. at ſix months diſtance from each other; the firſt payment of 40 per cent. to be the 2d of July, 1721. It was alſo agreed, that the fourth ſubſcription, which was taken at 1000 per cent. whereof 200 per cent. was paid down, ſhould be alſo reduced to 400 per cent. and that the remaining 200 per cent. ſhould be paid in eight equal payments of 25 per cent. each, the firſt of which was to be the 26th of Sept. 1721, and the remaining payments at ſix months diſtance from each other. That intereſt ſhould be allowed to the company from Michaelmas, 1720, after the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, to the reſpective times of payment of the ſaid third and fourth ſubſcriptions: and that the 10 per cent. dividend at Midſummer ſhould be allowed on the third and fourth ſubſcriptions. That the proprietors of the receipts of all the money ſubſcriptions ſhould be allowed, in part of their payments, the ſeveral dividends, that ſhould be made on the ſtoc of the company, till their payments were compleated. That 5 per cent. intereſt be allowed on the company's bonds from the 29th inſtant, till they ſhould become due: and that any of the company's bonds ſhould be taken as money in the fourth payment of the firſt ſubſcriptions, which would become due on the 14th of October.[z]

Theſe reſolutions gave no ſatisfaction to the annuitants, nor put the leaſt ſtop to the fall of the South-ſea ſtoc. The bank finding they were not able to ſtem the tide, without expoſing the properties of their own principals and adventurers to be carried away and loſt in the common deluge, they wiſely kept themſelves out of the general inundation, and did not care to be drowned, with thoſe, they could not ſave. They reſolved to drop an agreement, which they were under no obligation to perform (had it been poſſible) and to which the South-ſea company had no power to compel them. On the 10th of November, the governor of the bank reported from the committee appointed to treat with South-ſea company, that the tranſactions between the bank and that company had been laid before counſel, on behalf of the bank; and that, the South-ſea company preſſing for an anſwer of what had been done therein, the governor of the bank had acquainted the deputy-governor of the South-ſea company, that the committee did not think fit, for the preſent, to proceed further in that affair, and had delivered to him in writing the following anſwer:

'When the propoſition was offered by the lords, at the meeting of the committees of both companies, as a ſuitable expedient for the ſupport of public credit, the court of directors of the bank ſhewed their readineſs to join in any meaſures, that might tend to the ſervice of the public.

'But, ſome difficulties appearing to the committee of the bank, they had conſulted with their counſel, and they are adviſed, that, conſidering the nature of this tranſaction, it will not be ſafe for them to proceed upon the propoſition without conſent of parliament.

'However, they think it reaſonable, that, in the mean time, the committee of the South-ſea ſhould give the committee of the bank ſome account of their eſtate, for the ſatisfaction of their principals.'

About a week after, the following paper was ſent to the bank from the lords of the treaſury:

'My lords deſire, that the difficulties which have ariſen

(and upon which they ſay they have conſulted their own counſel) concerning the late agreement between them and the South-ſea company, may be put into writing, and delivered to their lordſhips, as ſoon as poſſible, that their lordſhips may receive the opinion of the king's counſel.'

To this the following anſwer was given:

'The court of directors of the bank have, with the utmoſt deference, conſidered the meſſage in writing, which your lordſhips were pleaſed to ſend them, and they humbly apprehend, they cannot better explain themſelves, than they have already done, in the manner they have given to the South-ſea company, a copy whereof was delivered to your lordſhips, which contains the ſubſtance of what they conſulted with the counſel thereupon.'

Thus ended the tranſactions between the two companies, which (as it has been ſuggeſted) were carried on by the authors and promoters of them, with a deſign to take advantage of the firſt rumour of this ſuppoſed agreement, and draw in unwary perſons, who, deſirous to retrieve their loſſes, were induced to buy ſtoc at the price, the bank had agreed to take it. Thoſe who had countenanced and run into every part of the South-ſea ſcheme, and were conſequently deeply involved, were juſtly ſuſpected of having contrived and taken advantage of the contract; by which means great numbers of deluded people were undone.

Thus, in the ſpace of eight months, were ſeen the riſe, progreſs, and fall of that mighty fabric, which being wound up by myſterious ſprings to a wonderful height, had fixed the eyes and expectations of all Europe, but whoſe foundation being fraud, illuſion, credulity, and infatuation, fell to the ground, as ſoon as the artful management of the projectors was diſcovered. The ebb of this ſwoln fluctuating credit returned with greater violence than it flowed, and carried every thing before it with that precipitation, that the application of the miniſters of ſtate, and the directors of the great companies, jointly and ſeparately to ſtop it, were ineffectual. Expreſs after expreſs was ſent to Hanover, to give the king information of the ſtate of affairs, which was ſo urgent, that the king ſet out for England ſooner than he intended, and arrived at London the 11th of November.

The South-ſea ſtoc, which was 200 at the king's arrival, fell again upon the prorogation of the parliament, from the 25th of November to the 8th of December, to 135; but, on a report that the miniſtry had agreed with the principal directors of the South-ſea, the bank, and Eaſt-India company, upon a project which would very much conduce to the reſtoration of the public credit, it roſe again to 210. But whatever the miniſters concerted, for that end, was fruſtrated by the managers of the South-ſea company, who publiſhed an advertiſement in the London Gazette, 'that the bonds of the South-ſea company would be taken in repayment of the money on all loans made by the company. That the bonds would be likewiſe taken in all future payments on the ſubſcription receipt; and that all perſons, who were willing to make their ſubſcription capital ſtoc, might do the ſame, by making the remaining payments in the bonds of the company. This advertiſement was generally looked upon as very extraordinary, ſince it was unreaſonable to expect, either the borrowers of 400l. on 100l. capital ſtoc abſolutely transferred, or ſubſcribers at 400l. ſhould make repayments and remaining payments at a time, when South-ſea ſtoc was under 200.

The ſquadron, which had been ſent to the Baltic under the command of ſir John Norris, returned to England, and arrived at Orford on the 20th of November, all but the Monk; a fifty-gun ſhip, which ſtruc on the Colſton Sand, near Yarmouth, and was loſt; but moſt of her crew was ſaved by boats from Colſton.

The parliament being being met, purſuant to their laſt prorogation, on the 8th of December, the king went to the houſe of peers, and by the mouth of the lord-chancellor, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'Since we laſt parted, the face of our affairs abroad is become more favourable. The peace in the ſouth only wants the form of a congreſs; and that of the north is brought much nearer to a concluſion. I ſhall, at a proper time, order the ſeveral treaties I have made, to be laid before you; by which you will perceive the ſucceſs of our endeavours to eſtabliſh a peace throughout Europe, and to ſecure and ſupport the proteſtant religion. At the ſame time I can never ſufficiently expreſs my concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which has ſo mcch affected the public credit at home.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I do moſt earneſtly recommend it to you, that you conſider of the moſt effectual and ſpeedy methods to reſtore the national credit, and fix it upon a laſting foundation. You will, I doubt not, be aſſiſted in ſo commendable and neceſſary a work by every man, that loves his country, and eſpecially by the ſeveral great ſocieties of this kingdom. I hope you will, on this occaſion, remember that all your prudence, your temper, and reſolution are neceſſary to find out and apply the proper remedies to our misfortunes; which will, if you ſucceed, ſerve to increaſe that reputation you have ſo juſtly acquired, particularly if you ſhall be able, notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, to diſcharge a part of the public debt. I have ordered the ſeveral eſtimates to be laid before you of the expence of the enſuing year; and muſt deſire you to diſpatch the ſupplies neceſſary for them.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am glad to obſerve to you, that our trade does appear to have been more extended this year than in the preceeding one. We have the moſt flouriſhing navy of any nation whatſoever to protect it. And I hope you will turn your thoughts to the beſt methods for the ſecuring and enlarging of our commerce. You may depend on my hearty concurrence to all ſuch proviſions, as ſhall appear to you neceſſary for the good of my people.'

The lords without any debate, unanimouſly agreed to congratulate the king in an addreſs, for the near proſpect of a general peace, and to thank him for his endeavours to ſecure and maintain the proteſtant religion. To this were added aſſurances of their utmoſt aſſiſtance towards attaining thoſe great ends, and of their zealous concurrence in all meaſures for reſtoring public credit, and enlarging the commerce of theſe kingdoms.

The commons, who were more concerned than the peers in the fall of the South-ſea company, and in the ſubſequent calamities, were not ſo peaceable. Mr Pulteney made a motion for an addreſs, 'to thank the king for the near proſpect of peace, and for his tender concern for the misfortunes of his people, occaſioned by the unhappy turn of affairs; and to aſſure him, that the houſe would proceed with all poſſible care, prudence, and temper, to enquire into the cauſes of theſe misfortunes, and apply the proper remedies for reſtoring and fixing public credit upon ſolid and laſting foundations.' This motion being ſeconded by mr. Pelham and ſome others, mr. Shippen propoſed, after the words 'for reſtoring public credit,' to add, 'as far as it is conſiſtent with the honour of parliaments, the intereſt of the nation, and the principles of juſtice.' Mr Shippen gave his reaſons for this addition, urging, 'that, in order effectually to remedy the preſent misfortunes, it was abſolutely neceſſary to maintain the honour and faith of parliamentary engagements, and to ſhew the higheſt reſentment againſt thoſe, who, abuſing the truſt repoſed in them, had given ſo fatal a wound to public credit, and enriched themſelves by the plunder of the nation: that, in his opinion, the managers of the South-ſea project were not the moſt criminal, ſince there were thoſe above them, whoſe duty it was to overlook and direct their proceedings, and who ought to have given a ſeaſonable chec to that extremity of folly, by which the South-ſea ſtoc and the ſubſcriptions were advanced to an extravagant rate: adding, that, had thoſe at the helm interpoſed in the affair of the South-ſea, as they did in the caſe of the two aſſurances and other projects, they would have prevented that diſmal calamity, which has ſince befallen the nation.'

The lord Moleſworth, who ſpoke with great vehemence on the ſame ſide, examined the king's ſpeech, and made remarks upon it: he ſaid, 'he was glad they were told, that the peace in the ſouth only wanted the form of a congreſs, which gave him hopes, that the difficulties ſtarted by Spain, in relation to Gibraltar, were at laſt ſurmounted, and that we were like to preſerve that important conqueſt of the preceeding war, together with Port-Mahon, which would make us ſome amends for the great expence of blood and treaſure we had lately been at, to conquer Sicily for the Houſe of Auſtria' When he came to ſpeak of South-ſea calamity, he ſaid, 'that before they conſidered of proper remedies, they ought to enquire into the cauſe and nature of the diſtemper: that it is with the body politic, as with the body natural; and therefore they ought to imitate the ſkilful ſurgeons, who, in order to cure a wound, begin with probing it; and when they find it neceſſary, make inciſions before they apply healing plaiſters; and that they, who followed a contrary method, are but mere emperies, who, by uſing palliatives make the ſore feſter, and endanger the life of the patient. He owned it had by ſome been ſuggeſted, that there was no law to puniſh the directors of the South-ſea company, who were juſtly looked upon as the immediate authors of the preſent misfortunes: but that, in his opinion, they ought, on this occaſion, to follow the example of the ancient Romans, who having no law againſt parricide, becauſe their legiſlators ſuppoſed no ſon could be ſo unnatural wicked, as to imbrue his hands in his father's blood, made one to puniſh ſo heinous a crime, as ſoon as it happened to be committed; and adjudged the guilty wretch to be thrown alive (ſewed up in a ſack) into the Tyber. That, as he looked upon the contrivers and executors of the villainous South-ſea ſcheme as the parricides of their country, he ſhould be ſatisfied to ſee them undergo the ſame puniſhment.'

Sir Joſeph Jekyll ſpoke on the ſame ſide; and obſerved, 'that as he doubted not, but among the South-ſea directors ſome might be innocent, and others criminal, ſo he was of opinion, there were thoſe, who were not directors, no leſs, if not more criminal, than the directors themſelves, and who therefore deſerved an equal, if not a ſeverer puniſhment: adding, that upon extraordinary emergencies, where the laws are deficient, the legiſlative authority may, and ought to exert itſelf, and he hoped a Britiſh parliament would never want a vendictive power to puniſh national crimes.'

Mr Grey Nevill, mr. Pitt, and ſome others, ſpoke alſo for the clauſe offered by mr. Shippen. But it was repreſented by mr. ſecretary Craggs, mr. York, the ſollicitor-general, and mr. Walpole. 'That ſuch a reſtriction did but ill ſuit with an addreſs of thanks, which, in their opinion, ought to run in the uſual form, and anſwer in general terms the ſeveral heads of the ſpeech from the throne. That, as to the main drift of the clauſe, they thought it inconſiſtent with the rules of prudence, to begin this ſeſſion with irritating enquiries: that if the city of London were on fire, they did not doubt but all wiſe men would be for extinguiſhing the flames, and preventing the ſpreading of the conflagration, before they enquired into the incendiaris. That, in like manner, public credit having received a moſt dangerous wound, and being ſtill in a bleeding condition, they ought to apply a ſpeedy remedy to it; and that afterwards they might enquire into the cauſe of the preſent calamity.' Mr Walpole, in particular, declared, 'that for his own part, he had never approved the South-ſea ſcheme, and was ſenſible it had done a great deal of miſchief. But, ſince it could not be undone, he thought it the duty of all good men to give their helping hand towards retrieving it: and, that with this view, he had already beſtowed ſome thoughts on a propoſal to reſtore public credit, which, in a proper time, he would ſubmit to the wiſdom of the houſe.' The majority acquieſced in theſe laſt reaſons; ſo that the queſtion being put for inſerting mr. Shippen's clauſe, it paſſed in the negative by two hundred and ſixty-one againſt one hundred and three. However, the next day a motion being made by mr. Milner for inſerting the words, 'and for puniſhing the authors of them (our preſent misfortunes)' the ſame was carried without dividing.

By theſe firſt proceedings, it is eaſy to ſee that this ſeſſion would not be ſo favourable to the miniſtry as the former ones had been, and that the whigs would hardly be diſtinguiſhed from the tories by their votes: theſe partialities were ſuſpended, and as it were, annihilated by various other paſſions, which produced numberleſs intrigues. Many of the commons were ſincerely touched with the public calamities, or moved by their own private loſſes: others, diſſatisfied with the miniſtry and court, were pleaſed to have an opportunity of covering their revenge, with the ſpecious pretence of juſtice and the public good: ſome had in view, by their loud and bitter complaints, to make themſelves conſiderable to the court, or draw the attention of the oppoſite party: others, engaged in the ſecret practices of the South-ſea company, had a mind, by an affected ſeverity, to prevent their being ſuſpected: a few there were, who politickly concealed, under the appearance of zeal and indignation, their devotion to ſome of the principal managers, and fought to be in the committees of enquiry into thoſe odious affairs, in order to ſcreen the authors thereof.

However different theſe views might be, all ſeemed at firſt to agree. On the 12th of September, the commons ordered, that the directors of the South-ſea ſhould forthwith lay before them an account of all their proceedings; of all the orders they had received from the treaſury; of what money and exchequer bills they had received ſince the 25th of December, 1719; of what public debts had been ſubſcribed or diſcharged, and what ſums of money had been borrowed on account of the company, ſince the ſame time. Nor did the commons reſt here. A few days after, ſir Joſeph Jekyll moved, 'that a ſelect committee ſhould be appointed, to enquire into all the proceedings relating to the execution of the South-ſea act; but, upon mr. Walpole's repreſenting, that ſuch a method would take up a great deal of time, and that, the public credit being in a bleeding condition, a remedy ought to be applied to it, the motion was not inſiſted on.

After that, mr Walpole acquainted the houſe, 'that (as he had hinted a few days before) he had ſpent ſome time upon a ſcheme for reſtoring public credit; but that, the execution of it depended upon a poſition, which had been laid as a fundamental, he thought it proper, before he opened the ſcheme, to be informed, whether he might rely on that main foundation, 'whether the ſubſcriptions of public debts and incumbrances, money-ſubſcriptions, and other contracts made with the South-ſea company, ſhould remain in the preſent ſtate?' This queſtion, being ſtated, occaſioned a warm debate, particularly in relation to the validity of the ſecond ſubſcription of the redeemable and irredeemable public debts. Sir Joſeph Jekyll, and ſome others, urged in favour of the ſubſcribers, 'that moſt of them having been drawn in to ſet their names 'to a ſort of letter of attorney, which was never read to them; and not having had afterwards the option of the terms offered, as the former ſubſcribers had, the ſubſcription was ſurreptitious, and therefore not binding.' But they were anſwered by mr. Walpole, mr. ſecretary Craggs, mr. attorney and mr. ſollicitor-general, and ſome others, 'that the letter of attorney, by virtue of which the contract of the ſecond ſubſcription was made, having been placed at the top of every page of the book, all the ſubſcribers might have read it, as many of them did; and ſo might have choſen, whether they would ſet their names to it, or not. But that it ſeems ſome perſons thought the ſubſcription valid while they got, and not binding when they were like to looſe by it. However, if any thing were defective in the ſubſcription, they thought it adviſeable to leave it to the determination either of a general court of the South-ſea, or of the common law.' Theſe reaſons being approved by moſt of the landed gentlemen, after a debate of ſeveral hours, it was at laſt reſolved by two hundred and fifty-nine againſt one hundred and ſeventeen, 'that all the ſubſcriptions of public debts and incumbrances, money-ſubſcriptions and other contracts made with the South-ſea company, by virtue of an act made the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, remain in the preſent ſtate, unleſs altered for the eaſe and relief of the proprietors, by a general court of the South-ſea company, or ſet aſide by due courſe of law.

There are few inſtances which prove ſo ſtrongly as this, that there is no cauſe ſo bad as to want an advocate in aſſemblies, where a man may freely ſpeak his opinion, without any other danger but that of being rejected. This pretended contract, which was deemed valid, had not been read, nor could have been read, without being univerſally diſapproved. Was it probable, that ſuch multitudes ſhould leave their moſt valuable intereſts to the diſcretion of two or three attorneys? they were not, indeed, forbid to ſubſcribe, but they believed they had done it, with a liberty to conſent to, or reject the conditions that ſhould be offered. Was not this ſufficient to declare the ſubſcription void, and to reſtore the proprietors to their former ſtate? However, the commons did not think ſo for the reſolution of the committee was confirmed, the next day, by the houſe. [a]

[a] In the next day's debate, mr. Walpole, who ſpoke for the reſolution, ſet forth the views, with which the South-ſea act was made, viz. 'to conſult the landed and trading intereſt of the nation, by leſſening its incumbrances and public debts, and putting them in a method of being paid off in a few years; which could not have been done, unleſs a way had been found to make the annuities for long terms redeemable; which had been happily effected by the South-ſea ſcheme, without a breach of parliamentary faith: and, if they ſhould now unravel what had been done, they ſhould not only ruin the South-ſea company, but, inſtead of alleviating, aggravate the preſent misfortunes.' In anſwer to this, ſir Joſeph Jekyll urged, 'that, in order to remedy the preſent diſtemper, and reſtore public credit, they ought, in the firſt place, to reſolve and aſſert public faith, equity, and juſtice, which the South-ſea managers had notoriouſly violated, with reſpect to the firſt and ſecond ſubſcribers of annuities and other public debts: for the former had not the ſtoc, to which they were intitled, delivered to them, till ſix months after they had ſubſcribed their effects, and when the ſtoc was fallen above half its price, and the latter had not the option either to accept or reject the terms, that were offered them.' Mr Walpole having, among other things, replied, 'that, if any injuſtice was done to the ſubſcribers, they were, by the reſolution in queſtion, left at liberty to ſeek their relief by law.' Mr Lechmere, chancellor of the duchy, inſiſted, 'that, if the South-ſea company, whom the parliament had appointed truſtees for the public debts, had not duly executed that truſt, in relation to the annuitants, the latter could ſeek for relief no where but in parliament; and that it was a duty incumbant upon the legiſlature to

The day after this reſolution was agreed to, mr. Walpole laid before the commons his ſcheme to reſtore public credit, the ſubſtance of which was, to ingraft nine millions of South-ſea ſtoc into the bank of England, and the like ſum into the Eaſt-India company, upon certain conditions. [b] Mr Hutchinſon and other members made ſome exceptions to the ſcheme; but, none offering a better, it was ordered, 'that propoſals ſhould be received from the bank of England, the South-ſea company, and the Eaſt-India company, towards reſtoring public credit.'

Though the plainneſs of Mr Walpole's ſcheme recommended it above all others, yet it met with ſome oppoſition in the general courts of the three great companies, who met to give powers to their directors to bring the matter to perfection: but at laſt the directors were empowered to make a propoſal to the houſe of commons.

Accordingly propoſals agreeable to the new ſcheme were afterwards preſented to the houſe of commons by the ſeveral companies, and it was reſolved (Jan. 5.) 'that an ingroſſment of nine millions of the capital ſtoc of the South-ſea company into the capitals of the bank and Eaſt-India company, as propoſed by theſe companies, will contribute very much to the reſtoring public credit.' A bill upon this reſolution was, after ſome debate, ordered to be brought in, which paſſed the houſe, and was ſent up to the lords, and afterwards received the royal aſſent.

Purſuant to the order of the houſe, the ſub and deputy-governors of the South-ſea company having preſented to the commons their books and papers, mr. Shippen made a long ſpeech, repreſenting, 'that beſides the papers, which had already been laid before them, it was neceſſary to have others, in order to diſcover the frauds and deceitful management of the South-ſea directors and their accomplices. That, in his opinion, the moſt villainous contrivance, whereby they enſnared unwary people, was their taking in money ſubſcriptions at 1000 per cent. and their declaring a dividend of 30l. per cent. at Chriſtmas, and of not leſs than 50l. per cent. per ann. for twelve years after; which had impoſed upon the underſtanding of all ſuch, as depended upon the wiſdom and integrity of the directors, and occaſioned the ruin of many thouſands of families.' He therefore moved, 'that the directors of the South-ſea company ſhould lay before the houſe the calculations or inducements, on which they took in the third and fourth money ſubſcriptions, and grounded the reſolutions of making ſuch dividends.' This motion, not being oppoſed, was agreed to; as was likewiſe a ſecond motion for laying before the houſe a liſt of the directors of the South-ſea company, with the names of the treaſurer, ſecretary, and accountant, and alſo the original books of the minutes of the committee of treaſury of the company, ſince the 25th of December, 1719, with a copy of the by-laws. After which the commons adjourned to the 4th of January, as the lords did to the 9th of the ſame month.

By theſe proceedings of the parliament it is evident, the commons were divided in their opinions, one party being for applying a remedy to the calamity occaſioned by the miſmanagement of the South-ſea ſcheme: and the other party, for enquiring into the cauſes of the preſent misfortunes, and for puniſhing the authors as the moſt effectual and only means to redreſs them. The firſt party, which was favoured by the court, prevailed for a time; but, when the commons met after the holidays, it appeared that the other party had gained conſiderable ſtrength, and that the artful introduction of other affairs, inſtead of diverting, only ſerved to inflame their reſentment againſt the authors of the late proceedings.

1720-21] On the 4th of January, mr. Trevor, ſecretary of war, ſeconded by the lord Carpenter, moved for a bill to prevent mutiny and deſertion; but ſir Joſeph Jekyll expreſſed his ſurprize, 'that a bill ſhould be moved for ſo early, which ſeldom uſed to be brought in but towards the end of a ſeſſion; that ſuch a hurry ſeemed to be intended to ſtop the proſecution of the authors of the preſent misfortunes. That they very well knew, their days were numbered, and that, as ſoon as they had diſpatched the money bills, and the bill now moved for, they ſhould immediately be diſpatched home. That therefore he was for ſtaying thoſe bills, until they had done juſtice to the nation, who called aloud for it.' Mr ſecretary Craggs ſaid, 'he wondered to ſee any oppoſition made to a bill ſo neceſſary for the ſafety of the government, eſpecially by a perſon, who had received ſignal favours from the crown.' Upon this the lord Moleſworth ſtood up, and ſaid, 'mr. ſpeaker, is it come to this, that every man, who has a place, muſt do all the drudgery, that is enjoined him? This may be true of ſome underlings; but I do not believe it: I am ſure it is falſe of king George; he commands his ſervants nothing, but what is according to laws, and for the good of his ſubjects.' Then ſir Joſeph Jekyll added, 'that he was as zealous as any man for the ſervice of the king and his government; but he was of opinion, that the doing juſtice to the nation, and puniſhing them, who had brought it into the preſent calamitous condition, was the moſt effectual way both to ſerve the king, and at the ſame time, to diſcharge their duty to their injured country: concluding, however, that he did not oppoſe the bringing in of the bill;' which was agreed to. After this, the houſe reſolving itſelf into a grand committee, ſir Joſeph repreſented, that, before they proceeded any farther, they ought to ſecure the perſons and eſtates of thoſe they had reaſon to look upon as the authors of the public misfortunes; and therefore he moved for a bill to reſtrain the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, treaſurer, under-treaſurer, caſhier, ſecretary, and accountants of the South-ſea company, from going out of this kingdom for the ſpace of one year, and till the end of the next ſeſſion of parliament; and, for diſcovering their eſtates and effects, and preventing the tranſporting or alienating the ſame.' This motion met with no oppoſition, and ſir Joſeph, with the attorney and ſollicitor-general, and ſome others, were ordered to prepare and bring in the bill, [c] which having paſſed both houſes received the royal aſſent. [d]

As ſoon as this was over, the houſe debated in what manner they ſhould proceed in the intended enquiry, whether in a grand or ſelect committee. After ſeveral ſpeeches on both ſides, it was reſolved that a committee ſhould be appointed to enquire into all the proceedings relating to the execution of the South-ſea act; and that the numbers ſhould be thirteen, and choſen by ballot. Purſuant to this reſolution, Thomas Broderick, Archibald Hutcheſon, ſir Joſeph Jekyll, Edward Wortley, ſir Thomas Pengelly, William Clayton, Edward Jeffreys, lord Moleſworth, Thomas Strangways, William Sloper, Nicholas Lechmere, general Roſſe, and Dixie Windſor, were choſen, to whom the ſeveral books and papers, which had been laid before the houſe by the South-relieve them.' Serjeant Pengelly, mr. Hutchinſon, and ſome other gentlemen, ſpoke on the ſame ſide; but were anſwered by mr. ſecretrary Craggs, ſir William Thompſon, and mr. Hungerford, and, after ſome other ſpeeches, it was moved to adjourn the debate; but, the queſtion put thereupon being carried in the negative by two hundred and thirty-two voices againſt eighty-eight, the houſe agreed, without dividing, to the reſolution of the day before.

[b] The ſubſtance of what was opened in the houſe of commons was told to the general court of the South-ſea directors two days after, by ſir John Fellows, to the following effect:

'That the 1ſt money-ſubſcription be continued, allowing longer time for the future payments; and that what has been paid be made ſtoc at 400l. per cent.

'That the money, paid upon the 2d, 3d, and 4th money-ſubſcriptions, be alſo made ſtoc at 400l. per cent. the ſubſcribers to have the Midſummer dividend at 10l. per cent. and their future payments to be diſcharged.

'The ſtoc then undiſpoſed of will be 11,600,000l. which, to be divided among the proprietors, will be 45l. per cent. to be diſpoſed of by ſubſcription or otherwiſe, as a general court ſhall order, which was to this effect:

'That a ſum not exceeding nine millions be ingrafted into the bank, on terms to be agreed on with that company.

'The like as to the Eaſt-India company:

'That, for the ſtoc ſo to be ingrafted, thoſe companies to have an annuity of 5l. per cent. per annum.

'That one-fourth part of the preſent ſtoc of this company be wrote into the bank, and one other fourth part into the Eaſt-India company, the proprietors to be allowed ſtoc in each of thoſe companies, at 120l. per cent.

'That there will be in all ſeven millions and a half of bank ſtoc, and the ſame of India ſtoc, for the proprietors of this company.

'That all the profits of this company, by their ſubſcriptions or otherwiſe, ſhall be for the ſole benefit of this company.'

[c] This done, mr. Shippen expreſſed his great ſatisfaction to ſee a Britiſh houſe of commons reſume their ancient vigour and ſpirit, and act with ſo great unanimity for the public good. He owned 'the neceſſity of ſecuring the perſons and eſtates of the South-ſea directors and their officers; but ſaid, that, in his opinion, there were ſome men in great ſtations, whom, in time, he would not be afraid to name, who were no leſs guilty than the directors.' Mr ſecretary Craggs being ſomewhat exaſperated at this, ſaid, 'that he was ready to give ſatisfaction to any man, who ſhould queſtion him, either in that houſe, or out of it.' This expreſſion gave no ſmall offence; and thereupon the lord Moleſworth ſaid, 'that he had had the honour to be a member of that houſe upwards of thirty years, and never before now knew any man bold enough to challenge the whole houſe of commons, and all England beſides: that, for his part, though paſt ſixty, he would anſwer whatever he had to ſay within the houſe, and hoped there were young members enough, who would not be afraid to look mr. ſecretary in the face out of the houſe.' Upon this, mr. ſecretary, ſeeing the houſe in a great ferment, got up, and ſaid, 'that, by giving ſatisfaction, he meant clearing his conduct.' Upon which the matter went no farther.

[d] By this bill, the directors were each to enter into recognizances, in the penalty of 100,000l. with two ſureties in the penalty each of 25,000l. If they neglected to do ſo before the 8th of February, they were to be impriſoned; and, in caſe they went out of the kingdom, were to be adjudged guilty of felony. They were alſo obliged to deliver in upon oath, before the 5th of March, exact particulars of all the effects they were poſſeſſed of by themſelves, or in truſt, on the 1ſt of June, 1720, or any time after, with an account of what they had diſpoſed of ſince that time. They were likewiſe diſabled from conveying any lands or effects, for a year after the 5th of January, 1720-21.

ſea company, were referred; and they were afterwards voted a committee of ſecrecy.

In the debate the lord Hinchinbroke repreſented, that it was to be feared that, before the bill againſt the directors, &c. was gone through both houſes, the moſt criminal might withdraw out of the kingdom, and therefore he moved, that they might be immediately taken into cuſtody. But, mr. Lechmere, and others, having ſhewed the inconveniences of ſuch a proceeding, the motion was dropped.

In vain did the directors preſent a petition to be heard by their counſel againſt the bill, which was now brought in, and having paſſed the commons was ſent up to the lords.

By this time the houſe of lords were entered upon the South-ſea affair. Some of the lords in the miniſtry were the firſt, who complained of the miſmanagement of the South-ſea directors, which had occaſioned the preſent diſtreſs; and earl Stanhope ſaid, 'that the eſtates of the criminals, whether directors or not directors, ought to be confiſcated, to make good the public loſſes.' The lord Carteret ſpoke to the ſame effect, as did likewiſe the earl of Sunderland, who owned, indeed, that he had been for the South-ſea ſcheme, becauſe he thought it calculated for the advantage of the nation, in order to leſſen the public debt, and, in particular, to take off the heavy incumberance of long annuities; and no man would imagine, that ſo good a deſign could have been ſo preverted in the execution, as to produce quite contrary effects: but that, in his opinion, no act of parliament had ever been ſo much abuſed as the South-ſea act; and therefore he would go as far as any body to puniſh the offenders. Several lords were ſurprized to find themſelves prevented by thoſe, whom they were ready to oppoſe, upon a ſuppoſition, that they entertained more favourable thoughts towards the directors, againſt whom the others had left them but little to ſay. However, the duke of Wharton obſerved, 'that they ought to have no reſpect of perſons: that for his part, he would give up the beſt friend he had: that the nation had been plundered in a moſt flagrant and notorious manner; and therefore they ought to find out the offenders, and then puniſh them with the utmoſt ſeverity.' The lord North and Grey, the earl of Abingdon, and ſome others, urged alſo the ill effects of the South-ſea project, which the biſhop of Rocheſter compared to a peſtilence. Earl Cowper ſpoke likewiſe on the ſame ſide, and in particular 'blamed thoſe, who, by the act of parliament, were appointed to overlook and chec the South-ſea directors, and who, in the diſcharge of their truſt, ought to have prevented their jumping from a ſubſcription at 400 to 1000, which was the main cauſe of the misfortunes that enſued.' The earl of Sunderland, finding himſelf and the other lords of the treaſury thus attaced, ſaid, 'that by the South-ſea act they were directed to appoint ſuch perſons, as they ſhould think fit to be managers and directors, on the part of the treaſury, for the due execution of the act: that, as they had reaſon to look upon thoſe perſons, who had the principal ſhare in framing this ſcheme, as the moſt able and proper to execute it, they had accordingly appointed ſome of the South-ſea directors to be managers and directors for the treaſury: concluding, that in this they had followed former precedents.' Upon this a queſtion was propoſed and ſtated, that the commiſſion iſſued out, by the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury, to three of the directors of the South-ſea company, was, according to former precedents, and legal. This occaſioned a great debate; but, after the reading of ſome papers, the lord Harcourt's opinion for the affirmative prevailed, by a majority of ſixty-three againſt twenty-eight, moſt of whom entered their proteſt againſt that reſolution. Then ſome lords moved for appointing a ſecret committee, to enquire into all the proceedings relating to the execution of the South-ſea act; but this was oppoſed by others, who ſaid, they ought, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to examine the perſons concerned. Which being agreed to, the ſub and deputy-governors, directors, and officers of the South-ſea company were ordered to attend on the 12th of January.

On that day, the ſub and deputy governors, about twenty-four of the directors, mr. Knight treaſurer, mr. Surman his deputy, and ſome other inferior officers, attended the houſe, and at the bar were ſworn to make true anſwers to ſuch queſtions, as ſhould be put to them. After this, the governors and treaſurer were examined ſeparately, and then the directors. The examinations being ended, it was reſolved, 'that the ſub-governor and directors of the South-ſea company had prevaricated with them, in giving falſe repreſentations of ſeveral matters of fact: that, by lending money on ſtoc, and ſubſcriptions, they were guilty of a notorious breach of truſt; and that they ought to make good the loſſes, which the company had ſuſtained by their fraudulent management.' Some lords were unwilling to involve all the directors in this cenſure, and would diſtinguiſh the innocent from the guilty: but they were told, that the whole court of directors were guilty, either in acting or aſſenting; upon which they acquieſced in declaring them all criminal. The directors being called in again, the lord-chancellor gave them a ſevere reprimand for giving the houſe ſuch lame accounts, and for having ordered their clerks to omit ſeveral material things in the copies, that had been laid before the houſe; commanding them, at the ſame time, to produce either the originals themſelves of ſeveral accounts of their treaſury, or authentic copies of them.

Soon after this, a bill paſſed the houſe of lords, to diſable the preſent ſub-governor, deputy-governor, and directors of the South-ſea company, to enjoy any office in that company, or in the Eaſt-India company, or bank of England, and from voting upon elections in the company. Then the lords examined ſeveral brokers, as Stroude, Teſtard, Lacour a Jew, and his ſon. By the three laſt, great diſcoveries were ſaid to be made. This done, the houſe adjourned to the 24th of January.

In the mean time, mr. Knight, treaſurer of the South-ſea company, who was intruſted with the principal ſecrets of the South-ſea affair, either of his own accord, or (as it was ſuſpected) at the ſuggeſtion of others, thought fit to retire out of the kingdom. [e] He abſented himſelf the 22d of January from his houſe, and embarked the next morning in the river, on board a veſſel, which carried him, the ſame day, to Calais. A letter, directed to the South-ſea directors, was brought that morning, by a porter, to mr. Surman, [f] who delivered it to the committee of ſecrecy, then ſitting at the South-ſea houſe. They immediately repaired to the houſe of commons, and acquainted them with what

[e] When mr. Knight attended at the houſe of lords, a peer ſpoke to the earl of Sunderland, that a motion might be made to ſecure him immediately; for it was ſtrongly ſurmized that he would ſoon make off. The earl agreed in that ſurmize, but ſaid, earl Cowper ſhould be conſulted before any ſuch motion was made, for, without his joining in with it, there was no likelihood of its paſſing; and then Knight would be alarmed to no purpoſe. The other lord applied to earl Cowper, who ſeemed very averſe to the taking any ſuch ſtep, till, upon Knight's further examination, the houſe ſhould come to a reſolution, particularly with relation to him: upon which the motion dropped; and it was ſuſpected, that the earl of Sunderland, knowing, earl Cowper's ſentiments, referred that other peer to him, on purpoſe to prevent the motion's being then made.

[f] The letter was as follows:

Gentlemen,

'I write this from a true ſenſe of the obligation I am under to make up my accounts with the company, and to pay them their full demand: and, though ſelf-preſervation has obliged me to withdraw myſelf from the reſentment againſt the directors and myſelf, yet I am conſcious to myſelf of having done any one thing that I can reproach myſelf for, ſo far as relates to an honeſt ſincere intention and zeal for the company; but I can and do charge myſelf with a great many indiſcretions, and am (beſides the concern I muſt be under for leaving my own family, friends, &c.) very ſenſibly touched with what you are like to ſuffer on this account; and it will be the more, I am afraid, from your want of unanimity, which I heartily recommend to you for the future, and, I am ſure, wiſh you all well, as you wiſh yourſelves.

I write this at a diſtance from home, and under a great deal of concern, ſo cannot be ſo particular, as otherwiſe I would have been. I have herewith ſent mr. Surman the key of my deſks, who knows ſo much of the ſtate of the caſh, as to be able to make it up. There are a good many bills of exchange, and other payments, to write off, and the weekly receipts to write on. There is caſh in the bank, in the company's book, which, together with the notes taken on the third and fourth ſubſcriptions, and the company's bonds, will make up the balance, as I do believe: but, if it fall ſhort, I have 3000 equivalent ſtoc, 1600 bank ſtoc, 2000 India and South-ſea ſtoc, over and above what I owe the company on the loan, as will be ſufficient to make it up with money owing on ſecurities on my particular account. The company need not deliver or be anſwerable for the ſubſcription-receipts or ſtoc on the third and fourth ſubſcriptions, unleſs theſe notes are paid ſo the loſs can only be the difference between the ſubſcriptions and money in value and I think, it would be hard for me to bear the loſs, becauſe the clerks took by far the greateſt part of them, as thinking them better than none; and moſt of them would have been non-payments, if they had been refuſed: however, I ſubmit this to the company. I have taken with me but little more than a ſufficiency to maintain myſelf, and the effects left will more than anſwer for all deficiencies. I have bought no land in truſt for me, nor have I ever conveyed or ſettled any part of that I had formerly, or have bought lately; it remains to anſwer any demands on me from the company or the legiſlature. I have withdrawn myſelf only to avoid the weight of the enquiry, which I found too heavy for me; and I am ſenſible that it would have been impoſſible for me to have avoided the appearance and charge of prevarication and perjury, not from my own intention to do ſo, but from the largeneſs and extent of the enquiry, and the nature and largeneſs of the tranſactions. I am ſure I am a great deal concerned to add to your preſent difficulties; though I muſt ſay, that I have deſerved better uſage than I have had from the court the laſt week: but this I ſay without any reſentment, otherwiſe than that it has been an addition to the weight I had before upon me.

I am preſſed for time, ſo can only aſſure you that I am with all reſpect, in inclination though not in power,

Gentleman,

Your moſt obedient humble ſervant,

Sunday evening, ROBERT KNIGHT.'

Jan. 22. 1720.

had happened. Two addreſſes were voted and preſented for a proclamation to apprehend mr. Knight, and for another to ſtop the ports to prevent him, or any of the directors, from eſcaping out of the kingdom. Then general Roſs and other members of the ſecret committee informed the houſe, 'that they had already diſcovered a train of the deepeſt villany and fraud that hell ever contrived, to ruin a nation, which, in due time, they would lay before the houſe; and that, in the mean while, in order to a further diſcovery, they thought it highly neceſſary to ſecure the perſons of ſome of the directors and principal South-ſea officers, and to ſeize their papers.' Upon which the books and papers of mr. Knight, mr. Surman, mr. Turner, ſir George Caſwal, and mr. Grigſby, were ordered to be ſecured, and Surman a Grigſby to be taken into cuſtody; as were alſo ſir John B.nt, ſir John Lambert, two of the directors, and ſir John Fellows, ſub-governor of the South-ſea company. Then, mr. Sawbridge and ſir Theodore Janſſen being come into the houſe, a motion was made and carried, 'that they were guilty of a notorious breach of truſt, as directors of the South-ſea company, and had occaſioned very great loſs to numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects, and highly prejudiced the public credit:' they were both expelled the houſe, and taken into cuſtody, with ſir Robert Chaplain and Francis Eyles, two other directors, and members of parliament.

The ſame evening a council was held, in which mr. Aiſlabie reſigned his places of chancellor of the exchequer, and lord of the treaſury. Orders were alſo given for removing all South-ſea directors from any place they had in the government. [g]

The lords, on the 24th of January, examined mr. Joye, deputy-governor of the South-ſea company, who made a very frank confeſſion of ſeveral important matters, and communicated mr. Knight's letter, which was read. After this, upon earl Stanhope's motion, five directors, ſir William Chapman, mr. Holditch, mr. Hawes, mr. Gibbon, and mr. Cheſter, were ordered to be taken into cuſtody, with their papers, and thoſe of mr. Clark, the company's ſollicitor. Of which notice was ſent to the commons with a meſſage, that theſe perſons and their papers ſhould be produced in ſuch manner as they ſhould direct. This meſſage contributed very much to the preſerving a good underſtanding between the two houſes.

Two days after, the directors mr. Aſtell and ſir Harcourt Maſters were examined by the lords, and, among other diſcoveries, named ſeveral perſons both in the adminiſtration and in the houſe of commons, to whom large ſums in South-ſea ſtoc had been given, for procuring the paſſing the South-ſea act. After this, upon the motion of earl Stanhope, ſeconded by the lord Townſhend and earl Cowper, it was unanimouſly reſolved, 'that the taking in of ſtoc, the transferring of ſtoc belonging to the South-ſea company, or giving credit for the ſame, without a valuable conſideration actually paid, or ſufficiently ſecured; or the purchaſing ſtoc by any director or agent of the South-ſea company, for the uſe or benefit of any perſon in the adminiſtration, or any member of either houſe of parliament, during ſuch time, as the late bill relating to the South-ſea company, was depending laſt year in parliament, was a notorious and moſt dangerous corruption.' This reſolution was ſoon followed by another, after the examination of mr. Waller, (ſon-in-law to mr. Aiſlabie) and mr. Aſtell, relating to a great quantity of South-ſea ſtoc, transferred to, and negotiated by mr. Waller, who pretended not to have kept minutes of what he had done in Exchange-alley. This being looked upon as a prevarication, it was reſolved, 'that the directors of the South-ſea company having ordered great quantities of their ſtoc to be bought for the ſervice of the company, when ſtoc was at a very high price, and on pretence of keeping up the price of the ſtoc; and, at the ſame time, ſeveral of the directors, and other officers belonging to the company, having, in a clandeſtine manner, ſold their own ſtocs to the company; ſuch directors and officers are guilty of a notorious fraud and breach of truſt; and their ſo doing was one great cauſe of the unhappy turn of affairs, that has ſo much affected public credit. [h]

On the 4th of February, the lords deſigned to have examined ſir John Blunt, the chief projector of the South-ſea ſcheme, and it was expected, he would make great diſcoveries: but, inſtead of that, he would not ſo much as be ſworn to anſwer to ſuch interrogatories, as ſhould be put to him, alledging, that he had already been examined before the ſecret committee of the houſe of commons, and to ſuch extent of affairs, that, unleſs he had a copy of his examination, he could not remember every particular; and, as no man is obliged to accuſe himſelf, he would not run the hazard of prevaricating. The lords were ſurprized at this proceeding; but, upon a ſurmiſe, that ſir John Blunt might deſign to break the harmony, which had hitherto been preſerved in this affair between the two houſes, they thought fit not to ſhew immediately their indignation againſt his obſtinacy. In the debate how they ſhould proceed in this unprecedented caſe, ſome reflections were made againſt the miniſtry by a noble duke, who obſerved, that the government of the beſt of princes was ſometimes made intolerable to their ſubjects by ill miniſters; and alledged the example of Sejanus, who had made a diviſion in the imperial family, and rendered the reign of the emperor Claudius odious to the Romans. This reflection was highly reſented by earl Stanhope, who undertook to vindicate the miniſtry. He ſpoke with ſuch vehemence, that, finding himſelf taken ſuddenly with a violent head-ach, he went home, and was cupped, which eaſed him a little. The next morning he was let blood, and continued pretty well till about ſix o'clock in the evening, when he fell into a drowzineſs, and then into a ſuffocation, in which he inſtantly expired. The king was ſo ſenſibly touched with the news of his death, that he retired for ſeveral hours into his cloſet, to lament the loſs of a faithful and able miniſter, whoſe ſervice he ſo much wanted at that time. The lord Townſhend was appointed ſecretary of ſtate in his room.

Two days after, mr. ſecretary Craggs was taken ill of the ſmall-pox, of which he died the ninth day, on the 16th of February. Thus, in the ſpace of eleven days, England loſt two ſecretaries of ſtate.

Mr Knight, after his eſcape into France, went to Bruſſels, from whence (not thinking himſelf ſafe there) he intended to retire to Liege. As the king had ſent orders to his miniſters in foreign courts, to make application for the ſeizing mr. Knight, in caſe he ſhould ſhelter himſelf in the dominions of any ſtate in alliance with him, mr. Gaudot, ſecretary to mr. Leathes, the Britiſh reſident at Bruſſels, having information, that mr. Knight was going towards Louvain, applied to the marquis de Prié, governor of the Auſtrian Netherlands, who ordered a major and ſixteen dragoons to attend him, and follow his directions. With theſe, Gaudot ſets out for Louvain, where he was informed, that two Engliſh gentlemen had that morning, taken the road to Tirlemont. Upon this Gaudot, with the major and four dragoons, haſted to Terlemont, and by means of a poſtilion ſent before to make enquiry, they put up at the ſame inn where the gentlemen had ſtopped. Gaudot, entering the inn, met mr. Knight and his companion, who inſtantly yielded themſelves priſoners. Soon after mr. Knight's ſon, who had followed his father from Bruſſels, arrived at Tirlemont, and was alſo ſeized. They were all carried bac to Bruſſels, and by a warrant from the marquis de Pré, the major conducted mr. Knight to the citadel of Antwerp, where he was kept in ſafe cuſtody by an officer who lay in the room with him, and four centinels without the houſe, and as many within, and was not allowed the uſe of pen ink and paper. His ſon went with him to the citadel.

Great was the joy at the news of mr. Knight's being in cuſtody. Addreſſes were preſented by both houſes to thank the king for giving ſuch effectual directions for ſecuring mr. Knight, and to deſire that orders might be given to his miniſters at Vienna and Bruſſels, to make proper applications that mr. Knight, with his papers and effects, might be delivered to ſuch perſons as ſhould be appointed to receive him. Purſuant to theſe addreſſes, the king ſent col. Charles Churchill to the court of Vienna, to make inſtances for the delivering up mr. Knight; who, on the other hand, made application to the ſtates of Brabant, for the protection

[g] Accordingly, Francis Hawes, receiver-general of the cuſtoms; ſir Harcourt Maſter, receiver-general of the city of London; mr. Reynolds, commiſſioner of the victualling-office; mr. Holditch, treaſurer of the ſtamp-office; and Arthur Ingram, treaſurer of the duty on ſalt, were all removed from their employments.

[h] Three days after, mr. Hawes, a director, having been examined with ſome brokers, the lords came to the following reſolutions:

1. That the directors, &c. buying the Midſummer dividend about the 4th of January, 1719-20, and paying 5s. down, and 3l. after the receipt of the dividend, was a fraud to the perſons, with whom they contracted.

2. That the giving a premium, for the refuſal of ſtoc, at higher prices than they knew the value was, was a fradulent artifice to raiſe the price of ſtoc.

3. That promoting the third ſubſcription at 1000 per cent. was to anſwer a particular end, and cheat the public.

4. That the declaring 30l. per cent. dividend for the half year ending at Chriſtmas, and 50l. per cent. per annum for no leſs than twelve years after, was a villainous artifice to delude and defraud his majeſty's good ſubjects.

5. That the declaring the Midſummer dividend to be paid in ſtoc, when they had money by them to anſwer the ſame, was a notorious fraud, and was one occaſion of the misfortunes that enſued.

of their conſtitution. By an article of the charter, called the Joyful Entry (granted by the emperor Charles V. and ſworn to all by his ſucceſſors) no perſon charged with, or apprehended for, any crime, can be removed to be tried out of Brabant. When therefore mr. Leathes made preſſing inſtances with the marquis de Prié to have mr. Knight delivered up, the ſtates of Brabant inſiſted upon their privilege, and the marquis would proceed no farther in the affair, without particular inſtructions from Vienna; for which purpoſe, colonel Churchill was ſent to that court. In the beginning of March, the colonel ſent word, that he was juſt arrived at Vienna, and would immediately apply to the imperial court, for the delivering up mr. Knight, and did not doubt of ſucceſs, unleſs the privileges of the ſtates of Brabant interfered. This letter being communicated to the houſe of commons, reflections were made (particularly by the lord Moleſworth) upon the frivolous pretence, uſed to fruſtrate the kings's endeavours to bring over mr. Knight. But the houſe came to no reſolution in the affair. About three weeks after, a letter from the emperor to the king was laid before the commons, wherein 'the emperor expreſſes his inclination to comply with his majeſty's deſires, but, the ſtates of Brabant inſiſted on their privileges, it would be neceſſary to make application to them, which he would not fail to ſupport.' In a debate on account of this letter, mr. Hutcheſon repreſented, 'how much, on the one hand, the public was concerned in having the authors of the preſent diſtreſs fully diſcovered, and brought to condign puniſhment; and how impracticable it was, on the other, to proceed in that important enquiry, ſo long as the principal agent of the South-ſea directors, and their accomplices, was kept out of the way; that, in the mean time, the public calamity increaſing every day, the nation called aloud for juſtice; and therefore, if the means already uſed for bringing over mr. Knight proved abortive, it were adviſable to have recourſe to more ſpeedy and effectual methods.' Sir Joſeph Jekyll alſo ſhewed, 'that it was incumbent on ſome perſons in the adminiſtration to have mr. Knight brought over, in order fully to clear their own innocence, otherwiſe, though acquitted, they would ſtill be looked upon as criminal: urging, moreover, that it was matter of wonder that ſo frivolous a pretence, as the privileges of the ſtate of Brabant, ſhould be uſed, to put a ſtop to ſo important an enquiry, eſpecially conſidering how little thoſe privileges had been regarded in more material points, and what obligations the houſe of Auſtria lay under to the Britiſh nation.' On the other hand, mr. Lechmere repreſented, 'that, in all probability, the court of Vienna had not fully conſidered the importance of the inſtances made to them in his majeſty's name, and at the deſire of the commons of Great-Britain: but it was to be preſumed, when ſo wiſe a prince as the emperor ſhould be apprized, that the welfare and ſafety of England depended in ſome meaſure on the delivering up of mr. Knight, he would readily comply with their deſires.' Then mr. Lechmere moved for an addreſs to thank the king for the inſtances he had made, by a letter under his own hand to the emperor about mr. Knight, to expreſs their diſſatisfaction at the obſticles raiſed againſt a compliance with his endeavours, and to deſire his moſt preſſing inſtances for the obtaining what was thought of ſuch importance to the juſtice due to his people. This addreſs was agreed to and preſented to the king, who aſſured them, he would continue to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for obtaining what they deſired, and hoped they would prove effectual. But, notwithſtanding all this, before the emperor had ſent any inſtructions to the marquis de Prié, mr. Knight found means to make his eſcape out of the citadel of Antwerp.

The committee of ſecrecy, appointed to look into all the proceedings relating to the execution of the South-ſea act, made their firſt report to the houſe of commons the 16th of Feb. the day mr. ſecretary Craggs died. At the entrance into their enquiry, they obſerved, the matters referred to them were of great variety and extent. Many perſons were intruſted with different parts in the execution of that act, and, in an unwarrantable manner, diſpoſed of the properties of many thouſands of perſons amounting to many millions. In the progreſs of their enquiry they found it attended with many difficulties.

In ſome of the books, falſe and fictitious entries were made; in others, entries with blanks; in others, entries with razure and alterations; and in others, leaves torn out. They found, ſome books had been deſtroyed, others ſecreted: however, they were enabled to lay ſome matters of importance before the houſe.

The firſt matter that occurred to their conſideration, was a ſcene of iniquity and corruption, the diſcovery of which they conceived to be of the higheſt concern to the honour of Parliaments, and ſecurity of the government.

It appeared, that before the paſſing the South-ſea act, and before any ſubſcription could be made, a fictitious ſtoc of no leſs than 574,000l. had been diſpoſed of by the directors, in order to facilitate the paſſing the bill. This ſtoc was ſet down as ſold at ſeveral days, and at ſeveral prices, from 150l. per cent. to 325l. per cent. amounting in all to 1,259,325l.) and was from thoſe times to be eſteemed as holden of the company, for the benefit of the pretended purchaſers, though no mutual agreement was then made for the delivery or acceptance of the ſtoc at any certain time, and though no money was paid down, nor any ſecurity given for payment by the ſuppoſed purchaſers. So, if the price of ſtoc had fallen, no loſs could have been ſuſtained by them; but, if it ſhould advance, the difference was to be made good to the pretended purchaſers. As this fictitious ſtoc was deſigned for promoting the bill, the ſub and deputy-governors, ſir John Blunt, mr. Gibbon, mr. Cheſter, mr. Holditch, with the caſhier mr. Knight, had the diſpoſal of this ſtoc, of which the following particulars were taken for ſeveral perſons:

	£
For the earl of Sunderland, at the requeſt of mr. Craggs, ſen. — — — — — — —	50,000
For the dutcheſs of Kendal — — — —	10,000
For the counteſs of Platen — — —	10,000
For the counteſs's two nieces — — —	10,000
For mr. Craggs, ſenr. — — — —	30,000
For Charles Stanhope — — — —	10,000
For the ſword-blade — — — —	50,000

The difference of the laſt parcel amounting to 250,000l. was ſuppoſed to be paid to mr. Charles Stanhope by ſir George Caſwal and company: but that ſir George ordered the name Stanhope to be partly eraſed out of the book, and made Stangape. It alſo appeared, that mr. Aiſlabie, chancellor of the exchequer, had great quantities of South-ſea ſtoc given him; but that his affairs were chiefly managed by mr. Edmund Waller, his ſon-in-law, and mr. Weymondſel, a broker: That mr. Aiſlabie's laſt account with Turner, Caſwal and company, was 794,451l. that 68,000l. part thereof, was paid in caſh to mr. Waller, as was alſo 45,600l. more by a bond of Caſwal and company; and 33,000l. by another bond of Caſwal and company, was paid to mr. Weddal: that mr. Aiſlabie, as a commiſſioner of the treaſury, had 4000l. in the firſt money-ſubſcription; but that as ſoon as it came to bear an advance of about 40 per cent. he had 20,000l. more: that no warrant was found for making the ſecond money-ſubſcription more than one million; but that afterwards ſome of the leading directors, by the advice of mr. Aiſlabie, made it 500,000l. more: that the third money-ſubſcription at 1000l. was promoted by mr. Aiſlabie, whoſe liſt amounted to 70,000l. the earl of Sunderland's liſt to 160,000l. mr. ſecrettry Craggs's liſt to 659,000l. and mr. Charles Stanhope's to 47,000l. That mr. Aiſlabie likewiſe adviſed the lending money on ſtoc; and that the directors ſold part of the pawned ſtoc at high prices; but that of 2,800,000l. that ſhould have been transferred by mr. Knight to four of the directors, there appeared to be but 2,400,000l. ſo that there was 400,000l. ſtoc wanting. The committee obſerved, that in the account of ſtoc ſold, they found the names of ſeveral members of parliament, not concerned in the adminiſtration, whoſe caſes they could not particularly examine, without the direction of the houſe in what manner to proceed. The report ended, with an account of the divers practices uſed to raiſe the nominal value of South-ſea ſtoc, to the extravagant rate to which it was afterwards advanced above the real value[i]. This report was followed by ſix others, and at the cloſe of the laſt, the committee ſaid, they were under a neceſſity of ending their enquiry,

[i] As this part of the report gives a brief hiſtory of all the contrivances for ſupporting the ſcheme, it will not be improper to inſert it at large:

Your committee find, that, by computation made by their direction, it appears that the directors of the South-ſea company might have raiſed the whole ſum ſtipulated for the public, with a profit of near one million and a half for the benefit of the proprietors of the old ſtoc, without ſetting their ſtoc to ſale at any higher price than 150l. per cent.

That after the ſaid directors had taken in the firſt money-ſubſcriptions at 300l. per cent. and the ſecond money-ſubſcription at 400l. per cent. and the firſt ſubſcription of the long and ſhort annuities at 375l. per cent. the value of 100l. South-ſea ſtoc was but 120l. or thereabouts, ſuppoſing the whole money of the ſaid firſt and ſecond ſubſcriptions (amounting to 12,750,000l.) had been all paid him in.

That the ſaid court of directors did afterwards proceed to take in a third and a fourth money-ſubſcription at the rate of 1000l. per cent. and a ſecond ſubſcription of the long and ſhort annuities and a ſubſcription of the redeemable by reaſon of the abſence of mr. Knight, who appeared to have been principally and in many inſtances ſolely inſtruſted in the execution of the blac and deſtructive South-ſea ſcheme.

Soon after the firſt report, the commons having taken it into conſideration, came to theſe reſolutions:

1. That the late ſub-governor, deputy-governor, and directors of the South-ſea company, and their officers, and their aiders and abettors, in lending out the company's money upon ſtoc and ſubſcriptions, without taking ſecurity for repayment thereof, have been guilty of a notorious breach of truſt, and have thereby occaſioned great loſs to the company, for which they ought to make ſatisfaction out of their own eſtates.

2. That the ſelling or diſpoſing of ſtoc or ſubſcriptions, transferred or depoſited as a ſecurity for the repayment of the money ſo lent, was a notorious breach of the truſt repoſed in the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, and their officers, and a fraud on the proprietors, in order to enrich themſelves; for which they ought to make ſatisfaction out of their own eſtates.

3. That the taking in or holding of ſtoc, by the South-ſea company, for the benefit of any member of either houſe of parliament, or perſon concerned in the adminiſtration, during the time that the company's propoſals, or the bill thereto relating, were depending in parliament, without any valuable conſideration paid, or ſufficient ſecurity given for the acceptance of, or payment for, ſuch ſtoc; and the company's paying or allowing ſuch perſon the difference ariſing by the advanced price of the ſtocs, were corrupt, infamous, debts at the rate of 800l. per cent. after which the value of 100l. South-ſea ſtoc was but 352l. or thereabouts, ſuppoſing the whole money of the ſaid four money-ſubſcriptions (amounting to 68,750,000l.) had been all paid in.

That, if all the remaining public debts had been taken in, and all the remaining ſtoc of the company ſold, on the terms which the ſaid directors pretended to expect, 100l. South-ſea ſtoc would have been worth but 547l. or thereabouts, ſuppoſing the money of the ſaid four ſubſcriptions, and the money for the remaining ſtoc (which together would have amounted to 205,039,401l.) had been all paid in.

That, on the 30th day of Auguſt laſt, the court of directors of the South-ſea company came to a reſolution (which, on the 8th of September laſt, was confirmed by a general court) to declare a dividend of 30l. per cent. to be made at Chriſtmas, 1720, and of not leſs than 50l. per cent. per ann. for not leſs than twelve years to come from that time.

That ſoon after this reſolution (viz. at a general court held the 20th day September laſt) the ſub-governor acquainted the general court, that the affairs of the company, in relation to the price of their ſtoc, and ſubſcriptions, had taken an unexpected turn, and thereupon propoſed their giving a power to the court of directors to relieve the laſt ſubſcribers of the public debts, and the proprietors of the two laſt money-ſubſcriptions, which was accordingly granted; and, at a court of Directors held the 29th day of September laſt, it was reſolved, that the ſaid ſubſcribers ſhould have the ſame terms with the bank, viz. That their ſubſcriptions ſhould be reduced from 1000l. and 800l. per cent. to 400l. and that they ſhould alſo have the benefit of the Middſummar dividend of 10l. per cent. which was accordingly confirmed by a general court held the 30th day of the ſame mouth; upon which your committee obſerves, That it appears to them very extraordinary, that the directors on the 8th day of September (when the ſaid high dividend was declared in a general court) ſhould have had no foreſight of the turn which ſo ſoon after (viz. on the 20th day of the ſame month) happened in their affairs.

That, on the ſaid 8th day of September, the ſub-governor acquainted the general court, that their directors had been unanimous in all their proceedings, which, amongſt other things, includes the before-mentioned ſeveral ſubſcriptions by them taken in, except the firſt; and upon the examination of the directors it doth not appear to your committee, that any one of them proteſted againſt, or declared any public diſſent from any of the ſaid proceedings; and it appears, that all of them took their ſhares and proportions of the ſubſcriptions, which were allotted for the reſpective directors to diſpoſe of.

And your committee have been informed by ſir Theodore Janſſen, that there was a meeting at the houſe of ſir John Fellows, betwixt ſixteen of the court of directors, mr. ſecretary Craggs and mr. Aiſlabie, at which time it was propoſed, that a ſubſcription ſhould be taken in at 300l. per cent. which was approved of by mr. ſecretary Craggs, and mr. Aiſlabie; and that, when the ſaid company broke up, it was agreed, that every perſon ſhould uſe their beſt endeavours to promote it; which is alſo confirmed by the information of ſir Lambert Blackwell.

And, at a court of directors held the 13th day of April laſt, it was reſolved to take in a ſubſcription for two millions, at the rate of 300l. per cent. but the ſame was afterwards increaſed, without any previous reſolution to that purpoſe, to 2,250,000l. and your committee obſerve, that the imaginary value of the ſaid ſubſcriptions roſe very faſt; and that thoſe who had the benefit of the ſaid additional ſubſcription, if they ſold, and diſpoſed of the ſame, made very great gains thereby.

That, at a court of directors held the 28th day of April laſt, it was reſolved to take in a ſecond money-ſubſcription, at the rate of 400l. per cent. for 1,000,000l. but, by the accounts delivered into this houſe, it appears, that the ſaid ſubſcription was for 1,500,000l. yet it does not appear that there was any previous reſolution of the court of directors for the addition of 500,000l. nor was the ſaid addition declared till the 8th of September laſt, at which time the ſub-governor acquainted the general court therewith; upon which your committee cannot but obſerve the great diſtance of time between the taking in of the ſecond ſubſcription at 1,000,000l. and the 8th of September, when the ſame was reported to the general court at 1,500,000l. during which interval the imaginary value of that ſubſcription was exceſſively increaſed, whereby the perſons, who had the ſame, had the advantage of that extraordinary riſe.

That, at a court of directors held the 15th day of June laſt, it was reſolved to take in a third money-ſubſcription at the rate of 1000l. per cent. one-tenth part whereof was to be paid down at the time of ſubſcribing; and, at a court of directors held the 23d day of the ſame month, the ſub-governor acquainted the court, that the ſaid third money-ſubſcription was compleated, without mentioning to what ſum; but at the before-mentioned general court, held the 8th day of September laſt, he declared the ſame to be for five millions; and mr. Knight, late caſhier of the South-ſea company, by an article dated the 20th day of June laſt, in the caſh-book, fol. 125, charges the ſaid ſum of five millions as received; which account was paſſed, and allowed by the company's committee of treaſury, on, or ſome time after the 4th day of Auguſt laſt; and yet, in the account of the third money-ſubſcription delivered in to this houſe, it is ſtated at 4,400,000l. only the remaining ſum of 600,000l. being entered on the credit ſide of the ſaid caſh-book on the 19th of December, 1720, as a ſuppoſed deficiency of the payment on this ſubſcription; although it appears to your committee, upon the evidence of mr. Lockyer, and others, that not only the whole ſum of five millions, but even a conſiderable exceeding thereon was paid in; that a great deal of money was repaid bac to reduce the ſubſcription to five millions; and that they had money enough paid in for near eight millions.

That, at a court of directors held the 12th day of Auguſt laſt, it was reſolved to take in a fourth money-ſubſcription for one million, at the rate of 1000l. per cent. And, at a court of directors held the 25th of the ſame month it, was declared, that, upon caſting up the books, it was found the ſaid fourth money-ſubſcription, inſtead of one million, was increaſed to 1,250,000l. which was occaſioned by taking the ſaid ſubſcription in ſeveral books; and at the before-mentioned general court, held the 8th day of September laſt, the ſub-governor declared the fourth money-ſubſcription was compleated to 1,250,000l. And mr. Knight the caſhier hath, in an article dated the 30th day of Auguſt laſt, and entered in the caſh-book, fol. 128, given the company credit for the firſt payment made on the fourth ſubſcription, viz. for 2,500,000l. which account was paſſed, and allowed by the committee of treaſury on the 4th day of October laſt; and yet, in the account of the ſaid fourth money-ſubſcription delivered into this houſe, it is ſtated at 1,200,000l. only: that upon the examination of mr. Knight, and ſeveral of the directors, in relation to the deficiency of the ſaid third and fourth money-ſubſcriptions, their anſwers were very unſatisfactory; and your committee cannot but obſerve, that as, by the before-mentioned additions to the firſt two money-ſubſcriptions, ſome perſons made great gains, whilſt the price of the ſaid ſubſcriptions continued high; ſo, when the price of the ſubſcriptions fell, many other perſons were favoured, by having their ſubſcriptions withdrawn, which was the cauſe of the deficiency.

That, on the ſecond money-ſubſcription each director was allowed, for himſelf and friends, 26,000l. and that the remainder of the million, at firſt reſolved to be taken in, was at the diſpoſal of the ſub and deputy governors; but, for whoſe benefit the additional ſubſcription of 500,000l. was intended, your committee have not yet been able to diſcover.

That, on the third money-ſubſcription each director was allowed 54,000l. for himſelf and friends; and that ſeveral large liſts of the names of perſons were ſent to the ſub-governor, to be admitted into the ſaid third ſubſcripion; viz. by the earl of Sunderland, firſt lord commiſſioner of the treaſury, a liſt amounting to 167,000l. by John Aiſlabie, eſq. late chancellor of the exchequer, another of the lords of the treaſury, a liſt amounting to 75,300l. by James Craggs, eſq. one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, two liſts, amounting to 695,000l. and by Charles Stanhope, eſq. one of the ſecretaries of the treaſury, a liſt amounting to 49,700l. Which four laſt mentioned liſts amount to 987,000l.

That, upon examination, it appears, that other liſts have been given in, as well on the third as on the ſecond ſubſcription; but, the ſame being loſt or miſlaid, as your committee have been informed, they are thereby diſabled, at preſent, from making any report thereon.

They find 25,000l. of the ſecond ſubſcription hath been given unto John Aiſlabie, eſq. about eight or ten days after the opening of that ſubſcription, at which time the ſubſcriptions were at an advanced price, of about 40l. per cent. and ſoon after roſe vaſtly higher.

That it doth not appear to your committee that any of the perſons, who had the honour to ſerve his majeſty in the treaſury, or in any other part of the adminiſtration, uſed any endeavours to prevent the directors of the South-ſea company from taking in ſubſcriptions at the aforeſaid extravagant prices; but on the contrary it doth appear, that ſome of them, by the liſts they gave in as aforeſaid, did not only encourage and promote the ſaid ſubſcriptions, but did greatly enlarge the ſame.

Your committee obſerving that ſir John Fellows, late ſub-governor of the South-ſea company, did, at a general court of the ſaid company, held the 21ſt of April, 1720, acquaint that court, that the deſign of the government's million of exchequer-bills to be lent to the company, by virtue of the late act of parliament for iſſuing exchequer-bills to be circulated at or near the exchequer, was to enable the company to lend money upon their ſtoc; and finding that by order of the court of directors of the ſaid company the ſame had been ſo lent out, your committee proceeded to enquire into this affair.

And, on the examination of mr. Robert Knight, late caſhier of the ſaid company, he declared, that he did not remember that any application was made by the directors to have thoſe bills iſſued; but that the firſt diſcourſe of this matter was by John Aiſlabie, eſq. then chancellor of the exchequer, a week before the propoſals of the South-ſea company were offered to this houſe; that mr. Aiſlabie ſaid, it would be more acceptable to have thoſe bills circulated at the exchequer, than to ſend them to the bank or elſewhere, and that the company might afford to circulate them for nothing, they being to be lent to the company to enable them to execute their ſcheme. That the examinant believed, the intention of lending the ſaid bills upon ſtoc had been communicated to mr. Aiſlabie, and that he (the examinant) on his attending at the treaſury to ſollicit the iſſuing of theſe bills, did mention that deſign, and never heard that the treaſury diſapproved of it.

That ſir John Blunt declared it would be better to employ thoſe bills in the lending upon ſtoc, than in paying of the redeemables, which would take up more time.

Hereupon your committee examining ſir John Fellows, he ſaid, that he and others of the directors treated with mr. Aiſlabie and others at the treaſury about the iſſuing the ſaid exchequer-bills; but that it was firſt propoſed to mr. Aiſlabie, and the examinant believed, it was at firſt mentioned by ſir John Blunt, in a committee of the directors, and that it was the general opinion of the directors.

Your committee examining ſir John Blunt upon this tranſaction, he declared, that he ſpoke to mr. Aiſlabie to haſten the iſſuing of the ſaid bills; and that himſelf, or ſome other of the directors, acquainted mr. Aiſlabie (as he believes at the treaſury) with the company's deſign to lend them upon ſtoc; that it did not at firſt ariſe from the directors, but that it was intimated to them before, or very ſoon after the company's propoſals were laid before the houſe, by ſome of the treaſury, and on recollection, the examinant ſaid, it was by mr. Aiſlabie, to enable the company to carry on their ſcheme, and thereby to raiſe the price of their ſtoc, the borrowers being enabled to buy ſtoc.

That, by the book of loans delivered in to this houſe, it appears that the and dangerous practices, highly reflecting on the honour and juſtice of parliaments, and deſtructive of the intereſts of his majeſty's government.

4. That any of the directors of the South-ſea company ſelling their own ſtoc at high prices to the company or others, at the ſame time, that they gave orders for buying ſtoc upon account of the company, under pretence of keeping up the nominal value of the ſtoc, was a ſcandalous practice, tending to enrich themſelves, to the great loſs and detriment of the company, and of others his majeſty's ſubjects, for which they ought to make ſatisfaction out of their own eſtates.

5. That the declaring a dividend of 30 per cent. for Chriſtmas laſt, and not leſs than 50 per cent. per ann. for not leſs than twelve years after, was an infamous contrivance to give his majeſty's ſubjects falſe notions of the value of the ſtoc, that the directors might more eaſily diſpoſe of their own ſtoc at exorbitant prices.

6. That the ſetting the ſtoc of the South-ſea company to ſale by ſubſcriptions, at high prices, above the intrinſic value of the ſame, by the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, and directors of the company, was a groſs and notorious fraud; and has been one great cauſe of the ſinking of the public credit, and bringing upon the nation the diſtreſs it at preſent labours under.

7. That the adviſing the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, and directors of the South-ſea company, to ſet the ſtoc of the company to ſale by ſubſcriptions at high and extravagant prices, or to declare the high and extravagant dividends for Chriſtmas laſt, and twelve years after, by any perſons in the adminiſtration, was a notorious breach of the truſt repoſed in them, to the prejudice of his majeſty's government, and the intereſt of the kingdom.

8. That the entry in the caſh-book of the South-ſea company of 574,500l. ſtoc, pretended to be ſold for 1,213,575l. between the 4th of February, 1719, and the 12th of April following, was contrived with a deſign to conceal the names of perſons, for whoſe benefit ſtoc was taken in by the company.

9. That every perſon, for whom ſtoc was taken in or held, ſuch ſtoc being part of the 574,500l. pretended to be ſold by the South-ſea company, from the 4th of February, 1719, to the 12th of April, without money paid, or ſufficient ſecurity given for the acceptance of, and payment for, ſuch ſtoc, be obliged to pay to the company all ſuch ſums of money, as have been received by way of difference, or otherwiſe, for ſuch ſtoc.

10. That the addition of 250,000l. to the firſt money-ſubſcription, after it had been declared to have been opened for two millions, and the addition of 500,000l. to the ſecond money-ſubſcription, after it had been declared to be opened for one million, were fraudulently contrived to give corrupt advantages to particular perſons, and were injurious to public credit.

Upon theſe reſolutions, a bill was brought in, for the relief of the unhappy ſufferers in the South-ſea company.

ſum of 9,039,936l. 11s. was lent to ſeveral perſons on the ſecurity of 2,563,117l. 17s. 5d. ſtoc: and that the further ſum of 2,219,087l. was lent on the ſecurity of 773,600l. ſubſcription-receipts; the money ſo lent, and ſtill remaining due, amounting in the whole to the ſum of 11,259,025l. 11s.

That by ſeveral reſolutions of the court of directors of the 21ſt of April, the 20th of May, and the 9th of June laſt, for three ſeveral loans, it appears, that the ſum, reſolved by them to be lent on ſtoc from the 21ſt of April to the 21ſt of May, was limited to 500,000l. in the whole, and that not more than 5000l. ſhould be lent to any one perſon, and ſuch loan to be only at the rate of 250l. on 100l. ſtoc; that, from the 20th of May to the 9th of June, the rule of lending was at the rate of 300l. on 100l. ſtoc; and that not more than 3000l. ſhould be lent to any one perſon; and, from the 9th of June, the rule of lending was at 400l. on 100l. ſtoc, and that not more than 4000l. ſhould be lent to any one perſon.

That, on examination of the books of loans, it appears, that on the firſt loan the rules of lending were greatly exceeded, viz. that there was lent in the whole 943,631l. more than the ſum of 500,000l. to which the ſaid loan was confined. That the exceſs above 250l. on 100l. ſtoc, amounts to 316,740l. and the exceſs above 5000l. to one perſon, amounts in the whole to 779,231l. That on the ſecond loan the exceſs above the rate of 300l. on 100l. ſtoc amounts to 30,750l. and the exceſs above 3000l. to one perſon, amounts in the whole to 169,025l. And that on the third loan the exceſs above 400l. on 100l. ſtoc amounts to 59,413l. and the exceſs above the rate of 4000l. to one perſon, amounts in the whole to 1,447,677l. For the particulars of all which your committee refer to the book marked No. IV, in which the ſame are diſtinctly expreſſed, and the reſolutions of the general court, and court of directors, in relation to loans, are tranſcribed.

That your committee do not find any reſolution, either of a general court, or a court of directors, for lending money on ſubſcription-receipts; but, by the examinations which they have taken, it appears, that mr. Knight, the late caſhier of the South-ſea company, and his under-caſhier and clerks, by his directions, did lend money on the ſubſcription-receipts, by verbal orders from the directors of the ſaid company, and under colour of an order of a general court, made the 21ſt of April, 1720, to impower the court of directors from time to time, as they ſhall ſee for the intereſt of the company, to lend any ſum or ſums of the company's money, on the company's preſent and to be increaſed capital ſtoc; and to do all ſuch matters and things, as they ſhould judge moſt for the good of the company.

But your committee find, that by the ſecond by-law of the ſaid company, relating to the keeping the caſh of the company, it was ordained, that the caſh of the corporation ſhould from time to time be kept under three ſeveral locs, with different wards, the keys of which to be kept, one by the caſhier, and the other two by ſuch of the governor, ſub-governor, deputy-governors or directors, as the ſaid court ſhould from time appoint, except ſuch ſum or ſums as the court of directors ſhould think neceſſary to let remain in the cuſtody of the caſhier; and no money relating to the trade or affairs of the ſaid company ſhould be diſpoſed of, without an order of the ſaid court of directors; and that the intereſt of all other advantages, ariſing and growing upon the caſh of the ſaid company, ſhould be brought to the account of the ſaid company. However, it appears that the ſaid loans on ſubſcriptions were generally known, and never objected againſt, by any of the directors in a general court, or in any court of directors.

That on the ſaid loans on ſtoc, the ſtoc was transferred to perſons for that purpoſe nominated in the ſame manner as if the ſame had been abſolutely ſold, without any defeazance on the part of the company, or of the perſons to whom the ſtoc was transferred, for re-transferring the ſame, on re-payment of the money; nor was any covenant or other ſecurity taken, for re-payment from the borrowers, except the ſtoc ſo transferred; nor doth there appear any diſtinction between the ſaid tranfers on loans, and the other transfers, which were made of ſtoc abſolutely purchaſed, on account of the company: upon which your committee obſerve, that it was in the power of the perſons, to whom the ſaid pawned ſtoc was transferred, to diſpoſe thereof at any time, as they thought fit, when the price of ſtoc was high, and to replace the ſame when it fell.

And your committee do find, that, on the 19th day of October laſt, the ſaid mr. Knight, to whom the ſaid pawned ſtoc was transferred, did, purſuant to an order of the court of directors, transfer ſtoc to the amount of 2,141,867l. 17s. 5d. to ſir Harcourt Maſters, colonel Hugh Raymond, Edward Gibbon, and John Gore, truſtees, for that purpoſe nominated by the court of directors, in whoſe names the ſame now remains; but the ſum is 421,250l. ſhort of the aforeſaid ſum of 2,563,117l. 17s. 5d. which is mentioned in the ſaid book of loans to have been pledged for the ſecurity of the repayment of the aforeſaid ſum of 9,039,936l. 11s. from which it is evident, that the ſaid ſum of 421,250l. of the ſtoc mortgaged or pawned, on loans, as aforeſaid, has been ſold, or otherwiſe diſpoſed of, by the Truſtees, or agents of the South-ſea company; and, till re-placed, cannot be re-transferred to thoſe, by whom the ſame was pawned or mortgaged: upon which your committee obſerve how eaſy it was for the truſtees of the company to have ſold the ſaid ſtoc, when it was at high prices, and to have replaced the ſame again when it fell; for on examination it appears, that there was no diſtinct and ſeparate account kept of the ſaid mortgaged and pawned ſtoc, nor was the ſame any ways diſtinguiſhed from the other ſtoc of thoſe perſons, to whom it was at firſt transferred.

That, as to the ſaid ſum of 2,219,087l. lent on 773,600l. ſubſcription-receipts, it appears by the aforeſaid book of loans, that the general rule of lending was at the rate of 300l. on 100l. ſubſcription-receipts; but, excluding from the ſaid loans on ſubſcriptions the two great loans, the one to the million-bank, and the other to Turner and company, the loans to the other borrowers will, at an average, come out above 300l. per cent. It appears that on the firſt ſubſcription-receipts, at the time of the ſaid lending there was paid in only from 90l. to 120l. per cent. and on the ſecond ſubſcription-receipts generally 40l. and on ſome few 80l. per cent. but how much more there hath been paid in ſince, or whether all the ſaid ſubſcription-receipts on which money was lent be now remaining in the cuſtody of any perſon for the ſecurity of the company, your committee cannot at preſent diſcover, the receipts not having been as yet produced to them.

That it appears that Turner and company were employed by the directors, to lend out 500,000l. on ſubſcription-receipts, and that they accordingly lent 150,000l. on ſuch receipts, after the rate of 190l. per cent. on the firſt ſubſcription, and 40l. per cent. on the ſecond. But, ſuch rates being by the ſaid directors thought too low, the ſaid Turner and company were ordered to proceed no farther in diſpoſing of the remaining part of the ſaid 500,000l. and were told at the ſame time, that by lending at ſuch low rates on ſubſcriptions they were ruining the ſtoc. And it alſo appears, that mr. Knight did iſſue a conſiderable ſum to be diſpoſed of by brokers, for the refuſal of South-ſea ſtoc at certain times, at very high prices; and likewiſe, that, on the declenſion of the price of the ſtoc, large ſums were iſſued to purchaſe ſtoc, on account of the company, at very high prices; and part of the ſtoc then bought appears to have belonged to ſome of the directors of the ſaid company. And although your committee are not yet prepared to ſet this matter in a full light, they cannot but obſerve, that the ſaid directors, in all their proceedings in the execution of their ſcheme, appear to have had chiefly in view the raiſing and ſupporting the imaginary value of the ſtoc, at an extravagant and high price, for the benefit of themſelves, and thoſe who were in the ſecret with them.

That, as to the aforeſaid loans on ſubſcription-receipts, it appears, there were no defeazances executed by thoſe with whom the receipts were depoſited for a re-delivery of the ſame, on re-payment of the money, nor any ſecurity given by the borrowers, beſides the receipts by them ſo delivered; nor doth any thing elſe appear to diſtinguiſh the receipts ſo pledged from ſuch receipts as were, or might have been, abſolutely ſold to the company; for all the ſaid receipts were made out in one name, viz. Joſeph Safford, and by his indorcement the bearer became intituled to the property thereof: upon which your committee obſerve, the ſecurity of the company, as to the money lent on the ſaid ſubſcription-receipts, is more precarious than the loans on ſtoc; for by the transfer-book it might appear by whom ſuch ſtoc was transferred; but it hath not yet appeared to your committee that any books have been kept, or entries made, of the names of the perſons to whom ſuch loans have been made on ſubſcription-receipts: and your committee do farther obſerve, that it was in the power of the perſons, with whom ſuch ſubſcription-receipts were depoſited, to ſell the ſame at high prices, and to replace them again when the price fell. And upon the whole it doth appear to your committee, that the ſaid loans on ſtoc, and on ſubſcriptions, have been managed with the utmoſt negligence, with reſpect to the intereſt of the company, and were contrived for the raiſing and keeping up the price of ſtoc at an extravagant height.

Before your committee concludes this report, they think it proper to obſerve, that it has appeared to them throughout their examination, that mr. Knight, caſhier of the South-ſea company, was principally concerned in their moſt ſecret tranſactions. And your committee have been informed by ſir Theodore Janſſen, ſoon after mr. Knight's withdrawing himſelf, that upon his preſſing mr. Knight, two or three days before he went away, to make a diſcovery of whatſoever he knew relating to the whole proceedings; mr. Knight anſwered, that, if he ſhould diſcloſe all he knew, it would open ſuch a ſcene as the world would be ſurprized at.

Mr Stanhope, one of the ſecretaries of the treaſury, having been charged, in the report of the ſecret committee, for having large quantities of ſtoc and ſubſcriptions held for him, preſſed the houſe, that a ſhort day might be appointed to examine the matter, that he might have an opportunity to clear himſelf. A day being appointed, ſeveral of the directors and others were ordered to attend, who were examined concerning the charge againſt him, conſiſting of two articles: 1. That 10,000l. South-ſea ſtoc was taken in for his benefit by mr. Knight, without any valuable conſideration; and that the difference, ariſing by the advanced price thereof, had been paid him out of the caſh of the South-ſea company. 2. That Turner and company had bought 50,000l. ſtoc at a low price of the South-ſea company, in the name, and for the benefit of mr. Stanhope, the difference of the advanced price whereof, amounting to 250,000l. had been paid him by ſir George Caſwal and company. To prove theſe articles, the ſecret committee cauſed the examinations of ſir John Blunt, mr. Holditch, mr. Sawbridge, mr. Henry Blunt, and others, to be read, and thoſe perſons themſelves to be examined; but ſome of them rather weakened than confirmed their former depoſitions. Sir John Blunt, in particular, owned, as to the firſt article, that mr. Knight had ſhewn him a letter, which he told him was ſigned by mr. Stanhope, deſiring him to take 10,000l. ſtoc for him; but that he did not know whether that letter was genuine, nor what was become of it: and, as for the 50,000l. ſtoc transferred to the ſword-blade company in mr. Stanhope's name, mr. Sawbridge and mr. Turner owned they had made uſe of mr. Stanhope's name without his privity or conſent. After the examinations, and the animadverſions of the members of the ſecret committee, mr. Stanhope ſaid, 'that, for ſome years paſt, he had lodged all the money he was maſter of in mr. Knight's hands, and whatever ſtoc mr. Knight had taken in for him, he had paid a valuable conſideration for it. And as for the 50,000l. he could not anſwer for what had been done without his conſent.' When the queſtion was put, whether he was concerned in the manner repreſented by the two articles, he was cleared, though by three voices only, 180 againſt 177.

A few days after, ſir George Caſwal having been heard in his place, it was reſolved by the commons, 'that it appeared to the houſe, that ſir George Caſwal, one of the co-partners of Turner and company, and a member of the houſe, did, on the 14th of December, 1720, after the houſe had begun to enquire into the conduct of the directors of the South-ſea company, order Daniel Watkins, one of the book-keepers of Turner and company, to eraſe, in ſeveral places of the books, the name of Stanhope, and to make the ſame Stangape, which was accordingly done.' After this and ſome other reſolutions concerning him, a bill was ordered to be brought in, to make the eſtates real and perſonal of ſir George Caſwal, Jacob Sawbridge, and Elias Turner, anſwerable for 250,000l. to the South-ſea company, the advanced price of the forementioned 50,000l. South-ſea ſtoc.

The caſe of the earl of Sunderland was alſo taken into conſideration. By the report of the ſecret committee it appeared, that 50,000l. ſtoc had been taken by mr. Knight for the earl's uſe, without any thing paid, or ſecurity given for payment for the ſame. The houſe ſeemed to be intent upon the enquiry: a warm diſpute aroſe, and much was ſaid for and againſt him: but, upon the queſtion, the vote paſſed in his favour, by a majority of 233 againſt 132. Notwithſtanding this, it was generally thought, the ſecret committee would not have accuſed the prime-miniſter, if the charge had not been at leaſt porbable. The earl did not loſe the confidence of his maſter, though he reſigned his poſt of firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, which was given to mr. Walpole, as one of the moſt capable to hold it in ſuch critical circumſtances.

Mr Aiſlabie did not eſcape ſo well as the earl of Sunderland. When that part of the report of the ſecret committee, which related to mr. Aiſlabie, came to be conſidered, mr. Hawes's depoſition againſt him, 'that he had cauſed the book of accounts between them to be burnt, and given him a diſcharge for the balance, amounting to 842,000l.' appeared ſo ſtrong, that the commons came to ſeveral reſolutions againſt him, particularly that he had promoted the deſtructive execution of the South-ſea ſcheme, with a view to his own exorbitant profit, and combined with the directors in their pernicious practices, to the ruin of public credit; and therefore he was expelled the houſe, and ordered to be committed to the Tower.

Mr Craggs would have been called to an account on the 17th of March, but he happened to die the day before of a lethargic fit, leaving behind him an immenſe eſtate to be divided among his three daughters, who were married to three members of parliament, mr. Treſuſis, mr. Newſham, and mr. Elliott. About ſix weeks after his death, the commons having taken mr. Cragg's affair into conſideration, it was reſolved that a large quantity of South-ſea ſtoc had been held by the company for his uſe, and that he was a notorious accomplice with Robert Knight, and ſome of the directors, in carrying on their ſcandalous practices; and therefore that all the eſtate he was poſſeſſed of from the 1ſt of December, 1719, ſhould be applied towards the relief of the unhappy ſufferers in the South-ſea company.

1720] The directors having delivered in the inventories of their eſtates, it was debated what allowance ſhould be given them. Mr Lowndes propoſed an eighth part: but it was objected, ſuch an allowance would be too much for ſome who had the largeſt eſtates, and conſequently had been deepeſt in the guilt; and too little for others who had but ſmall eſtates, and were only paſſively criminal, by not entering their diſſent to the fraudulent management of the reſt. It was at laſt agreed, that the affair of each director ſhould be particularly conſidered, and more or leſs favour ſhewn, according as they ſhould appear more or leſs guilty. The commons began with the ſub and deputy-governors, and proceeded alphabetically to the reſt. The value of their eſtates, as given in upon oath, amounted to about 2,014,000l. of which 334,000l. was left to the proprietors. [i]

Mr Aiſlabie's affair occaſioned debates proportionable to his great riches, and the multitude of his friends. He was allowed all the eſtate he was poſſeſſed of, on the 20th of October, 1718. His country-houſe, gardens, and park, with his wife's jewels, and houſehold goods, were alſo excepted from the forfeiture.

Soon after, an act paſſed for raiſing money upon the eſtates of the ſub and deputy-governors, directors, caſhier, deputy-caſhier, and accountant of the South-ſea company, and of mr. Aiſlabie and mr. Craggs, towards making good

[i] The debates in the grand committee about ſettling the allowances were as follow:

They began with ſir John Fellows, the ſub-governor, in whoſe behalf mr. Sloper moved, 'that, ſince it did not appear, that he had been ſo active in the late vile and pernicious practice, as ſome others, he might be allowed 20,000l. out of his eſtate.' Mr Hungerford reduced it to 15,000l. others to 12,000l. and mr. Walpole having at laſt propoſed 10,000l. it was agreed to without any diviſion. Mr Joye, the deputy-governor, appearing to have been deeply concerned in the guilt, it was agreed to allow him only 5,000l. The ſame ſum was allowed mr. Aſtell: and the queſtion being put to allow ſir Lambert Blackwell 10,000l. ſome propoſing only 5,000l. it was carried for the former by a majority of four voices, one hundred and twelve againſt one hundred and eight. The allowance to ſir John Blunt occaſioned a long debate. Mr Lawrence Carter moved to allow him one ſhilling only; the lord James Cavendiſh, 1,000l. mr. Plummer, 5,000l. ſir Joſeph Jekyll 10,000l. which was ſeconded by general Roſſe, the lord Moleſworth, mr. Jeffreys, and mr. Windſor: but mr. Sloper, mr. John Smith, mr. Horace Walpole, and mr. Milner, were of opinion, that he ought to be moſt ſeverely puniſhed. Mr Sloper ſaid, that he was grown to that height of pride and inſolence, that he could not give a civil anſwer to perſons far above him: inſtancing in his behaviour one day at the treaſury, when, a relation of a great man aſking ſir John, in his (mr. Sloper's) hearing for a ſubſcription, ſir John, with a great deal of contempt, bid him go to his couſin Walpole, and deſire him to ſell his ſtoc in the bank, and by that means he might be ſupplied.' Mr Walpole entered fully into ſir John Blunt's life and character, and ſhewed, that he had been a projector of many years ſtanding, and had been the author of ſeveral fallacious ſchemes, by which unwary people had been drawn in to their utter ruin, particularly in a project for the linen manufactory. To this mr. Horace Walpole added, 'that was not the firſt; for there was a gentleman, who ſat next to him, meaning mr. Jeſſop, whom ſir John Blunt had drawn into a project for bringing water to London from a great diſtance, which was to out-do the new river water; by which the ſubſcribers loſt all their money, though ſir John himſelf got ſome thouſands by it:' This mr. Jeſſop confirmed. However, the lord Hinchinbroke moved for allowing ſir John Blunt 10,000l. but the queſtion being put for allowing him 1,000l. it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of one hundred and thirty-eight againſt ninety-four.

The next allowance in debate was for ſir Robert Chaplin, for whom the lord Moleſworth, ſir John Eyles, and other members ſpoke; and it was agreed, without dividing, to allow him 10,000l. The ſame allowance was given to ſir William Chapman, mr. Cheſter, and mr. Child. A motion being made to give mr. De la Porte the like ſum, the lord Moleſworth was for reducing it to 7000l. but upon the queſtion it was carried for 10,000l. by a majority of one hundred and fifty againſt ſixty-nine. The caſe of mr. Francis Eyles appeared in ſo favourable a light, that he was allowed 20,000l. without dividing. Mr Edmondſon's eſtate amounting to little more than 5,000l. it was moved to allow him the whole, and leave him out of the bill; but, after ſome debate, it was agreed to allow him only 3,000l. The queſtion being put to allow mr. Gibbon 15,000 or 10,000l. it was carried for the latter without dividing. It appearing, that ſir William Hammond and mr. Gore had little or no ſhare in the fraudulent contrivances of the leading directors, mr. Gore was allowed 20,000l. and ſir William Hammond 10,000l. It was propoſed to give mr. Hawes, late receiver-general of the cuſtoms, 1,000l. But ſir Nathaniel Gould and ſome other members having obſerved, that he was very active in the late vile practices, and had occaſioned the ruin of many people, mr. Docminique moved, and it was agreed to allow him only 31l. the odd money of his inventory. Several members ſpoke in favour of mr. Horſey, particularly the lord Hinchinbroke and ſir Robert Rich, who moved for allowing him 10,000l. which was carried without a diviſion. It was then debated, whether to allow mr. Holditch 500l. 1,000l. or 5,000l.

the damages ſuſtained by the company, and for diſabling ſuch of theſe perſons, as were living, to hold any place, or ſit in parliament for the future.

When the motion was made in the houſe of commons, for joining mr. Aiſlabie in the ſame bill with the directors, his friends repreſented the hardſhip of putting a man of his eminence on the ſame level with them, and the danger of ſuch a precedent: but it was to no purpoſe, for the motion was approved. Mr Aiſlabie, when the bill was depending in the houſe of lords, petitioned to be heard by counſel. He was himſelf heard at their bar, and made two long and eloquent ſpeeches in his defence, but they met with more applauſe than ſucceſs, for the bill paſſed as ſent up by the commons.

After theſe proceedings againſt the managers of the South-ſea ſcheme, the commons, with the ſame moderation and wiſdom, applied themſelves to repair the miſchiefs, that ſcheme had produced, and at ſeveral times came to the following reſolutions:

I. That for the re-eſtabliſhing of public credit, relief be given to the South-ſea company, with regard to the payment of the 4,156,306l. and the four years and a half's purchaſe on the annuities and other national debts, the company giving ſuch conſideration to the proprietors, as the houſe ſhall think proper.

II. That in order to put an end to all diſputes between the company and the proprietors of the redeemable funds, and of the ſecond, third, and fourth money-ſubſcriptions, who have ſtoc allowed them at 400l. per cent. with the Midſummer dividend, an addition of 33l. 6s. 8d. be given to the proprietors by the company.

III. That the ſeven millions, payable to the public by the company, be remitted to, as, from the 24th of June, 1722, two millions of the ſtoc be annihilated, and a proportionable part of their annuity or yearly fund from that time, ceaſe.

IV. That the ſecond ſubſcription of the irredeemables be made equal to the firſt, by an addition of ſtoc at 150l. per cent.

V. That all the ſtoc belonging to the company, which, after the propoſed diſtribution, ſhall remain undiſpoſed of, ſhall be divided among the proprietors.

VI. That ſuch perſons as have borrowed money of the company upon South-ſea ſtoc, or upon ſubſcription-receipts, ſhall, upon payment of 10l. per cent. be diſcharged from all future demands.

VII. That all contracts for the ſale or purchaſe of ſubſcriptions or ſtoc of the South-ſea company, or any other, which ſhall be unperformed before the 29th of September next, be entered in books before the 1ſt of November next, or elſe be void.

VIII. That no ſpecial bail be required for any action brought upon any contract, ſince the 1ſt of December, 1719, for the ſale or purchaſe of any ſubſcription or ſtoc.

IX. That no execution be awarded, or any judgment obtained in any ſuch action, till the end of the ſeſſion of parliament, which ſhall be next after the 29th of September enſuing.

X. That all contracts for the ſale or purchaſe of any ſubſcription or ſtoc, unperformed before the 29th of September next, where the ſeller, or the perſon on whoſe behalf ſuch contract was made, was not, at the ſame time of ſuch contract, or within a time to be limited, actually poſſeſſed of intitled to ſuch ſubſcription or ſtoc, ſhall be declared null and void.

With theſe reſolutions, the commons preſented to the king an addreſs, demonſtrating both the neceſſity and wiſdom of their proceedings, and which deſerves to be inſerted at large:

'We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great-Britain in parliament aſſembled, being ſenſibly affected with the miſery and calamities, that have befallen great numbers of your majeſty's faithful ſubjects, occaſioned by the heavy loſſes they have ſuſtained, from the fatal execution of the South-ſea ſcheme: and taking into our ſerious conſideration the low ſtate of public and private credit, which it ſeems impoſſible to us ſhould ever revive under the preſent uncertain and unſettled poſture of affairs, have come to ſeveral reſolutions, which we humbly beg leave to lay before your majeſty.

'When we firſt entered upon the conſideration of this extenſive and perplexed affair, we thought it moſt adviſable to leave every man's property to be determined by due courſe of law, and were of opinion, that no relief or abatement could properly be preſcribed or given, but from the South ſea company. But, the diſcontents of the people daily increaſing, and the uncertain and doubtful events, that threatened very great and valuable properties, creating ſuch infinite anxieties and diſſatisfaction, as had a moſt fatal and general influence upon all public and private credit, the interpoſition of parliament became unavoidable, and we found ourſelves under a neceſſity of reſuming the conſideration of this nice and intricate matter, and to endeavour to remove, as far as poſſible, the chief and greateſt inconveniencies.

'The great difficulty in remedying theſe miſchiefs ſeemed to ariſe from the ſeveral contended intereſts engaged in the South-ſea company, which made it impoſſible to give relief to ſome but at the expence of others: and as all the new proprietors, as well thoſe concerned in the public funds, as the other adventurers, were equally impoſed upon by the

The voices were equally divided, eighty-ſix and eighty-ſix; upon which mr. Clayton, the chairman, gave the caſting vote for 5,000l. which met with general approbation. Mr Horace Walpole and ſir Richard Steel ſpoke in favour of ſir Theodore Janſſen, and were anſwered by general Roſſe and the maſter of the rolls. But, after a ſmall debate, mr. Trenchard moved for allowing him 50,000l. which was carried by a majority of one hundred and thirty-four voices againſt one hundred and eighteen. Sir Jacob Jacobſon's caſe coming next under conſideration, mr. Hungerford moved for allowing him 11,000l. which was all his eſtate, except 481l. and it was agreed to without a negative. Mr Ingram's caſe being much the ſame, mr. Pulteney moved for allowing him 12,000l. near three parts in four of his eſtate; and being ſeconded by the lord Hinchinbroke, it was carried without dividing. Sir John Lambart was allowed 5,000l. without a diviſion, as was ſir Harcourt Maſters; and mr. Morley 1800l. near his whole eſtate. Mr Page had an allowance of 10,000l. without dividing. Mr Heyſham moved for allowing colonel Raymond 30,000l. and being ſeconded by mr. Tufnel, the attorney-general, and mr. Hungerford, no oppoſition was made to that motion. Mr Sloper moved for allowing mr. Read 10,000l. He was ſeconded by ſir John Ward and mr. Docminique; and the motion carried without a debate; as was the allowance of 14,000l. to mr. Reynolds. Mr Hungerford moved for allowing mr. Sawbridge 10,000l. and was oppoſed by mr. Lowndes, the lord Moleſworth, ſir Adolphus Oughton, and mr. Horace Walpole. But another member moving for 5,000l. it was agreed to without a diviſion. Mr Tillard had in like manner an allowance of 15,000l. and mr. Turner 800l. which was near his whole eſtate. The caſe of mr. Surman, the deputy caſhier, occaſioned a debate of about an hour and a half. He had not the beſt character amongſt the offenders; but, acting only as a ſervant, and by the command of mr. Knight, or the directors, ſeveral members thought there ſhould be a mitigation in his puniſhment, as there was in his crime. Mr Grey Nevill ſtrenuouſly inſiſted, that he might be left out of the bill. Another member moved to allow him 30,000l. Mr Hungerford would have reduced it to 20,000l. mr. Lechmere to 12,000l. and two other members to 10,000, and 5,000l. All theſe were oppoſed by ſir Joſeph Jekyll, ſerjeant Pengelly, and mr. Horace Walpole, who would not have allowed him above 20 or 30l. but at laſt the queſtion being put for allowing him 5000l. it was agreed to without dividing. Mr Arthur Moore moved for allowing John Griſby, accountant to the South-ſea company, 10,000l. But another member ſaid, 'that, ſince that upſtart was once ſo prodigally vain, as to bid his coachman feed his horſes with gold, no doubt but he could feed on it himſelf: and therefore he moved he might be allowed as much gold, as he could eat; and that the reſt of the eſtate might go towards the relief of the ſufferers.' However a motion being made for allowing him 2,000l. it was carried without dividing.

The particulars of the eſtates and allowances were as follow:

Some alterations were afterwards made in theſe allowances. Mr Aſtell had 10,000l. inſtead of 5,000l. ſir John Blunt 5,000l. inſtead of 1,000l. ſir Lambert Blackwell 15000l. inſtead of 10,000l. and mr. Hawes 5,000l. inſtead of 31l. A motion was made to reduce ſir Theodore Janſſen's allowance to 30,000l. but it was rejected.

artifices of the late directors, and equally drawn in by their own too great credulity and desire of gain; to have discharged any particular sett had been not only an injustice to the rest, but, by dissolving the whole system, had involved them in utter ruin, which made a distribution of losses, and some abatement to all, absolutely necessary. It was indeed very much to be wished, that such ease could have been given to the proprietors of the public debts, as would have made their property as valuable to them, as they had enjoyed it for many years: but as they had voluntarily consented to take stoc at some rate or other, even at the time when they saw the stoc raised to the highest pitch, the giving stoc at one and the same price to them and all others, that were most immediately concerned, make the provision as just and equitable, as the nature of the thing will admit; it being impracticable, so far to reconcile the different interests in this general concern, as to make the conditions of those equal, that had engaged themselves at different rates, and unequal terms.

'The great and principal mischiefs arose from several concurring circumstances; from the hard terms of most of the proprietors, occasioned by the high prices, at which they had purchased stoc, or the excessive rates, at which, as well the proprietors of public debts, as the money-subscribers, had obliged themselves to take stoc; from the demand of above seven millions, payable to the public, which could only be raised out of the properties of those, that were already too great sufferers, and which rendered the company incapable of giving them any farther ease or relief; from the disputes and contests at law, which were preparing to be carried on, not only between the company and the subscribers of the redeemable funds, but between infinite numbers of private persons engaged in contracts for the sale and purchase of stoc and subscriptions; from the impossibility of the money-subscribers making any farther payments; from the great loss the company had sustained by the late directors, having lent out above eleven millions of the company's money, without any, or without sufficient security; and from the very little prospect of recovering any considerable part thereof; without which it was impossible for the company to comply with the demand of the public, but at the infinite expence and insupportable loss of all their adventurers, which must have proved destructive to the trade and credit of the kingdom.

'These considerations induced us to come to the foregoing resolutions; being, as we conceive, the most proper means to enable the company to give relief to such of the proprietors, as most wanted and deserved it; to put an end to all disputes at law; and to fix, settle, and ascertain the several properties and interests of all persons concerned with the South-sea company: to deliver infinite numbers of your majesty's good subjects from the apprehension of vexatious law-suits and persecutions, and from the farther demand of such excessive sums of money, as must sink and depress all public and private credit.

'And as the greatest mischiefs, which we now so justly complain of, have arisen from the unwarrantable methods used by the late directors of the South-sea company, in selling and disposing of such part of their increased capital stoc, as belonged to the company; to remove such a foundation of stoc-jobbing, and to prevent the like fatal consequences for the future, we thought it necessary to take care, that all the increased capital stoc belonged to the company, which, after the proposed distribution is made, shall remain undisposed of, be divided among all the proprietors of the company, in proportion to their several and respective interests.

'These resolutions, if passed into a law, and duly put in execution, we humbly hope will tend very much to the re-establishing of the public credit, to the quieting of the minds of your majesty's subjects, and contribute to the ease and relief of great numbers, though not sufficient to give satisfaction to, or repair the losses of all that are unhappily involved in the present calamity.

'But, as the ancient usage and established rules of parliament make it impracticable for us to prepare bills for the royal assent, during the present session of parliament, for some of the purposes contained in our resolutions, we have humbly presumed to lay the same before your majesty for you royal consideration; not doubting but that your majesty will, out of your great wisdom and accustomed grace and goodness to your people, as soon as the public and private bills, now depending in parliament, shall be dispatched, give us an early opportunity of perfecting this great and necessary work.'

The king returned for answer, 'that he had such an entire confidence in the parliament's duty and affection to him, and their zeal for the public service, that he should very readily comply with what they desired, and would soon give them an opportunity of doing what they proposed for settling and establishing the credit of the kingdom.'

The next day, being the 29th of July, the king came to the house of peers, and, passing the bills that were ready, the lord-chancellor prorogued the parliament for two days only to the last of July, when the king came again to the house of lords, and made the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The occasion of my calling you together again so suddenly, is to give you an opportunity of resuming the consideration of the state of public credit.'

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

'The progress, that you made in this affair, during the last session, laid such a foundation of this necessary work, that the world is fully apprised of what is reasonably to be hoped for at this present conjuncture.'

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I must recommend to you all possible dispatch, and am persuaded, that at this season of the year your deliberation will be confined to what is absolutely necessary upon this extraordinary occasion.'

Pursuant to this short speech, the commons came again to their former resolution, and ordered a bill to be brought in under the title of, 'a bill for making provisions to restore public credit, which suffered by the frauds and mismanagements of the late South-sea directors and others.'

This bill was formed upon the forementioned resolutions, and it may here be observed, that the whole capital stoc, at the end of the year 1720, amounted to above 37,800,000l. and the stoc, allotted to all the proprietors in their several shapes, did not amount to 24,500,000l. The remaining capital stoc, being about 13,300,000l. belonged to the company in their corporate capacity, and was the profit arising from the execution of the South-sea scheme, and out of which the seven millions was to be paid to the public.

When this scheme was blown up, and the calamities and ruin attending numberless families appeared, the parliament, in favour of the unhappy sufferers, by the present act directed several additions to be made to the stoc of the proprietors out of the stoc possessed by the company, in their own right, and made a particular distribution of stoc, which amounted to above 2,200,000l. and upon remitting five millions of the seven, that was to be paid to the public, annihilated two millions of their capital, which was insisting upon the payment of two millions: then they enacted, that, after these distributions, the remaining capital stoc should be divided among all the proprietors which came to 33l. 6s. 8d. per cent. and took this from the company above 8,900,000l.

There was then due, and owing to the company, above eleven millions for money lent by them on stoc unredeemed, and of this the parliament discharged all the debtors to the company upon paying 10l. per cent. (which some did comply with, and others refused) and the loss to the company was upon this article above 6,900,000l.

This act gave some relief to the sufferers, and the cries and lamentations of undone multitudes were less heard, but the proprietors of the stoc loudly complained of the two millions taken from them: upon which (as will hereafter be related) the parliament, in 1723, revived the two millions that had been annihilated, and directed to be distributed among the proprietors which made an addition of 6l. 5s. to every man's capital.

Whilst the affair of the South-sea was depending in parliament, petitions, from counties, cities, and boroughs were sent up, crying for justice, and pamphlets were daily published, exasperating the minds of the people against the South-sea directors and their abettors. But the loudest cries for justice were contained in letters directed to the author of the London Journal, and supposed to have been mostly penned by mr. Gordon, under the borrowed name of Cato.[k]

[k] A committee was appointed to enquire into the authors, printers, and publishers of seditious libels. They sent for mr. Peele, publisher of the London Journal, and for the reputed author of the letters, but they both kept out of the way. Mist, the printer and publisher of a Weekly Journal, was, for reflections cast on the king for his interpositions on behalf of the protestants in the Palatinate, sentenced to stand in the pillory, to pay a fine of fifty

The affairs of the South-ſea being thus ſettled, the company were ſoon in condition to ſatisfy their engagements with the public. On the 1ſt of September a general court was held, which ſir John Eyles, the ſub-governor, opened with a ſpeech, ſetting forth the regulations of the parliament, without which the directors would have been involved in difficulties inſuperable, and confuſions without end. He enlarged upon his majeſty's care of their intereſts in the late treaties with Spain, upon the advantages that might be gained by the Aſſiento contract, to which end the directors were fitting out the Royal George, whoſe cargo amounting to 280,000l. was provided. He acquainted them with the intention of carrying on a trade hitherto not meddled with by the company, the Greenland trade ſo beneficial to Holland and Hamburgh. He then told them, that the forfeited eſtates of the late directors, and the 10l. per cent. on the borrowed ſtoc, with ſome other particulars, were abundantly ſufficient for diſcharging the debts of the company, and maintaining the credit of their bonds: that therefore the directors had diſcharged part of the bonds due at Chriſtmas, and hoped to give a ſpeedy determination to the reſt, that ſo their credit might be eſtabliſhed upon a ſolid foot: that the court of directors had alſo reſolved to divide (if thought fit) 3l. 6s. 8d. in ſtoc upon the preſent capital. That as all the remaining ſtoc was, by act of parliament, to be divided equally among the proprietors, the directors had, in great meaſure, executed that appointment, amounting, upon a calculation, to 33l. 6s. 8d. upon every 100l. capital. After this, he mentioned the company's being empowered, by the late act, to ingraft part of their ſtoc into the capitals of the bank and Eaſt-India; but, as the act for reſtoring public credit had adjuſted the concerns of the company upon a new foot, he only barely mentioned the ingraftment.

This ſpeech met with applauſe, not only in the court, but from the public; and the matters contained in it were agreed to, except the affair of the ingraftment, which was let reſt. At this court it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the directors ſhould take the moſt effectual meaſures to oblige the bank to ſtand to their contract, for taking ſtoc at 400l. per cent. in lieu of the 3,775,000l. the company was to have paid them; and the contract was ordered to be regiſtered.

During theſe proceedings concerning the affairs of the South-ſea company, the following tranſactions paſſed in the parliament.

There was formed, (at leaſt it was pretended ſo) a ſcandalous ſociety at London, with the ſhocking name of the Hell-fire-club. The members whereof were guilty of the like extravagancies with the Mohocks, formerly mentioned. Several perſons of quality, particularly the duke of Wharton, were marked out as belonging to this club. The king, being informed of their wicked proceedings, publiſhed a proclamation (April 29) againſt blaſphemous and ſcandalous clubs, declaring, he was determined to ſhew all marks of diſpleaſure to any, who even lay under the ſuſpicion of ſuch deſtructive practices. He gave orders alſo to the officers of this houſehold, to make ſtrict enquiry, whether any of his ſervants were guilty of ſuch horrid impieties. The ſame day this order was given, the earl of Nottingham, who had lately anſwered mr. Whiſton's tents about the trinity,[1] took this occaſion to complain, in the houſe of lords, of the growth of atheiſm, profaneneſs, and immorality. Upon this dr. Verney, lord Willoughby of Brooke, dean of Windſor, brought in a bill for ſuppreſſing of blaſphemy and profaneneſs. It contained ſeveral articles, which had little relation to the practices complained of, and was chiefly deſigned to ſecure the belief of the thirty-nine articles of the church of England, and reſtrain the liberty granted by the laws of the former ſeſſion to the non-conformiſts. The ſubſtance of it was:

I. If any ſpoke or writ againſt the being of God, the divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, or the Holy Ghoſt, or the doctrine of the trinity, as ſent forth in the thirty-nine articles, on the truth of the Chriſtian religion, or the divine inſpiration of the ſcriptures, he ſhould, upon conviction, be impriſoned many months, unleſs he ſhould, within ſuch a time, publicly renounce his error, in a form preſcribed.

II. If any preacher in a ſeparate congregation ſhould, deny any of the fundamental articles of the Chriſtian religion, he ſhould be deprieved of the benefit of the act of toleration.

III. The archbiſhops in their provinces, and every biſhop in his dioceſe, ſhould be authorized to ſummon any perſon in holy orders, to appear before, and ſubſcribe the declaration above-mentioned, and upon refuſal, ſuch perſon ſhould be incapable to hold any eccleſiaſtical benefice.

IV. The juſtices at their quarter-ſeſſions are authorized, in like manner, to ſummon any diſſenting preacher, and upon his refuſal to ſubſcribe the declaration of faith, he ſhould be deprived of the benefit of the act of toleration.

At the ſecond reading of this bill (May 2) all the lords about London being ſummoned to attend, the archbiſhop moved to have it committed. Upon which the lord Onſlow ſaid, 'he was as much againſt blaſphemy, and for promoting religion, as it is profeſſed in the church of England, as any body; but he could not be for any law, that was for perſecution, of which nature he took this bill to be; and therefore he moved, that it might be thrown out.' He was ſeconded by the duke of Wharton, who ſaid, 'he was not inſenſible of the common talk and opinion of the town concerning himſelf; and therefore he was glad of this opportunity to juſtify himſelf, by declaring, he was far from being a patron of blaſphemy, or any enemy to religion; but, on the other hand, he could not be for this bill, becauſe he conceived it to be repugnant to the holy ſcripture.' Then, taking an old family bible out of his pocket, he quoted and read ſeveral paſſages of the Epiſtles of St. Peter and St. Paul; concluding, that the bill might be thrown out. He was ſupported by the duke of Argyle, and the earls of Sunderland and Ilay, the lord Townſhend, and earl Cowper. The earl of Peterborough ſaid, 'though he was for a parliamentary king, yet he did not deſire to have a parliamentary God, or a parliamentary religion: and, if the houſe were for ſuch a one, he would go to Rome, and endeavour to be choſen a cardinal; for he had rather ſit in the conclave, than with their lordſhips upon thoſe terms.' Dr Kennet, biſhop of Peterborough, ſpoke likewiſe on the ſame ſide, and ſaid, 'that neither himſelf, nor, he hoped, any of that bench would be executioners of ſuch a law, which ſeemed to tend to the ſetting up of an inquiſition.' On the other hand, the earl of Nottingham, the lord Bathurſt, the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Lichfield and Coventry, and ſome others, ſpoke for the bill; as did likewiſe the lord Trevor. One of theſe having ſaid, 'that he verily believed, the preſent calamity, occaſioned by the South-ſea project, was a judgment of God on the blaſphemy and profaneneſs the nation was guilty of.' The lord Onſlow replied, 'that noble peer muſt then have been a great ſinner; for he heard, he had loſt conſiderably by the South-ſea.' After ſome other ſpeeches, the bill was put off to a long day, by a majority of 60 voices againſt 31.

The ſupplies were, contrary to cuſtom, granted very late, and not with the uſual readineſs. The king, not to increaſe the ill humour, had not mentioned the ſubſidy he was oblidged, by the laſt year's treaty, to give Sweden for her ſupport againſt Ruſſia. However, on the 16th of June, he thought proper to ſend the following meſſage to the houſe of commons:

'His majeſty, having taken the firſt opportunity, upon the death of the late king of Sweden, to renew the ancient alliances between this kindom and Sweden, and having ſtipulated by a treaty to pay a ſubſidy to that crown, hath ordered that treaty to be laid before the houſe of commons; and pounds, and after three months impriſonment to give ſecurity for his good behaviour ſeven years. His journal was carried on under the title of Fog's, and two months after (May 27) was cenſured again by the commons as a traiterous libel, tending to alienate the affections of his majeſty's ſubjects, and excite rebellion. However, the journal continued many years afterwards.

[1] About the latter end of March, a full convocation of the univerſity of Oxford unanimouſly reſolved, that the ſolemn thanks of the univerſity ſhould be returned to the earl of Nottingham, for his moſt noble defence of the Chriſtian faith, contained in his anſwer to mr. Whiſton's letter to him concerning the eternity of the Son of God, and of the Holy Ghoſt. It was alſo agreed, that dr. Shippen, the vice-chancellor, with their repreſentatives, mr. Bromley and dr. Clarke, ſhould wait upon the earl with their thanks. The example of the univerſity was followed by the clergy, at the viſitations held for the dioceſe of Oxford, at Witney, Chipping-Norton, and Henley. The archdeacon of Hereford, and forty-five of the clergy, ſigned an addreſs of thanks to the earl; wherein they hinted, that he had aſſerted the convocation to be part of the parliament. The ſame was done likewiſe by the clergy of Cheſter and Shropſhire. About the ſame time mr. Joſeph Hall, mace-bearer to the king, and juſtice of the peace, was ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory, to pay 200l. fine, to lie three months in priſon, and give ſecurity alſo for ſeven years, for his Sober Reply to mr. Higg's merry Argument for the Tritheſtical Doctrine of the Trinity.

In May, the king publiſhed directions to the archbiſhops and biſhops, for the preſervation of unity in the church, and the purity of the Chriſtian faith, particularly in the doctrine of the trinity. They were required to ſee, 'that no preacher whatſoever, in his ſermon or lecture, do preſume to deliver any other doctrine, concerning the great and fundamental truths of our moſt holy religion, and particularly concerning the bleſſed trinity, than what are contained in the holy ſcriptures, and are agreeable to the three creeds, and the thirty-nine articles of religion.' All perſons denying one of the perſons in the trinity to be God, &c. were to be incapable of any office, and to ſuffer impriſonment three years.

hopes from their known zeal and affection for the proteſtant religion, and the true intereſt of their country, that they will enable him to make good the engagements he has entered into upon this occaſion.

'His majeſty being informed, that two ſhips called the Briſtol Merchant and Turky Merchant (now lying under quarentine) did arrive from Cyprus, and other parts of Turky, infected with the plague, and have cotton, wool, and other goods on board, which are dangerous to ſpread the infection; and conceiving it neceſſary for the preſervation of the health of his ſubjects, that theſe ſhips and their ladings be burnt and deſtroyed, and that a reaſonable ſatisfaction be given to the owners, hath, by advice of his privy-council, cauſed the value thereof to be computed by his majeſty's officers, and ordered thoſe computations to be laid before the houſe of commons, that proviſion may be made for ſatisfying the ſame.'

This meſſage occaſioned a long debate. Mr Shippen, ſir William Wyndham, ſir Joſeph Jekyll, the lord Moleſworth, mr. Butler, and ſome others, deſired to know, 'Whether we were to give 72,000l. (for that was the ſubſidy) to Sweden, beſides the maintaining a great fleet, with ſix thouſand ſeamen in the Baltic, which they thought a ſufficient charge to the nation, without paying ſo great a ſubſidy? urging, that before this laſt treaty with Sweden, there had been a rupture between the two nations, and hoſtilities, and great depredations committed by the Swediſh privateers on our merchants; ſo that before any ſubſidy be given to that crown, accounts ought firſt to be ſtated and ſettled, and it might appear upon the balance, that Sweden is indebted to us.' To this it was anſwered by mr. Walpole and his brother, mr. Lechmere, the lord Barrington, and ſome others, 'that the ſubſidy allowed to Sweden by this laſt treaty, and the ſquadron ſent to their aſſiſtance, who was no more than had been ſtipulated by former engagements; but that the ſubſidy was not like to be demanded any more, the preliminaries of the peace between the czar of Muſcovy and the crown of Sweden being in a manner ſettled. Neither did the king deſire any new tax for it, the land and malt-tax being ſufficient to anſwer all this year's expence.' Mr Walpole added, 'he was extremely glad, he could at the ſame time acquaint the houſe, that his majeſty's endeavours to procure a general peace had been ſo ſucceſsful, that an advantageous treaty with Spain was actually agreed on and ſigned.' The lord Moleſworth obſerved, 'that he would go as far as any man to maintain and ſupport the honour and dignity of the crown of Great-Britain; but that, on the other hand, he was not for ſquandering away unneceſſaryly the ſmall remainder of the wealth of the nation. That by our late conduct we were become the allies of the whole world, and the bubbles of all our allies; but when we have occaſion for our allies, we are obliged to pay them well: and to that purpoſe he inſtanced in the Dutch troops, that came over to our aſſiſtance in the rebellion in 1715. He added, 'that, as to our alliances with Sweden, it was a matter of great intricacy and nicety, becauſe the treaties which England has in divers times made with Sweden, are partly contradictory.' He then entered into a detail of the treaties of Roſchield and Trevendal made in the reigns of king Charles II. and William III. 'that the engagements lately entered into with the crown of Sweden, were likewiſe, in ſome meaſure, contrary to the treaties ſubſiſting with Denmark; particularly as to the ſecuring to the duke of Holſtein the duchy of Sleſwick; and directly oppoſite to the meaſures formerly concerted with the czar of Muſcovy, in order to engage him to check the fierceneſs and ambition of the late king of Sweden: and therefore, in order to engage the czar to yield what he had gained, it were but juſt, that the king of Pruſſia ſhould give up Stetin, and the elector of Hanover, Bremen and Verden. He owned, that the diſtreſſed condition to which the Swedes had been reduced, was really worthy of compaſſion: but that, on the other hand, it muſt be conſidered, they had been, in great meaſure the authors of their own misfortunes by their tame ſubmiſſion to a deſpotic tyrannical prince, and by ſacrificing their whole ſubſtance to enable him to carry on his unjuſt, raſh, and ambitious deſigns; and that any nation who followed their example, deſerved the ſame fate. To this purpoſe he took notice of the hard uſage of the ſubjects of Mecklenburgh from their prince, which he inſinuated to have been one of the cauſes of the late rupture with the czar; but that, after all, England ought not to intermeddle with the affairs of the empire: that the getting naval ſtores for our ſhipping was the main advantage we reaped from our trading in the Baltic: and he owned, that hemp was a very neceſſary commodity, particularly at this juncture; but that, if due encouragement were given to ſome of our plantations in America, we might be ſupplied from thence at a much cheaper rate than from Sweden and Norway.' Mr Lechmere diſtinguiſhed himſelf alſo on this occaſion; but the ſubſidy was at laſt granted by a majority of 197 againſt 136. A ſupply was alſo given to ſatisfy the owners of the ſhips that were to be burnt, on account of their being ſuſpected to be infectious.

Notwithſtanding this warm debate about the Swediſh ſubſidy, the king ſent, about three weeks after, another meſſage to the commons, relating to the debts of the civil liſt.

'His majeſty finds it neceſſary to acquaint his loyal houſe of commons with the difficulties he labours under, by reaſon of debts contracted in the civil government; which being computed at Lady-day laſt, do amount to more than 550,000l.

If the proviſion, made by an act of the laſt ſeſſion of parliament for diſcharging this debt, had not hitherto proved in a very great degree ineffectual, his majeſty had not been under a neceſſity of applying again to parliament upon this occaſion. But being reſolved to cauſe a retrenchment to be made of his civil liſt expences for the future, and finding that ſuch a retrenchment cannot be well effected, without diſcharging the preſent arrears, has ordered the accounts thereof to be laid before the houſe, and hopes he may be empowered to raiſe ready money for that purpoſe on the civil liſt revenues, which to avoid laying any new burden on his people, his majeſty propoſes ſhall be replaced to the civil liſt, and reimburſed by a deduction to be made out of the ſalaries and wages of all officers, and the penſions, and other payments from the crown.' After the reading of this meſſage, mr. Shippen ſtood up, and made a long ſpeech, wherein he took notice of 'this new and unuſual method of aſking for money, not from the throne, and at the beginning of a ſeſſion, as it had always been the cuſtom in the former reigns; but now, by a meſſage, towards the end of the ſeſſion, when moſt of the members were gone home. Look round about the houſe, gentelman (ſaid he) and ſee how few members are preſent, when a buſineſs of this conſequence is to be debated.' But, beſides the unſeaſonableneſs of the time, he obſeved, 'that this meſſage was no leſs extraordinary as to another circumſtance; for, whereas the ways and means of raiſing ſupplies were always left to the commons, here, not only the ſum, but the way of raiſing it, was pointed out to them, which was making the houſe a perfect parliament of Paris. That if things were brought to that paſs, it might be eaſy for any king, whenever he thought fit, to make himſelf arbitrary and abſolute maſter of our liberties and properties; concluding, he was ſure, that the gentleman who adviſed the aſking for ſuch a ſum in that manner, would have been of a quite contrary mind two years ago; but that it was uſual for men's judgments to alter as their intereſts lead them.' Mr Shippen was anſwered by mr. Walpole, who ſhewed the occaſion and the reaſonableneſs of the king's meſſage, the tenderneſs and regard he expreſſed in it for the eaſe of his ſubjects, and the neceſſity of complying with his deſires. He was ſeconded by mr. Lowndes, who ſaid, that ſix-pence in the pound on all the civil liſt funds would anſwer the purpoſe. But mr. Pulteney and ſir Joſeph Jekyll were of opinion, that it would not do, and therefore moved for one ſhilling in the pound; adding, that, if this were too much for the preſent occaſion, the overplus might go towards the diſcharge of the public debts. Mr Sloper agreed with them, and upon this laſt conſideration moved for one ſhilling and ſix-pence in the pound; and that the tax might extend to all military officers, whoſe pay was above ten ſhillings a day. But this motion was dropped, and after ſome other debates it was at laſt agreed that 500,000l. ſhould be raiſed for the debts of the civil liſt, by a deduction of ſix-pence in the pound out of ſalaries, wages, penſions, and other payments from the crown. For this purpoſe a bill paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent. At the ſame time paſſed alſo an act for a general pardon.

The act for reſtoring public credit was paſſed the 10th of Auguſt, when the king came to the houſe of peers, and concluded the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am glad that the buſineſs of this, and the former ſeſſion, is at length brought to ſuch a period, that I have now an opportunity of giving you ſome receſs, after the great pains you hve taken in the ſervice of the public.

'The common calamity, occaſioned by the wicked execution of the South-ſea ſcheme, was become ſo very great before your meeting, that the providing proper remedies for it was very difficult. But it is a great comfort to me to obſerve, that public credit now begins to recover, which gives me the greateſt hopes, that it will be entirely reſtored, when all the proviſions, you have made for that end, ſhall be duly put in execution.

'I have great compaſſion for the ſufferings of the innocent, and a juſt indignation againſt the guilty; and have readily given my aſſent to ſuch bills, as you have preſented to me, for puniſhing the authors of our late misfortunes; and for obtaining the reſtitution and ſatisfaction due to thoſe, who have been injured by them, in ſuch a manner, as you judge proper. I was at the ſame time willing and deſirous, by my free and general pardon, to give eaſe and quiet to the reſt of my ſubjects, many of whom may, in ſuch a general infatuation, have been unwarily drawn in to tranſgreſs the laws.'

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I return you my hearty thanks for the ſupplies you have granted for the current ſervice of this year, and particularly for your enabling me to diſcharge the debts and arrears on the civil liſt, and to make good the engagements I was under for procuring peace in the north, which in all probability, will now very ſoon be concluded. Theſe inſtances of your faithful endeavours to ſupport the honour and dignity of the crown at home and abroad, are freſh marks of you zeal and affection to my perſon and government.'

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I take this opportunity of acquainting you, that we have renewed all our treaties of commerce with Spain, upon the ſame foot as they were ſettled before the late war, which muſt neceſſarily prove an immediate and valuable advantage to the trade and manufactures of this kingdom.

'I earneſtly recommend to you all, in your ſeveral ſtations, to ſuppreſs profaneneſs and immorality, and to preſerve the peace and quiet of the kingdom.

'You are all ſenſible that the diſcontents occaſioned by the great loſſes that many of my ſubjects have ſuſtained, have been induſtriouſly raiſed and inflamed by malicious and ſeditious libels: but I make no doubt, but that, by your prudent conduct in your ſeveral countries, all the enemies of my government, who flattered themſelves they ſhould be able to take advantage from our misfortunes, and blow up the ſufferings of my people into popular diſcontent and diſaffection, will be diſappointed in their wicked deſigns and expectations.'

The zeal of the parliament deſerved the praiſes beſtowed by the king, for having in great meaſure reſtored the public credit, when under ſuch difficulties, and his thanks, not only for the ſupplies for the ſervice of the year, but for the diſcharge of the civil liſt debts, and the ſubſidy to Sweden. The king was ſenſible of the injurious ſuſpicions raiſed on his account with regard to the South-ſea company: the emperor's refuſal to deliver up mr. Knight, and the favour ſhewn to the directors and their abettors, were conſidered as his work, and greatly increaſed the number of the diſaffected. Hence it was that he ſtrongly expreſſed his apprehenſions, that the enemies to his government would endeavour to blow up the ſufferings of the people into diſcontent, that the members of parliament might be the more zealous to diſappoint their deſigns.

After the ſpeech the parliament was prorogued to the 19th of October.

During thoſe proceedings, ſeveral changes had been made in the miniſtry. Mr Walpole (as has been ſaid) was made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer. [m] The lords Townſhend and Carteret were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate. The earl of Ilay was made privy-ſeal of Scotland, and the earl of Bute a lord of the bedchamber.

Whilſt the parliament was employed in ſettling affairs at home, the king had continued his negotiations abroad, and ended them with ſucceſs.

On the 13th of June, N. S. the treaty of peace between Great-Britain and Spain was ſigned at Madrid. It contained only ſix articles, by which all the regulations with regard to commerce, agreed upon by the former treaties, were renewed; and both the contracting parties promiſed to execute it with the utmoſt ſincerity, and to renounce all interpretations, which had been made uſe of to reſtrain and to weaken theſe conventions. They engaged to reſtore mutually all the effects ſeized and confiſcated on both ſides. His Britannic majeſty, in particular, was to reſtore all the ſhips of the Spaniſh fleet, which had been taken by that of England, in the action near Sicily, with the guns, ſails, rigging, &c. in the ſame condition, in which they then were, or the value of them, if they were ſold.

The deciſion of the other difficulties and pretenſions was referred to the congreſs of Cambray. It was ſtipulated likewiſe, that the publication of this treaty ſhould be deferred till the general peace, which was negotiating at Cambray, or ſome other agreement ſhould be made. It was, however, to take place immediately after its being ratified, and the letters of which ratification were to be exchanged in ſix weeks, or ſooner, if poſſible. To theſe was added a ſecret article, by which king George promiſed not to interfere any longer in the affairs of Italy, and the king of Spain made an abſolute ceſſion of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon.

The ſame day another treaty was ſigned at Madrid, which was little expected: it was a defenſive alliance between Great-Britain, France, and Spain; by which they were to defend the dominions of each other, wherever ſituated, as they were fixed by the treaties of Utrecht, Baden, and London. Each of the allies was to furniſh him, who ſhould have occaſion for aſſiſtance, or be attacked, with 8000 foot and 4000 horſe, or an equivalent in money and ſhips.

One deſign of this alliance was the maintenance and obſervation of the treaty, which was to be made at Cambray, in order to terminate the differences between the emperor and king of Spain.

'Their Britannic, moſt chriſtian, and catholic majeſties (ſaid the fifth article of this treaty) being entirely ſatisfied with the ſentiments, the duke of Parma has always ſhewn towards them, and being deſirous to give him marks of the ſingular eſteem and affection they have for him, promiſe and engage, by virtue of the preſent treaty, to grant him a particular protection for the preſervation of his territories and rights, and for the ſupport of his dignity; ſo that, if he ſhall be diſturbed, they will join their good offices and endeavours to obtain a juſt ſatisfaction; and, if that be refuſed, they will agree upon meaſures to procure it him by all other methods, which ſhall be in their power.'

The States-General were, on the firſt opportunity, to be invited to enter into this treaty; and it was promiſed to maintain the treaty of defenſive alliance, made at the Hague, the 4th of January, 1717, and that nothing ſhould be done, either directly or indirectly, to the prejudice thereof.

The congreſs at Cambray, to which all the difficult points were referred, was at laſt opened. The ambaſſadors of England and France had the title of mediators, and were to terminate the numberleſs differences between the courts of Vienna and Madrid; but they could not ſucceed, the demands on both ſides being ſo oppoſite. The imperial miniſters talked in ſo high and deciſive a ſtrain, that there was no treating with them: 'All the pretenſions of their maſter were inconteſtable, and equity itſelf; to oppoſe or conteſt them, was attacking his ſacred majeſty.' It was thus they expreſſed themſelves, in ſpeaking of the pretenſions of the duke of Parma, who had inſiſted, that the emperor and empire had no right to exerciſe any ſuperiority over the duchies of Parma and Placentia. The imperial miniſters declared, 'they were amazed the duke of Parma ſhould have the aſſurance to draw up ſuch a memorial, and engage the mediators to preſent it to them. It violates (ſaid they) the reſpect due to his imperial majeſty, by denying, he has any ſovereignty over the duke. The mediators ſhould have ſuppreſſed ſuch unreaſonable pretenſions, which they neither could regard, nor had time to diſcuſs. If the duke had any juſt complaints to propoſe, and would repreſent them with reſpect to the imperial court, they would undoubtedly be treated there with equity.'

The mediators anſwered, that the terms uſed by the imperial miniſters were not very becoming between princes: that the memorial in queſtion could not, without cenſure, have been ſuppreſſed: that the duke of Parma had reaſon to apply to the congreſs for juſtice, and that he had not met with ſufficient encouragement, in his repreſentations to the court of Vienna, to addreſs himſelf thither again. To this

[m] The other commiſſioners of the treaſury were Bailie, Turner, Edgecombe, and Pelham. Mr Horatio Walpole was made ſecretary of the treaſury: and Edward Carteret and Galfredus Walpole, poſt-maſter general. Benjamin Mildmay, brother to the lord Fitzwalter, was made a commiſſioner of the exciſe, and Charles Stanhope, treaſurer of the chamber to the king. Hugh Forteſcue was called up to the houſe of Lords by the title of baron Clinton.

it was added, that the negotiations had been always delayed, by continued obſtructions from the plenipotentiaries of the emperor.

With ſuch diſpoſitions, nothing was concluded, and never was congreſs more fruitleſs. To amuſe and ſurpriſe one another was the chief buſineſs; and, when they broke up, they were farther than ever from agreeing.

After the peace with Spain, king George had the ſatisfaction to ſee the tranquillity of Europe reſtored, by a reconciliation between Sweden and Ruſſia. Though this was not done by his mediation, yet, it is certain, the aſſiſtance he had given Sweden, and the peace he had procured between that crown and thoſe of Pruſſia, Denmark, and Poland, had determined the czar to bound his pretenſions, and hearken to an accommodation. As the czar had no quarrel with France, he accepted the mediation of that crown, but abſolutely refuſed to hear of the mediation of Great-Britain.

Sweden was forced to yield up to the czar almoſt all his conqueſts, after the battle of Pultowa; as Livonia, Ingria, Eſtonia, part of Carelia, and of the territory of Wyburg, Riga, Revel, Nerva, &c. and, in return, the czar reſtored only part of Finland, with two millions of rix-dollars, promiſing not to concern himſelf with the regulations of their government.

The czar included in the treaty the king and republic of Poland, and conſented alſo to the including of the king of Great-Britain, in ſuch ſort, that the differences between them ſhould be adjuſted in an amicable manner.

Theſe differences daily increaſed; and, if theſe princes had been neighbours, a war would certainly have enſued. Their enmity was in a great meaſure perſonal. The czar's was founded upon the conduct of king George, who, whilſt only elector of Hanover, had entered into the views of the northern ſtates againſt Sweden, and, after reaping the fruit of that alliance had declared, on all occaſions, againſt Ruſſia. Hence the czar always diſtinguiſhed the king of England from the elector of Hanover, and ſhewed all poſſible regard for the Engliſh, whilſt he endeavoured, by all methods, to annoy their king; and, perhaps he would have ſucceeded, had it not been for the death of Charles XII. That prince and the czar, how much ſoever they were offended with each other, were more ſo with king George, and were going to lay aſide or ſuſpend their reſentments, in order to be revenged. About the time of the king's laſt arrival from Hanover, mr. Baſtugef, the czar's reſident at London, for ſome expreſſions in a memorial, was ordered to depart the kingdom in a fortnight. The czar, in revenge of this affront, took occaſion to publiſh a declaration (which was delivered to the Engliſh factory at Peterſburg, and printed in Holland) in order to raiſe diſcontents in England. The declaration was as follows:

Peterſburg, Jan. 29, 1720-21.

'It is notorious in what an unjuſt and injurious manner, our reſident was ſent away from the court of England; which, having done us a great and ſenſible wrong, ought naturely to have engaged us to uſe repriſals, according to what is practiſed every where elſe. But as we perceive that all this is done without any regard to the intereſt of England, and only in favour of the Hanoverian intereſt; for which the miniſters of Great-Britain not only neglect the friendſhip of foreign powers, but do not even ſpare their own country, which more nearly, and more ſenſibly concern them; we were unwilling that the Engliſh nation, which has no ſhare in that piece of injuſtice, ſhould ſuffer for it; and therefore we grant to them all manner of ſecurity and free liberty to trade in all our dominions.'

Theſe two princes, without mentioning their other qualities, had great talents for negotiation; but king George excelled; for, it muſt be owned, no prince could more wiſely improve any favourable circumſtances to diſconcert his enemy's projects.

Beſides theſe treaties in which king George had ſo great an influence, there was one made with the Moors, and ſigned the 12th of Auguſt. Spain, being then at war with the Moors, loudly complained of the treaty, but without any effect.

This year died pope Clement XI. His name was John Francis Albani, native of Urbino. He had ſat in the papal chair above twenty years. When he was cardinal, he was for his abilities courted by all the powers of Europe, and had a great hand in the will of king Charles II. of Spain. He was revengeful to the laſt degree, inflexible in his reſolutions, and rejected all advice. His greateſt policy was to keep princes at variance. He expreſſed great kindneſs for the pretender. When he found he was going to die, he ſent for the pretender, who being come, he told the cardinals, then in his bed-chamber, that he wanted to ſpeak with him in private; but, one of them repreſenting, that it would redound moſt to his holineſs's honour to deliver his laſt thoughts to him in their preſence, the pope complied, and recommended to them the three following points:

1. To let the pretender reſide conſtantly in the palace which he had aſſigned him.

2. To continue the penſion granted to him, that he may be always enabled to ſupport the royal dignity, till he recover his kingdoms.

3. To oblige the ſucceſſor in the holy ſee, to aſſiſt the pretender in all things againſt the attempts of his enemies.

The cardinals aſſured the pope they would take care to perform the 1ſt and 3d articles; but that, as to the 2d, they would be inexcuſable, if they ſhould continue to exhauſt the treaſure of the church, which was by no means appropriated for the preſervation of one prince alone, but for the defence of the Roman catholic religion in general. To this the pope anſwered, that his ſucceſſor might, with a very ſafe conſcience, draw out ſums from the treaſury for the maintenance of the pretender, becauſe he had been deprived of his dominions for the ſake of the catholic religion; moreover, the pretender himſelf made a very moving ſpeech againſt the inhumanity of abandoning one that was ſo helpleſs: but the cardinals replied, that they would conſider of it, and give their anſwer next day. The pope, acquieſcing therewith, deſired the cardinal d'Althan to engage the emperor to eſpouſe the pretender's intereſt, and not to forſake him in the preſent juncture; but that cardinal begged to be excuſed, and ſhewed, that it was impoſſible to be done, not only on account of ſolemn treaty, but alſo by reaſon of the ſignal ſervices which England did to his imperial majeſty, in the late war againſt the Spaniards.

Clement XI. was ſucceeded by Michael Angelo, of the family of Conti, who took the name of Innocent XIII. in memory of pope Innocent III. the moſt worthy of all the popes choſen from among the cardinals of that family. [n]

On the 15th of April, the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a ſon at Leiceſter-houſe, and, the next day the city of London having preſented the congratulatory addreſs, the king in his anſwer, ſaid, 'I cannot omit taking this opportunity of aſſuring you, that I am truly concerned at the calamity brought upon you by the wicked management of the South-ſea company. I have, however, this comfort, that the report of any part of this misfortune cannot with the leaſt juſtice be imputed to me. Nothing will give me more eaſe and ſatisfaction than the ſeeing you delivered from your preſent ſufferings, your trade revived, and public credit re-eſtabliſhed.' This declaration was thought to be neceſſary, by reaſon of the inſinuations raiſed by the diſaffected.

The young prince was chriſtened the 2d of May: the godfathers were the king of Pruſſia and the duke of York, repreſented by the earl of Grantham and the lord Lumley. The godmother was the queen of Pruſſia, repreſented by the dutcheſs of Dorſet. The young prince was named William Auguſtus, who, this very year 1746, defeated the rebels in Scotland.

The king held, on the 27th of March, a chapter of the order of the garter, to fill up the vacancies occaſioned by the death of the dukes of Rutland and Buckingham. [o] In their room were choſen Charles Fitzroy, duke of Grafton, and Henry Clinton, earl of Lincoln.

The parliament had but one ſeſſion left, ſince the ſeven years expired at Lady-day next. It was propoſed in council to diſſolve the preſent, and call a new parliament; but it was repreſented by the majority, that it would be more expedient to hold another ſeſſion, as farther meaſures were [n] The family of Conti is one of the four chief families of Rome; the other three are thoſe of Colodna, Orſino, and Savelli, which laſt is extinct.

[o] John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, died February 24, 1720-21. He had himſelf made the following epitaph, and ordered it to be engraved on his tomb: but it was not orthodox enough:

Pro Rege ſæpè, pro rebublicâ ſemper, dubius non improbus vixi. Incertus nec perturbatus morior. Chriſtum veneror. In deo confido æterno ac omnipotente. ENS ENTIUM MISERERE MEI.

He was made knight of the garter by king Charles II. and lord-chamberlain by his ſucceſſor: he was always in the oppoſition againſt king William, and made privy-ſeal by queen Anne. Notwithſtanding his dying in a ſtate of uncertainty, as he owned in his epitaph, he had appeared very zealous for the church. He left a ſon by a natural daughter of king James II. who are ſince both dead, and the family extinct.

This year, September 15, died Matthew Prior, for whom a monument was erected in Weſtminſter-abbey.

to be taken towards a perfect reſtoration of the public credit, which another parliament might not ſo readily come into. It had been inſinuated, that a deſign was formed for the continuance of the parliament beyond the next ſeſſion: and ſo far believed, that ſeveral members of the common-council of London demanded, in form, of the lord-mayor, that a council ſhould be ſummoned, in which it was intended to move for an addreſs to the king to thank him for his great care of the trade and commerce with Spain, but principally to expreſs their hopes of his calling frequent and new parliaments. The lord-mayor, perceiving their intentions, refuſed to comply with their requeſts on various pretences. Upon this, they publiſhed an account of their proceedings, with the heads of their intended addreſs, under the artful title of, 'An apology for the citizens of London, for their not addreſſing his majeſty under the preſent circumſtances of affairs.'

The plague raged this year in the ſouthern parts of France, particularly at Marſeilles. On this occaſion a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding any perſon to come into England from any part of France, between the bay of Biſcay and Dunkirk, without certificates of health. The ſtreets were ordered to be paved and kept clean; and an act of parliament paſſed the laſt ſeſſion for prevention of infection, by building of peſt-houſes (to which the infected perſons, or healthy of an infected family, were to be removed) and by ordering trenches or lines to be drawn round any city, town, or place infected. Theſe precautions, appearing to ſome to be unreaſonable, cauſed great debates, as will hereafter be ſeen.

The parliament met on the day appointed, October 19; and the ſeſſion was opened with the following ſpeech from the throne:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I acquainted you, when we parted laſt, with our having renewed all our treaties of commerce with Spain; ſince which, peace is happily reſtored in the north, by the concluſion of the treaty between the czar and the king of Sweden, and by that, which I have made with the Moors, a great number of my ſubjects are delivered from ſlavery; and all ſuch of them, as trade to thoſe parts of the world, are, for the future, ſecured from falling under that dreadful calamity.

'In this ſituation of affairs, we ſhould be extremely wanting to ourſelves, if we neglected to improve the favourable opportunity, which this general tranquility gives us of extending our commerce, upon which the riches and grandeur of this nation chiefly depend. It is very obvious, that nothing would more conduce to the obtaining ſo public a good, than to make the exportation of our own manufactures, and the importation of the commodities, uſed in themanufacturing of them, as practicable and as eaſy as may be preſerved in our favour, our navigation increaſed, and greater numbers of our poor employed.

'I muſt therefore recommend it to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to conſider how far the duties upon theſe branches may be taken off and replaced, without any violation of public faith, or laying any new burthen upon my people. And I promiſe myſelf, that, by a due conſideration of this matter, the produce of thoſe duties, compared with the infinite advantages, that will accrue to the kingdom by their being taken off, will be found ſo inconſiderable, as to leave little room for any difficulties or objections.

'The ſupplying ourſelves with naval ſtores, upon terms the moſt eaſy and leſs precarious, ſeems highly to deſerve the care and attention of parliament. Our plantations in America naturally abound with moſt of the proper materials for this neceſſary and eſſential part of our trade and maritime ſtrength: and if, by due encouragement, we could be furniſhed from thence with thoſe naval ſtores, which we are now obliged to purchaſe and bring from foreign countries, it would not only greatly contribute to the riches, influence, and power of this nation, but, by employing our own colonies in this uſeful and advantageous ſervice, divert them from ſetting up and carrying on manufactures, which directly interfere with thoſe of Great-Britain.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'It will be a great pleaſure to me, if, in raiſing the ſupplies of this year, it may be ſo ordered, that my people may reap ſome immediate benefit from the preſent circumſtances of affairs abroad. I have ordered eſtimates to be prepared for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and likewiſe an account of the debts of the navy to be laid before you. You cannot but be ſenſible of the ill conſequences, that ariſe from ſuch a large debt remaining unprovided for; and that, as long as the navy and victualling bills are at a very high diſcount, they do not only effect all other public credit, but greatly increaſe the charge and expence of the current ſervice. It is therefore very much to be wiſhed, that you could find a method of diſcharging this part of the national debt, which of all others is the moſt heavy and burthenſome; and by that means have it in your power to eaſe your country of ſome part of the taxes, which from an abſolute neceſſity, they have been obliged to pay.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The unſpeakable miſery and deſolation, that has of late raged in ſome parts of Europe, cannot but be a ſuffi ent warning to us, to uſe all poſſible precautions to prevent the contagion from being brought in among us; or, if theſe kingdoms ſhould be viſited with ſuch a fatal calamity, to be in a condition, with the bleſſing of God, to ſtop its farther progreſs. And as all other proviſions will be altogether vain and fruitleſs, if the abominable practice of running goods be not at once totally ſuppreſſed, I moſt earneſtly recommend to you, to let no other conſideration ſtand in competition with a due care of preſerving ſo many thouſand lives.

'The ſeveral affairs which I have mentioned to you, being of the higheſt and moſt immediate concern to the whole kingdom, I doubt not but you will enter into the conſideration of them with that temper, unanimity, and diſpatch, that the neceſſity and importance of them require.'

The king, in his ſpeech, propoſes the affairs to be conſidered; ſhews the beſt manner of extending commerce, and ſupplying naval ſtores: expreſſes his concern for the debts of the navy, and hopes they will be taken care of in the ſupplies for the preſent year: concludes with recommending all poſſible means to prevent the plague, or ſtop the progreſs of its contagion, particularly by providing againſt the practice of ſmuggling.

The addreſſes of thanks were ſuitable to the ſpeech; the king was congratulated upon his ſucceſs for reſtoring the tranquility of Europe, and ſecuring the trade of the nation by treaties: aſſurances were given to proceed to the conſideration of the affairs recommended by him, with temper, unanimity, and diſpatch. Notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances of unanimity, the debates ran very high this ſeſſion, and nothing paſſed without great oppoſition.

One of the firſt debates which happened in the houſe of lords was about the famous mr. Law. He came to England, on the 20th of October, in the fleet under ſir John Norris from the Baltic. Mr Law, after the downfal of the Miſſiſſippi ſtoc, had been forced to leave France, to avoid the reſentment of the enraged people, who had more than once attempted his life. Having ſpent ſome time at Venice, and paid a viſit to the pretender at Rome, people were not a little ſurpriſed, ſome time after, to hear, that he was gone to Hanover, from whence he deſigned ſhortly to come into England. He was brought up to London by a lord, with whom he had negotiated for great parcels of South-ſea ſtoc; was privately admitted at court; and having taken a houſe in Conduit-ſtreet, near Hanover-ſquare, he was, for ſome days, viſited by great numbers of perſons of quality and diſtinction. This gave ſo much umbrage, that on the 26th of October, earl Coningſby repreſented to the houſe of lords how dangerous it might be, on ſeveral accounts, to entertain and countenance ſuch a man as mr. Law; and a day being, at his motion, appointed to conſider of that matter, the earl ſaid, 'that he (the earl) could not but entertain ſome jealouſy of a perſon, who had done ſo much miſchief in a neighbouring kingdom, and who being ſo immenſely rich, as he was reported to be, might do a great deal more hurt here, by tampering with any, who were grown deſperate, by being involved in the calamity occaſioned by the fatal imitation of his pernicious projects. That this perſon was the more dangerous, in that he had renounced, not only his natural affection to his country, and his allegiance to his lawful ſovereign, by being naturalized in France, and openly countenancing the pretender's friends, but, which was worſt of all, he had alſo renounced his God, by turning Roman catholic; concluding, that they ought to enquire, whether ſir John Norris had orders to bring him over?' The lord Carteret anſwered, 'that mr. Law had many years ago, the misfortune to kill a gentleman in a duel; but that, having at laſt, received the benefit of the king's clemency, and the appeal lodged by the relations of the deceaſed being taken off, he was come over to plead his majeſty's pardon. That there was no law to keep any Engliſhman out of his country; and as mr. Law was a ſubject of Great-Britain, it was not even in the king's power to hinder him from coming over, if he thought fit.' To this the Lord Trevor replied, 'that mr. Law was indeed a ſubject of Great-Britain, and, therefore, as ſuch, had an undoubted right to come hither; but the circumſtances of a perſon of his character being brought on board an Engliſh admiral, and at this juncture of time, might deſerve the conſideration of that houſe.' Earl Cowper ſpoke much to the ſame effect: but, however, the affair was dropped, and mr. Law, attended by the duke of Argyle and the earl of Ilay, pleaded his pardon at the King's-bench according to form.

The navy debt, which was increaſed to 1,700,000l. and of which the conſideration had been recommended from the throne, occaſioned great debates in both houſes. Mr Freeman, in the houſe of commons, reflected with ſome warmth upon the perſons concerned in that part of the adminiſtration, ſaying, 'it was matter of wonder, how ſo great a debt could be incurred, when the parliament had provided what had been deſired upon that head.' Mr Shippen hinted, 'that ſuch extraordinary expences could not be for the immediate ſervice of Great-Britain, but in all probability, for the preſervation of ſome foreign acquiſitions.' Sir Joſeph Jekyll ſaid, 'that he was not againſt providing for any juſt public debt; but that, in his opinion, they could not anſwer it, either to themſelves, or thoſe they had the honour to repreſent, if they gave away the nation's money blindfold; and therefore he deſired, that the houſe might be informed, how ſo great a debt had been contracted?' To this mr. Walpole replied, 'nothing in the world was more reaſonable; and therefore he backed the motion, for having a particular account of that debt laid before the houſe; but, in the mean time, he might aſſure them, that near 1,100,000l. of it was contracted in the laſt reign; and as the perſons now in the adminiſtration were not anſwerable for that part, neither did they deſire, that above one million of it ſhould be this year provided for.' This was agreed to without dividing.

The ſame affair was more warmly debated in the houſe of lords: when a ſurpriſe was expreſſed, how the navy debt came to be ſo large, it was anſwered (as in the houſe of commons) that near two-thirds of the debt had been contracted in the laſt reign, of which the proofs were ready. Upon this the earl of Rocheſter ſaid, 'that, ſince the debt was incurred, it was but juſtice, that they, who truſted the government, ſhould be paid; but, on the other hand, it became the wiſdom of that houſe to endeavour to prevent the like for the future, and to reſtore the navy on the ancient foot, that is, not to exceed the expences provided for by parliament.' And moved for an addreſs to that purpoſe. This was oppoſed by the earl of Ilay, who urged, 'that the public good, and the ſafety of the nation, being the grand object and rule of government, ſome latitude muſt of neceſſity be given, and allowance made to thoſe who are in the adminiſtration, for extraordinary expences, upon unforeſeen exigences. And therefore, if the miniſters, as they had promiſed it, gave the houſe a ſatisfactory account how the debt in queſtion came to be contracted, there was, in his opinion, no occaſion for ſuch an addreſs.' The lord-chancellor Parker and others ſpeaking on the ſame ſide, the motion for an addreſs was rejected by 64 voices (among which was the lord Harcourt's, who had been lately made a viſcount) againſt 22.

In ſeveral other debates on this affair, it was urged, 'that the navy debt was increaſed by employing more ſeamen than were provided for by parliament, particularly by ſending large fleets to the Baltic and Mediterranean, and keeping the ſailors in pay during the winter: that theſe expences were not neceſſary for the ſervice of Great-Britain, and therefore it was proper to have all the papers relating to the northern tranſactions, particularly the lord Carteret's private inſtructions, laid before the houſe, in order to have full ſatisfaction concerning the grounds of theſe expeditions, and to ſee whether the act of ſettlement had been no ways infringed by them, a point of the utmoſt conſequence to the preſent eſtabliſhment. To this it was anſwered, that the employing more ſeamen for ſeveral years, than were provided for by parliament, was occaſioned by ſervices which either were purſuant to the previous advice, or had the ſubſequent approbation of one or both houſes, and were alſo neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, and tranquility of Europe: that, the nature of theſe ſervices detaining the ſquadrons till the months of November, or December, the paying off the ſeamen was inconſiſtent with having the ſhips ready to ſail early in the ſpring, and nothing would be ſaved by it. By a great majority it was voted, that lord Carteret's private inſtructions ſhould not be addreſſed for, and that the ſending a ſquadron to the Baltic did no way break into the act of ſettlement.

The affairs of Spain in the north were ſo equally concerned in the increaſe of the naval debt, that the enquiry into the one naturally led to the enquiry into the other. The debate was opened by the duke of Wharton, who animadverted upon the conduct of the miniſters, both as to the war and peace with Spain, and moved that the treaty with that crown might be laid before the houſe. The earl of Sunderland ſaid, 'he did not doubt but his majeſty would be always ready to comply with the deſires of that houſe, and even in this particular, as well as in others; but that, for his part, he would be ſo free as to declare his judgment againſt adviſing his majeſty to communicate the treaty in queſtion at this juncture, becauſe, to his knowledge, there was in it a ſecret article, which the king of Spain had deſired might not be made public, till after the treaty of Cambray was over; and, his majeſty having granted that requeſt, he therefore hoped that houſe would not deſire his majeſty to break his promiſe.' Upon this the duke of Wharton's motion was rejected by a majority of 59 voices againſt 22. In another debate the earl of Strafford ſuggeſted, 'that as the war with Spain was undertaken without neceſſity, or a juſt provocation, ſo the peace was concluded without any benefit or advantage. That, contrary to the law of nations, the Spaniſh fleet was fallen upon without any declaration of war, and even while a Britiſh miniſter and a ſecretary of ſtate were amicably treating at Madrid; ſo that the Spaniards might think themſelves ſecure from any hoſtilities. And as the manner of beginning the war did not appear juſtifiable, ſo neither could the war itſelf be eaſily reconciled with ſound politics, ſince it was an interruption to one of the moſt valuable branches of our trade, and at a time when the nation groaned under the preſſure of heavy debts, occaſioned by a former long expenſive war: concluding with a motion for an addreſs to his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to cauſe the inſtructions, that were given to ſir George Byng (now lord Torrington) to be laid before the houſe.' But as the motion for the treaty, ſo this for the inſtructions of ſir George Byng, was upon the queſtion rejected by a majority of 67 againſt 24. A proteſt was entered, repreſenting, that a motion for the admiral's inſtructions had never been denied; that, without a ſight of the lord Torrington's inſtructions, the war with Spain, in which the action in the Mediterranean involved us, did not appear juſtifiable, and was plainly prejudicial to the nation, as it interrupted our commerce with Spain, and occaſioned a ſtrict union between the French and Spaniſh crowns, which it was the intereſt of Great-Britain to have kept always divided. Nor did it appear that Great-Britain reaped any fruits from that war.

After this it was moved, that the houſe would enquire what were become of the ſhips taken from the Spaniards, and how they were diſpoſed of, and an addreſs for that purpoſe was voted.

[1721-22] The debates on the navy debt being put off for three weeks, a proteſt (Feb. 19,) was entered againſt it, in which the ſeveral particulars that were deſigned to be proceeded upon, were ſpecified, but they were afterwards expunged by an order of the houſe.

The bill to prevent infection from the plague cauſed likewiſe long and warm debates in the houſe of lords. Earl Cowper moved, 'that a clauſe might be added to the bill for repealing ſo much of the late quarentine act, as impowers the government to remove to a lazaret, or peſt-houſe, any perſon whatſoever, infected with the plague, or healthy perſons out of an infected family from their habitations; and alſo ſo much of the act, as gives power for the drawing lines or trenches round any city, town, or place infected. He repreſented, that theſe powers were altogether unknown to our conſtitution, inconſiſtent with the lenity of our free government, ſuch as could never be wiſely or uſefully put in practice; and the more odious, becauſe they ſeemed to be copied from the arbitrary government of France, and could not be executed but by military force.' The earl alſo oppoſed the forcing perſons to accept of nurſes and phyſicians appointed by government. Though the repeal of the obnoxious clauſes in the quarentine act, met with much oppoſition, and a petition from the city of London, for that purpoſe, had been rejected by the lords: yet an act paſſed at laſt for repealing the clauſes for removing perſons to peſt-houſes, and drawing lines round any city or town that was infected.

The mutiny and deſertion bill occaſioned the uſual diſputes about the army. The lord Trevor opened the debate with a long ſpeech, wherein he excepted againſt the cauſes for puniſhing ſoldiers with death for deſertion, and for exempting them from being arreſted for debt. He urged, 'that the exerciſe of the martial law in time of peace was unknown, and repugnant to our conſtitution: that ſuch a law was indeed neceſſary during the late rebellion; but, there being at preſent no ſuch reaſon, and all being perfectly quiet and eaſy under his majeſty's mild government, the puniſhment of offences committed by the ſoldiery ought to be left to the civil magiſtrate: and that, on the other hand, it was unreaſonable to grant ſoldiers a protection from their lawful creditors, ſince a great many poor people, who might be drawn in to truſt them, might be ruined.' After a warm debate, the bill paſſed without any alteration or reduction of the forces.

There was at this time great clamour againſt the French building and buying ſhips in England. Some were built for them at Briſtol, and more at London. When this matter was conſidered in the houſe of lords, it was ſuggeſted, 'that the practice of building ſhips for foreigners might be attended with very ill and dangerous conſequences; for, as ſuch foreigners, though at preſent in amity with us, may yet, one time or other, become our enemies, they will, in ſuch a caſe, make uſe of thoſe very ſhips to fight againſt us: beſides this general conſideration, the preſent great ſcarcity of timber in England made ſuch a practice ſo much the more unjuſtifiable, eſpecially if it was conſidered what a great number of ſhips had lately been built for the French, ſome of which were ſixty or ſeventy gun ſhips.' To this it was anſwered, 'that they knew of no law in being to hinder any ſhip-carpenter from working for any one, that would employ him. That the French, though now in amity, may indeed be one day our enemies; but yet, if they built not here ſuch ſhips as they have occaſion for, they might get them built in Holland or at Hamburgh; and they were of opinion, that it was better for us to get their money than our neighbours: that indeed, if we could hinder the French from building ſhips at all, it would be prudent to do it; but ſince they can have them in other places, our prohibiting them to buy them here would rather be detrimental than advantageous to us.' After ſome other ſpeeches, it was agreed to conſult the judges. Upon which, chief-juſtice Pratt, in the name of all the judges preſent (except baron Montague, who deſired farther time to conſider of it, before he gave his opinion) declared, 'that they knew of no law, whereby the king was impowered to hinder any of his ſubjects from building ſhips for any one, that would employ them, whether natives or foreigners.' Earl Cooper ſaid, if there was no ſuch law, it was high time there ſhould be one, to put a ſtop to ſuch a pernicious practice for the future; and therefore moved, that the judges be ordered to bring in a bill for that purpoſe. But, after ſome diſputes about certain proviſoes, the conſideration of the bill was put off and never more reſumed.

The quakers having petitioned the commons for leave to bring in a bill for taking out their ſolemn affirmation the words, 'in the preſence of Almighty God,' a bill paſſed the houſe for that purpoſe, and was ſent up to the lords, where it occaſioned a debate. The biſhop of Rocheſter having, among other things, ſaid, 'He did not know why ſuch a diſtinguiſhing indulgence, as was intended by this bill, ſhould be allowed to a ſet of people, who were hardly chriſtians.' The earl of Ilay anſwered, 'he wondered that reverend prelate ſhould call in queſtion, whether the quakers were chriſtians, ſince they were ſo, at leaſt by act of parliament, being included in the Toleration act, under the general denomination of proteſtant diſſenters. The biſhop replied, 'It was againſt the ſtanding orders of that auguſt aſſembly to make any perſonal reflections; and he thought it a much greater indecency to make a jeſt of any thing, that was ſacred; and that the calling the quakers chriſtians, by act of parliament, was a ſort of ſide-wind reflections upon chriſtianity itſelf; however, he would let that paſs, and reſerve to another opportunity what he had to offer againſt the bill. Accordingly, he afterwards endeavoured to prove the quakers were no chriſtians, and was ſeconded and ſupported by the earl of Strafford, lord North and Grey, and the archbiſhop of York. When the bill was committed, a petition from ſome of the London clergy was preſented by the archbiſhop of York, ſetting forth, 'that, the bill might, in its conſequences, nearly affect the property of the ſubject in general, ſo it would in a more eſpecial manner, indanger the legal maintenance of the clergy by tythes, inaſmuch as the people called quakers pretend to deny the payment of tythes upon a principle of conſcience: and therefore might be under ſtrong inducements to eaſe their conſciences in that reſpect, by violating them in another, when their ſimple affirmation, on behalf of friends of the ſame perſuaſion, ſhall paſs in all courts of judicature for legal evidence. However, that the injuries, which the petitioners in their private affairs might poſſibly ſuffer, were as they ought to be, of ſmall account with them in compariſon of the miſchiefs which might redound to ſociety from the indulgence intended, as it ſeemed to imply, that juſtice may be duly adminiſtered, and government ſupported, without the intervention of any ſolemn appeal to God as a witneſs of the truth of what is ſaid by all perſons, in all caſes of great importance to the common welfare; whereas the petitioners were firmly perſuaded, that an oath was inſtituted by God himſelf, as the ſureſt bond of fidelity among men, and hath been eſteemed, and found to be ſo by the wiſdom and experience of all nations in all ages. But that what chiefly moved the petitioners to apply to their lordſhips ſerious concern, leſt the minds of good men ſhould be grieved and wounded, and the enemies of chriſtianity triumph, when they ſhould ſee ſuch condeſcenſions made by a chriſtian legiſlature to a ſet of men, who renounce the divine inſtitutions of Chriſt; particularly that, by which the faithful are initiated into his religion, and denominated chriſtians; and who cannot, on this account, according to the uniform judgment and practice of the catholic church, be deemed worthy of that ſacred name. The petitioners moreover repreſented, that, upon the beſt information they could get, the inſtances wherein any quaker had refuſed the ſolemn affirmation preſcribed by an act in the 7th and 8th years of William III. had from the paſſing that act to that day, been exceeding rare; ſo that there might be ground to hope, that the continued uſe of the ſaid ſolemn affirmation would, by degrees, have entirely cured that people of all thoſe unreaſonable prejudices againſt an oath, which the favour deſigned them by the bill might tend to ſtrengthen and confirm. And the petitioners humbly left it to their lordſhips wiſe deliberations, whether ſuch an extraordinary indulgence, granted to a people already, as is conceived, too numerous, might not contribute to multiply their ſect, and tempt perſons to profeſs themſelves quakers in order to be exempted from the obligation of oaths, and to ſtand upon a foot of privilege, not allowed to the beſt chriſtians in the kingdom.'

The receiving and reading of this petition was warmly oppoſed, and, the queſtion being at laſt put, it was rejected. All the biſhops preſent, except the two archbiſhops, the biſhops of Oxford, (Potter) Litchfield and Coventry, (Hough) and Rocheſter, were againſt the petition. The biſhop of Saliſbury endeavoured to mitigate the matter, and propoſed, that the petitiones might have leave to withdraw their petition; but this was oppoſed by the earl of Sunderland, who ſaid, that a committee ought to be appointed to enquire into the authors and promoters of it, for he looked upon it to be no better than a libel. The lord Townſhend took notice of the irregular way, in which the petition was preſented, for, if it was a petition of the London clergy, it ought to be offered either by the biſhop of that dioceſe, or the archbiſhop of Canterbury; whereas it was preſented by the archbiſhop of York, who was metropolitan of another province. However, a proteſt was entered by ſeveral lords and biſhops againſt rejecting the petition. After this, the archbiſhop of Canterbury moved, that the quakers affirmation might not be admitted in courts of judicature, but among themſelves; and the archbiſhop of York moved for a clauſe, that the quakers affirmation ſhould not go in any ſuit at law for tythes: but, after ſome farther debate, the bill was gone through, and ſent bac to the commons; but a proteſt was entered againſt it by ſeveral lords and biſhops.

As nothing had paſſed without being proteſted againſt, the earl of Sunderland, towards the end of the ſeſſion, took notice, 'that the privilege of entering proteſts had, of late, been ſo much abuſed, that, in his opinion, ſome reſtraint ought to be put to it by limiting the time for entering proteſts upon aſking leave of the houſe, which was never denied: and therefore he moved, that ſuch lords, as ſhall enter their proteſtations with reaſons ſhall do the ſame before two o'clock the next ſitting day, and ſign them before the houſe riſes.' This was oppoſed by the lord Cowper, who alledged, 'that, the time being ſo ſhort, and very few lords coming ſo early, ſuch an order would in effect put an end to all proteſting, which was an ancient privilege of that houſe.' The biſhop of Rocheſter added, 'that if proteſts were limited to ſo ſhort a time, this was at leaſt the way to have them crude and indigeſted: and he thought it unbecoming the dignity of that auguſt aſſembly to have any thing entered upon their journals, which were records for after ages, before it had been duly conſidered, and well digeſted.' However, it was reſolved, that it ſhould be a ſtanding order of the houſe (inſtead of the order of the 5th of March, 1641) that ſuch lords, as ſhall enter their proteſtations with reaſon, ſhall do the ſame before two o'clock the next ſitting day, and ſign them before the houſe riſes.

The commons, after having granted the neceſſary ſupplies, brought in a bill for ſecuring the freedom of elections of members of parliament. Great debates aroſe about ſeveral clauſes that were offered to be inſerted in the bill; particularly, that no officer of the cuſtoms or exciſe ſhould vote at any election for parliament men. This was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, as taking away from thoſe officers their birth-right, as Engliſhmen and freeholders; upon which that clauſe was dropped. Another was propoſed, that no perſon, who did not pay ſcot and lot, ſhould have a vote in a corporation. This was alſo oppoſed, 'becauſe (as it was urged) it had already been adjudged at committees of elections, and agreed to by the houſe in ſeveral caſes, that ſuch perſons, in ſome places ſhould have no votes; and in other places they ſhould be allowed to vote, provided they did not receive alms from the pariſh.' As this clauſe was not inſiſted upon, the bill paſſed, and was ſent up to the lords. The earl of Sunderland endeavoured to ſhew the impoſſibility of the ſeveral clauſes of the bill being put in execution, without expoſing the moſt innocent perſons to the guilt of perjury. After ſeveral ſpeeches on both ſides, the bill was rejected by 48 voices againſt 30.

An act paſſed this ſeſſion, to enable the South-ſea company to diſpoſe of the effects in their hands by way of lottery or ſubſcription, in order to pay the debts of the company. By a clauſe in this bill, the South-ſea company were impowered to ſell 200,000l. a year of their capital ſtoc for the ſame purpoſe. Another act paſſed, to prolong the times for hearing and determining claims upon the eſtates of the South-ſea directors, and of mr. Aiſlabie and mr. Craggs.

On the 7th of March, the buſineſs of the ſeſſion being over, the king came to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the parliament, with the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'You could not have given me a more acceptable inſtance of your zeal and affection, than by diſpatching, with ſo much unanimity, the ſeveral particulars I recommended to you at the beginning of this ſeſſion, for the eaſe and advantage of my people.

'The many and great encouragements you have given to our trade and manufactures, and the proviſion you have made for our being ſupplied with naval ſtores from our own plantations, will, I make no doubt, excite the induſtry of my ſubjects, employ a greater number of the poor, increaſe our navigation, and be a conſiderable addition to the riches and ſtrength of this nation.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'The raiſing the current ſupplies of the year, and the making a proviſion for the diſcharge of ſo conſiderable a part of the debt of the navy, is a farther proof of your affection to me, and your regard for the public; and your doing it, in a manner ſo little burthenſome to my people, gives me the greateſt ſatisfaction.

My Lords and Gentleman,

'I cannot in juſtice part with this parliament, without returning you my ſincereſt thanks for your ſteady and reſolute adherence to my perſon and government, and to the intereſt of the proteſtant cauſe both at home and abroad. The enemies of our happy conſtitution have given the ſtrongeſt and moſt honourable teſtimony of your behaviour in theſe particulars, by the implacable malice, which they have, upon all occaſions, expreſſed againſt you.

'You muſt all be ſenſible, that they are at this juncture reviving with the greateſt induſtry, the ſame wicked arts of calumny and defamation, which have been the conſtant preludes to public troubles and diſorders: and ſuch is their infatuation, that they flatter themſelves, the groſſeſt miſrepreſentations will turn to their advantage, and give them an opportunity of recommending themſelves to the favour and good opinion of my people. But I have ſo juſt a confidence in the affection of my ſubjects, and in their regard for their own welfare, that I am perſuaded they will not ſuffer themſelves to be thus impoſed upon, and betrayed into their own deſtruction.

'For my part, as the preſervation of the conſtitution in church and ſtate ſhall always be my care, I am firmly determined to continue to countenance ſuch, as have manifeſted their zeal for the preſent eſtabliſhment, and have the religious and civil rights of all my ſubjects truly at heart; and I queſtion not but that behaviour, which has juſtly recommended them to me will effectually ſecure to them the good-will of all that are well-affected to my government, and will convince the world, that the expectations of thoſe are very ill grounded, who hope to prevail with a proteſtant free people, to give up their religion and liberties into the hands of ſuch as are enemies unto both.'

After this ſpeech the parliament was prorogued to the 15th of March, but, on the 10th, a proclamation was publiſhed to diſſolve the parliament, and, three days after, another for calling a new one.

[1722] Soon after the diſſolution of the parliament, died Charles Spencer, earl of Sunderland, whoſe abilities as a miniſter were indiſputable, but who expoſed himſelf to great odium by the violence of his temper, and the ſhare he was thought to have had in the South-ſea ſcheme; and in the latter part of his life it is thought, upon good grounds, that he had entered into correſpondences and deſigns, which would have been fatal to the public.

His death was followed in leſs than a month by that of his father-in-law the duke of Marlborough, whoſe character has been given in the former part of this hiſtory.[p] He was

Ambaſſador extraordinary and Plenipotentiary
To the ſtates-general of the united provinces.

The duke contracted ſeveral alliances before the death of king William. He confirmed and improved theſe. He contracted others, after the acceſſion of Queen Anne; and re-united the confederacy, which had been diſſolved at the end of a former war, in a ſtricter and firmer league.

Captain-general and commander in chief Of the forces of Great-Britain.

The duke led to the field the army of the allies. He took with ſurprizing rapidity Venlo, Ruremonde, Stevenſwaert, Liege. He extended and ſecured the frontiers of the Dutch. The enemies, whom he found inſulting at the gates of Nimweghen, were driven to ſeek for ſhelter behind their lines. He forced Bonne, Huy, and Limbourge in another campaign. He opened the communication of the Rhine, as well as the Maes. He added all the country between theſe rivers to his former conqueſts. The arms of France, favoured by the defection of the elector of Bavaria, had penetrated into the heart of the empire. This mighty body lay expoſed to immediate ruin. In that memorable criſis, the duke of MARLBOROUGH led his troops with unexampled celerity, order, from the ocean to the Danube. He ſaw; he attacked; nor ſtopped, but to conquer the enemy. He forced the Bavarians, ſuſtained by the French, in their ſtrong intrenchments at Schellenberg. He paſſed the Danube. A ſecond royal army, compoſed of the beſt troops of France, was ſent to reinforce the firſt. That of the confederates was divided. With one part of it the ſiege of Ingolſtadt was carried on. With the other the duke gave battle to the united ſtrength of France and Bavaria. On the ſecond day of Auguſt, 1704, he gained a more glorious victory than the hiſtories of any age can boaſt. The heaps of ſlain were dreadful proofs of his valour. A marſhal of France, whole legions of French, his priſoners, proclaimed his mercy. Bavaria was ſubdued. Ratiſbon, Augſburgh, Ulm, Meminghen, all the uſurpations of the enemy, were recovered. The liberty of the diet, the peace of the empire, were reſtored. From the Danube the duke turned his victorious arms toward the [p] It may not be improper to inſert here the monumental inſcription on the pillar in the park, before the caſtle of Blenheim, which enumerates the duke of Marlborough's exploits in a plain, elegant, and maſculine ſtyle:

The caſtle of Blenheim was founded by Q. Anne.
In the fourth year of her reign;
In the year of the chriſtian æra 1705;
A monument deſigned to perpetuate the memory of the ſignal victory
Obtain'd over the French and Bavarians,
Near the village of Blenheim,
On the banks of the Danube,
By JOHN duke of MARLBOROUGH;
The hero not only of his nation, but of his age;
Whoſe glory was equal in the council and in the field;
Who by wiſdom, juſtice, candour, and addreſs,
Reconciled various and even oppoſite intereſts;
Acquired an influence, which no rank, no authority can give,
Nor any force but that of ſuperior virtue;
Became the fixed important center,
Which united in one common cauſe
The principal ſtates of Europe;
Who by military knowledge, and irreſiſtible valour,
In a long ſeries of uninterrupted triumphs,
Broke the power of France,
When raiſed the higheſt, when exerted the moſt;
Reſcued the empire from deſolation;
Aſſerted and confirmed the liberties of Europe.

Philip, a grandſon of the houſe of France, united to the intereſts, directed by the policy, ſupported by the arms of that crown, was placed on the throne of Spain. King William the third beheld this formidable union of two great, and once rival, monarchies. At the end of a life ſpent in defending the liberties of Europe, he ſaw them in their greateſt danger. He provided for their ſecurity, in the moſt effectual manner. He took the duke of Marlborough into his ſervice.

interred the 9th of Auguſt, with great funeral pomp, in Weſtminſter-Abbey; and was ſucceeded as maſter-general of the ordnance, and colonel of the firſt regiment of foot-guards by the earl of Cadogan.

The elections for members of parliament were carried on with great zeal on both ſides; but the majority of the elected was clearly in favour of the court; as was likewiſe that of the ſixteen Scots peers, who were the dukes of Montroſe and Roxburgh, the Marquis of Tweedale, the earls of Sutherland, Rothes, Loudon, Haddington, Buchan, Selkirk, Orkney, Stairs, Deloraine, Ilay, Hoptoun, Bute, and Aberdeen. [q]

It was king George's lot to meet with continual diſturbances. The affair of the South-ſea and the favour ſhewn to the managers of that ſcheme, had raiſed great diſcontents. It was natural for the enemies of his perſon and government to improve ſuch a juncture: accordingly they did ſo, and, though without hope of any foreign aſſiſtance, they imagined it poſſible to ſucceed in their deſigns, unleſs prevented by a diſcovery. The king had ſome ſuſpicion of a plot, which he had intimated in his ſpeech to both houſes, but preſently after his ſuſpicions were turned into certainty. In the beginning of May he had full information of a conſpiracy formed againſt him, the firſt notice of which came from the duke of Orleans.

Upon this information, a camp was marked out in Hyde-park, to which the troops of the king's houſehold marched the next day. Orders were iſſued to all military officers immediately to repair to their reſpective commands. Lieutenant-general Maccartney was diſpatched to Ireland, to bring over ſome troops from thence into the weſt of England. Meſſengers were ſent to Scotland to ſecure ſome ſuſpected perſons; and mr. Horace Walpole, who ſome days before, went over to Holland, was inſtructed to deſire the ſtates, to keep in readineſs the guarantee troops, in order to be ſent into England in caſe of neceſſity. On the other hand, colonel Churchill was ſent to the court of France, with a private commiſſion, probably to ſee how far the aſſurances from thence were to be depended upon. By theſe precautions the public tranquility was preſerved in Great-Britain. However, the apprehenſions of the plot did not a little affect public credit; for, on May the 7th, South-ſea ſtoc fell from 90 to 77; and the timorous or diſaffected began a run upon the bank. But a few days after, the funds gradually roſe to their former value.

To authorize theſe precautions, and ſound the temper of the people, the lord Townſhend writ the following letter to the lord-mayor of London:

My Lord, Whitehall, May 8, 1722.

'His majeſty having nothing more at heart than the peace and ſafety of his good city of London, the protection of its inhabitants, and the ſupport of public credit, has commanded me to acquaint your lordſhip, that he has received repeated and unqueſtionable advices, that ſeveral of his ſubjects, forgetting the allegiance they owe to his majeſty, as well as the natural love they ought to bear to their country, have entered into a wicked conſpiracy, in concert with traitors abroad, for raiſing a rebellion in this kingdom in favour of a popiſh pretender, with a traiterous deſign to overthrow our excellent conſtitution both in church and ſtate, and to ſubject a proteſtant free people to tyranny and ſuperſtition; but I am perſuaded, that it will be a great ſatisfaction to your lordſhip and the city to find, that, at the ſame time I am ordered to inform you of this deſign, I am likewiſe commanded by his majeſty to let you know, that he is firmly aſſured, that the authors of it neither are, nor will be ſupported, nor even countenanced by any foreign power. And as his majeſty has had timely notice of their wicked machinations, and has made the proper diſpoſitions for defeating them, he has no reaſon to doubt, but by the continuance of the bleſſing of Almighty God, and the ready aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects, this effort of the malice of his enemies will he turned to their own confuſion.

'His majeſty makes no doubt, but your lordſhip, purſuant to the truſt repoſed in you, will, in conjunction with Rhine, and the Moſelle. Landau, Treves, Traerbach were taken. In the courſe of one campaign the very nature of the war was changed. The invaders of other ſtates were reduced to defend their own. The frontier of France was expoſed in its weakeſt part to the efforts of the allies.

That he might improve his advantage, that he might puſh the ſum of things to a ſpeedy deciſion, the duke of MARLBOROUGH led his troops early in the following year once more to the Moſelle. They, whom he had ſaved a few months before, neglected to ſecond him now. They, who might have been his companions in conqueſt, refuſed to join him. When he ſaw the generous deſigns he had formed fruſtrated by private intereſt, by pique, by jealouſy, he returned with ſpeed to the Maes. He returned; and victory returned with him. Liege was relieved; Huy re-taken; the French, who had preſſed the army of the ſtates-general with ſuperior numbers, retired behind intrenchments, which they deemed impregnable. The duke forced theſe intrenchments, with inconſiderable loſs, on the ſeventh day of July, 1705. He defeated a great part of the army, which defended them. The reſt eſcaped by a precipitate retreat. If advantages proportionable to this ſucceſs were immediately obtained, let the failure be aſcribed to that misfortune which attends moſt confederacies, a diviſion of opinions, where one alone ſhould judge; a diviſion of powers, where one alone ſhould command. The diſappointment itſelf did honour to the duke. It became the wonder of mankind how he could do ſo much under thoſe reſtraints, which had hindered him from doing more.

Powers more abſolute were given him afterwards. The increaſe of his powers multiplied his victories. At the opening of the next campaign when all his army was not yet aſſembled, when it was hardly known that he had taken the field, the noiſe of his triumphs was heard over Europe. On the 12th of May, 1706, he attacked the French at Ramillies. In the ſpace of two hours, the whole army was put to flight. The vigour and conduct with which he improved this ſucceſs, were equal to thoſe, with which he gained it. Louvain, Bruſſels, Malines, Liere, Ghent, Oudenard, Antwerp, Damme, Bruges, Courtray ſurrendered. Oſtend, Menin, Dendermond, Aeth were taken. Brabant and Flanders were recovered. Places which had reſiſted the greateſt generals for months, for years; provinces, diſputed for ages, were the conqueſts of a ſummer. Nor was the duke content to triumph alone. Sollicitous for the general intereſt, his care extended to the remoteſt ſcenes of the war. He choſe to leſſen his own army, that he might enable the leaders of other armies to conquer. To this it muſt be aſcribed that Turin was relieved, the duke of Savoy re-inſtated, the French driven with confuſion out of Italy.

Theſe victories gave the confederates an opportunity of carrying the war, on every ſide, into the dominions of France. But ſhe continued to enjoy a kind of peaceful neutrality in Germany. From Italy ſhe was once alarmed, and had no more to fear. The entire reduction of this power whoſe ambition had cauſed, whoſe ſtrength ſupported the war, ſeemed reſerved for him alone, who had ſo triumphantly begun the glorious work.

The barrier of France, on the ſide of the Low-countries, had been forming for more than half a century. What art, power, expence could do, had been done to render it impenetrable. Yet here ſhe was moſt expoſed; for here the duke of MARLBOROUGH threatened to attac her.

To cover what they had gained by ſurprize, or had been yielded to them by treachery, the French marched to the banks of the Schelde. At their head were the princes of the blood, and their moſt fortunate general, the duke of Vendoſme. Thus commanded, thus poſted, they hoped to check the victor in his courſe. Vain were their hopes. The duke of MARLBOROUGH paſſed the river in their ſight. He defeated their whole army. The approach of night concealed, the proximity of Ghent favoured their flight. They neglected nothing to repair their loſs; to defend their frontier. New generals, new armies, appeared in the Netherlands. All contributed to enhance the glory, none were able to retard the progreſs of the confederate arms.

Liſle, the bulwark of this barrier, was beſieged. A numerous garriſon and a marſhal of France defended the place. Prince Eugene of Savoy commanded, the duke of MARLBOROUGH covered and ſuſtained the ſiege. The rivers were ſeized, and the communication with Holland interrupted. The duke opened new communications with great labour and much greater art. Through countries, over-run by the enemy, the neceſſary convoys arrived in ſafety. One alone was attacked. The troops which attacked it, were beat. The defence of Liſle was animated by aſſurances of relief.

The French aſſembled all their force. They marched towards the town. The duke of MARLBOROUGH offered them battle, without ſuſpending the ſiege. They abandoned the enterprize. They came to ſave the town. They were ſpectators of its fall.

From this conqueſt the duke haſtened to others. The poſts, taken by the enemy on the Schelde, were ſurprized. That river was paſſed the ſecond time; and notwithſtanding the great preparations made to prevent it, without oppoſition.

Bruſſels, beſieged by the elector of Bavaria, was relieved. Ghent ſurrendered to the duke in the middle of a winter remarkably ſevere. An army, little inferior to his own, marched out of the place.

As ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year permitted him to open another campaign, the duke beſieged and took Tourney. He inveſted Mons. Near this city the French army, covered by thick woods, defended by treble intrenchments, waited to moleſt, nor preſumed to offer battle. Even this was not attempted by them with impunity. On the laſt day of Auguſt 1709, the duke attacked them in their camp. All was employed, nothing availed againſt the reſolution of ſuch a general; againſt the fury of ſuch troops. The battle was bloody. The event deciſive. The woods were pierced. The fortifications trampled down. The enemy fled. The town was taken. Douay, Bethune, Aire, St. Venant, Bouchain underwent the ſame fate in two ſucceeding years. Their vigorous reſiſtance could not ſave them. The army of France durſt not attempt to relieve them. It ſeemed preſerved to defend the capital of the monarchy.

The proſpect of this extreme diſtreſs was neither diſtant, nor dubious. The French acknowleged their conqueror, and ſued for peace.

Theſe are the actions of the duke of MARLBOROUGH.
Performed in the compaſs of few years,
Sufficient to adorn the annals of ages.
The admiration of other nations
Will be conveyed to the lateſt poſterity,
In the hiſtories even of the enemies of Britain.

The ſenſe, which the Britiſh nation had
Of his tranſcendent merit,
Was expreſſed
In the moſt ſolemn, moſt effectual, moſt durable manner.

The acts of parliament, inſcribed on this pillar,
Shall ſtand
As long as the Britiſh name and language laſt,
Illuſtrious monuments
Of MALBOROUGH's glory
And
Of Britain's gratitude.

[q] About this time David Graham, eldeſt ſon of the duke of Montroſe, was created earl Graham of Belford in Northumberland; and Robert Ker, only ſon of the duke of Roxburgh, earl Ker of Wakefield in Yorkſhire. TOWNSHEND.'

The reception this letter met with was very acceptable to the court. An addreſs was preſented by the court of aldermen, thanking the king for his indulgent regard to the city of London, by informing them of the wicked deſigns of his enemies at home and abroad, and congratulating him upon the happy ſucceſs of his nogotiations, which had procured aſſurances, that theſe traiterous purpoſes would not be ſupported by any foreign power:

'When we reflect (continues the addreſs) on the many bleſſings, which Britons enjoy, under the protection of a prince, who makes the laws of this land his rule for the government of his people, when we conſider that neither the civil, or religious rights of your majeſty's ſubjects, have met with the leaſt inſtance of violation, ſince your majeſty's happy acceſſion to the throne of theſe realms, when we recollect your majeſty's royal clemency and benevolence, (ſince the laſt rebellion) to numbers of thoſe who had offended, in the higheſt degree, againſt their king, and the laws of their country, we cannot but expreſs the utmoſt abhorrence of thoſe vile and deteſtable perſons, who ſhall again conſpire and attempt to bring a free and happy people under the yoke and tyranny of ſuperſtition, and to involve this nation in a ſtate of blood, miſery, and utmoſt confuſion.

And as theſe muſt be the unavoidable conſequences attending any enterprize to alter our preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and to introduce a popiſh one;

As Engliſhmen that value our liberties; as honeſt men that have ſworn allegiance to your majeſty, and who have abjured and renounced the pretender; and as real friends to our excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate (with a proteſtant prince at the head of it) we beg leave in the moſt ſolemn manner, to declare to your majeſty, that, as we are bound in gratitude, we will exert ourſelves in our ſeveral ſtations, with the utmoſt care and vigilance, for the preſervation of the public peace and tranquility, and for the reſtoring of public credit; and that we will uſe our ſincere and hearty endeavours for the firm ſupport of your majeſty upon the throne, and for the making your reign eaſy and happy.'

The example of London was followed by many other cities and boroughs, who all expreſſed the ſame zeal and devotion. But, notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances, the king's journey to Hanover was laid aſide, though the regency had been ſettled, in which the prince of Wales had no part. The court, however, went to Kenſington, and the prince and princeſs retired to Richmond.

Various were the reports about the nature and diſcovery of the conſpiracy, as the government did not as yet think fit to publiſh the particulars. However, to remove all ſuſpicions of its realty, ſeveral perſons were taken up. On the 21ſt of May, mr. George Kelly, who went under the name of Johnſon, an Iriſh clergyman, was ſeized at his lodgings in Bury-ſtreet, by three meſſengers, for treaſonable correſpondences; and, having delivered his ſword and papers to them, they placed them in a window, and went in ſearch of other things. Their negligence gave him an opportunity of recovering his ſword, which he drew, and ſwore he would run the firſt man through the body, that diſturbed him in what he was doing, which was burning his papers in a candle with his left hand, whilſt he held the drawn ſword in the other. When the papers were burnt, he ſurrendered himſelf.

On the 4th of Auguſt, mr. Robert Cotton, of Huntingtonſhire, one of the gentlemen concerned in the late rebellion, and cleared by the act of grace, was ſeized at his lodgings over againſt Somerſet-houſe, as were alſo his footman and landlady. Two days after, mr. Cochran and mr. Smith were brought priſoners from Edinburgh, and Cochran was committed to the Tower. One John Sample, formerly a ſervant to ſir Robert Sutton, while he reſided as envoy extraordinary at the court of France, having been taken up for high-treaſon, and being in cuſtody of a meſſenger, found means, on the 5th of Auguſt, to make his eſcape; upon which a proclamation was iſſued out, with a reward of 1000l. for apprehending him. And on the 13th, another proclamation, with the like reward, was publiſhed for apprehending mr. Thomas Carte, a non-juring clergyman, againſt whom a warrant had been iſſued by one of the ſecretaries of ſtate.

On the 24th of Auguſt, dr. Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter, and dean of Weſtminſter, was apprehended by ſome of the king's meſſengers, who having ſearched his houſe, and ſecured ſome of his papers, carried him before a committee of the privy-council, who, having examined him, committed him to the Tower for high-treaſon. The next day, mr. Thomas Moore, vicar of St. Botolph, Aldersgate, formerly ſecretary to the biſhop of Rocheſter, was likewiſe taken up, and afterwards examined, but ſoon after diſcharged.

About the middle of September, mr. Bingley, mr. Neynoe, a young Iriſh prieſt, and two other perſons, were ſeized at Deal, and brought up priſoners to London. About the ſame time mr. Chriſtopher Layer, a young counſellor of the Temple, being alſo apprehended, he endeavoured, the next day to make his eſcape; and ſucceeded ſo far in his deſign, that he found means to get out at a bac-window two ſtory high, and having reached the river-ſide, he gave a ſculler ſome guineas to carry him over the water to Southwark with all poſſible expedition. But, being diſcovered, upon his going off, by a ſervant-maid, he was immediately purſued, and a hue and cry being raiſed after him, he was taken and brought bac, and the next morning committed to the Tower. On the 21ſt of September, he was brought under a ſtrong guard to the Cock-pit at Whitehall, and having been ſome hours under examination, before a committee of the privy-council, was remanded to his confinement. The day before, mr. Sayer, of the Temple, was taken into cuſtody; as was alſo, the next day, mr. Stewart, clerk to mr. Leyer, while his maſter was under examination.

The ſame day, John Plunket, ſerjeant to a company of invalids at Plymouth, was ſeized at Chelſea, upon ſuſpicion of being concerned with mr. Layer, and, after examination, committed to the cuſtody of a meſſenger. On the 24th, mr. Shippen's houſe in Norfolk-ſtreet was ſearched for papers, that might give light into ſome ſuſpicions. Warrants were likewiſe iſſued out for apprehending the lord North and Grey, who was gone as far as the Iſle of Wight, and had put himſelf on board a ſmuggler's ſloop, having been ſome time at mr. Holmes's houſe in that iſland. Colonel Morgan, the deputy-governor, being informed of his being on board the ſloop, ſent to a captain of one of the king's frigates, to have an eye upon the ſloop, and, when going to ſail, to ſend his long-boat aboard, and ſecure all the paſſengers on ſuſpicion; which being done, the lord North and Grey at firſt pretended to be another perſon; but finding that did him no ſervice, he confeſſed who he was; and he and the reſt of the paſſengers were carried before the governor, who told them, he muſt ſecure them till he could write to court; and upon an anſwer from thence, he had orders to ſend them up in cuſtody. The lord North and Grey's houſe in Great Queen-ſtreet, being alſo ſearched for papers, the meſſenger found there mr. Swathfegger, ſecretary to the earl of Orrery, who was ſeized and committed to cuſtody; and the next morning, September 27, the earl himſelf was brought to town from his ſeat at Brittel in Buckinghamſhire, and having been examined at the Cock-pit, was ordered to be confined that night at his own houſe, in Glaſs-houſe-ſtreet, under a guard of thirty ſoldiers; and the next day in the evening, was again examined by a committee of the privy-council, and committed priſoner to the Tower: as was alſo the lord North and Grey, being brought up from Portſmouth by lieutenant-general Maccartney, colonel Gordon, and a meſſenger.

On the 26th of September mr. Fleetwood was taken into cuſtody, and mrs. Layer, ignorant of her huſband's fate, and coming over from France, was about the ſame time ſeized at Dover.

Two days after, mr. Stephen Neynoe, the Iriſh prieſt, ſeized at Deal, being cloſely confined in the houſe of mr. Crawford, one of the king's meſſengers, in Manchester-court, near the Thames, found means, about three in the morning, to make his eſcape from a window two ſtory high, by tying the blanket and ſheets together, and got to the wall of a neighbouring garden adjoining to the river; but not knowing, that the tide was high, he leaped into the water, and being unſkilled in ſwimming, was drowned.

After the biſhop of Rocheſter had lain a fortnight in priſon, ſir Conſtantine Phipps preſented a petition to the court at the ſeſſions-houſe in the Old Bailey, in the name of mrs. Morrice, the biſhop's daughter, praying that, in conſideration of the biſhop's ill ſtate of health, he might be either brought to a ſpeedy trial, or bailed, or diſcharged: but it was over-ruled, as were alſo the petitions of two other priſoners for the plot, Cochran and Dennis Kelly.

The commitment of the biſhop of Rocheſter made a great noiſe through the whole kingdom, and gave occaſion to the diſaffected to heighten jealouſies and diſcontents. They pretended his confinement was injurious to the church of England, and the epiſcopal order, and went ſo far as to offer up public prayers for him (under pretence of his being afflicted with the gout) in moſt churches and chapels in London and Weſtminſter, on Sunday the 16th of September. On the other hand, endeavours were uſed to remove the prejudices of the clergy againſt the miniſtry, and dr. Gibſon, biſhop of Lincoln (now of London) wrote a circular letter, wherein he ſets forth the indulgence wherewith the biſhop was treated: the great reſpect the order of biſhops met with from the king, who in the diſpoſal of his preferments was directed by their advice: the improbality of ſo unpopular an act, without a juſt and even neceſſary foundation: and laſtly the ſafety of the nation, which requires that all delinquents ſhould be cenſured as ſuch, without any regard to the office, or title, or honour they bear.

Whilſt the public was employed in condemning or acquitting the impriſoned biſhop, the king thought proper to ſhew himſelf to the people. He ſet out the latter end of Auguſt for his Weſtern progreſs, accompanied by the prince of Wales. He came to Hackwood, a ſeat of the duke of Bolton, near Baſingſtoke, in Hampſhire, on the 28th of Auguſt, lay there that night, and the next day arrived at Saliſbury, being received every where with demonſtrations of the greateſt affection and joy. On the 20th he went to the camp near the city, and reviewed Londonderry's and Wade's regiments of horſe, and Evan's and Core's regiments of dragoons; and Wills's, Cadogan's, Pocock's, Stanwix's, Groves's, Montague's, and Clayton's regiments of foot. The king returned by the way of Winchester, viſited Portſmouth, lay at Stanſtead, the ſeat of the earl of Scarborough, and arrived at Kenſington the firſt of September.

The noiſe made by the conſpiracy ſeemed to require the meeting of the parliament as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit. Accordingly, on the 9th of October, the king came to the houſe of lords, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech very proper to remove any doubts which might have been entertained of the plot:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am concerned to find myſelf obliged at the opening of this parliament, to acquaint you, that a dangerous conſpiracy has been for ſome time formed, and is ſtill carrying on, againſt my perſon and government, in favour of a popiſh pretender.

'The diſcoveries I have made here, the informations I have received from my miniſters abroad, and the intelligences I have had from the powers in alliance with me, and indeed from moſt parts of Europe, have given me moſt ample and concurrent proofs of this wicked deſign.

'The conſpirators have, by their emiſſaries, made the ſtrongeſt inſtances for aſſiſtance from foreign powers, but were diſappointed in their expectations. However, confiding in their numbers, and not diſcouraged by their former ill ſucceſs, they reſolved once more, upon their own ſtrength, to attempt the ſubverſion of my government.

'To this end they provided conſiderable ſums of money, engaged great numbers of officers from abroad, ſecured large quantities of arms and ammunition, and thought themſelves in ſuch readineſs, that, had not the conſpiracy been timely diſcovered, we ſhould, without doubt, before now, have ſeen the whole nation, and particularly the city of London, involved in blood and confuſion.

'The care I have taken has, by the bleſſing of God, hitherto prevented the execution of their traiterous projects. The troops have been encamped all this ſummer; ſix regiments (though very neceſſary for the ſecurity of that kingdom) have been brought over from Ireland: the ſtates-general have given me aſſurances, that they would keep a conſiderable body of forces in readineſs to embark on the firſt notice of their being wanted here, which was all I deſired of them, being determined not to put my people to any more expence than what was abſolutely neceſſary for their peace and ſecurity.

'Some of the conſpirators have been taken up, and ſecured, and endeavours are uſed for the apprehending others.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'Having thus in general laid before you the ſtate of the preſent conſpiracy, I muſt leave to your conſideration what is proper and neceſſary to be done for the quiet and ſafety of the kingdom. I cannot but believe the hopes and expectations of our enemies are very ill-grounded, in flattering themſelves that the late diſcontents, occaſioned by private loſſes and misfortunes, however induſtriouſly and maliciouſly fomented, are turned into diſaffection, and a ſpirit of rebellion.

'Had I, ſince my acceſſion to the throne, ever attemted any innovation in our eſtabliſhed religion; had I, in any one inſtance, invaded the liberty and property of my ſubjects, I ſhould leſs wonder at any endeavours to alienate the affections of my people, and draw them into meaſures, that can end in nothing but their own deſtruction.

'But to hope to perſuade a free people, in full enjoyment of all that is dear and valuable to them, to exchange freedom for ſlavery, the proteſtant religion for popery, and to ſacrifice at once the price of ſo much blood and treaſure, as have been ſpent in defence of our preſent eſtabliſhment, ſeems an infatuation not to be accounted for. But, however vain and unſucceſsful theſe deſperate projects may prove in the end, they have at preſent ſo far the deſired effect, as to create uneaſineſs and diffidence in the minds of my people; which our enemies labour to improve to their own advantage. By forming plots they depreciate all property, that is veſted in the public funds, and then complain of the low ſtate of credit. They make an increaſe of the national expences neceſſary, and then clamour at the burthen of taxes, and endeavour to impute to my government, as grievances, the miſchiefs and calamities, which they alone create and occaſion.

'I wiſh for nothing more, than to ſee the public expences leſſened, and the great national debt put in a method of being gradually reduced and diſcharged, with a ſtrict regard to parliamentary faith; and a more favourable opportunity could never have been hoped for, than the ſtate of profound peace, which we now enjoy with all our neighbours. But public credit will aways languiſh under daily alarms and apprehenſions of public danger. And, as the enemies of our peace have been able to bring this immediate miſchief upon us, nothing can prevent them from continuing to ſubject the nation to new and conſtant difficulties and diſtreſſes, but the wiſdom, zeal, and vigorous reſolutions of this parliament.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I have ordered the accounts to be made up, and laid before you, of the extraordinary charge, that has been incurred this ſummer, for the defence and ſafety of the kingdom; and I have been particularly careful, not to direct any expence to be made greater or ſooner than was of abſolute neceſſity.

'I have likewiſe ordered eſtimates to be prepared, and laid before you, for the ſervice of the year enſuing; and I hope the further proviſions, which the treaſonable practices of our enemies have made neceſſary for our common ſafety, may be ordered with ſuch frugality, as very little to exceed the ſupplies of the laſt year.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I need not tell you of what infinite concern it is to the peace and tranquility of the kingdom, that this parliament ſhould, upon this occaſion, exert themſelves with a more than ordinary zeal and vigour. An entire union among all, that ſincerely wiſh well to the preſent eſtabliſhment is now become abſolutely neceſſary. Our enemies have too long taken advantage from your differences and diſſenſions. Let it be known, that the ſpirit of popery, which breathes nothing but confuſion to the civil and religious rights of a proteſtant church and kingdom, however abandoned ſome few may be, in deſpite of all obligations divine and human, has not ſo far poſſeſſed my people as to make them ripe for ſuch a fatal change. Let the world ſee, that the general diſpoſition of the nation is no invitation to foreign powers to invade us, nor encouragement to domeſtic enemies to kindle a civil war in the bowels of the kingdom. Your own intereſt and welfare call upon you to defend yourſelves. I ſhall wholly rely upon the divine protection, the ſupport of my parliament, and the affections of my people, which I ſhall endeavour to preſerve, by ſteadily adhering to the conſtitution in church and ſtate, and continuing to make the laws of the realm the rule and meaſure of all my actions.'

The addreſſes of thanks were full of the ſentiments which ſo ſtrong and pathetic a ſpeech naturally produced. The deteſtation and abhorrence, as well as the indignation conceived by both houſes, at the hearing of theſe traiterous and dangerous deſigns againſt his majeſty in favour of the popiſh pretender were unſpeakable. The commons eſpecially expreſſed themſelves in a very affecting manner: 'We cannot expreſs too great an abhorrence of ſuch unnatural practices, nor too great an indignation againſt thoſe who would have made the capital of this flouriſhing kingdom a ſcene of blood and deſolation. Wicked men! whilſt they have the malice to revile your government, and attempt to overturn it, at the ſame time have the inſolence to depend upon the clemency of it for their ſecurity: while they are endeavouring to deſtroy all liberty, they are clamouring that a few of them are, for the public ſafety, confined: whilſt they are attempting to deſtroy all property, they are murmuring at the neceſſary taxes given to your majeſty for the ſecurity of it: and, whilſt they act againſt all law themſelves, they truſt, and are confident, that, even in their own caſes, the laws of the realm will be the rule and meaſure of your actions.' To this were added aſſurances of not only making good all the extraordinary expences already incurred, but of chearfully granting whatever ſhould be neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, as they were entirely convinced, that they could by no other means reſtore public credit, and attempt the gradual reduction of the great national debt, than by doing every thing in their power for the ſupport of his majeſty's goverment, and happy eſtabliſhment in his royal family.

The expreſſions of 'doing every thing in their power' were objected againſt by ſome members as to too general, and it was moved to add the words, 'with due regard to the liberty of the ſubject, the conſtitution in church and ſtate, and the laws now in force.' But the motion was rejected, upon mr. Pulteney's repreſenting that ſuch a clauſe would be injurious to the king, ſince it would look like making a condition or bargain with the king, and tacitly imply, either that the laws had already been infringed, or that the commons were jealous, leſt his majeſty ſhould for the future, break in upon the conſtitution.

As the diſcovery of the plot made the ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus act neceſſary, a bill was brought in for that purpoſe the very firſt day of the ſeſſion, by the duke of Grafton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, who repreſented the neceſſity of ſtrengthening the hands of the king's miniſters, in order to a full detection and entire ſuppreſſion of the traiterous deſigns and practices againſt the government, by empowering his majeſty to ſecure all ſuſpected perſons. Accordingly, it was propoſed that the habeas corpus act ſhould be ſuſpended till the 24th of October 1723.

This was oppoſed chiefly by the earls of Angleſea, Cowper, Strafford, and Coningſby, and the lords Trevor, Bathurſt, and Bingley, who repreſented, that, the habeas corpus act being, on all hands admitted to be the greateſt and ſtrongeſt bulwark of Engliſh liberty, it did not conſiſt with the wiſdom of parliament to ſuſpend it, without an abſolute neceſſity. That, indeed, in caſes of actual rebellion, or intended invaſion, that act had been, at times before, ſuſpended; but yet this was done ſparingly, by degrees, and never for above the term of ſix months. That this conſideration put them under a very melancholy apprehenſion for the very being or effect of that excellent law, ſince the ſuſpenſion of it for a year might be as good a precedent for the ſuſpending it, on another occaſion, for the term of two years, as any former precedent was now for the preſent ſuſpenſion. That, the horrid and deteſtable conſpiracy, which occaſioned this ſuſpenſion, having been diſcovered and notified to the city of London above five months before, and divers of the conſpirators impriſoned for it a conſiderable time paſt, it was very unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the danger of this plot, in the hands of an able, faithful, and diligent miniſtry, would continue for a year or more yet to come; and that in ſo high a degree, as to require a ſuſpenſion of the liberty of the ſubject; for ſo they took the habeas corpus act to be. That, indeed, their juſt apprehenſions would, in a great meaſure, be removed, if they could flatter themſelves with the hopes, that his majeſty, on whoſe known equity, goodneſs, and clemency, they entirely depended, would remain among us, during the whole time of this ſuſpenſion: but that his majeſty, not having viſited his dominions abroad theſe two laſt years, would, very probably, leave the kingdom the next ſpring to that end. That, in his majeſty's abſence, this great power of ſuſpecting and impriſoning the ſubjects at will, and detaining them in priſon till the 24th of October 1723, and for as much longer time, as till they can, after that, take the benefit of the habeas corpus act (if they could then do it at all) would be lodged in the hands of our fellow ſubjects, who could not be ſuppoſed to be above all prejudices and partialities, as their lordſhips were ſure his majeſty was; and who, beſides, might have private piques and reſentments to gratify. That this bill did, in effect, veſt the miniſters with an authority almoſt as arbitrary and extenſive as that of a Roman dictator, ſince they might inflict, even on innocent perſons (who ſhould have the misfortune to diſpleaſe them) a puniſhment of above a year's impriſonment, which comes little ſhort of death, and which oftentimes occaſions it. That the dictatorian power among the Romans was always ended or laid down immediately after the occaſion, for which it was given, was over; and it was remarkable, that it was never continued much longer till a little before the Roman common-wealth (from which all other ſtates draw ſo many maxims of government) loſt its liberty. That ſo long a ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus act weakens the proviſion made in the bill for the members of either houſe of parliament, that they ſhall not be committed or detained, ſitting the parliament, until the matter be firſt communicated, and the conſent obtained of the houſes reſpectively, ſince it is very probable, the parliament will not be ſitting the greateſt part of the time, for which this bill was enacted, and would continue a law. That ſuch is the weakneſs of human nature, that the apprehenſion of what might befal a member of parliament, while the parliament is not ſitting, might have ſome influence on the freedom of parliament. And, upon the whole matter, ſince ſo long a ſuſpenſion was liable to ſo many inconveniences, they thought it adviſable and conſiſtent with the uſual prudence of that auguſt aſſembly, to reduce it to the term of ſix months; at the the end of which, if there appeared to be a neceſſity for it, it might be continued ſix months longer, as was done before in this very reign, during the late rebellion.

Theſe objections to the bill itſelf, or continuance of it for a year, were anſwered by the lords Townſhend, Harcourt, Carteret, the dukes of Argyle, Wharton, and Newcaſtle, and ſome others. They repreſented, 'that the habeas corpus act had been ſuſpended upon much leſs important occaſions, upon bare intimations of a plot; whereas the king had now laid before the parliament the particulars of a conſpiracy to introduce a popiſh prince: that it was neceſſary the ſuſpenſion ſhould continue a whole year, ſince the conſpirators (who probably would lie ſtill all the winter) would exert themſelves in the ſummer when the parliament was up; and might flatter themſelves with the hopes of foreign aſſiſtance.' After theſe debates, the ſuſpenſion, being put to the vote, was carried without a diviſion, and the bill was ſent down to the commons.

The debates (which ran chiefly upon the continuance of it) were much the ſame as in the houſe of lords. Mr Spencer Cowper ſaid, 'that he and all his family had come as early and readily into the revolution, and, on all occaſions, had appeared as zealous for the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, as any one: but yet he could not be of opinion to truſt the liberties of the people in the hands of any miniſtry, for ſo long a time as above a year. That neither in king William's nor queen Anne's reigns, nor ſince his preſent majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, even in times of open and actual rebellion, the habeas corpus act had ever been ſuſpended for above ſix months; and therefore he moved, that the preſent ſuſpenſion might be limited to that term.' Sir Joſeph Jekyll added, 'that, if, at the end of thoſe ſix months, there appeared to be a neceſſity for a farther ſuſpenſion, he ſhould, and he doubted not but the whole houſe would readily come into it.' At laſt, mr. Robert Walpole roſe up, and laid before the aſſembly ſome particulars of the dangerous conſpiracy, which for ſome time had been, and was ſtill carrying on, for the utter ſubverſion of the preſent happy ſettlement. He ſaid, 'that this wicked deſign was formed about Chriſtmas laſt: that the conſpirators had at firſt made application to ſome potentates abroad, for an aſſiſtance of five thouſand men: that being denied, they afterwards (about the month of April) made farther application and earneſt inſtances for three thouſand men: being again diſappointed in their expectations from foreign aſſiſtance, they reſolved deſperately to go on, confiding in their own ſtrength, and fondly depend on the diſaffection in England: that their firſt attempt was to have been the ſeizing of the Bank, the Exchequer, and ſuch other places, where the public money was lodged: that the government had undoubted informations of this plot ever ſince May laſt; but, nevertheleſs, thought fit not to take up any body, becauſe, there being then two terms coming on together, the conſpirators would have had the benefit of the habeas corpus act; and ſo the apprehending them was put off till the long vacation.' He added, 'that the traiterous deſigns againſt his majeſty's perſon and government had been carrying on ever ſince the death of the late queen; and it could be proved, that there had been a meeting of ſome conſiderable perſons, one of whom was not far off, wherein it had been propoſed to proclaim the pretender at the Royal-Exchange that an exact account of this deteſtable conſpiracy would, in due time, be laid before the parliament: and, as to the buſineſs now before them, though it was true, that the habeas corpus act had never before been ſuſpended for above ſix months; yet, conſidering the lords had made this ſuſpenſion for a whole year, if the commons ſhould go about to alter it, the ſame might occaſion a difference between the two houſes, which, at this time of jealouſy and danger, might ſound ill in foreign courts.' After this ſpeech, the bill paſſed the houſe as ſent down by the lords, and, on the 17th of October, received the royal aſſent.

Purſuant to a clauſe in the act, that no member of either houſe ſhould be impriſoned during their ſitting, till the matter be firſt communicated to the houſe, and their conſent obtained, the king by the lord Carteret deſired the conſent of the lords to detain priſoners the biſhop of Rocheſter, the lord North and Grey, and the earl of Orrery, which was readily given.

Soon after paſſing the bill, the duke of Norfolk was taken into cuſtody at Bath, and brought up to London. He was examined by the council, and afterwards committed to the Tower on ſuſpicion of high-treaſon.

When the lord Townſhend acquainted the peers with this affair, thoſe that oppoſed the ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus act were againſt conſenting to the duke's commitment. They repreſented, that the cauſe and ground of his being ſuſpected of high-treaſon ſhould be communicated to the houſe, and that a general ſuſpicion was not ſufficient: that this would ſubject every peer, even while the parliament was ſitting, to unwarrantable impriſonments, and might produce very ill effects. But their reaſons were not heard, and after a long debate the houſe conſented to the duke's being detained priſoner in the Tower.

As a farther proof of the plot, the king, on the 16th of November, ſent the following meſſage to the houſe of peers:

'His majeſty having been informed, that many ſcandalous declarations in print have been by ſeveral foreign poſts tranſmitted into this kingdom, in order to be diſperſed among his good and faithful ſubjects, to poiſon their minds, and ſeduce them from their allegiance; ſeveral of thoſe declarations have, by his majeſty's order, ever ſince his majeſty received from both houſes of parliament the laſt moſt ſolemn and acceptable aſſurances of their fidelity, been intercepted; and amongſt them an original in writing, ſigned, as his majeſty has good reaſon to believe, by the pretender himſelf. This, together with one of the printed copies, his majeſty has ordered to be laid before you, as a matter not unworthy of your conſideration.'

This declaration (dated September 20, 1722, at Lucca) was directed by James III, king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to all his loving ſubjects of the three nations, and to all foreign princes and ſtates, to ſerve as a foundation for a laſting peace in Europe, and ſigned James Rex. The pretender begins with ſhewing how fond he is of his ſubjects; that, though the obligation he owes to his own honour be great, yet the obligation to the ſafety and tranquility of his native country is above all ties the deareſt to him and the tendereſt. He then talks of the late violations to the freedom of elections: of conſpiracies invented on purpoſe to give pretence for new oppreſſions: of infamous informers: and a ſtate of proſcription in which he concludes every honeſt well-meaning man to be. Theſe conſiderations have engaged him to enter ſeriouſly into himſelf, and examine his heart, what ſacrifice to make on his own part for the public peace, eſpecially of theſe kingdoms, of which he is the natural and undoubted father. Then he propoſes, that, if king George will quietly deliver to him the poſſeſſion of his throne, he will in return beſtow upon him the title of king in his native dominions, and invite all other ſtates to confirm it, with a promiſe to leave to him his ſucceſſion to the Britiſh dominions ſecure, whenever in due courſe his natural right ſhall take place. As motives to this reſignation, he ſays, that in king George's native dominions an unconteſtable right will free him from the crime and reproach of tyranny, and repreſents the difference between a calm undiſturbed reign over a willing people and a reſtleſs poſſeſſion in a ſtrange land, where authority, forcing the inclinations of the people, can only be ſupported by blood and violence, eternally ſubject to fears and alarms even when no danger appears. He concludes with ſaying, king George's ſettlement here is frail and uncertain, becauſe his title ſhall, whilſt the pretender has health or any deſcendants in being, be for ever diſputed, conjuring him, inſtead of adviſing with an imperious miniſtry, as much his tyrants as the nation's, to conſult his reaſon, to aſk his conſcience, and to examine his intereſt and glory, and then his very ambition will admoniſh him to deſcend from a throne, which muſt be always ſhaking, to mount another, where his ſeat will be firm and ſecure.

When this declaration was read in the houſe of lords, it was unanimouſly reſolved, that it was a falſe, inſolent, and traiterous libel, the higheſt indignity to the king, full of preſumption and arrogance, in ſuppoſing the pretender in a condition to offer terms to his majeſty, and injurious to the honour of the Britiſh nation, in imagining that a free proteſtant people, happy under the government of the beſt of princes, could be ſo infatuated, as without the utmoſt contempt and indignation, to hear of any terms from a popiſh bigotted pretender. Then they ordered the declaration to be burnt at the Royal-Exchange. The king's meſſage, the declaration and the lords reſolution being communicated to the commons, they agreed with the lords, only adding that the ſheriffs ſhould attend in perſon at the burning of the declaration. An addreſs was preſented by both houſes, expreſſing their utmoſt aſtoniſhment and indignation at the ſuprizing inſolence of the pretender and aſſuring, they were determined to ſupport the king's title to the crown with their lives and fortunes. [r]

The commons proceeding to conſider of the ways and means to raiſe the ſupplies, a motion was made, that, towards defraying the expences occaſioned by the late rebellion and diſorders, the ſum of 100,000l. ſhould be raiſed (in lieu of all forfeitures and profits of the two-thirds of their regiſtered eſtates) upon the real and perſonal eſtates of all papiſts or perſons educated in the popiſh religion. This was oppoſed by ſir Wilfrid Lawſon and dr. Friend, who ſaid, that ſuch an extraordinary tax would carry the face of perſecution, which was inconſiſtent with the principles and temper of the proteſtant religion: adding, ſome of thoſe who had their education in foreign ſeminaries, proved ſome of the beſt friends to the preſent govenment. To this mr. Yonge anſwered, that he knew very little of foreign education, but he doubted very much, that loyalty to king George was taught by prieſts and jeſuits in Romiſh ſeminaries. The lord Gage, who was bred a Roman catholic, and had ſeveral relations of that religion, ſaid, that he believed moſt of them to be very loyal ſubjects, though, by their principles, they cannot take the oath of ſupremacy; and therefore he propoſed, that a new oath of Allegiance might be framed for them. mr. William Thompſon ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and declared his abhorance of perſecuting any body on account of their opinions in religion. This was anſwered by recorder Thompſon who ſtated the true notion of perſecution, which, in his opinion, was only when any one is puniſhed for his particular opinion in religion, and for ſerving God according

[r] The addreſs was as follows:

'We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and faithful ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament aſſembled, being deeply affected with the ſenſe of thoſe many bleſſings, which we have conſtantly enjoyed, and hope long to enjoy, under your majeſty's moſt juſt and gracious government; and being thoroughly convinced, that our religious and civil rights, as well as the very being of the Britiſh name and conſtitution, do, under God entirely depended upon the preſervation of our majeſty's ſacred perſon and of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, as ſettled by law in your royal line are filled, with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment and indignation at the unexampled preſumption and arrogance of the pretender to your dominions, in daring to offer ſuch an indignity to your majeſty and the Britiſh nation, as to declare to your ſubjects, and to all foreign princes and ſtates, that he finds himſelf in a condition to offer terms to your majeſty, and even to capitulate with you for the abſolute ſurrender of the religion and liberties of a free nation.

'However great the infatuation of his adviſers may be, we are ſenſible, nothing could have raiſed his or their hopes to ſo extravagant a degree of preſumption, but repeated encouragements and aſſurances from the conſpirators at home, founded on the moſt injurious and groſs miſrepreſentations of the inclinations and affections of your majeſty's ſubjects: and a raſh concluſion, that becauſe ſome, from whom it ought leaſt to have been expected, had broke through the ſolemn reſtraint of reiterated oaths, in order to raiſe themſelves on the ruin of their country; therefore the whole body of the nation was ripe for the ſame fatal defection and ready to exchange the mild and legal government of a moſt indulgent prince, for the boundleſs rage of an attainted fugitive, bred up in the maxims of tyranny and ſuperſtition.

'But we, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, reſolve, by a ſteady and conſtant adherence to your government, to wipe off this ſtain and imputation from the name of Britons, and to convince the world that thoſe wicked deſigns, formed againſt your majeſty's ſacred perſon and government, which the inſolence of this declaration proves to be moſt real, while it affects to treat them as imaginary, and impracticable againſt a prince relying on, and ſupported by the vigour and duty of a Britiſh parliament, and the affections of his people.

'And we beg leave, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to aſſure your majeſty, that neither the impotent menaces of foreign aſſiſtance, nor the utmoſt efforts of domeſtic traitors, ſhall ever deter us from ſtanding by your majeſty with our lives and fortunes and ſupporting your majeſty's moſt juſt title to the crown of theſe realms, againſt the pretender, and all his open and ſecret abettors, both at home and abroad.'

to that opinion and the dictates of his conſcience. But that (ſaid he) was not the caſe here, for the extraordinary tax, now intended to be raiſed upon the papiſts, was not a puniſhment for their being Roman catholics, but on account of penalties they had at divers times incurred for being enemies to the civil government, raiſing rebellions, and contriving plots againſt the ſtate. At laſt, mr. Walpole repreſented 'the great dangers this nation had been in, ever ſince the reformation, from the conſtant endeavours of popery to ſubvert our happy conſtitution and the proteſtant religion, by the moſt cruel, violent and unjuſtifiable methods: that he would not take upon him to charge any particular perſon among them with being concerned in the preſent horrid conſpiracy: but that it was notorious to the whole world, that many of them had been engaged in the Preſton rebellion, and ſome were executed for it; and the preſent plot was contrived at Rome, and countenanced in popiſh countries: that many of the papiſts were not only well-wiſhers to it, but had contributed large ſums of money towards carrying it on; and therefore he thought it very reaſonable ſince they made ſuch ſavings of the incomes of their eſtates, that the ſame ſhould go towards the great expence they and the pretender's friends had put the nation to.' In the courſe of the bill, which was ordered to be brought in, the friends of the Roman catholics, when they ſay it was like to paſs, took the opportunity of a thin houſe to clog it with a clauſe for including the papiſts and non-jurors of Scotland which was carried by five voices only in the committee. But, when this amendment came to be conſidered by the houſe, mr. Walpole repreſented, that the names and real eſtates of the Scots papiſts and non-jurors not being regiſtered, it was impoſſible to aſcertain their proportion of this tax. Upon which the clauſe was rejected, and the bill, having paſſed, was ſent up to the lords, where it was alſo agreed to with another bill from the commons to oblige all perſons, being papiſts, in Scotland, and all perſons in Great-Britain refuſing or neglecting to take the oaths appointed for the ſecurity of the king's perſon and government to regiſter their names and real eſtates. Both theſe bills received the royal aſſent.

Mr Layer was brought to his trial on the 21ſt of November at the King's-bench. His indictment ſet forth, 'that he had been employed in forming a moſt traiterous and horrid plot and conſpiracy againſt his majeſty and his government, by liſting men in Eſſex for the pretender's ſervice, in order to ſtir up a rebellion; and alſo, that he had held correſpondence with the pretender, by carrying letters and treaſonable papers to him beyond ſeas, and from him to his majeſty's diſaffected ſubjects in this kingdom.' The firſt evidence proved, that the earl of Cadogan was to be ſeized, and the Tower at the ſame time; afterwards the Bank of England, and then his majeſty and the prince of Wales. The inliſting men for the pretender was proved by ſeveral perſons, to whom mr. Layer had given money; and, after a trial of about eighteen hours, he was found guilty, and received ſentence of death; but, being reprieved from time to time, the houſe of commons appointed a committee to examine him in relation to the conſpiracy, conſiſting of Spencer Compton, the ſpeaker; Robert Walpole, chancellor of the exchequer; ſir Joſeph Jekyll, maſter of the rolls; Paul Methuen, comptroller of the houſehold; William Pulteney; John Smith, teller of the exchequer; Richard Hampden; lieutenant-general Wills, and ſir Robert Sutton. They choſe Stephen Poyntz to be their ſecretary. Mr Layer's reprieve was prolonged on this occaſion, and, his trial not being publiſhed, the earl of Angleſey, in the houſe of lords, took notice, 'that, at the opening of this ſeſſion, his majeſty, in his ſpeech from the throne, had been pleaſed to acquaint both houſes with the diſcovery of a dangerous conſpiracy, which for ſome time had been formed, and was ſtill carrying on againſt his perſon and government: that ſome of the conſpirators had been taken up and ſecured; and that endeavours were uſed for the apprehending others. That, one of the principal plotters having ſince that time been tried and condemned, it was ſomewhat ſtrange, that no particulars relating to the conſpiracy had yet been communicated to that houſe, the rather, becauſe ſeveral of their members had been apprehended, and were ſtill confined, on ſuſpicion of being concerned in it.' And therefore he moved, 'that the judges of the King's-bench be ordered to cauſe the trial of Chriſtopher Layer to be forthwith printed and publiſhed, being firſt peruſed by the king's council.' This motion was ſupported by the earls Cowper, Strafford, and Aylesford, the lords Trevor, Bathurſt, Lechmere, and ſome others. To this it was anſwered by the lord Carteret, 'that the order moved for was altogether unneceſſary, directions having been long before given by the judges for the printing and publiſhing of the trial with all convenient ſpeed: that the trial being of a very large extent, and ſeveral parts of it, that were taken down in ſhort-hand, requiring a great deal of time to be reviſed and rectified by the judges and the council on both ſides, had occaſioned the delay complained of; but that, the printing of the trial being now in great forwardneſs, the ſame would be publiſhed in a few days.' Upon this a motion for an order to the judges was rejected, and about a week after the trial was publiſhed. However, ſixteen lords entered their proteſts.

[1722-23] Theſe debates probably haſtened the publiſhing of the trial; and, though Layer was ſtill reprieved from time to time in hopes he would make a full diſcovery of the plot, he waved it; and therefore he was at laſt executed at Tyburn, his head being carried to Newgate, and the next day fixed up at Temple-bar; but his quarters were delivered to thoſe who came for them. He was attended at his death by mr. George Hawkins and mr. John Berryman, two clergymen. His ſpeech was very ſhort; but in it he juſtified himſelf in what he had done, and recommended the intereſt of the pretender. He delivered a paper to mr. Price, the under-ſheriff, and another to a friend.

This report of the committee appointed to examine mr. Layer, and others, having been delivered to the houſe on the 1ſt of March, by mr. Pulteny, the chairman, it appeared from thence, that a deſign had been long carrying on by perſons of figure and diſtinction at home in conjunction with traitors abroad, for placing the pretender on the throne of theſe kingdoms. That various methods had been attempted, and various times fixed for putting this deſign in execution. That the firſt intention was to have procured a regular body of foreign forces to invade theſe kingdoms at the time of the late elections; but that the conſpirators, being diſappointed in their expectation, next reſolved to make an attempt at the time, that it was generally believed the king intended to go to Hanover, by the help of ſuch officers and ſoldiers, as could paſs into England unobſerved from abroad, under the command of the late duke of Ormond, who was to have landed in the river with a great quantity of arms provided in Spain for that purpoſe, at which time the Tower was likewiſe to have been made a place of arms. but this deſign being alſo diſappointed by the diſcoveries made in England, and the king's putting off his journey; by the incampment of his forces at home, as well as the ſending for thoſe from Ireland, and by the readineſs of his allies the ſtates-general, to aſſiſt him in caſe of need; by the orders given in Spain, that the late duke of Ormond ſhould not be ſuffered to paſs through that kingdom, the conſpirators found themſelves under a neceſſity of deferring their enterpize till the breaking up of the camp: during that interval they were labouring by their agents and emiſſaries to corrupt and ſeduce the officers and ſoldiers of the army, and depended ſo much on this defection as to entertain hopes of placing the pretender on the throne, though they ſhould obtain no aſſiſtance from abroad, which nevertheleſs they ſtill continued to ſollicit for.

The truth and reality of theſe deſigns were confirmed by the concurrent advices from almoſt all parts of Europe, ſent by perſons who appeared to have had no communication with each other. Theſe advices were alſo verified by ſeveral diſcoveries made at home by the informations and confeſſions of the parties concerned, as well as by a long ſeries of correſpondence with the conſpirators furniſhed the government againſt themſelves.

From ſeveral letters and circumſtances it appeared, that the firſt deſign was to have been executed with the aſſiſtance of foreign forces, at the time of the elections; that the pretender, the late duke of Ormond, lord Orrery, and the biſhop of Rocheſter, were of his opinion; that memorials were drawn up here, to be preſented to the regent for this purpoſe, and that thoſe memorials were actually preſented, or at leaſt, application made to the regent in conſequence of them, by directions from perſons in England; and that ſuch diſpoſitions had been made for this enterprize at that time, as broke out into riots at ſome of the elections; which muſt have been allowed to have been no unfavourable juncture for ſuch an attempt, conſidering the diſcontents occaſioned by the late South-ſea ſcheme, which the conſpirators have all along flattered themſelves they ſhould be able to improve into a ſpirit of rebellion, and the liberties uſually taken at ſuch a ſeaſon, when all the freeholders of England are neceſſarily aſſembled together, and when the whole nation is too apt to be in a ferment, even in the quieteſt times.

This deſign failing, on account (as it is reaſonable to believe) of the conſpirators not being able to obtain the forces they ſollicited from abroad, and of their being themſelves divided in opinion as to the time and manner of execution, their next endeavour was to attempt an inſurrection at the time, when they ſuppoſed his majeſty would be going to Hanover. For it appeared by ſeveral particulars, that the duke of Ormond was to have landed in England with officers and arms about that time. The reaſon of Ormond's not coming proceeded from the orders iſſued at Madrid and in France to prevent him, and by the king's not going abroad. In a letter to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate from Rome, notice was taken, that a perſon of great diſtinction at that place had declared it as his opinion, that the grand project formed in a conclave, for placing the pretender on the throne of Britain, was going to be put in execution; but that the ſame perſon afterwards aſſigned four reaſons for its having miſcarried, which were, the want of money, the ſuſpected faith of the regent, the want of ſkill in thoſe who were to conduct it, and the puſillanimity of the pretender, who, to avoid hazarding his own perſon, propoſed to ſend his child.

The report farther obſerved, that the leaders, in order (as it is natural to believe) to ſave themſelves from the danger of legal conviction, choſe to manage their correſpondences by the intervention of perſons of a meaner rank and figure, and of deſperate fortunes, who, they hoped, might eſcape the obſervation of the government; being no otherwiſe conſiderable, than as the truſt repoſed in them made them ſo. Of theſe inferior agents, Layer appears to have been entruſted by lord North and Grey, and lord Orrery; and Plunket, who travelled with Layer to Rome, and whoſe treaſonable practices and correſpondences are cloſely connected with thoſe of Layer, writes of himſelf as tranſacting part of his treaſons with the lord Orrery's clerk, and ſends frequent accounts to the pretender's agents abroad, of matters relating to the ſaid lord.

George Kelly, a non-juring clergyman, appears to have been the perſon principally entruſted by the biſhop of Rocheſter, and to have been employed in writing for him, and conveying letters to him, until the time that he, Kelly, was firſt taken into cuſtody; after which it appears to the committee, that Thomas Carte, another non-juring clergyman, was entruſted and employed by the biſhop in the ſame manner; and the committee obſerved, that George Kelly's correſpondence has a cloſe connection with that of Dennis Kelly, and likewiſe that he appears to have been privy to Plunket's and Neynoe's tranſactions.

The perſon employed by the duke of Norfolk, in conveying letters between him, and George Jernegan, an agent of the pretender's in Flanders, they find to be mrs. Spelman, alias Yallop, who has likewiſe owned her conveying letters in the ſame manner between mr. Harvey of Comb, and one Moore of Brownloe-ſtreet, and the ſaid Jernegan: the committee obſerve, that John Sample acted under the direction of mr. Sempil (commonly called lord Sempil) and his ſon at Paris; and that he wrote letters to the late duke of Ormond and the pretender.

After the reading the report, it was moved, by mr. Pulteney, that this queſtion might be put, 'that upon conſideration of the report, and the ſeveral papers and examinations relating to the conſpiracy, it appears to this houſe, that a deteſtable and horrid conſpiracy has been formed and carried on by perſons of figure and diſtinction, and their agents and inſtruments, in conjunction with traitors abroad, for invading theſe kingdoms with foreign forces, for raiſing inſurrections and rebellion at home, for ſeizing the Tower, and the city of London, for laying violent hands upon the perſons of his moſt ſacred majeſty and the prince of Wales, in order to ſubvert our preſent happy eſtabliſhment in church and ſtate, by placing a popiſh pretender upon the throne.' This queſtion, after a ſhort debate, was carried without dividing; and then mr. Pelham moved, 'that it appears to this houſe, that Chriſtopher Layer, in his ſeveral examinations before the lords of the council, and committee of this houſe, has groſsly prevaricated, ſuppreſſed the truth, contradicted himſelf, and endeavoured, as far as in him lies, to diſguiſe and conceal the horrid and deteſtable conſpiracy:' which was alſo carried in the ſame manner. After this, the attorney-general moved, 'that it appears to this houſe, that John Plunket has been a principal agent and inſtrument in the conſpiracy, and has carried on ſeveral treaſonable correſpondences to procure a foreign force to invade theſe kingdoms, to raiſe inſurrections and a rebellion at home, and was engaged with others in the villainous and execrable deſign, of laying violent hands upon his majeſty's moſt ſacred perſon.' This queſtion being carried with very little oppoſition, the attorney-general moved again, for a bill to inflict certain pains and penalties on John Plunket. Though this motion was warmly oppoſed, yet, after a long debate, it was carried by a majority of 289 againſt 130, and the bill, being brought in, paſſed both houſes: but thirty-one lords entered their proteſts againſt it. A few days after, the ſollicitor-general made the like motion in the caſe of George Kelly, and a bill was alſo paſſed againſt him, which was attended with the ſame proteſts.

By theſe acts Plunket and Kelly were to be kept in cloſe cuſtody during his majeſty's pleaſure, his heirs and ſucceſſors in any priſon in Great-Britain; and, in caſe they ſhould break priſon, they and their aſſiſtants were to ſuffer death.

The ſame day mr. Yonge, in a long ſpeech took notice, how deeply dr. Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter, had been concerned in this deteſtable conſpiracy; aggravating his crime from his holy function, and high ſtation in the church of England, a church ever conſpicuous for its loyalty; from the ſolemn oaths he had, on ſo many occaſions, taken to the government, and by which he had abjured the the pretender; when at the ſame time he was traiterouſly conſpiring to bring him in, upon the ruin of hie country, and of all that was dear and valuable to us as freemen and chriſtians: concluding, that as he was a diſgrace to his order, and a diſhonour to the church, ſo he might apply to him on this occaſion theſe words of the 1ſt of Acts, verſe 20, 'Let his habitation be deſolate, and let no man dwell therein, and his biſhopric let another take.' And therefore he moved, 'that it appears to this houſe, that Francis lord biſhop of Rocheſter was principally concerned in forming, directing, and carrying on the wicked and deteſtable conſpiracy, for invading theſe kingdoms with a foreign force, and for raiſing inſurrections and rebellions at home, in order to ſubvert our preſent happy eſtabliſhment in church and ſtate, by placing a popiſh pretender upon the throne.' Sir William Windham ſaid, he ſaw no cauſe to proceed againſt the biſhop in ſo ſevere a manner, there being little or indeed no evidence beſides conjectures and hearſays. However, mr. Yonge's motion was agreed to, and a bill was ordered to be brought in to inflict certain pains and penalties on Francis biſhop of Rocheſter.

[1723] When the bill came to be read a ſecond time, the biſhop ſent a letter to the ſpeaker, which he deſired might be communicated to the houſe, and in which he ſaid, 'that though conſcious of his own innocence, he ſhould decline giving the houſe any trouble that day, and contented himſelf with the opportunity (if the bill went on) of making his defence before another, of which he had the honour to be a member.' However, the commons proceeded in that affair, and the council for the bill being called in, and the bill read, the council opened the evidence, and produced a ſcheme, taken amongſt mr. Layer's papers, which was read, as were alſo ſeveral copies of letters ſtopped at the poſt-office. Then the council examined ſeveral witneſſes to make good the allegations of the bill; produced ſeveral papers taken at his houſes at Weſtminſter and Bromley; as alſo a packet taken on one of his ſervants at the Tower of London; and examined two witneſſes, one to prove, that a letter and paper contained in the packet were his handwriting; and the other to prove, that a letter directed to mr. Dubois, taken amongſt his papers at the deanry at Weſtminſter, was ſealed with the ſame ſeal, with which the letter taken on his ſervant at the Tower was ſealed. Then the council ſummed up the evidence, and being withdrawn, the ſpeaker opened the bill, which was committed to a grand committee, on the 6th of April, when the leading men amongſt the tories choſe to go out of the houſe, ſo that only mr. Lawſon, mr. Oglethorpe, and two or three more, ſtaid to ſpeak in the biſhop's behalf. When they came to the filling up the blank for pains and penalties, it was moved, that he ſhould be deprived of his office and benefice, baniſhed the kingdom, be guilty of felony if he returned, and that it ſhould not be in the king's power to pardon him without conſent of parliament; but without forfeiture of goods and chattels. Mr. Lawſon repreſented, that, the evidence againſt the biſhop being all either hearſay or conjecture, and therefore not to be depended upon, he ought to have no puniſhment at all. Mr. Oglethorp was of the ſame opinion, but gave it another turn. He ſaid, 'it was plain, the pretender had none but a company of ſilly fellows about him; and it was to be feared, that, if the biſhop, who was allowed to be a man of great parts, ſhould be baniſhed, he might be ſollicited and tempted to go to Rome, and there be in a capacity to do more miſchief by his advice, than if he was ſuffered to ſtay in England under the watchful eye of thoſe in power.' But the bill paſſed and was ſent up to the lords; before whom the biſhop was brought to his trial on the 9th of May; and, himſelf and his council having been heard, the lords in a grand committee went through the bill againſt him; and on the 15th the bill was read the third time; after which a motion being made for paſſing it, there aroſe a very long and warm debate.[s]

Earl Powlet, who opened the debate, ſpoke to the nature of this bill, ſhewed the danger of ſuch an extraordinary proceeding, and urged, that the ſwerving from fixed rules of evidence, and conſequently from juſtice, muſt inevitably be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences to our excellent conſtitution. Dr Willis, biſhop of Saliſbury, in anſwer to that alledged, that as extraordinary diſeaſes require extraordinary remedies; ſo in caſes of extreme danger and neceſſity, when the very being of the ſtates lies at ſtake, if the common law cannot reach offenders, the legiſlature ought to exert itſelf. He was replied to by dr. Gaſtrell, biſhop of Cheſter, who owned, that extraordinary proceedings may indeed be recurred to upon extraordinary occaſions, and when they are evidently neceſſary for the preſervation of the ſtate; but that was very far from the preſent caſe, ſince the conſpiracy, in which the biſhop of Rocheſter was charged to have had a ſhare, had been diſcovered and diſappointed long before. The duke of Wharton, in a long ſpeech, ſummed up the whole evidence, which had been produced againſt the biſhop of Rocheſter, and endeavoured to ſhew the inſufficiency of it to prove the charge; concluding, 'that, let the conſequences be what they would, he would not have ſuch a helliſh ſtain ſully the luſtre and glory of that illuſtrious houſe, as to condemn a man without the leaſt evidence;' and therefore was for rejecting the bill. He was ſtrongly ſupported by lord Bathurſt, who in the firſt place, took notice of the ungracious diſtinctions that were fixed upon the members of that noble and illuſtrious aſſembly, who differed in opinion from thoſe who happened to have the majority. That, for his own part, as he had nothing in view but truth and juſtice, the good of his country, the honour of that houſe, and the diſcharging of his own conſcience, he would freely ſpeak his thoughts, notwithſtanding all diſcouragements: that he would not complain of the ſiniſter arts that had been uſed of late to render ſome perſons obnoxious, and under pretence of their being ſo, to open their letters about their minuteſt domeſtic affairs. For theſe ſmall grievances he could eaſily bear, but when he ſaw things go ſo far, as to condemn a perſon of the higheſt dignity in the church, in ſuch an unprecedented manner, and without any legal evidence, he thought it his duty to oppoſe a proceeding ſo unjuſt and unwarrantable in itſelf, and ſo dangerous and diſmal in its conſequences. To this purpoſe he begged leave to tell their lordſhips a ſtory he had from ſeveral officers of undoubted credit, who had ſerved in Flanders in the late war. A Frenchman, it ſeems, had invented a machine, which would not only kill more men at once than any yet in uſe, but alſo diſable for ever any man who ſhould be wounded by it. Big with hopes of a great reward, he applied himſelf to one of the miniſters, who laid the project before the late French king; but the monarch conſidering, that ſo deſtructive an engine might ſoon be turned againſt his own men, did not think proper to encourage it: whereupon the inventor came over into England, and offered his ſervice to ſome of our generals, who likewiſe rejected the propoſal with indignation. The uſe and application of this ſtory is very obvious; for, if this way of proceeding be admitted, it will certainly prove a very dangerous engine. No man's life, liberty or property will be ſafe. And if thoſe, who were in the adminiſtration ſome years ago, and who had as great a ſhare in the affections of the people, as any that came after them, had made uſe of ſuch a political machine, ſome of thoſe noble perſons who now appear ſo zealous promoters of this bill, would not be in a capacity to ſerve his majeſty at this time. He added, that, if ſuch extraordinary proceedings went on, he ſaw nothing remaining from him and others to do, but to retire to their country houſes, and there, if poſſible, quietly enjoy their eſtates within their own families, ſince the leaſt correſpondence, the leaſt intercepted letter, might be made criminal. To this purpoſe he quoted a paſſage out of cardinal de Retz's memoirs, relating to that wicked politician, cardinal Mazarine, who boaſted, that, if he had but two lines of any man's writing, with a few circumſtances atteſted by witneſſes, he could cut off his head when he pleaſed. He likewiſe animadverted on the majority of the venerable bench, towards which turning himſelf, he ſaid he could hardly account for the inveterate hatred and malice ſome perſons bore the learned and ingenious biſhop of Rocheſter, unleſs it was, that they were intoxicated with the infatuation of ſome of the wild Indians, who fondly believe they inherit not only the ſpoils, but even the abilities of any great enemy they kill.'

The earl of Strafford ſpoke on the ſame ſide as did alſo the lord Trevor, who, among other arguments againſt the bill, urged, that, if men were in this unprecedented manner proceeded againſt without legal proof, in a ſhort time men would be tried as they were liked by miniſters: that, for his own part, he believed he ſtood but indifferently in the opinion and liking of ſome perſons, and therefore he had reaſon to think himſelf more in danger, becauſe at preſent they wanted the protection of the law (meaning the ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus act;) and as in a ſhort time they were like to be ſo unhappy, as to be deprived of his majeſty's perſonal protection, and were ſtill liable to be confined upon ſuſpicion, which he took to be no more than will and pleaſure, they were conſequenly at the will and pleaſure of the miniſters. That however no apprehenſion of what he might ſuffer ſhould deter him from doing what he thought his duty: that, conſonant to that principle, he had all along, and ſtill oppoſed theſe extraordinary proceeding, which tended to lodge an exorbitant power in their fellow-ſubjects. That if he were to loſe his liberty, he had rather give it up to one ſingle tyrant, than to many; for a tyrant, if a man of common underſtanding, would, for his own ſake, be tender of the lives of his ſubjects; whereas many tyrants would endeavour to deſtroy one another, to get one another's preferments. The lord Trevor having done ſpeaking, the earl of Seafield endeavoured to ſhew, that the evidence which had been produced before them, being ſufficient to convince any reaſonable man, that there had been a deteſtable conſpiracy, and that the biſhop of Rocheſter had a great ſhare in it, was likewiſe ſufficient to juſtify this extraordinary proceeding againſt him, eſpecially ſince they inflicted on him ſo light a puniſhment, conſidering the heinouſneſs of the crime. The duke of Argyle purſued the ſame argument; run through and confuted the moſt eſſential parts of the biſhop's defence; and aggravated his offence, by which he had debaſed his holy function and chraracter, and acted contrary to the ſolemn repeated oaths he had taken. The lord Gower ſpoke afterwards againſt the bill; but what ſurprized moſt people, the lord Lechmere, who, on ſeveral occaſions, had expreſſed his diſlike of theſe extraordinary proceedings, declared it as his opinion, that there was ſufficient evidence to ſupport the charge. He was anſwered by earl Cowper in a long ſpeech, importing in ſubſtance, that the ſtrongeſt argument which had been urged for this bill, was neceſſity; but that, for his part, he ſaw no neceſſity that could juſtify ſo unprecedented and ſo dangerous a proceeding. That, as already had been ſuggeſted, the conſpiracy had above a twelvemonth before been happily diſcovered, and the effects of it conſequently prevented. That, beſides the intrinſic weight and ſtrength of the government, by numerous offices and employments, civil and military, and the wealth and intereſt of well-affected to his majeſty's perſon and the preſent happy eſtabliſhment the hands of thoſe at the helm had ſtill been fortified by the ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus act and the additional troops; ſo that, in his opinion, there could be no danger to the government if Plunket and Kelly were not priſoners for life, nor the biſhop of Rocheſter ſent into baniſhment. That, on the contrary, if that prelate's talent and genius lay in contriving and carrying on ſtate intrigues, he thought him leſs dangerous at home than abroad: that the other reaſons alledged to ſupport this extraordinary proceeding had no more weight in them than the firſt: that the known rules of evidence, as laid down a firſt and eſtabliſhed by the law of the land, were the birthright of every ſubject of this nation, and ought to be conſtantly obſerved, not only in the inferior courts of judicature, but alſo in both houſes of parliament, till altered by the legiſlature: that much had been ſaid of the power of parliaments, which he owned was very great; but that, in his opinion, their abſolute power conſiſted only in making and repealing laws, and, till ſuch time as a law was repealed, every ſubject had a right to it. That the admitting of the precarious and uncertain evidence of the clerks of the poſt-office was a very dangerous precedent: that in former times it was thought very grievious, that, in capital caſes, a man ſhould be affected by ſimilitude of hands: but here the caſe was much worſe, ſince it was allowed, that the clerks of the poſt-office could carry the ſimilitude of hands, four months in their minds. That theſe men might be honeſt, and ſwear to the beſt of their knowledge; but he was ſure, they were at leaſt very willing and forward evidence: for as he aſked one of them, how he knew ſuch a paper to be mr. Kelly's hand? he readily anſwered, 'he had ſeen the ſame four months before, and he was ſure it could be no other:' whereas any man, who has never ſo little been converſant in the world, knows, that hands may be ſo well counterfeited, as not to be diſtinguiſhed. After this, he commended the biſhop of Rocheſter's noble and brave carriage in not anſwering before the houſe of commons, whoſe proceeding in this unprecedented manner againſt a lord of parliament was ſuch an incroachment on the prerogative of the peerage, that, if ſubmitted to by paſſing this bill, they might well be ſaid to be the laſt of lords. 'Ultimus Romanorum, my lords (ſaid he in the concluſion) was a character of honour and praiſe: but to be the laſt of Britiſh peers, by giving up our ancient privileges, will never, I doubt, admit of ſuch conſtruction; and therefore I am for rejecting this bill.' Little was ſaid of any great weight after this ſpeech; and, about half an hour paſt nine the queſtion being put, it was reſolved in the affirmative, that the bill ſhould paſs, by a majority of 83 voices againſt 43; upon which ſeveral lords entered their proteſt.

By this act the biſhop, from the 1ſt day of June, 1723, was to be deprived of all offices, dignities, promotions, and benefices eccleſiaſtical, and incapable of holding any for the future. He was alſo baniſhed the realm, and, in caſe he returned, he was to ſuffer death, as well as all perſons that correſponded with him.

When the report and the other papers were communicated to the lords by the commons, the earls of Scarſdale, Strafford and Cowper, the lords Craven, Gower, Bathurſt and Bingley complained, that, in the examinations, it is ſet forth, that John Plunket told Layer, that they were of a club or meeting, called, in Plunket's letters, Burford's club.[t] Theſe lords ſeverally declared the ſame to be falſe and groundleſs; and earl Cowper in particular made a long ſpeech, complaining of being mentioned in the report, on the bare hearſay of an infamous perſon, which was enough to give an air of fiction to the whole conſpiracy; and then moved, that Plunket ſhould be ſent for and examined. The lord Townſhend anſwered, 'that he was much ſurprized to find that a noble peer, whoſe abilities and merits had juſtly ſo great weight in that illuſtrious aſſembly, ſhould, upon a trivial circumſtance, ridicule, as a fiction, a horrid execrable conſpiracy, ſupported by ſo many concurring proofs, and from a falſe trifling particular infer, that no part of it was true.' As the debate was like to grow warm, ſome members called for the queſtion, and earl Cowper's motion was rejected by 81 againſt 26. The earl and mr. Hutchinſon publiſhed declarations againſt the falſe information of their being of the club, wherein they ſtrongly aſſerted their innocence.

The lords had alſo choſen by ballot a committee of nine, to whom the report and original papers were referred, to prepare what might be fit to be offered to the commons, by way of anſwer to what was delivered, at a conference relating to the papers. When the duke of Dorſet's report from the lords committees was taken into conſideration, it was reſolved, that a deteſtable conſpiracy had been formed for raiſing a rebellion, and laying violent hands on the king and prince: after which, the committee was thanked by the lord-chancellor, for having diſcharged their truſt with great exactneſs, fidelity, and candor.

Dr Friend, the phyſician, who had exerted himſelf very zealouſly for the biſhop of Rocheſter, was ſoon after taken into cuſtody; for, on the 15th of March, mr. Walpole acquainted the commons, 'that his majeſty, having had juſt reaſon to apprehend dr. John Friend (a member of this houſe) for high-treaſon, deſired the conſent of the houſe to his being committed and detained; and then he moved for an addreſs to that purpoſe.' This motion was oppoſed by mr. Shippen and mr. Bromley, who ſaid, they could not ſee any reaſon for that houſe giving leave for detaining any member, unleſs the ſpecies of treaſon was declared, and that the information was upon oath. Sir Joſeph Jekyll and mr. Walpole replied, that, by the late act for ſuſpending the habeas corpus, the king was impowered to take up any perſon he had reaſon to ſuſpect: that therefore the government was not obliged to ſay, whether the information was upon oath or not. But mr. Walpole added, he did not doubt but dr. Friend was charged upon oath; and privately declared to ſeveral members, that they had a poſitive oath of his being guilty of the blackeſt and baſeſt treaſon. Mr Shippen then ſuggeſting, that the doctor's having ſpoke ſo warmly the Monday before in mr. Kelly and the biſhop of Rocheſter's behalf, was, in his opinion, the reaſon of his being taken up the next day himſelf, and at that rate there was an end of the liberty of ſpeech, which every member of that houſe had a right to. Mr Walpole replied, he wondered any gentleman could think any miniſtry capable of ſo baſe a thing, as to take up any gentleman for what he ſaid in that houſe, without any other cauſe, when they knew themſelves to be accountable as well as others for their actions: adding, that they, who made ſuch inſinuations, might more eaſily be proved to be jacobites, than they could make out ſuch an allegation againſt the miniſtry. Mr Pulteney ſpoke on the ſame ſide; and, in relation to dr. Friend's having ſpoken in Kelly's behalf, obſerved, that it was uſual, in all conſpiracies, for one traitor to endeavour to excuſe another. Mr Shippen animadverted with ſome warmth upon this reflection, ſaying, it was not to be endured, to have a member of that houſe called a traitor, before he was convicted as ſuch. But, mr. Pulteney having explained himſelf, that matter ended, and then the motion for an addreſs was carried without a diviſion.

The affair which occaſioned the moſt talk, next to the plot, was the Harburgh lottery, which was brought before the parliament this ſeſſion. The lottery took its name from the place where it was to be drawn, the town and port of Harburgh on the river Elbe, within the king's German dominions, where the projector was to ſettle a trade for the woolen manufacture between England and Germany. The houſe of commons having appointed a committee to enquire into this and other lotteries, then carrying on in London, it was repreſented in their report, 'that the ſcheme propoſed, that 1,500,000l. ſterling, or 16,500,000 guilders, ſhould be ſubſcribed; and that it was to be drawn at Harburgh in five claſſes, 100,000 tickets to be drawn in each claſs at 3l. per ticket; and that every perſon ſubſcribing was to pay 12s. or ſix guilders for each ticket, before the drawing each claſs of the lottery. That 200,000l. of 300,000l. in each claſs was to be divided into lots, to the fortunate adventurers, which amounts to 1,000,000l. to be deducted out of the whole ſum, which was to be paid the fortunate adventurers. That a ſum of 1,000,000l. was ſubſcribed for, to carry on a trade between Great-Britain and his majeſty's German dominions; and that 2 per cent. was only paid in upon the ſtoc ſo ſubſcribed; of which a ſum of 13,000l. or more was actually paid in money, and 7000l. or more was ſecured by notes; 400,000l. whereof was ſubſcribed. At firſt, 100,000l. ſtoc was ſold at 15l. 3s. per cent. of which 2 per cent. was only paid into the company, and the reſt diſpoſed of as follows; 13l. 3s. per cent. which amounted to 13,150l. 10,000l. of which was given to mr. Nicolai; and 3,150l. to mr. Benjamin Joules, for their ſervices: and as to 13,000l. paid in money, and 7,000l. in notes, the committee could get no account what was become of it, not being able to ſee their books; nor c...

[t] Layer being aſked, if Plunket ever explained to him who were meant by Burford's club? Plunket told him, it was an appellation made uſe of by the pretender and his agents, to denote a club of tory lords and others, of which club lord Orrery was chairman, and conſiſted of the following members:

Lord Strafford,	Mr Hutchinſon,
Sir Henry Goring,	Biſhop of Rocheſter,
Lord Cowper,	Sir Conſtantine Phipps,
General Webb,	Mr Shippen,
Lord Bingley,	Lord Scarſdale,
Mr Dawkins,	Lord Bathurſt,
Lord Craven,	Lord Gower.

The committee thought it juſtice due to ſeveral of the perſons named by Layer, to obſerve, that the matters, aſſerted of Burford's club in Plunket's letters to Dillon, ſeemed utterly inconſiſtent with the known characters of ſome of thoſe perſons. See Report, the committee learn what number of tickets had been delivered out, or what money thereupon had been received, or what was become of what they had received. That with regard to the diſpoſition of the other 500,000l. 5 per cent. upon 1,500,000l. which amounts to 75,000l. was to be deducted for management; which being taken out of the ſaid 500,000l. leaves 425,000l. which ſum was to be incorporated into the ſtoc of the firſt company, and to make a part of a capital of 1,500,000l. as the committee apprehended, of which they could get no poſitive information. But whether the former capital was intended to be ſo great, or only to conſiſt of this 425,000l. and the 1,000,000l. which was before ſubſcribed, it appeared to the committee, that a plain fraud was intended in joining this real ſum with an imaginary ſubſcription; of which 2 per cent. only was paid in or ſecured, and that probably embezzled.' The truſtees of this lottery were twenty; ſome of whom were in Germany; the reſt, who were in England, were the lord Barrington, ſir John Hartop, Charles Frederick Krenbergh, John London, Fiennes Harriſon, Peter Hartop, William Squire, Edward Richier, John Caſwal, William Sterling, Benjamin Smith, Benjamin Burroughs, John Thompſon, Henry Bendiſh, —— Foſter, Benjamin Joules, and John Manley. But ſeveral of them reſigned their truſt immediately, being diſſatisfied with the ſcheme; for, when ſir Thomas Webſter, ſir Charles Wager, and lord Barrington waited upon lord Townſhend, lord Carteret, and mr. Walpole, they were told, that an Engliſh charter for the advantage of the lottery could not be granted, becauſe it was illegal and impracticable. Upon reading the report, the houſe came to the following reſolutions:

1. That the project, called the Harburgh lottery, carried on in the city of London, is an infamous fraudulent undertaking, whereby ſeveral unwary perſons have been drawn in to their great loſs; and that the manner of carrying the ſame on hath been a manifeſt violation of the laws of this kingdom.

2. That it appears to this houſe, that the managers of, and agents of the ſaid lottery, did frequently, without any authority for ſo doing, make uſe of his majeſty's royal name, thereby to give countenance to the infamous project, and induce his majeſty's ſubjects to engage, or be concerned therein. After which a bill was ordered to be brought in to ſuppreſs the lottery, and to prevent any foreign lotteries from being carried on in this kingdom; and to oblige the perſons concerned, in the management of the Harburgh lottery, to make reſtitution and ſatisfaction for the money they have received from the contributors. And it was alſo reſolved, nemine contradicente, That it appeared to this houſe, that John lord viſcount Barrington, of the kingdom of Ireland, a member of this houſe, has been notoriouſly guilty of promoting, abetting, and carrying on the fradulent undertaking, called the Harburgh lottery; and for that offence he be expelled the houſe.'

In December 1722, the emperor of Germany granted a patent for eſtabliſhing an Eaſt-India company in the Auſtrian Netherlands, the ſubſtance of which was, that they were impowered to open books of ſubſcription, wherein the ſubjects of any nation were admitted to ſubſcribe. The company was to be called the imperial company of commerce eſtabliſhed in Flanders. The fund conſiſted of eight millions of florins, and directors to be choſen annually. The nobility had the privilege of entering into this company, without derogation in the leaſt from their nobility: thoſe of any nation, who ſubſcribed 20,000 florins, were to be naturalized from that ſubſcription: and any perſon had the privilege to ſubſcribe what ſum he pleaſed above 1000 florins, but nothing leſs, to prevent confuſion in their accounts. The ſettlement of this company was ſaid to be chiefly owing to mr. Colebrooke, an Engliſh merchant.

Notwithſtanding the oppoſition they met with from the Engliſh, French, and Dutch, they opened their books, and had a full ſubſcription in a very few days, owing chiefly to the clandeſtine negotiations of their agents in England, France, and Holland, where great numbers of merchants ſubſcribed to that ſtoc, and maſters of Eaſt-India ſhips and ſupercargoes went to Oſtend, to enter into their ſervice, and put them in a way to eſtabliſh and carry on their tade, which they did effectually, to the great damage of the Engliſh, French, and Dutch companies. Monſieur de Fonſeca, the emperor's miniſter at Paris, ſignified to the duke of Orleans, then at the head of affairs there, that the emperor was much ſurprized at the moſt chriſtian king's forbidding his ſubjects to be any ways concerned in the Oſtend company. He was anſwered, 'that repreſentations had been made to the emperor, that he was engaged by treaty not to encourage any ſuch commerce; that, nevertheleſs, his imperial majeſty, without any regard to the ſaid repreſentations, had thought fit to grant a charter in favour thereof. That the moſt chriſtian king was maſter of his own kingdom, and not obliged to give an account of his actions, and therefore the emperor could not take amiſs the prohibition to his ſubjects, not to have any concern in the company ſet up at Oſtend.'

A memorial of the Dutch Eaſt-India company (which had been delivered to the ſtates in March) having been preſented to the commons this ſeſſion, together with an extract of another memorial ſent by the ſtates to the court of Vienna, concerning the Oſtend company, ſir Nathaniel Gould repreſented to the houſe the great damage the Eaſt-India company had already received, and was like farther to receive by the Oſtend company; it was unanimouſly reſolved, 'that for the ſubjects of this kingdom to ſubſcribe, or be concerned in encouraging any ſubſcription, to promote an Eaſt-India company, now erecting in the Auſtrian Netherlands, is a high-crime and miſdemeanor.' Accordingly a bill paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent, to prevent the king's ſubjects from ſubſcribing or being concerned in the Oſtend Eaſt-India company.

There had been ſeveral general courts held by the South-ſea company about transferring two millions of their ſtoc to the Bank of England, which was at laſt agreed on by the two companies. A petition had likewiſe been preſented to the commons for the reviving the two millions that had been annihilated. Accordingly an act paſſed this ſeſſion, whereby it was enacted, that the two millions ſhould be revived, and added to the capital ſtoc, and divided among the proprietors. By the ſame act, the whole capital, computed at 33,802,483l. 14s. was to be divided into two equal parts, one of which amounting to 16,901,241l. 17s. was to be called 'the joint ſtoc of South-ſea annuities,' attended with annuities payable out of the South-ſea company's funds in lieu of all dividends, viz. at 5l. per cent. till June 27, 1727, and from thence at 4l. per cent. till redeemed. The other moiety was to remain in the company as a joint-ſtoc, attended with the reſidue of the yearly funds, payable at the Exchequer, till redemption, and alſo attended with the ſeveral ſums for charges of management, and with all benefits of trade, &c. And, as concerning the moiety ſo converted into South-ſea annuities, every proprietor ſhould be intitled to annuities at 5l. per cent. till June 24, 1727, and from thence at 4l. per cent. and the company ſhould receive at the Exchequer, out of the duties charged with their whole annuities yearly, the intereſt of the ſame moiety, till redemption, in truſt for the proprietors: and all powers in force were to be continued for ſecuring the joint ſtoc of South-ſea annuities, and the yearly funds to attend the ſame. The annuities were payable half-yearly, at Lady-day and Michaelmas.

An act paſſed this ſeſſion for the more effectual execution of juſtice, in a pretended privileged place in the pariſh of St. George, commonly called the Mint, where great numbers of debtors had taken ſanctuary.

On the 27th of May, the king put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am perſuaded, notwithſtanding the unuſual length of this ſeſſion, you will not think your time has been miſemployed in conſulting the neceſſary means for preſerving the peace and quiet of the kingdom; and bringing to juſtice ſome of the chief promoters of that confuſion which lately threatened the nation.

'The prudent meaſures you have taken for our common ſecurity, and your enabling me to defend my kingdom againſt any deſigns or attempts of our enemies, are the moſt convincing teſtimonies of your fidelity and affection to me, and of your concern for the liberties of my people. Be aſſured, the confidence you have repoſed in me ſhall never be made uſe of but for their ſafety and defence.

'The papers, which have been laid before you, for your information, and have been ſince publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the world, evidently ſhew that the conſpirators had brought their wicked arts and practices to ſuch perfection, that they confidently carried on their traiterous projects in defiance of the law, from aſſurances of their being able to elude it. The reſpect and reverence due to the law had been loſt, and the tranquility of my people endangered, had not you interpoſed. This made it neceſſary for the legiſlature to exert itſelf, in puniſhing ſuch offenders, whoſe gilt is too certain to leave the leaſt room for doubt, and whoſe crimes are too heinous to admit of any aggravation.

'And yet it is with pleaſure I reflect, that the juſtice of parliament has been ſo tempered with mercy, that even thoſe who are reſolved to be diſſatisfied, muſt acknowledge the lenity of your proceedings, and will be at a loſs for any pretence to complain, ſo few examples having been made, and the penalties inflicted by bill falling ſo much ſhort of the puniſhments due for the ſame crimes, by the common courſe of law.

'The firmneſs you have ſhewn, muſt convince all the world, how much they were miſtaken, whoſe chief hopes were founded on the diſaffection of my people. It gave me great ſatisfaction to ſee as general a concurrence in full parliament upon this occaſion, as has been known on any former: and it is to be hoped, our enemies will ceaſe to flatter themſelves with the vain imagination of being able to ſubvert our religion and preſent eſtabliſhment.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I muſt acknowledge, in a particular manner, the great readineſs you have ſhewn in raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies for the enſuing year. It is an unexpected felicity, that you have been able ſo far to diſappoint the hopes of our enemies, as to avoid laying any new burthen upon my people; and that ſo ſoon after that great ſhoc and convulſion in all the public funds, and in the midſt of inteſtine alarms and diſturbances, the credit of the nation ſhould ſo far revive and flouriſh, that not only the ſupplies of the year ſhould be raiſed at a much lower intereſt, than was ever known in the moſt quiet times, and part of the national debt ſhould be reduced from an intereſt of 5 to 3 per cent. and put in a courſe of being ſoon diſcharged.

My Lords and Gentleman,

'I return you my moſt ſincere thanks for the indefatigable pains you have taken in the ſervice of the public. I earneſtly recommend it to you, in your ſeveral ſtations and countries, to perſevere in your endeavours, for preſerving the peace of the kingdom; by juſtice and reſolution to ſubdue the reſtleſs ſpirit of faction and ſedition; and by prudence and temper to reconcile the miſled.

'Some extraordinary affairs calling me abroad this ſummer, I doubt not but that the wiſdom and vigilance of my good ſubjects will prevent our enemies from taking any advantage of my abſence. To gain the hearts and affections of my people ſhall always be my firſt and principal care. On their duty and loyalty I will entirely depend. They may as ſurely depend on my protection, in the full enjoyment of their religion, liberty, and property.'

The king, whom the conſpiracy had detained in England the laſt year, had no ſooner put an end to the ſeſſion, but he ſet out for his German dominions. He embarked for Holland the 3d of June, and after ſtaying two days with his brother the biſhop of Oſnabrug, arrived the 11th at Herenhauſen. He appointed lords-juſtices in his abſence as uſual, the prince being ſtill excluded, who was now in his forty-firſt year. The lord Harcourt, formerly ſo ſtrictly united with the earl of Oxford and queen Anne's other miniſters, and who had defended them with ſo much zeal, was one of the lords-juſtices. Mr Walpole was likewiſe of the number, and acted as ſecretary of ſtate, in the abſence of the lords Townſhend and Carteret, who were with the king. It was intended to advance him to the peerage, but he choſe rather to have that honour conferred on his ſon, who was made baron Walpole, of Walpole, in the county of Norfolk.[x] About the ſame time mr. Pulteney, chairman of the late committee of ſecrecy, was made cofferer of the houſehold; and Philip, lord Stanhope, captain of the yeomen of the guard; dr. Gibſon was tranſlated from Lincoln to London, dr. Reynolds from Bangor to Lincoln, and dr. Bradford from Carliſle to Rocheſter; dr. Waugh was promoted to Carliſle, and dr. Willis, on the death of dr. Trimnel, to Wincheſter; dr. Hoadley was tranſlated from Hereford to Saliſbury; dr. Green, on the death of dr. Fleetwood, from Norwich to Ely; dr. Leng was made biſhop of Norwich, and dr. Egerton, brother to the duke of Bridgwater, of Hereford.

The king, before his departure, ſhewed his clemency to thoſe who had been taken up on account of the plot. The earl of Orrery was releaſed from his confinement, and admitted to bail, as were alſo the duke of Norfolk, the lord North and Grey, Dennis Kelly, Thomas Cochran, and Swathfogger, and the earl of Orrery's ſecretary. On the 20th of June, dr. Friend was admitted to bail; and, two days after, dr. Atterbury embarked on board the Aldborough, a ſmall man of war, which had orders to land him in France. He was put on ſhore at Calais, accompanied with his daughter, mrs. Morrice, and her huſband, who was high-bailiff of Weſtminſter. At Calais he was told, that the lord Bolingbroke, having obtained his pardon, was juſt arrived there in his way to England: upon which the biſhop merrily ſaid, 'then I am exchanged.' The king had granted the lord Bolingbroke a pardon the day after the parliament broke up, of which one of his friends inſtantly ſet out for France to bring him word. He immediately returned to England to plead his pardon, in expectation that a new parliament would repeal his attainder. The lord Harcourt had prevailed with the king to ſhew him this favour; though mr. Walpole had oppoſed it at the council-board with unanſwerable arguments: he was againſt looſening the hands of one, who (as he ſaid) he foreſaw, from his former conduct and ambition, and the natural reſtleſneſs of his temper, would go any lengths to poiſon the minds of the ſubjects, in order to diſturb the national tranquility, that he himſelf might the eaſier arrive at power. But, notwithſtanding his diſapprobation, he was forced to give way.[y]

Before the king left England, it was agreed in council, that the troops ſhould be incamped as they had been the laſt ſummer, and that the horſe-guards ſhould be quartered round Hyde-park, in order to be ready to aſſemble, if there ſhould be occaſion.

Theſe meaſures kept all things quiet in Great-Britain, during the king's ſeven months abſence. The ſame reaſons which had required his preſence abroad, detained him perhaps longer than he intended. He was received in his dominions in the moſt agreeable manner, and was complimented by at leaſt twelve foreign miniſters. The king and queen of Pruſſia waited likewiſe upon him, by which means his court was as ſplendid, and as much the ſcene of affairs, as ever the court of Great-Britain had been.

Affairs were then at a ſort of criſis: the uſeleſneſs of the congreſs of Cambray and of Brunſwick, where little had been done, having worn out the patience of the princes, whoſe intereſts were to be determined there, they entered into ſeparate negotiations, and ſought the means of coming to an agreement. The czar and king of Sweden were going to conclude a treaty favourable to the duke of Holſtein's pretenſions to Sleſwick, of which king George had guaranteed the poſſeſſion to the king of Denmark: it was to be feared, that this treaty might affect even Bremen and Verden, lately annexed to the electorate of Hanover.

On the other hand, France and Spain ſeemed to be ſincerely reconciled, and willing to unite againſt the emperor. The regent had projected a marriage between the king of France and the infanta of Spain, then three years old, and had married his ſecond daughter, Mademoiſelle de Montpenſier to the prince of Aſturias, and a year after, another daughter, to Don Carlos, eldeſt ſon of Philip V. by his ſecond wife. Theſe two powers endeavoured to draw the czar to their ſide; they offered new treaties to England, more advantageous than the former, in regard to trade, but ſtrongly inſiſted upon the reſtitution of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon; and it was wiſhed, that court would not be concerned in the affairs of Italy, and would declare openly againſt the Oſtend company.

This ſituation of ſo oppoſite intereſts was full of difficulties. The emperor, preſſed too much, might declare for the czar and the Swede: Poland, confined between theſe [x] The lord Townſhend's eldeſt ſon was called up to the houſe of peers, by the title of baron Townſhend of Lynn-Regis, and made one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, in the room of lord Tynham, who ſome days before ſhot himſelf, and died an hour after.

The preample to the lord Walpole began thus:

Our moſt beloved and moſt faithful counſellor Robert Walpole, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, with the aſſiſtance of other ſelect perſons, and chancellor of our exchequer, having highly recommended himſelf to our royal favour by his many ſervices to us, to our houſe, and to his own country, we did not think him unworthy to be advanced to the rank of the peers of our realm. But, though he rather chuſes to merit the higheſt titles than to wear them, we have however thought fit, in order to enoble his family, to confer on the ſon the honour due to the father, and to raiſe to the peerage Robert Walpole, junior, eſq. &c.

[y] Mr Walpole's conduct, with regard to this tranſaction, and many more was not unlike the lord Clarendon's, who ſays of himſelf, 'that he had often, as believing himſelf obliged in duty, argued in the Senate in favour of many points, which he had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed at the Council-Table.' The reaſons on which miniſters found their conduct on ſuch occaſions, are obvious to every man of common penetration.

It is obſerved from the lord Bolingbroke's pardon, that mr. Walpole held not then the firſt rank, either in power or confidence, but that the direction of affairs, particularly the foreign, after the death of the earls Stanhope and Sunderland, was chiefly conducted by the lord Townſhend and baron Bothmar.

three powers, could not help taking part with them: almoſt all Italy exclaimed againſt the treaty of London: the pope had proteſted againſt any deciſions at Cambray to the prejudice of his right: the king of Sardinia, the dukes of Tuſcany, Parma and Modena, had preſented memorials equivalent to ſo many proteſtations: France and Spain were inclined to ſupport them: war was every where on the point of breaking out: England, engaged by ſo many treaties, and her own intereſts, muſt have been concerned: for king George to declare againſt the emperor was expoſing his German dominions, and helping to ſtrengthen two powers already very formidable to the reſt of Europe: to take part with the emperor was ſupporting the new eſtabliſhment at Oſtend, and aiming againſt himſelf France, Spain, and perhaps Ruſſia and Sweden.

King George overcame all theſe difficulties, or at leaſt ſuſpended their ill conſequences. He entered into ſtricter alliances with the kings of Pruſſia and Denmark: he uſed his endeavours to prevail with the emperor to be more ready to end his differences with Spain, and to deſiſt from the affair of Oſtend, againſt which his ſubjects in particular, and his faithful allies, the ſtates-general, were extremely incenſed. In England, as hath been related, the commons had voted againſt it.

One of the king's principal deſigns, when he came to Hanover, was to perſuade the court of Vienna to deſiſt from erecting the Oſtend India company: he laboured conſtantly at it, but the ſucceſs did not anſwer his good intentions: that court promiſed, in general, not to do any thing contrary to treaties, and the rights of others, but avoided to enter into any diſcuſſion, and diſregarded the repreſentations that were made from all parts.

It was the ſame with reſpect to the czar. So that the king's journey proved fruitleſs, and the negotiations might have been as well carried on at London as at Hanover. Something was alſo done for the proteſtants, whoſe complaints continued, becauſe they were ſtill oppreſſed, and new grievances were added to the old. The king of Pruſſia readily entered into the deſign to procure them eaſe and tranquility.

This union put a ſtop at leaſt to greater calamities; and appeared to be very cordial. King George ſpent four or five days at Berlin, where he was received and treated with reſpect and magnificence. The two ſecretaries of ſtate, the lords Townſhend and Carteret, who attended him, had frequent conferences with the king of Pruſſia's miniſters, in order to conclude ſome alliance to prevent the czar's deſigns in favour of the duke of Holſtein; the propoſals were neither rejected nor received, and aſſurance was given that no engagement ſhould be made contrary to what had been agreed.

All was quiet in England: however there appeared now and then ſome ſparks of diviſion, which ſhewed the parties ſtill ſubſiſted, and had not altered their ſentiments. At the election of the ſheriffs this year, the rabble was ſpirited up at London, by the oppoſition which the new ſheriffs, ſir Richard Hopkins and mr. Feaſt, met with from the old ones, mr. Humphrey Parſons and mr. Child, who endeavoured to have the election fall upon ſir John Williams and mr. Lockwood. Hopkins and Feaſt were declared duly elected by the lord-mayor and aldermen; notwithſtanding Parſons and Child had made a contrary declaration in favour of Williams and Lockwood, but the lord-mayor having diſſolved the common-hall, after the court had declared Hopkins and Feaſt duly choſen, the old ſheriffs could not meet them after the laſt adjournment, as they intended to have done, but were prevented by the lord-mayor and aldermen's prior declaration. Feaſt oppoſed Williams in the election of an alderman for Cripplegate-ward, which being alſo conteſted, was decided by the court of aldermen in favour of Williams, upon which the rabble broke the windows of the well-affected in that ward, and committed ſeveral outrages, for which ſome of the ring-leaders were taken, and committed to Newgate.

Purſuant to an act of parliament lately paſt, requiring all perſons to take the oaths before the 25th of December, or to regiſter their eſtates, the ſeſſions, held by the juſtices of the peace over all the kingdom, were crowded with perſons of all ſexes and condition for that purpoſe.

The king, having been informed that his ſubjects in Ireland were in want of ſmall money, made a contract with William Wood to furniſh that kingdom with copper halfpence and farthings. The copper was to be of ſuch fineneſs, and the money of ſuch a weight, as agreed upon in the patent granted for that purpoſe. When this money came to be circulated in Ireland, great clamour was raiſed againſt it, and the parliament which met on the 5th of September, came to theſe reſolutions:

That the importing and uttering of copper halfpence and farthings, by virtue of Wood's patent, would be prejudicial to the revenue, deſtructive of trade, and of dangerous conſequence to the rights of the ſubject: that the ſtate of the nation had been miſrepreſented to the king, in order to obtain the patent: that the halfpence wanted weight: and, though the terms of the patent had been complied with, there would have been a loſs to the nation of 150l. per cent. That it had been always highly prejudicial to the kingdom to grant the power of coinage to private perſons, and would at all times be of dangerous conſequence.

Addreſſes from both houſes, agreeable to theſe reſolutions, were tranſmitted to the king, who, in anſwer to the commons, ſaid, 'he was very much concerned, that his granting the patent for coining of halfpence and farthings, agreeable to the practice of his royal predeceſſors, had given ſo much uneaſineſs to the houſe of commons; and if there had been any abuſes committed by the patentee, his majeſty would give the neceſſary orders for enquiring into, and puniſhing thoſe abuſes, and do every thing, that was in his power, for the ſatisfaction of his people.'

Purſuant to this anſwer (for which the commons returned an addreſs of thanks) the affair was referred to the lords of the privy-council in England, by whom a report of it was drawn up in July the next year. In this report they juſtified the conduct of the patentee, and obſerved, that his majeſty having ordered, that an aſſay ſhould be made of the fineneſs, value, and weight of mr. Wood's copper money, and the goodneſs thereof, compared with the former coinages of copper money for Ireland, and the copper money coined in his mint in England, it had been accordingly referred to ſir Iſaac Newton, mr. Southwell, and mr. Scroope, to make the aſſay and trial; and it appeared, 'that the pix of the copper monies coined at Briſtol by mr. Wood for Ireland, containing the trial pieces, which was ſealed and locked up at the time of coining, was opened at his majeſty's mint at the Tower: that the comptroller's account of the halfpence and farthings coined agreed with mr. Wood's account, amounting to 59 tons, 3 hundred, 1 quarter, 11 pounds, and 4 ounces: that by the ſpecimens of this coinage, which had from time to time been taken from the ſeveral parcels coined, and ſealed up in papers, and put into the pix, 60 halfpence weighed 14 ounces troy, and 18 penny-weights, which is about a quarter of an ounce above one pound weight averdupois; and 30 farthings weighed 3 ounces and 3 quarters of an ounce troy, and 46 grains; which is alſo above the weight required by the patent: that both halfpence and farthings, when heated red hot, ſpread thin under the hammer, without cracking: that the copper, of which mr. Wood's coinage is made, is of the ſame goodneſs and value with the copper of which the copper money is coined in his majeſty's mint for England, and worth in the market about 13 pence per pound weight averdupois: that a pound of copper wrought into bars and fillets, and made fit for coinage, before brought into the mint at the Tower of London, is worth 18 pence per pound, and always coſt as much, and is coined into 23 pence of copper money by tale for England. That the halfpence and farthings coined by mr. Wood, when compared with the copper money coined for Ireland in the reigns of king Charles II. king James II. and kind William and queen Mary, conſiderably exceeds them all in goodneſs, fineneſs, and value of the copper, none of them bearing the fire ſo well, not being milleable, waſting very much in the fire, and great part of them burning into a cinder of little or no value at all.' The fact being thus proved to be on the ſide of mr. Wood, the lords committees ſhew, that his majeſty's royal predeceſſors always exerciſed the undoubted prerogative of granting patents for copper coinage in Ireland to private perſons, none of which patents were equally beneficial to that kingdom, nor ſo well guarded with proper covenants and condition for the due execution of the powers thereby granted, as this of mr. Wood, though the validity of theſe patents, and a due compliance with them, was never in any one inſtance till this time diſputed or controverted. They then prove, that mr. Wood's patent was not, as had been ſuggeſted in Ireland, obtained clandeſtinely, in an unprecedented manner, but after a reference to the attorney and ſollicitor-general, and after ſir Iſaac Newton had been conſulted in all the ſteps of ſettling it. In the laſt place they made it plainly appear by a cloud of witneſſes, that there was a real want of ſmall money in Ireland, to make ſmall payments. But, mr. Wood having, in compliance with the clamour induſtriouſly raiſed againſt his coinage, produced to reduce his coinage from 100,000l. to 40,000l. value it was thought fit to accept of it, and to ſend directions to Ireland accordingly. [z]

The parliament of Ireland paſſed ſeveral acts, and particularly one for accepting the quakers affirmation inſtead of an oath; and granted 340,000l. ſupply toward paying off the debt of the nation, which was about 660,000l. and for the ſupport of the eſtabliſhment for two years.

On the 10th of October died earl Cowper, eminent for his integrity in the diſcharge of the office of lord-chancellor, which he had twice filled. There may have been chancellors of more extenſive learning, but none of more knowledge in the laws of England. His judgment was quic, and yet ſolid. His eloquence manly, but flowing. His manner graceful and noble. [a]

The king was ſtill at Hanover when he heard of the duke of Orlean's death, who, under the title of prime-miniſter, governed France as abſolutely as he had done during the minority of Lewis XV. King George was much concerned at the news: the mutual eſteem they had for each other, their circumſtances and intereſts which were not unlike, begot a firm friendſhip between them, whereof they gave on all occaſions the moſt effectual proofs. The duke died of an apoplexy, in the 50th year of his age, and according to his deſire, before his deceaſe, the duke of Bourbon was nominated prime-miniſter.

As the death of the duke of Orleans might occaſion great alterations, and as it was uncertain whether the new miniſter would enter into the views of his predeceſſor, the king haſtened his return to England. Being detained by contrary winds ſome days in Holland, he received their aſſurances, from the part of France, of good diſpoſition of that court, to cultivate, and even improve, the union eſtabliſhed by the late duke of Orleans, between the two ſtates.

[1723-24] The king came to London the 19th of December, and on the 9th of January the parliament met, and was opened by the following ſpeech delivered as uſual by the lord-chancellor:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I cannot open this ſeſſion without congratulating you upon the ſucceſs of your endeavours laſt year for the ſafety, intereſt, and honour of the kingdom. The riſe of the public credit, the flouriſhing condition of our trade and manufactures, and the general tranquility of my people, are the happy conſequences of your prudent reſolutions. It is to be hoped, that the few examples, which were made of ſome notorious offenders, will be ſufficient to deter the moſt diſaffected from engaging in the like deſperate and wicked practices. The augmentation you thought fit to make to our national forces, by ſea and land, has not only ſecured the general quiet of the kingdom againſt any ſudden attempts or inſurrections, but has alſo given me ſuch weight and credit in all foreign negotiations, as greatly contribute towards the preſervation of the peace of Europe.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I will order the proper officers to lay before you the eſtimates for the ſervice of the current year. I deſire ſuch ſupplies only, as you ſhall find abſolutely neceſſary for preſerving the peace of the kingdom, and for the ſecurity of my people; and thoſe, I hope, may be raiſed without laying any additional charge or burden on my ſubjects.

'I muſt in a particular manner, recommend to your care the public debts of the kingdom, as the moſt national concern you can poſſibly take into your conſideration. I am perſuaded, it muſt be a very great ſatisfaction to all my faithful ſubjects, to ſee the ſinking fund improved and augmented, and the debt of the nation thereby put into a method of being ſo much the ſooner gradually reduced and paid off. It would be a work truly worthy of a Britiſh parliament to begin this commendable undertaking, and to make ſuch a progreſs therein, as, with a ſtrict regard to public faith and private property, may pave the way to this great and deſirable end.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'In the preſent happy ſituation of our affairs, I have nothing more to recommend to you, than that you would make uſe of the opportunity, which your own good conduct has put into your hands, in conſidering of ſuch farther laws, as may be wanting for the eaſe and encouragement of trade and navigation, for the employment of the poor, and for the exciting and encouraging a ſpirit of induſtry in the nation.

'I am fully ſatisfied, that the trade and wealth of my people are the happy effects of the liberties they enjoy; and that the grandeur of the crown conſiſts in their proſperity: and I am as fully perſuaded, that all who wiſh well to their country, muſt agree, with me, that it is the vaineſt of all deluſions to imagine, that the religion, laws, and liberties of this kingdom can ever be ſecured, but by ſupporting the preſent eſtabliſhment, and maintaining the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line. Let us therefore heartily join in every thing, that may tend to promote our mutual happineſs, and to extinguiſh the hopes of thoſe, who long have been, and are ſtill reſtleſs in their endeavours to ſubject this nation to the whole train of miſeries, that are inſeparable from popery and arbitrary power.'

This ſpeech drew from both houſes addreſſes of thanks, with aſſurances of maintaining the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and the ſucceſſion in his majeſty's family, as the only ſolid foundation of quietly enjoying their religion, laws, and liberties.

The commons, according to cuſtom, proceeded to raiſe the ſupplies, which were granted according to the eſtimate laid before them by the court. Ten thouſand ſeamen at 4l. a month each, were voted for the ſea-ſervice, and the army was continued on the ſame foot as laſt year. The affair of the army occaſioned a warm debate, chiefly about the four thouſand additional troops raiſed the year before, which the oppoſers inſiſted to have diſbanded; but it was carried againſt them, and reſolved that the number of effective men, for the year 1724 (including 1815 invalids) ſhould be 18264. A land-tax of two ſhillings in the pound, with the malt-tax, was granted towards defraying the expences of the enſuing year.

As the king had particularly recommended to their care the public debts of the nation, the commons took the ſame into conſideration, and came to the following reſolutions:

[z] Notwithſtanding this deciſion of the privy-council of England, dean Swift, in his paper, called, 'the draper of Dublin,' repreſented this affair in the blackeſt colours, and is ſuppoſed to be the author of a lampoon upon it, beginning with theſe words:

Now, altho' to draw water is not very good,
Yet we all ſhould rejoice to be hewers of Wood.

[a] In September this year, four Engliſh gentlemen were barbarouſly murdered in France. Mr Seabright and mr. Monpeſſon, accompanied by mr. Davis, paſſing over to Calais in their way to Paris, ſet out from thence for that city the 12th of September, mr. Seabright and mr. Davis in one chaiſe, mr. Monpeſſon and Richard Spindelow, mr. Seabright's man, in another, and mr. Monpeſſon's ſervant on horſe bac. About ſeven miles from Calais they were attacked by ſix ruffians well mounted, who ſtopped the poſtilions, came up to the chaiſes, and demanded their money, which the gentlemen readily ſurrendered, they having no fire-arms to make reſiſtance, and even their ſwords were taken from them. The robbers then, taking them out of the chaiſes, commanded them to lie down upon their faces, and the poſtilions to do the ſame. After which the villains rifled their pockets, and ſearched them very narrowly; which done, they ordered Spindelow to get up and open the portmanteaus, which as he was doing, he ſaw one of the rogues pull the dead body of mr. Locke out of a chaiſe in which he had been killed in his return from Paris, at ſome ſmall diſtance from that place; mr. Locke's ſervant, a Swiſs, was ſpared, but made to lie on his face. When they had done with mr. Seabright's portmanteau, they ordered mr. Monpeſſon to open his, and he deſired mr. Seabright to tell them in French, his ſervant was gone before, and had the key with him. This man they had ſhot in the bac, but not being dead, he was commanded to lie down on his face, and now they fetched him to open his maſter's portmanteau; when they had finiſhed their ſearch, they cried, 'Tuez, kill!' they firſt ſhot mr. Seabright through the heart, mr. Davis was ſhot and ſtabbed in ſeveral places, and his ſkull cleft; they ſtabbed Spindelow in five places in his body, and left him for dead, mr. Monpeſſon at the ſame time received a ſhot which had laid him ſprawling on the ground. A peaſant of the neighbourhood, was going to Calais for a licence to marry, unfortunately paſſing that way, was alſo murdered, and mr. Monpeſſon, who had lain as if he had been dead, lifting up his head before the murderers were gone, one of them came bac to him and cut his throat; but he and Spindelow made a ſhift, with the help of ſome of the country people, to get bac to Calais, where mr. Monpeſſon died 36 hours after, and Spindelow recovering his wounds, returned to England. The dead bodies of the four Engliſh gentlemen were brought to England, and landed at Tower-wharf, four days after, where they were received by their friends, who gave them decent interment; and George Turville, eſq. of the Middle Temple, who happened to paſs by the place where theſe gentlemen were murdered, a few hours after the ſaid murder was committed, while the dead bodies, ſtripped naked by the country people, yet lay on the high road, gave orders for erecting a monument of blac marble, in form of a pyramid, on the ſpot where the murder happened, by permiſſion of the duke de Humiers, governor of the Bolougnois, and the biſhop of Bologne. Theſe robbers and aſſaſſins robbed the Liſle ſtage coach, ſeven miles from Peronne, two months afterwards, and killed Poulart and Heunelet, two perſons that accompanied the coach; two of the rogues, Joſeph Bizean, a jeweller of Liege, and Peter le Fehvre, another jeweller, being taken, were tried and condemned at Paris in July following, by this moſt dreadful ſentence: 'to be put to the rac, to have their arms, legs, and thighs broken on a ſcaffold, and to have their bodies put upon wheels, there to remain with their faces towards the ſky as long as they had life, and Bizean's dead body to be carried and remain expoſed on a wheel upon the high road to Calais, and le Fehvre's on the high road to Peronne,' which ſentence was executed to the full.

That, towards leſſening the public debt, the annuities of 5l. per cent. charged on the general fund, by a clauſe in the act of the 5th of his majeſty's reign, except ſuch as had been ſubſcribed into the South-ſea, ſhould be paid off at Lady-day 1724, as alſo the unſubſcribed blanks of the lottery of 1714. That all theſe ſhould be diſcharged, with the money ariſing from the ſinking fund, as well as the two annuities, which by the act, entitled, 'an act for redeeming certain annuities, payable by the caſhier of the Bank at 5l. per cent. were enacted to be redeemed at Lady-day, 1724.' Purſuant to theſe reſolutions, a bill was brought in, which, paſſing both houſes, received the royal aſſent.

Protections from foreign miniſters, peers, and members of parliament, having long been the ſubject of complaint, a liſt of the names of the perſons protected by written certificates was laid before the commons, and it was reſolved, 'that all protections and written certificates of the members of this houſe be declared void in law, and be forthwith withdrawn and called in; and that none be granted for the future; and that, if any ſhall be granted by any member, ſuch member ſhall make ſatisfaction to the party injured, and ſhall be liable to the cenſure of the houſe.' This order was to be printed and ſet up in the courts of juſtice, and diſtributed by the ſheriffs in their ſeveral counties.

The ſame grievance being taken into conſideration by the lords, after ſome debate, the following declaration was made, 'that all the written protections are null and void; and all other protections, which ſhall be at any time hereafter given, ſhall be taken to be null and void.' But this order is not to extend to menial ſervants, nor thoſe employed neceſſarily and properly about the eſtates of peers, or any who are really their ſervants.

In this ſeſſion, the inland duty was laid on coffee, tea, and chocolate, which has been a conſiderable increaſe to the public revenue.

The affair of the army cauſed the greateſt debate in the houſe of lords. There had been the laſt year an addition of four thouſand men on account of the conſpiracy, which was now propoſed to be continued. The commons had agreed to it, and paſſed the bill; but the continuance of theſe additional troops met with great oppoſition in the houſe of lords. The two moſt remarkable ſpeeches were the lord Trevor's againſt it, and the lord Townſhend's for it. [b] It was obſerved, that the lord North and Grey, the earl of Orrery, the lord Barthurſt, and others of that party, appeared very zealous for the reduction of the army, which cauſed the duke of Argyle to ſay in his ſpeech, 'that, if he ſaw the nation unanimous in opinion, that our laws, liberties, properties, and holy religion, entirely depend on the preſent happy ſettlement, and on the proteſtant ſucceſſion in his majeſty's royal family, he would readily give his vote for reducing the army. But he was very much afraid, that ſome people ſo ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the diſbanding of the additional troops, with no other deſign than to weaken

[b] As theſe ſpeeches contain the chief arguments on both ſides, they are here inſerted at large:

The lord Trevor ſaid, 'That, the conſpiracy mentioned in the king's ſpeech at the opening of the laſt ſeſſion of Parliament, which was the occaſion of this augmentation, of the land-forces, being now happily extinguiſhed, and thereby the cauſe of raiſing that aditional number being perfectly removed there was not the leaſt reaſon or pretence for continuing that number. That the keeping on foot a greater army in time of peace, than was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity of the king's perſon and government, was very dangerous to our happy conſtitution: and, conſidering the great tranquility we enjoy both at home and abroad, he could not but apprehend, the number of regular forces allowed by this bill to be much greater than was neceſſary for that end. That, if ſo great an army was allowed to be continued in our preſent happy circumſtances, a ſtanding army would thereby become an eſſential part of our conſtitution, ſince the reaſons for keeping it up in perpetuity would grow ſtronger every year, and in every ſucceeding reign. For on the one hand it cannot, with any probability, be foreſeen or expected, that in any future time there will be leſs reaſon to be given, than at preſent, for juſtifying the neceſſity of keeping up ſo great an army, there being now as little danger to our preſent happy eſtabliſhment to be feared either from inſurrections at home, or by any diſturbance or invaſions from abroad, as the nature and inſtability of human affairs will allow of. And on the other hand, if ſo numerous an army be at preſent allowed of in parliament, no argument can hereafter be urged for the reducing the number in any future reign, but what will ſeem to carry with it too great a diſtruſt of the prince then on the throne, and will be conſtrued to imply, that the ſame confidence is not to be repoſed in him, as in his predeceſſors.' His lordſhip added, 'That it was not out of any diſtruſt he entertained either of his majeſty or his miniſters, that he was for reducing part of the army. That, on the contrary, he was fully convinced, his majeſty will never make an ill uſe of his power, of which they had a ſure earneſt in the equity and moderation, with which his majeſty had governed hitherto: but, that as they could not promiſe themſelves, nor expect, that ſo good and ſo juſt a king ſhould always fill the throne, it was prudence early to prevent the inconveniences and dangers, to which our excellent conſtitution and liberties would be expoſed, in caſe, in any ſucceeding reign, an ambitious prince and ill miniſters ſhould have ſo great a number of troops at their diſpoſal. That it was notorious, that all the ſtates of Europe, that have loſt their liberties, have been inſlaved by their own armies, whoſe officers and commanders, growing every day in power, do, at laſt, turn it againſt thoſe, from whom they had at firſt their commiſſions; of which we had a fatal example in England ſtill freſh in our memories in the perſon of Oliver Cromwell. That, beſides the four thouſand additional men, the regular forces were double the number of thoſe kept on foot after the peace of Ryſwick, in the reign of king William of glorious memory; and more numerous by one-third than in the late queen's reign, after the peace of Utrecht: that therefore they are more than ſufficient to ſecure the government againſt any ſudden inteſtine commotion, which is the leſs to be apprehended, by reaſon of the general affection, which the people had lately ſhewn in taking the oaths, though many of them that took them, were not required to do it, by the act paſſed the laſt ſeſſion; and he was confident, that, except a few perſons of deſperate principles and fortunes, who might hope to fiſh in troubled waters, there was no body in England, that had any thing to loſe, who wiſhed for a revolution. That, if we looked abroad, it appeared, that by the happy influence of his majeſty's wiſe counſels, and the good alliances that had been entered into and concerted, all Europe enjoyed a profound peace, which, in all probability, would be laſting: but that, in caſe of a rupture with any neighbouring prince, our fleet, which was certainly the moſt numerous, and the beſt in all Chriſtendom, would defend us againſt any foreign invaſion or inſult. That the pay of the four thouſand additional men amounted to a good ſum of money. That indeed, at another juncture, that expence might eaſily be borne; but that in the preſent circumſtances, when the nation is involved in ſo great a debt, and groans under the load of heavy taxes, this additional charge is very conſiderable. That, his majeſty, in his gracious ſpeech at the opening of this ſeſſion of parliament, having, in a particular manner, recommended to the houſe of commons the putting the national debt in a method of being gradually reduced and paid, it was with the greateſt ſatisfaction he took notice, that ſome progreſs had already been made in that great and important undertaking; and that, in order to improve that good beginning, not only the pay of theſe additional forces, but alſo all other needleſs expences ought, in his opinion, to be applied to the increaſe of the ſinking fund.' His lordſhip concluded, as he had began, with the moſt earneſt profeſſions of his ſincere and entire affection for his majeſty's ſacred perſon and government, and for his royal family, on whoſe proſperity, under God, abſolutely depend both our preſent felicity, and the preſervation of our laws, liberties, properties, and holy religion.

The lord Townſhend anſwered the lord Trevor, and ſaid, 'That he agreed with that noble lord in ſome parts of his ſpeech, but was ſorry he differed from him in others. That he was thoroughly perſuaded of his entire affection to his majeſty's perſon, and the preſent happy ſettlement; nor did he in the leaſt doubt, but he ſaw with pleaſure the progreſs, that had been already made towards reducing the national debt: but that, at the ſame time, they ought to conſider, that, as the happy tranquility, we at preſent enjoy, is in ſome meaſure owing to the ſtrength of the government, ſo it was prudence not to weaken that ſtrength, becauſe the ſame might affect public credit, which being founded on the ſecurity of the government, if that ſecurity was rendered precarious, they would ſoon ſee the funds and ſtocs fall to or 12 per cent. which would render the reduction of the national debt altogether impracticable, ſince it was impoſſible to reduce that debt, otherwiſe than by public credit. That it was notorious, that, before the laſt augmentation of regular forces, the government could not form and march a body of three or four thouſand men againſt any ſudden attempt, either at home, or from abroad, whithout leaving the king's perſon, the royal family, the capital of the kingdom, and the fortified places expoſed; and therefore the ſaid augmentation was become abſolutely neceſſary to prevent theſe dangers and inconveniences. That the number of the troops now on foot was not ſo great as to afford any juſt ground of jealouſy, ſince the preſent forces are much inferior to thoſe the crown had formerly. That, by the ancient and Gothic conſtitution of the government, the king had at his diſpoſal the militia of the realm, which chiefly conſiſted in archers, who were kept in conſtant diſcipline and exerciſe, the memory of which is ſtill preſerved, there being almoſt in every village a place called But-lane. That the invention of fire-arms had made a great alteration in the ancient conſtitution; and, inſtead of archers, the crown raiſed as many regular troops, as were thought neceſſary upon any emergency. That queen Elizabeth, who had many enemies, both at home and abroad, conſtantly kept a conſiderable body of troops in the Netherlands, without any contradiction from her parliaments, and thereby maintained herſelf on the throne, and overcame all her enemies. That, if king Charles I. had ſteered the ſame courſe, he might in all probability have preſerved both his crown and his life, ſince he loſt both only for want of a ſufficient force to ſuppreſs faction, which was the principal ſource of all the calamities and enormities, in which the nation was afterwards involved. That upon the reſtoration of king Charles II. they, who at that time had the management of affairs, did not think it proper to keep up a great number of regular troops, and therefore choſe to reſtore to the crown its ancient power over the militia of the kingdom; but that there was a ſecret in that. That king James II. not truſting the militia, had an army of 20,000 men, which would have ſecured him the crown, had he not given a general diſguſt to his people, by violating the fundamental laws, and endeavouring to ſubvert the conſtitution in church and ſtate. That in the reign of king William, of glorious memory, when ſome leading men in the parliament thought fit to diſband the army, after the peace of Ryſwick, they fell upon a project to ſecure the government, which was to raiſe and diſcipline the militia; but that they ſoon after perceived the unprofitableneſs of that ſcheme, the militia proving a great burthen to the people, and of no ſervice to the government. That the reduction of the army had then a double ill effect; for, on the one hand, it obliged king William, and his miniſters, to enter into a treaty of partition; and, on the other hand, it very probably encouraged France to break that treaty, which occaſioned a ſecond war, and was the ſource of two-thirds of that heavy debt, under which the nation labours at this day. That the diſbanding of the army had almoſt the ſame ill effect in the reign of the late queen, having encouraged Lewis XIV. to furniſh the pretender with a land-force and a fleet to invade theſe kingdoms. That, if at preſent they weakened the hands of the government, we ſhould be expoſed to the like inſults and attempts. That, if our enemies may be credited in an affair, in which it is their intereſt to ſpeak truth, they ſeemed confidently aſſured of ſucceſs in their deſign of overturning the government, provided they had only an aſſiſtance of three or four thouſand men from abroad; and that, conſidering the method now practiſed in embarkations, how good, and how ſtrong ſoever our fleet may be, it was impoſſible to hinder a foreign prince, who ſhould have a mind to undertake it, to throw ſuch a number of men upon England.' His lordſhip concluded, 'that the conſtant tenour of his majeſty's adminiſtration, ſince the happy acceſſion to the throne, ought to convince every body, that, by the continuing the number of regular forces now on foot, his majeſty and miniſters have nothing in view but the public ſafety and ſecurity, and thereby to give the people an opportunity to improve trade, and encourage induſtry, as the only means to retrieve their former loſſes.'

ken the goverment, and thereby have an opportunity of involving their native country in new troubles. And therefore these noble lords, who had ſpoke for the reduction of the army, would do well, when they went down into their ſeveral countries, to aſſure the people, with whom, no doubt, their reaſons would not fail of having great weight, that their liberties and properties were entirely ſafe under his majeſty's government.' After a long debate, the motion againſt the additional troops was rejected, and the bill paſſed, as ſent up by the commons.

[1724] The buſineſs of the ſeſſion being over, the king came to the houſe of Peers the 24th of April, and, paſſing the bills, delivered the following ſpeech by the mouth of the chancellor:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The unanimity, chearfulneſs, and diſpatch with which you have now finiſhed every thing I recommended to you, at the opening of this ſeſſion, are freſh inſtances of your affection to my perſon and government, and cannot fail of contributing, with the bleſſings of God on our endeavours, towards the eſtabliſhment of that happy tranquility we now enjoy both at home and abroad.

'Your continuing the like national force by ſea and land this year, as was judged neceſſary by parliament for the ſervice of the laſt, gives me great ſatisfaction. You have hereby wiſely provided againſt the miſchiefs from any ſudden ſhocks to the public credit; you have provided for the ſafety of the kingdom, and have enabled this nation to hold, among the powers of Europe, the rank and figure due to her honour and dignity. Nothing could have been more acceptable to me, than your having been able to make that proviſion, without laying any new or additional burthens on my people.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I return you my thanks for the care and pains you have taken towards augumenting the ſinking fund, and improving the public revenues, by putting them under a ſtricter management. I make no doubt, but that the happy beginning you have made will be attended with ſuch immediate good conſequences, as will encourage you to purſue the way you have now opened for a gradual reduction of the debt, and for putting the trade and navigation of Great-Britain on ſuch a foot, as may not only in ſome meaſure diſcourage the unjuſtifiable incroachments they labour under from ſome of our neighbours, but at the ſame time extend her exportations beyond what has been known in former ages.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'As the early receſs, which your diligence and unanimity has procured you, affords you the opportunity of a longer retirement into the country, than the buſineſs of former ſeſſions has uſually allowed of, I aſſure myſelf, that you will carry with you thither the ſame zeal for the public good, with which you have been animated in parliament; and that you will make it your buſineſs to diſcountenance any remains there may be yet left of ſedition and diſaffection, and to promote that perfect harmony and confidence between me and my people, which I moſt earneſtly deſire, and on which our mutual happineſs entirely depends.'

A little before the end of the ſeſſion, the king had appointed the duke of Newcaſtle to be ſecretary of ſtate in the room of the lord Carteret, who was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Grafton was appointed lord chamberlain, the lord Falmouth and mr. Edgecombe vice-treaſurers of Ireland, mr. Yonge commiſſioner of the treaſury, and mr. Pelham ſecretay at war. Sir Robert Raymond being made judge of the King's-bench, ſir Phillip York ſucceeded him as attorney-general. And ſir Clement Wearg was made ſollicitor-general. About the middle of May, Horatio Walpole was appointed ambaſſador extraordinary at the court of France.

On the 16th of May the king ſent the following circular letter to the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge: 'We being greatly deſirous to favour and encourage thoſe ancient and laudable nurſeries of piety and learning, and to enable them more effectually to anſwer the end of their inſtitution, by ſending forth conſtant ſupplies of learned and able men, to ſerve the public both in church and ſtate; and having obſerved, that no encouragement or proviſion has hitherto been made in either of the univerſities, for the ſtudy of modern hiſtory, or modern languages, the knowledge of which is highly neceſſary towards compleatly qualifying the youth committed to their care for ſeveral ſtations both in church and ſtate, to which they may be called; and having ſeriouſly weighed the prejudice, that has accrued to the univerſities from this defect, perſons of foreign nations being often employed in the education and tuition of youth, both at home and in their travels, and great numbers of the young nobility and gentry being either ſent directly abroad from ſchools, or taken away from the univerſities before the courſe of their ſtudies can be there compleated, and opportunities frequently loſt to the crown, employing and encouraging members of the two univerſities, by conferring on them ſuch employments both at home and abroad as neceſſarily require a competent ſkill in writing and ſpeaking the modern languages; in order therefore to remedy theſe and the like inconveniences, we have determined to appoint two perſons of ſober converſation and prudent conduct, of the degree of maſter of arts, or batchelor of laws, or of ſome higher degree, in one of the univerſities, ſkilled in modern hiſtory, and in the knowledge of modern languages, to be nominated by us to be our profeſſors of modern hiſtory, one for the univerſity of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford, who ſhall be obliged to read lectures in the public ſchools, at ſuch times as ſhall hereafter be appointed. And we have further determined, that each of the profeſſors ſhall have a ſtipend of four hundred pounds per annum, and out of the ſtipend ſhall be obliged to maintain with ſufficient ſalaries, in the univerſity where he ſhall be eſtabliſhed, two perſons at leaſt, well qualified to teach and inſtruct in writing and ſpeaking the languages, which teachers ſhall be under the direction of the profeſſors reſpectively, and ſhall be obliged to learn two at leaſt of the languages; both the profeſſors and teachers taking eſpecial care, that the times and hours for the inſtructing and teaching the ſcholars be ſo ordered, as not to interfere with thoſe appointed for their accademical ſtudies; which profeſſors and teachers ſhall be obliged, once every year, to tranſmit an atteſted account of the progreſs made by each ſcholar committed to their care, to our principal ſecretaries of ſtate, to be laid before us, that we may encourage the diligence and application of ſuch amongſt them as ſhall have qualified themſelves for our ſervice, by giving them ſuitable employments either at home or abroad, as occaſion ſhall offer.'

The two firſt profeſſors were mr. Gregory, of Chriſt-church, Oxford; and mr. Samuel Harris, fellow of Peterhouſe, Cambridge.

For a farther encouragement to the univerſities, the king ordered that his almoner ſhould chuſe out of the members of Oxford and Cambridge, twenty-four preachers to officiate alternately in the chapel at Whitehall, with a ſalary of thirty pounds a year each.

The inoculation of the ſmall-pox had now begun to be practiſed in England, and ſucceeded very well with the two

'The moſt material particulars, beſides what relates to his family and circumſtances, are as follow:

By his ſtrict conjunction with the Foleys and Winningtons, his relations and their friends, he gained at laſt ſuch an extenſive intereſt, as to be choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. When the queen thought fit to lay aſide the earl of Nottingham, principal ſecretary of ſtate, mr. Robert Harley was pitched upon to ſucceed him as her favorite and prime miniſter, ſuppoſing he would be moſt agreeable to the whigs, from his education among the diſſenters. The duke of Marlborough and the earl of Godolphin's main deſign, in advancing him, was to ſecure his intereſt in the houſe of commons, and they fondly imagined, that, as to the grand affairs, either he would not intermeddle, or would blindly follow their directions; but they ſoon after found, that a perſon of his ambitious ſpirit would not be contented to act an under part.

They who extol his liberality and munificence to learned men, are no more to be depended upon, than when they tell us, that he diſcharged the office of ſecretary to king William with great addreſs; for, as it is certain on the one hand, that he never ſerved king William in that capacity, it is no leſs true on the other hand, that the only perſon on whom he beſtowed any public mark of favour, was dr. Jonathan Swift, the famous author of the Tale of a Tub, whom he employed, with ſome other obſcure writers, to banter and ridicule all that oppoſed his meaſures. He was the reverſe of his predeceſſor in the treaſury, the earl of Godolphin, who never kept ſuitors unprofitable in ſuſpence, nor promiſed any thing that he was not reſolved to perform. The earl of Oxford, on the contrary, kept them, who had any pretenſions, in perpetual dependance, by feeding them with hopes. This maxim he practiſed in a moſt barbarous manner with mr. Rowe, author of the tragedy of Tamerlane; the ſtory is too well known to be repeated. They who commend him for being a kind friend, and generous enemy, have forgot with what an unrelenting fury he purſued his benefactor, the immortal duke of Marlborough, and mr. Stephens, the miniſter, whom he cauſed to be proſecuted to the pillory, and that ignominious puniſhment was not remitted, till he was brought to the place of execution. His prodigious riſe and greatneſs was more owing to his cunning in finding out the weakneſſes of thoſe he had to deal with, than to his own bright parts. For he neither was maſter of eloquence in ſpeech, nor of ſtile in writing, but in both puzzled and intricate: his conſtant deſign being to diſcover other people's thoughts, and conceal his own. But he had at laſt the fate, which all ambidexters deſerve, to be diſtruſted and diſregarded by all parties; of which he was ſo ſenſible, that, for ſeveral years before his death, he ſeldom came to parliament, but lived in a country retirement, endeavouring to drown his melancholy thoughts in wine, which at laſt dozed his ſpirits, and certainly abridged his life.

princeſſes, Amelia and Carolina, and had the ſame good effect on prince Frederick, the duke of Bedford, and the lady Mary Ruſſel, his ſiſter. But others are ſaid to ſuffer under it, particularly the earl of Sunderland's ſon, who died in the operation, upon which dr. Jurin, ſecretary to the royal ſociety, publiſhed a treatiſe in favour of inoculating.

The 21ſt of May died Robert Harley, earl of Oxford, and earl Mortimer, whoſe life and character is given at large, by the author of the Political State[c], (May 1724.)

On the 15th of June died dr. Henry Sacheverel. Though he had taken the oaths to the government, his will ſhewed he perſevered to the end in the ſame ſentiments; for, amongſt his legacies, he left five hundred pounds to the late biſhop of Rocheſter. It does not appear, that he was any way concerned in the plot.

As to foreign affairs, one of the moſt remarkable events this year, was the abdication of Philip V. king of Spain. Having taken the reſolution to renounce his crown, and retire with the queen to the monaſtery of St. Ildefonſo, he ſent from thence, the 15th of January 1723-24, the marquis de Grimaldo, principal ſecretary of ſtate, with a packet for the prince of Auſtrias, his ſon, who the day before returned from St. Ildefonſo to the eſcurial. The marquis being arrived there, and having acquainted the prince with his meſſage, his highneſs ſent for the infantes to come to his apartment; and alſo ordered the count de Altamaria, the marquis de Valero, the duke de San Pedro, the count de Salazar, the marquis de Magney, the count de Safeteli, and the prior of San Lorenzo, to attend there, and be witneſſes of what ſhould paſs; who being all preſent, the marquis delivered the packet to the prince of Aſturias, who returned it to him opened, that he might read what was in it, which was the inſtrument of his father's renunciation of the crown, accompanied with a letter of advice to direct the new king's conduct. The renunciation was alſo ſent to the preſident of the council of Caſtile, and ordered to be publiſhed throughout the kingdom.[d] Upon this it was reſolved in the council of Caſtile, that king Lewis might immediately take the government upon him without aſſembling the Cortes, as having been already ſworn to and acknowledged prince of Spain. The penſion which their catholic majeſties reſerved to themſelves, was about 100,000 piſtoles, and they likewiſe reſerved about 25,000 for each of the infantes.

The king of France, at the perſuaſion of the biſhop of Frejus, and contrary to the ſentiments of the duke of Bourbon, publiſhed a ſevere edict this year againſt his proteſtant ſubjects: whoever performed any exerciſe of the reformed religion, if a man, was to be ſent to the gallies; if a woman, to be ſhaved and confined where the judges thought fit: the proteſtant preachers to be put to death; and thoſe who had any communication directly or indirectly with ſuch miniſters, condemned to the gallies: to give their children foreign education, to be puniſhed with a fine of 6000 livres: the memory of thoſe who died in the profeſſion of the proteſtant religion, to be proſecuted: all concealed proteſtants, who diſſuaded ſic perſons from dying catholics, to be ſent to the gallies, if men, and if women, as before: to conſent that children ſhould marry abroad without licence, to be puniſhed with the gallies; and baptiſm and ſchooling were forbidden to proteſtants, under the like pains and penalties. To put a ſtop to theſe ſeverities, mr. Horace Walpole had orders to ſollicit the French court in behalf of the proteſtants; but he could obtain no other anſwer, than that the king's edicts muſt be obeyed.

However, the court of France declared, that the edict againſt the proteſtants ſhould not affect the inhabitants of Alſatia, their religious rights being founded on treaties of peace. This was done to prevent the Alſatians, terrified with this edict, from putting themſelves under the protection of Germany.

The proteſtants at Thorn, in royal Pruſſia, belonging to Poland, were likewiſe treated with great cruelty, on account of a pretended riot in July, which was really begun by a ſtudent of the Jeſuits College, and for which the preſident and vice-preſident of that city, with thirteen others, were condemned to be beheaded, and others quartered and burnt, and the proteſtant councellors at Thorn to be removed from the magiſtracy, and papiſts put in their places; and the church of St. Mary to be taken from the proteſtants, and given to the Franciſcan friars. Mr Finch, the Britiſh miniſter at Dreſden, had orders to go to Poland, and inſiſt upon ſatisfaction for the proteſtants of Thorn, and other places in that kingdom, oppreſſed by the papiſts; but the Poles could not be prevailed upon to do the proteſtants juſtice. [e]

A ſet of enthuſiaſtical levellers roſe in the weſt of Scotland, who, under pretence of eſtabliſhing equality among chriſtians, pulled down incloſures, and committed great ravages and depredations. But the royal regiment of Scots fuzileers being ordered to march againſt them, about the latter end of June, and three other regiments of foot landing at Galloway at the ſame time, they ſoon ſuppreſſed thoſe diſorders.

The parliament met again the 12th of November, when his majeſty made the following ſpeech by the mouth of the lord-chancellor.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I am perſuaded you ſhare with me in the ſatisfaction I feel at the proſperous ſituation of affairs: peace with all powers abroad; at home perfect tranquility, plenty, and uninterrupted enjoyment of all civil and religious rights, are moſt diſtinguiſhing marks of the favour and protection of the divine providence: and theſe, with all their happy conſequences, will, I doubt not, by the bleſſing of God upon our joint endeavours, be long continued to my people.

'The ſame proviſion by ſea and land, for the defence and ſafety of the nation, will continue to make us reſpected abroad, and conſequently ſecure at home. The ſame attention to the improvement of the public revenues, and to the eaſe and encouragement of trade and navigation, will

[d] The renunciation was as follows:

Having theſe four years conſidered with due reflection, and maturely, the miſeries of this life, through the infirmities, wars, and troubles, with which God has been pleaſed to viſit me during the twenty-three years of my reign; and having likewiſe conſidered, that my eldeſt ſon, don Lewis, ſworn prince of Spain, is of ſufficient age, is married, and has capacity, judgment, and the qualities fit for ruling and governing juſtly and happily this Monarchy; I have determined abſolutely to quit the poſſeſſion and adminiſtration of it, renoun cing the ſame, with all its dominions, kingdoms, and lordſhips, in favour of the ſaid prince don Lewis, my eldeſt ſon; and to retire with the queen, in whom I have found a ready diſpoſition and voluntary inclination, to accompany me to this place and ſeat of St. Ildefonſo, here to ſerve God, diſengaged from all other cares to meditate on death, and to ſeek my ſalvation. This I communicate to the council for their information, to be notified to the proper perſons, that my reſolution may be made known to all.

His letter to his ſon was remarkable neither for ſtile nor ſentiments: amongſt his inſtructions, he ſays: 'preſerve ever a great devotion to the moſt Holy Virgin, and put yourſelf, as well as your kingdoms, under her protection, ſeeing you cannot, by any other means, better obtain what may be needful for you, and for them. Be always, as you ought, obedient to the holy ſee, and to the pope, as the vicar of Jeſus Chriſt. Protect and defend ever the tribunal of the holy inquiſition, which may be called the bulwark of the faith, and to which it owes its preſervation in all its purity in the dominions of Spain; ſo that the hereſies which have afflicted the other parts of Chriſtendom, and produced ſuch horrid and deplorable ravages in them, could never be able to get footing here.'

[e] The affair of Thorn was thus: on the 16th of July, the ordinary proceſſion at Thorn being arrived at St. James's Church-yard, a great number of the citizens children reſorted thither to ſee it, with their hats under their arms, according to cuſtom; but a ſtudent of the Jeſuits college, not ſatisfied with that mark of civility and reſpect, would needs have them kneel down, and gave them bad language and blows. About two hours after the proceſſion was over, this ſame ſtudent, with ſome of his comrades, inſulted ſeveral young people, without the leaſt provocation on their part; but, in the end, this troubleſome young fellow was ſeized by the ſoldiers of the garriſon, and brought to the guard, after he had wounded ſeveral citizens with ſtones. Next day the Jeſuits ſtudents got together again, and meeting one of the citizens, whom they had abuſed the day before, they would oblige him to get their comrade ſet at liberty; but the citizen had the good fortune to get out of their hands, and ran to his own houſe for ſafety, whither they purſued him ſword in hand. In the mean time the preſident of the city had given order for ſetting him at liberty, at the the requeſt of the rector of the Jeſuits college; but another ſtudent being likewiſe carried to the guard-room, his comrades would oblige the preſident to ſet him at liberty alſo, which he refuſed to do, till he had ſpoke to the rector. Upon this the Jeſuits ſtudents ran furiouſly to the guard-room to reſcue their comrade, but, being repulſed, they thought to revenge themſelves upon a townſman, whom they purſued with drawn ſwords to the Burgrave's houſe, where he took ſhelter. They then attacked a Lutheran ſtudent, who was in his night-gown at the door of his lodgings. They dragged him by the hair as far as their own college, threw him into the canal, and beat him unmercifully; which being done, they ſallied again into the city, and wounded ſeveral people with their ſabres, who were coming to the aſſiſtance of the Lutheran ſtudent. But the preſident having ſent thither the town-guard, they were obliged to betake themſelves to their college, where they kept the Lutheran ſtudent, till the Jeſuit ſtudent was firſt ſet at liberty. While this exchange was making, ſome of the trained-bands of the town were ordered to poſt themſelves before the Jeſuits college, to protect them from the enraged populace. But the ſtudents throwing ſtones at them, and firing upon them, it was not poſſible to reſtrain the people, who forced open the gate, and were doing what they could to revenge the cruelty of the Jeſuits ſtudents, when, in that very inſtant, the town-clerk, who had got the Lutheran releaſed, came and obliged them to retire. The riot was then thought to be over, but the guards that were poſted before the college were ſcarce marched off, when the Jeſuits ſtudents from within fired again, and threw ſtones at the people, who again forced open the gate, plundered the college, and committed great diſorders, till a detachment of the garriſon and trained-bands came to the Jeſuits aſſiſtance, and diſperſed the people.

The bloody decree (notwithſtanding the interpoſition of ſeveral proteſtant princes and ſtates) was put in execution, only the vice-preſident was reprieved. As many were exorbitantly fined, with the money riſing from thence, a ſtone pillar with the Virgin Mary's ſtatue was erected where her picture was burnt.

eſtabliſh credit upon the ſtrongeſt baſis, and raiſe ſuch a ſpirit of induſtry, as will not only enable us gradually to diſcharge the national debt, but will likewiſe greatly increaſe the wealth, power, and influence, of this kingdom.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I have ordered the proper officers to prepare and lay before you eſtimates of the expences for the ſervice of the enſuing year; and, as they do not exceed what has been found by experience to be abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity of the kingdom. I make no queſtion, but I ſhall have your ready concurrence in raiſing the ſupplies in ſuch manner, as ſhall be moſt eaſy to my people.

'There is one thing, that I cannot but mention to you, as deſerving your particular conſideration. It is too manifeſt, that the funds eſtabliſhed for the finiſhing the works at Greenwich hoſpital, and providing for a competent number of ſeamen there, cannot, in time of peace, be ſufficient to anſwer the expences of this great and neceſſary work. It is therefore very much to be wiſhed, that ſome method could be found out to make a farther proviſion for a comfortable ſupport to our ſeamen, worn out in the ſervice of their country, and labouring under old age and infirmities.

My Lords and Gentleman,

'You muſt all be ſenſible how much our preſent happineſs is owing to your union and ſteady conduct. It is therefore wholly unneceſſary to recommend to you unanimity and diſpatch in all your deliberations. The zeal and abilities you have on all occaſions ſhewn in ſupporting the intereſt of your country, even under the greateſt difficulties, leave me no room to doubt of my having your entire effectual concurrence in every thing, that can tend to the ſervice of the public, and to the good of my people.'

After the addreſſes of thanks from both houſes, the commons proceeded upon the ſupplies for the next year. This brought on a debate about the land-forces, particularly the additional four thouſand men; but at length it was voted, that the number ſhould be as the laſt year 18,264 effective men, and the ſum of 654,488l. 17s. 8d. was granted for their maintenance. For raiſing this and the other ſupplies, two ſhillings in the pound on land and the malt-tax were voted.

Great part of this ſeſſion was taken up in the trial of the earl of Macclesfield, and the repeal of the late lord Bolingbroke's attainder. There had been for ſome time a murmuring againſt the inſufficiency of the maſters in chancery to anſwer the great ſums lodged in their hands by the ſuitors in that court; and it was ſuſpected, that the large ſums, which they paid for admiſſion into their places, made their way more eaſy than it ought to have been, and very much leſſened the enquiry into their qualifications. This abuſe had indeed been long growing up to this degree; and there was ſcarce any thing bought and ſold more freely and openly than a maſter in chancery's place. The ſuitors money, for which the maſters paid no intereſt, brought them in great intereſt from the funds; and the profits of the place being conſequently doubled or trebled to what they had been before, there was ſuch an opportunity to inrich themſelves by the advantages they made of the money they had in their hands, that it is not ſurprizing, the lord-keepers and lord-chancellor doubled and trebled the prices, which the maſters were to pay for admittance. But the complaints againſt this practice growing ſtrong and public, and the lord-chancellor Macclesfield finding it impracticable for him to put a ſtop to thoſe complaints, or keep the great ſeal under them, he reſigned it the beginning of January, 1724-25; and it was committed to the cuſtody of ſir Joſeph Jekyll maſter of the rolls, ſir Jeffery Gilbert, and ſir Robert Raymond, who having in council taken the oath as lords-commiſſioners of the great ſeal, the king ſaid to them as follows:

'I have had ſuch experience of of your integrity and ability that it is with pleaſure I now put the great ſeal into your hands. You are fully informed of the ſtate of the accounts of the maſters in chancery. I earneſtly recommmed to you the taking effectual care, that entire ſatisfaction be made to the ſuitors of the court; and that they be not expoſed to any dangers for the future; and I have ſuch confidence in the faithful diſcharge of the truſt I now repoſe in you, that I am perſuaded you will look narrowly to the behaviour of all the officers under your juriſdiction, and will ſee that they act with the ſtricteſt regard to juſtice, and to the eaſe of my ſubjects.'

[1724-25] On the 9th of Feburary, mr. comptroller delivered the following meſſage to the houſe of commons:

George R.

'His majeſty having reaſon to apprehend, that the ſuitors of the court of Chancery were in danger of looſing a conſiderable ſum of money from the inſufficiency of ſome of the maſters, thought himſelf obliged, in juſtice and compaſſion to the ſaid ſuitors, to take the moſt ſpeedy and proper method the law would allow, for enquiring into the ſtate of the maſters accounts, and ſecuring their effects for the benefit of the ſuitors: and his majeſty having had ſeveral reports laid before him in purſuance of the directions he had given, has ordered the reports to be communicated to the houſe, that they may have as full and as perfect a view of the important affair, as the ſhortneſs of the time, and the circumſtances and nature of the proceedings, would admit of.'

Theſe reports, and the papers referred to in them, being taken into conſideration by the commons, ſir George Oxenden roſe up, and ſaid, 'that it manifeſtly appeared by theſe reports, which after the ſtricteſt enquiry, and upon the matureſt deliberation, had been drawn up by perſons of the greateſt weight and authority for their abilities, experience, high ſtations, and integrity, that enormous abuſes had crept into the High-Court of Chancery, chiefly occaſioned by the magiſtrate, who was at the head of that court, and whoſe duty conſequently it was to prevent the ſame. That the crimes and miſdemeanors of the late lord-chancellor were many, and of various natures, but might be reduced to theſe three heads: 1. That he had taken into his own hands the eſtates and effects of many widows, orphans, and lunatics, and either had diſpoſed of part of them arbitrarily to his own profit, or connived at the officers under him, making advantage of the ſame. 2. That he had raiſed to an exorbitant price the offices and places of the maſters in chancery, and in order to enable them to pay to him thoſe high prices and gratuites for their admiſſion, had truſted in their hands large ſums of money belonging to ſuitors in chancery. 3. That in ſeveral caſes he had made divers irregular orders. So that, in his opinion, that firſt magiſtrate in the kingdom was fallen from the height of the dignities and honours, to which he had been raiſed by the king's royal bounty and favour, to the depth of infamy and diſgrace. And therefore he moved, that Thomas earl of Macclesfield be impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanors.' This motion was ſeconded by mr. Srickland, and ſupported by mr. Doddington, one of the lords of the treaſury, who failed not to aggravate the earl's miſdemeanors, which, they ſaid were of the greateſt and moſt dangerous conſequence, ſince moſt of the eſtates in England, once in thirty years, paſs through the court of Chancery. Mr Pulteney, who ſpoke next, ſaid, 'that it was far from his thoughts to endeavour to abate the juſt reſentment, which the gentlemen, who ſpoke laſt, ſhewed againſt the great abuſes that had been committed in the court of Chancery: but that in his opinion, they went a little too faſt in ſo weighty and important an affair, by which means they might looſe the very end they aimed at, the effectual puniſhing the perſon, by whoſe neglect at leaſt thoſe abuſes had been committed. That whatever deferrence they ought to pay, on this occaſion, to the capacity, experience, integrity and authority of the perſons, who had drawn up the reports that had been laid before them; yet it little became the dignity, and was even derogatary to the prerogative of that houſe, which is the grand inqueſt of the nation, to found an impeachment upon thoſe reports, without a previous enquiry and examination into the proofs that were to ſupport it. And therefore he moved, that this affair might be referred to the conſideration of a ſelect committee.' Sir William Wynham urged, 'that, by proceeding by way of impeachment upon reports laid before them from above, the commons would make a dangerous precedent, and ſeem to give up the moſt valuable of their privileges, the inqueſt after ſtate-criminals.' Theſe reaſons had great weight with ſeveral members, particularly on ſir Wilfred Lawſon and ſir Thomas Pengelly, who ſupported mr. Pulteney's motion. But mr. Yonge and and ſir Clement Wearg having anſwered thoſe objections, the queſtion was put, and it was carried by a majority of 273 againſt 164, that Thomas earl of Macclesfield ſhould be impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanors; and ſir George Oxenden was ordered to go up to the lords, and at their bar to impeach him in the name of the houſe of commons. This being done, a committee was appointed to draw up the articles. Then a bill was ordered to be brought in, to indemnify the maſters in chancery from the penalties of the act of the 5th and 6th years of king Edward the ſixth (againſt buying and ſelling of offices) upon their diſcovering what conſideration, price, or gratuity they paid, or agreed to pay, for the purchaſe of, or for their admiſſion to their reſpective offices; which bill paſſed both houſes, and had the royal aſſent.

The earl of Macclefield's trial laſted twenty days. The eight firſt articles againſt him were, for taking large ſums of the maſters in Chancery for admiſſion or purchaſe. By the other articles, he was accuſed of admitting perſons of ſmall ſubſtance, and of ſuffering an unjuſt and fraudulent practice to continue, of paying for their places out of the ſuitors money, by means of which great deficiencies happened: of neglecting to ſecure Fleetwood Dormer's perſon or effects, who by diſpoſing ſuitors money to his own uſe, had cauſed a deficiency of 24,000l. of neglecting to prevent the like abuſes for the future, by not taking ſecurity upon admiſſion: of borrowing money of the maſters out of the ſuitors caſh, and making uſe of the ſame ſo long as he pleaſed. Upon theſe and other accounts, ſentence was paſſed upon him by the mouth of ſir Peter King, ſpeaker of the houſe of lords: that he ſhould be fined 30,000l. and impriſoned in the Tower till the ſum was paid.

After the trial, it was moved that the earl ſhould be for ever rendered uncapable of any office in the ſtate; but the motion was rejected, as well as another for his not ſitting in parliament, or coming within the verge of the court. The earl was carried to the Tower, and confined in the ſame apartment as was formerly the earl of Oxford's; and three days after, the king in council ordered his name to be ſtruc out of the liſt of privy-counſellors. The earl paid his fine about ſix weeks after, and was diſcharged from his confinement. Sir Peter King, being created baron of Oakham, in Surry, ſucceeded him in the chancellorſhip.[f]

The debts of the civil liſt being increaſed to above 500,000l. the king, on the 8th of April, ſent by mr. Walpole the following meſſage to the commons:

'The neceſſities of his majeſty's government having rendered it impracticable for his majeſty to make any conſiderable retrenchments in the expences of his civil liſt; and having engaged his majeſty in ſome extraordinary expences, which he is perſuaded his royal commons will believe have been employed, not only for the honour and dignity of the crown, but for the intereſt and proſperity of his people, his majeſty hopes, from the known zeal and affection of his parliament to his perſon and government, that he may be enabled to make uſe of the funds, lately ſettled for the payment of the civil liſt annuities, and for replacing the ſame to his majeſty in the moſt advantageous manner, and upon the credit thereof, to raiſe a ſum of money ſufficient to redeem thoſe annuities, and to diſcharge the preſent debts contracted in his civil government.' Mr Pulteney, cofferer of the houſehold, who about this time began to be diſſatisfied, moved for an addreſs, that an account ſhould be laid before the houſe of all monies paid for ſecret ſervice, penſions, bounties, &c. from the 25th of March, 1721, to the 25th of March, 1725. This addreſs being voted, a motion was made for the houſe to go into a grand committee, to conſider of the king's meſſage; but mr. Pulteney repreſented, 'that, the houſe having ordered an addreſs for ſeveral papers relating to the civil liſts and other expences, they ought, in his opinion, to put off the conſideration of the meſſage, till thoſe papers were laid before the houſe; it being natural to enquire into the cauſes of a diſeaſe before any one applies remedies to it.' This being oppoſed by mr. Walpole, mr. Pulteney replied, 'that he wondered how ſo great a debt could be contracted in three years time, but was not ſurprized ſome perſons were ſo eager to have the deficiencies of the civil liſt made good, ſince they and their friends had ſo great a ſhare in it; and deſired to know, whether this was all that was due, or whether they were to expect another reckoning?' To this it was anſwered in general, 'that there was indeed a heavy debt on the civil liſt, and a great many penſions; but that moſt of theſe had been granted in king William and queen Anne's reigns, ſome by king Charles the ſecond, and very few by his preſent majeſty. That, ſince the civil liſt was firſt ſettled for his majeſty, an expence of above 90,000l. per annum had happened, which could not then be foreſeen, and therefore was left unprovided for. That, upon examination of the account of the civil liſt debts, it would appear, the moſt of thoſe expences were either for the neceſſary ſupport of the dignity of the crown and government, or for the public good. That there was indeed a penſion of 5,000l. of another nature, upon the account of the cofferer's place, but which could not well be avoided; for both lord Godolphin, who was in that office, and his father, had ſo well deſerved it of the government, that they could not handſomely remove him without a gratuity, and therefore they gave him a penſion of 5,000l. to make room for the worthy gentleman, who now enjoys the poſt.' Then the commons in a grand committee, took the meſſage into conſideration, and a motion was made, 'that, for the redeeming the annuities of 25,000l. per annum charged on the civil liſt revenues by an act of parliament of the 7th year of his majeſty, and for diſcharging the debts and arrears due from his majeſty to his ſervants, tradeſmen, and others, his majeſty be enabled to raiſe any ſum not exceeding one million, by Exchequer bills, loans, or otherwiſe, on the credit of the deductions of ſix-pence per pound, directed by that act, and of the civil liſt revenues, at an intereſt not exceeding 3l. per cent. till repayment of the principal.' This motion, after ſome farther debate, being carried by a majority of 239 againſt 119, a bill paſſed for that purpoſe, and received the royal aſſent the 20th of April.

The ſame day a petition was preſented to the houſe of commons in behalf of Henry St. John, late viſcount Bolingbroke, attainted for high-treaſon. The purport of the petition was to ſuſpend the execution of the law, with reſpect to his forfeitures, as a pardon ſuſpended it, with reſpect to his life. After the petition had been offered to the houſe by the lord Finch, mr. Walpole acquainted the houſe, that he had received his majeſty's commands to inform them, that the petitioner had ſeven years ſince made his humble application and ſubmiſſion to the king, with aſſurances of duty, allegiance, and fidelity, which his majeſty ſo far accepted, as to give him encouragement to hope for ſome future marks of his grace and goodneſs; and that his majeſty is ſatisfied, that the petitioner's behaviour has been ſuch, as convinces him, that he is an object of his mercy; and his majeſty conſents, that this petition be preſented to this houſe. Then the petition was read, ſetting forth, that the petitioner is truly concerned for his offence, in not having ſurrendered himſelf, purſuant to the act (whereby the petitioner was attainted of high-treaſon, and forfeited all his real and perſonal eſtate) and by reaſon thereof, hath ſuffered very great loſſes. That upon the petitioner's marriage in 1700, ſir Walter St. John, bart. and the right honourable the lord viſcount St. John (the petitioner's grandfather and father) together with the petitioner, made a ſettlement of the family-eſtates in the counties of Wilts, Surry and Middleſex, all which premiſes (except a very ſmall part thereof) are now in the poſſeſſion of the petitioner's father, and the petitioner cannot become intitled thereto for his life, until after his father's deceaſe: that the petitioner hath, in a moſt humble and dutiful manner, made his ſubmiſſion to his majeſty, and given him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his inviolable fidelity, and of his zeal for his ſervice, and for the ſupport of the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, which his majeſty hath been moſt graciouſly pleaſed to accept; and praying, that leave may be given to bring in a bill for enabling the petitioner, and the heirs-male of his body (notwithſtanding his attainder) to take and enjoy the ſettled eſtate, according to the limitations of the ſettlement, or other aſſurances therein mentioned, and for enabling the petitioner to hold and enjoy any perſonal eſtate or effects, whereof he now is, or hereafter ſhall be poſſeſſed, and to inveſt the ſame in the purchaſe of any real or perſonal eſtate within this kingdom. After the reading of this petition, the lord Finch moved for a bill, which was ſeconded by mr. Walpole, who having repeated part of what he had before laid before the houſe by the king's command, added, 'he was fully ſatisfied, that the petitioner had ſufficiently attoned for his paſt offences, and therefore deſerved the favour of that houſe, ſo far as to enable him to enjoy the family inheritance, that was ſettled upon him; which, according to the opinion of the beſt of lawyers, he could not do by virtue of his majeſty's pardon, without an act of parliament.' This was confirmed by the attorney and ſollicitor-general. But after a ſhort diſpute among the lawyers about the validity of ſuch a pardon in the pre-

[f] This great lawyer was deſigned by his father to follow his own trade, that of a ſalter, or grocer, in the city of Exeter; and did actually ſerve ſeveral years, as (or in the nature of) an apprentice to it; but his genius to learning, breaking through the diſadvantages of education, diſcovered itſelf in two or three very learned treatiſes, of the eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, of the creed, and primitive chriſtianity, which he wrote even while he was breeding up in the trade of his father; who, being related to the famous philoſopher mr. Locke, did, doubtleſs, by the advice of that great man, enter his ſon in the Temple, where he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſtudy and practice of the law. His father was a native of Glaſtonbury in Somerſetſhire; and when the charter of that ancient corporation was revived, in the year 1705, ſir Peter King was appointed their recorder by it, and continued ſo to his death.

ſent caſe, mr. Methuen, comptroller of the houſehold, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed to the lord Finch's motion, and ſaid, 'that, as he had the honour to be one of the king's immediate ſervants, it might perhaps, by ſome, be thought unbecoming his ſtation to appear againſt a petition, to the preſenting of which his majeſty, in his royal clemency and goodneſs, hath graciouſly been pleaſed to give his conſent. But that, being at liberty to follow the dictates of his conſcience in this matter, he would freely declare his opinion, that the public crimes, for which the petitioner ſtood attainted, were ſo henious, ſo flagrant, and of ſo deep a dye, as not to admit of any expiation or atonement; and whatever he might have done to deſerve his majeſty's private grace and pardon, yet he thought him altogether unworthy of any national favour.' Then he went through the late lord Bolingbroke's conduct, while he had a ſhare in the adminiſtration of affairs in queen Anne's reign: 'how he was the principal adviſer of, and actor in the wicked meaſures, that were then purſued; his clandeſtine negotiation of peace, without the privity of the queen's allies, contrary to the expreſs tenor of the grand alliance; his inſolent behaviour towards all the confederates in general, and the Dutch in particular; his ſacrificing the intereſt of the whole confederacy, and the honour of his own country, particularly in the baſe abandoning of the poor and brave Catalans; a tranſaction, with which he had an opportunity to be intimately acquainted, as having had the honour, at that juncture, to ſerve the nation as the queen's miniſter in Portugal: and, to ſum up all his crimes in one, his traiterous deſign of defeating the proteſtant ſucceſſion, the foundation of both our preſent and future happineſs; and of advancing a popiſh pretender to the throne, which would have involved his native country in endleſs miſery.' Though this ſpeech made a great impreſſion on the aſſembly, and ſeveral other eminent members ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe, particularly mr. Onſlow and lord William Pawlet, the motion for a bill was carried by 231 againſt 113. When the bill was brought in, it was moved, that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted, to diſable him to ſit in parliament, or enjoy any place under the king; but, upon mr. Walpole's oppoſing it, the clauſe was rejected, and the bill paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

The moſt material acts paſſed this ſeſſion, beſides what have been mentioned, were theſe: An act for diſarming the Highlands, and ſecuring the peace of Scotland. A proteſt was entered againſt this act in the houſe of lords, alledging, that the diſorders in the preamble were not proved: too great power was given to the lord-lieutenants and juſtices of the peace, and that the behaviour of the Highlanders had of late been inoffenſive.

Another act paſſed for regulating elections within the city of London, and for preſerving the peace, good order, and government of the city. This law, which is now the rule for all elections in the city, raiſed ſo great a ferment in London, that a printed ſummons was diſperſed, inviting the citizens to aſſemble at Guildhall to conſider of it. This attempt being reſented by the lord-mayor and aldermen, the gates of Guildhall were ordered to be ſhut, and the government was acquainted with what had paſſed. Upon this the guards were doubled at St. James's, Leiceſter-houſe, and Somerſet-houſe, and ſuch precautions taken as kept all things quiet. This ſpirit was ſuppoſed to have been raiſed by that majority of the common-council, who had voted thanks to mr. Francis Child and mr. John Barnard, for ſtrenuouſly oppoſing the bill. By a clauſe of this act, the right of elections of aldermen and common-councilmen belongs to freemen, being houſeholders, paying ſcot and lot to the amount of 30s. provided they had been in houſes of 10l. a year, twelve calender months. This and ſome other particulars, occaſioned a petition from the freemen of London againſt the bill, whilſt it was depending.

A motion was made in the houſe of commons for inſerting a clauſe in a bill about the 50 new churches, to diſable bodies corporate to purchaſe advowſons or other eccleſiaſtical preferments. This motion made by mr. Arthur Onſlow was chiefly intended to reſtrain the univerſities from purchaſing advowſons, but it was rejected.

Thomas Guy, formerly a bookſeller in London, and afterwards member of parliament for Tamworth, dying in the 80th year of his age, left a benefaction of 200,000l. to an hoſpital for incurables erected by himſelf, and near finiſhed in his life-time, beſides many other charities. In order to the better management and diſpoſition of his charities, an act paſſed the 24th of March, for incorporating the executors of the laſt will and teſtament of mr. Thomas Guy.

Two acts likewiſe paſſed to diſſolve the marriages of William Yonge with Mary Heathcote, and of Francis Anneſly with Elizabeth Sutton.

The princeſs of Wales was delivered on the 5th of December of a princeſs at Leiceſter-houſe, who was afterwards chriſtened by the name of Louiſa, and is now married to the prince of Denmark.

The king put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am come to put an end to this ſeſſion of parliament, which, though it has been extended to an unexpected length, has been ſo well employed for the ſervice and intereſt of the public, that I aſſure myſelf it will be to the general ſatisfaction of the nation.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'The prudent uſe you have made of the preſent flouriſhing ſtate of credit, by a certain reduction of more than three millions ſeven hundred thouſand pounds to an intereſt of four per cent. and by a wiſe proviſion for the redemption thereof by parliament, without further notice, on payment of ſuch ſums, as the circumſtances of the government will from time to time admit, has ſecured a conſiderable addition to the ſinking fund, not ſubject to the hazard of future events. [g]

'You have not only raiſed the ſupply for the ſervice of the current year at the loweſt rate of intereſt, that has been ever known, but, without laying any new burden on my people, you have enabled me to diſcharge the debts of my civil government; debts contracted by neceſſary and unavoidable expences, and in ſupport of ſuch meaſures of government, as have greatly encreaſed the happineſs of my people. You have thereby ſhewn your juſt regard to my honour, and dignity of the crown.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'As all our public bleſſings are the happy effects of the general tranquility we now enjoy, I cannot but expreſs my ſatisfaction in the proviſion you have made for ſuppreſſing and preventing diſturbances and commotions in thoſe parts, where the peace of the kingdom might have been moſt indangered.

'Nothing more remains neceſſary, than to tell you, that I intirely depend on the faithful diſcharge of your duties in your ſeveral ſtations, and on your conſtant care, in your reſpective countries, to preſerve the peace and quiet of the public. But I know not how to part you without firſt returning you my very hearty thanks for the many repeated inſtances you have, in this ſeſſion, given me of your duty and affection. All ſuch returns may be expected from me, as can be made by the moſt indulgent prince to an affectionate and loyal people.'

Preſently after the end of the ſeſſion, the king revived the order of knights of the Bath, of whom prince William was the firſt, and the duke of Montague was appointed grand-maſter, among the knights were ſir Robert Walpole, and his ſon the lord Walpole. The whole number was 38, including the ſovereign. Several promotions were likewiſe made. Mr Methuen was appointed treaſurer of the houſehold, and the earl of Lincoln, cofferer in the room of mr. Pulteney. William Bateman was created baron of Calmore, in Ireland, and viſcount Bateman. Soon after ſir Robert Walpole was made knight of the garter. [h]

[g] And act paſſed this ſeſſion, for continuing to the bank the ſeveral annuities of 80,754l. 7s. 10½d. and of 100,000l. until Midſummer, 1727, and from thence for reducing the ſame to 71,000l. 2s. 3¾d. and 80,000l. redeemable by parliament (that is, from 5l. per cent. to 4l. per cent.)

The king having ſettled his affairs in England, and appointed the lords-juſtices, ſet out for Hanover the 3d June, and arrived the 14th at Herenhauſen.

The Scots, ever ſince the union, had very unwillingly paid any of the taxes that had been laid on the united kingdom; and had behaved on all ſuch occaſions, as if they thought themſelves injured, when they were obliged to contribute any thing towards the public expence. The enemies to the government failed not to feed this ill humour, and, under colour of zeal for the old conſtitution, to ſet the people againſt that, which was now eſtabliſhed. The malt-tax was moſt clamoured againſt; and it was foreſeen, that it would not be collected without peril to the officers. At Edinburgh indeed, the exciſemen were ſuffered to take an account of the maltſter's ſtoc in hand; but thoſe at Glaſgow were obliged to apply to the commiſſioners of the exciſe at Edinburgh for protection and aſſiſtance, their lives being threatened, if they offered to viſit the malt-houſes. The commiſſioners applied to major-general Wade, commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, who, on the 23d of June, ſent captain Buſhel, with two companies of ſoldiers to Glaſgow, where they arrived the next day in the evening. At their entrance into the town, they found a great mob of men, women, and boys, who gave them abuſive language, and threw ſtones at them, as they marched along the ſtreets, crying aloud, No malt-tax! The officer deſired them to forbear, for he meant them no harm. The provoſt gave him billets for quartering his men, but told him, he could not put him in poſſeſſion of the guard-room, becauſe the rabble had locked it up, and carried away the key, as ſoon as they heard the ſoldiers were coming. The officer, unwilling to exaſperate them, by forcing open the door, ordered the guard to be kept in a public houſe, which they hired for that purpoſe. About eleven o'clock, that night, ſeveral thouſand of the mob got together about the houſe of mr. Daniel Campbel, repreſentative in parliament for Glaſgow, threatning to plunder it. Upon which captain Buſhel ſent an officer to the provoſt, letting him know the miſchief they deſigned to commit; and that he was ready with his men to aſſiſt him in preventing it. But his anſwer was, 'he thought the number of his ſoldiers too few, and therefore he would make no uſe of them.' Thus the rabble, finding no oppoſition, nor even the appearence of a magiſtrate to reſtrain their fury, with hatchets and other inſtruments forced into the houſe, and turned out two or three of mr. Campbel's ſervants (he, with his wife, having the day before retired to his country-houſe) and fell to plundering every thing they could carry away, and deſtroying what was not portable. This riot continued till nine the next morning, when ſeveral of the mob were lying drunk in the houſe, with the wine and liquors they found in the cellars, but the magiſtrates did not get any of them ſecured. The officers of the exciſe hid themſelves as well as they could: ſome of them fell into the hands of the mob, and with great difficulty eſcaped with their lives, after having been unmercifully beaten. The rabble were then pretty quiet, till about four in the afternoon, when they began to meet again; women, or men in women's cloaths, beating drums about the ſtreets to call them together. Captain Buſhel, not knowing what their deſigns might be, ordered the ſoldiers to be near the guard-room, which the provoſt had now cauſed to be opened: but the mob did not long keep their ſecret; for they advanced towards the guard, crying, 'Drive the dogs out of town: we will cut them to pieces.' The officer ſaid again, 'We mean you no hurt, but, if you continue to provoke the ſoldiers, we ſhall not be able to reſtrain them from firing at you.' The rabble anſwered, 'You dare not fire with ball;' and continued throwing ſtones in ſuch quantities, and ſo large, that they broke ſome of the locks of the ſoldiers pieces, and their bayonets, and wounded ſeveral men. Upon which they were ordered to fire over the heads of the mob to frighten them; but they advanced ſtill upon the ſoldiers, and, throwing ſtones in greater quantities, the ſoldiers at laſt fired on them, and killed or wounded three or four, which made them retire to ſome diſtance. In this ſhort interval, the provoſt ſent to captain Buſhel, deſiring him to ſave himſelf and his men, by retreating out of the town; for the rioters were collecting all the arms they could; and, if he did not march away, there would be more blood ſhed. The captain, taking his advice, marched immediately for Dunbarton, being followed by great numbers of the mob, and that ſo cloſely, that he was forced to fire now and then to ſecure his retreat out of the town. Three or four hundred of them followed him ſix miles, but they durſt not come up with him. He ſent an officer from Dunbarton to Edinburgh, to give general Wade an account of what had happened; and, on the 8th of July, the general, accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord-advocate, ſet out from Edinburgh, and at noon, the next day, joined a body of forces, that had been ordered to draw together on a moor within two miles of Glaſgow, conſiſting of four troops of horſe, and a detachment of colonel Campbel's dragoons; eight companies of the earl of Deloraine's regiment of foot; the earl of Stair's regiment, and one of the new-raiſed Highland companies. The general wrote a letter to the magiſtrates to let them know he was coming; and the next day, about two o'clock in the afternoon, entered the town; the troops advancing with ſilence and good order; and they were diſtributed into quarters without any diſturbance. The two following days the exciſemen were ſet to take an account of the malſters ſtoc in hand, and had quiet admittance. The rioters having endeavoured by circular letters to every town of any note to excite tumults, the mob roſe July the 9th, at Elgin, attacked in the night-time three ſoldiers, who were poſted centinels at a ſhop, wherein was lodged a quantity of brandy, that had been ſeized by the cuſtom-houſe officers, and obliged the ſoldiers to fire in their own defence, by which one of the rabble was killed. The ſoldiers being overpowered were put in priſon by the magiſtrates; and the mob immediately carried off the brandy. The malſters at at Glaſgow complied with the terms of the act of parliament. Many of the rioters were ſeized; moſt of them mean perſons. Near an hundred witneſſes were examined, but little or nothing were found againſt any of them: it was all laid on thoſe, who fled, and on ſtrangers. The general and the lord-advocate, having ſtaid a week at Glaſgow, returned to Edinburgh. The lord-advocate committed ſeventeen men and boys, and four women, to priſon. The provoſt, baliffs, dean of Guild, and deacon Conveener, were alſo apprehended, and the next day, under a ſtrong guard of dragoons, ſent to Edinburgh. When they came near the city, there was a vaſt concourſe of people at ſuch an unuſual and unexpected ſight, beſides a great many merchants and men of note on horſeback, who went to meet them, and accompanied them to the priſon-doors, the Glaſgow magiſtrates being in coaches. They did not continue long under confinement; for, this affair being brought before the lords-juſticiary, they were unanimous in their opinions, that they were innocent; upon which they were immediately ſet at liberty. It was reported, that the whole royal boroughs of Scotland had come to a reſolution to ſtand out againſt payment of the malt-tax. But they were ſo far from doing it, that, the convention being aſſembled at Edinburgh on the 7th of July, they reſolved to write a circular letter to each of the royal boroughs, to be ſent by expreſs, teſtifying the falſhood of that report, and their abhorrence of the thought of reſiſting or not paying due obedience to the law, which has enacted the levying of that tax, exhorting the magiſtrates and governors of each royal borough, to concur vigorouſly with the officers of the revenue, in the execution of the laws relating thereto, and in ſuppreſſing of all mobs, riots, and tumultuous aſſemblies; and requiring them every where to uſe all diligence for the diſcovery of the authors of ſuch malicious reports and ſeditious practices; and to acquaint the annual committee of the convention therewith, that the offenders might be proſecuted, and brought to deſerved puniſhment at the ſuit of the convention, as diſturbers of the public peace. The rioters at Glaſgow were brought to their trial before the court of juſticiary, of which the earl of Ilay was chief; and, Walter Buchanon, William Hamilton, George Macfarlane, Patrick Mitchel, and Janet Balleny being found guilty of the riot, the four men were, the next day, ſentenced to be tranſported, after they had been ſcourged at Glaſgow by the common hangman; and Balleny, the woman, was ſentenced to ſtand twice in the pillory there; ſo that no capital puniſhment was inflicted on any of theſe offenders.

General Wade did likewiſe another very important ſervice to the public, by diſarming, purſuant to the act of parliament, the Highlanders, Mackenzies, Macdonals, Grants of Glenmoriſton, Macleods, Chiſholms, Stewarts, Camerons, Macphersons, Mackintoſhes, Macgrogors, Gordons, Farquharſons, Macfarlans, and other clans, their tribes and followers; as alſo the inhabitants of the iſles of Sky and Mull; the arms amounting to between two and three thouſand. The companies of the ſoldiers left in the Highlands were ſo poſted, that they poſſeſſed all the conſiderable paſſes, and thereby prevented the ſtealing of cattle.

As to foreign affairs, there were great alterations abroad this year. Mention has been made of the marriage of Lewis, prince of Aſturias with the duke of Orlean's ſecond daughter, and of king Philip's reſignation of the crown to his ſon. It has alſo related, how Lewis XV. of France was married to the infanta of Spain; and madamoiſelle de Beaujolois, another of the duke of Orlean's daughters, to don Carlos, infanta of Spain by king Philip's ſecond wife. The firſt marriage was conſummated, but ſoon after diſſolved by the death of Lewis king of Spain. Upon his deceaſe, his father, king Philip, reſumed the crown. In the beginning of March 1724-25, the French king, who could never gain upon himſelf to be tolerably civil to the young infanta, declared his reſolution to ſend her bac into Spain.[i] This was ſo highly reſented by the court of Spain, particularly by the queen that it was reſolved to ſend bac to France madamoiſelle de Beaujolois, whoſe mariage with don Carlos was yet unconſummated; which was acccordingly done, and at the ſame time the infanta was ſent to Madrid, the Spaniſh miniſters, the marquis de Monteleone, and Patrick Lawleſs (the pretender's agent in England in queen Anne's reign) returning with her.

The queen of Spain's reſentment did not end here. She reſolved the French ſhould meddle no more in the Spaniſh affairs, and offered to adjuſt her differences with the emperor (for which the congreſs of Cambray had been appointed) under the ſole mediation of Great-Britain. This offer was refuſed by king George upon many accounts. The emperor was ſo far from ſeeking the ſole mediation with the ſame warmth as Spain, that he ſhewed ſuch a coolneſs on the occaſion, as not only indicated a jealouſy, but foretold an unſucceſsful iſſue in caſe it was aſſumed. Beſides, the accepting it, in order to gratify the paſſions of the queen of Spain, muſt have diſobliged France, with whom ever ſince, the death of Lewis XIV. the Britiſh court had contracted the ſtricteſt friendſhip. The ſame motive ſtill ſubſiſted, that had induced king George to enter into a reciprocal confidence with that crown, the title of the houſe of Orleans to that monarchy in virtue of the treaty of Utrecht. The young king was as yet a minor, and unmarried, and the duke of Bourbon prime-miniſter of France, who ſolely guided the helm, was next in reverſion to the crown, after the young duke of Orleans, then unmarried, and of a weak conſtitution. The coolneſs therefore of the emperor, the engagement with France, and the proſpect of diſuniting for ever the houſe of Bourbon, by means of the branches of Orleans and Condé, induced king George not to accept the ſole mediation at the hazard of loſing France, without any appearance of gaining, or, if gained, of keeping Spain one moment fixed to his intereſt or alliance. Upon the king's refuſal of the ſole mediation, the emperor and queen of Spain reſolved to adjuſt their differences by a private negotiation. This was managed on the part of Spain by the baron de Ripperda, a Dutchman, who had abandoned the proteſtant religion, and entered into the Spaniſh ſervice. The firſt treaty of Vienna was ſoon concluded, and ſigned the 30th of April, and the next treaty of commerce was alſo ſigned. It was urged, that the mediators having for ſeveral years in vain endeavoured to reconcile the emperor and king of Spain, they reſolved to do it by themſelves without the intervention of any other power, eſpecially ſince France had affronted Spain, by ſending bac the infanta, and England had refuſed to continue her mediation at Cambray without France.[k]

By theſe treaties the emperor acknowledges Philip V. as lawful king of Spain and the Indies and promiſes not to moleſt him in the poſſeſſion of the dominions ſecured to him by the treaty of Utrecht, nor to appropriate to himſelf any right to them. King Philip, on his part, renounces all his pretenſions to the dominions in Italy and the Netherlands, adjudged to the emperor by the treaty of London in July 1722. The emperor grants (without the conſent of the empire) the inveſtiture of the dukedoms of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, to the queen of Spain's eldeſt ſon, in caſe theſe dukedoms ſhould be vacant for want of heirs, the determination of king George and the regent of France in the treaty of London, that they are maſculine fiefs of the empire, being taken for granted. Spain agreed to guarantee the ſucceſſion of the Auſtrian dominions according to the Pragmatic ſanction.[l] By the treaty of commerce the emperor's ſubjects were to have commercial advantages in Spain, to which no others were entitled: Spain was to guarantee the Oſtend trade to the Eaſt-Indies, and pay an annual ſubſidy of about four millions of pieces of eight.

The treaty of peace was not liable to any great objection, though the article, by which Spain agreed to guarantee the ſucceſſon of the Auſtrian dominions, according to the Pragmatic ſanction, gave ſome room to ſuſpect, it was to operate in favour of Spain. And therefore it did not alarm the other ſtates, but it was not the ſame with the treaty of commerce, which was ſo much to the diſadvantage of England and Holland, particularly with regard to the privileges granted to the Oſtend India company.

But, beſides theſe treaties, king George had reaſon to ſuſpect that another, much more repugnant to the intereſt of Great-Britain, was alſo concluded. This ſuſpicion was afterwards confirmed, not only by ſome indiſcreet expreſſions of Ripperda, but by the moſt poſſitive intelligence from different perſons, all capable of knowing the truth, and all concurring in the moſt material facts. By this third treaty, which was carefully concealed, it was declared, that the Spaniſh miniſter having repreſented that the king of Great-Britain had promiſed the reſtitution of Gibralter and Port-Mahon, and that the king of Spain did inſiſt upon it, the emperor would concur in employing force for reſtoring Gibraltar to Spain, if it could not be amicably effected. King George had moreover cauſe to believe, that ſeveral other points of ſtill more dangerous conſequence were ſettled between the emperor and Spain, particularly that the two archduchеſſes ſhould be married to the infants of Spain, and that means ſhould be taken for placing the pretender on the throne. This laſt article the king was informed of by a perſon of great rank, veracity, and credit, though the emperor himſelf ordered his miniſters to give, in his name, the moſt ſolemn denial of the fact. It muſt indeed be owned, that the duke of Bavaria received likewiſe aſſurances equally ſtrong from the miniſters of Vienna, that nothing had been tranſacted between the emperor and the court of Madrid, relating to the marriage of an archduchеſs to a prince of Spain, though it was afterwards owned by the imperial miniſters, and the execution of it openly demanded by thoſe of Spain. And it may here be obſerved, that, if thoſe marriages had taken place, and the French king and the prince of Aſturias at that time, both princes of weak conſtitutions, had died without iſſue, it would have laid the foundation for the moſt formidable power ever known in Europe, by uniting together in one ſovereign all the dominions belonging to the houſes of Auſtria and Bourbon.

In conſequence of theſe treaties between the emperor and Spain, great ſums, amounting to about a million ſterling, were remitted in ſix months, from the ſigning of them by Spain, to Vienna. The court of Vienna gave immediately the neceſſary orders for an augmentation of their own forces, with thirty thouſand men, and took immediately into their pay thirty thouſand more. Negotiations were ſet on foot for engaging other powers in ſupport of their cauſe; and particularly Ruſſia, by her acceſſion, was to furniſh thirty thouſand men.

King George, juſtly alarmed at theſe proceedings, reſolved to taken ſuch precautions, as were likely to defeat the pernicious deſigns of the new allies. The court of Vienna had behaved with uncommon coolneſs towards the court of London, ever ſince the acceſſion of king George. The em-

[i] The French king being taken very ill, and in great danger of his life, by a fever, in February 1725, N. S. it alarmed the whole French nation, and made them cry aloud for his marrying immediately after his recovery, to prevent the fatal conſequences of a civil war, in caſe of his dying without iſſue. It was thereupon ſuddenly reſolved in council to ſend bac the infanta. Upon this unexpected turn the court of Spain propoſed the ſole mediation to mr. Stanhope, the Engliſh miniſter at Madrid, which, as will be ſeen, was refuſed.

[k] It appears by ſtating and comparing the dates of theſe tranſactions, that the ſending bac the infanta, or the refuſal of the ſole mediatation, could have no ſhare in the motives negotiating. The courier, diſpatched from France to ſignify the reſolution of ſending bac the infanta, March 13, 1725, did not arrive at Madrid till the 19th, and king George's anſwer, declining the ſole mediation, came to Spain the 24th of April, 1724, N. S. Ripperda's full powers were ſigned in November, 1724; and the court of Madrid received advice from him in March, 1725, that the principal articles were then agreed at Vienna. In conſequence of this agreement, the treaty of peace and friendſhip between the emperor and Spain was ſigned at Vienna the laſt of April, and that of commerce the firſt of May, 1725. Now could the reſolution of ſending bac the infanta, which was not thought of in France till March, 1725, nor known at Madrid till the 19th of that month, be the occaſion of negotiating at Vienna treaties of ſuch importance and long diſcuſſion, the principal articles of which were the very ſame month of March known at Madrid to have been agreed upon at Vienna? Or could the king's refuſal of the ſole mediation, which was not known at Madrid till the 24th of April, 1725, N. S. have poſſibly occaſioned the ſigning of treaties at Vienna the laſt of April and firſt of May 1725? To this it may be added, that the acceptance of the ſole mediation to accommodate the difference between the two courts, were already agreed in every reſpect, who would have been as rediculous and abſurd, as it is to imagine, that the declining of it could poſſibly be a motive for ſigning of treaties ſo injurious to the ſtates-general, as well as to Great-Britain, when neither of them had given the leaſt reaſon for ſuch treatment.

[l] By the pragmatic ſanction the order of ſucceſſion to the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria is ſettled on the emperor's heirs and ſucceſſors of either ſex, and declared to be a perpetual, indiviſible, and inſeparable feoffment of the primogeniture. This pragmatic ſanction or perpetual law was publiſhed at Vienna, December 5, 1724.

peror, whether out of ſome old perſonal enmity to the king, or from his jealouſy of ſeeing a proteſtant of Germany become ſovereign of a powerful nation, behaved with great indifference, and in a very contradictory manner, towards him on many occaſions. He refuſed to guarantee the ſucceſſion in his line, and denied him the inveſtiture of the duchies of Bremen and Verden, which he had a right to demand and expect, as a purchaſer and member of the empire. To this may be added, the late erection and ſupport of the Oſtend India company in violation of treaties, which greatly affected the Britiſh commerce to the Eaſt-Indies, and againſt which the whole nation made loud complaints. Led by theſe motives, the treaty of Hanover was projected by king George, to chec the ambitious views of the emperor and king (or rather queen) of Spain, who, from being irreconcileable enemies, ran into each other's arms voluntarily, tying themſelves down by treaty to the cloſeſt and ſtricteſt friendſhip. The king ſucceeded in his deſign, and a treaty was concluded in September between England, France, and Pruſſia, in the uſual forms of a defenſive alliance, with a mutual guarantee to protect the reſpective countries rights and privileges, thoſe of commerce in particular, which the parties enjoyed or ought to enjoy, as well out of as in Europe; which had a view to the Oſtend company. There was nothing in the treaty that reflected directly or implicitly upon the conduct of any other power: nor was there any expreſſion to be found in it, nor inferrence from it, or from the conſequent meaſures, to ſhew it was projected to increaſe the dominions and claims of the electorate of Hanover, or to involve Great-Britain in the quarrels of that electorate, or could give offence to any but thoſe who intended to offend. The treaty was to laſt fifteen years. There were three ſeparate articles: the firſt related to the affair of Thorn, and was an engagement to procure ſatisfaction for what had been done contrary to the treaty of Oliva. By the ſecond, the two kings electors, engaged, in caſe the emperor declared war againſt France, not only not to furniſh their quota of troops, but to act in concert with his moſt chriſtian majeſty. By the third, France conſented that, if the empire declared againſt her, the two electors kings might furniſh their quota, provided they furniſhed no more and fulfilled their engagements to his moſt chriſtian majeſty.

Thus was concluded the treaty of Hanover, which has been painted in more invidious colours, than any tranſaction during the reign of king George.

In the mean time the duke of Bourbon was removed from the adminiſtration of affairs in France; having received, as he was preparing to follow the king to Rambouillet, an order to go to Chantilli, his country ſeat, and there to ſtay till further orders. Preſently after, the count de St. Florentine, ſecretary of ſtate, went to acquaint him, that the king had reſolved to take the government into his own hands; which he did on the 10th of June, in a council of ſtate at Verſailles, to whom he made a ſpeech ſuitable to the occaſion. This revolution in the miniſtry of France was generally ſuppoſed to be owing to the intrigues of the court of Spain, who could never forgive the ſending bac the infanta, which they imputed to the influence of the duke of Bourbon on the counſels of France. The biſhop of Frejus, the young king's preceptor, and afterwards cardinal, had a great hand in this meaſure, in order to aſſume the poſt of prime-miniſter himſelf; but he aſſured mr. Horace Walpole, the Britiſh ambaſſador at the court of France, 'that the alterations in the court of France, inſtead of making any in the meaſures taken with the king of Great-Britain, purſuant to the treaty of Hanover, would rather tend to the execution of that treaty.'

The king of France ſoon after married the princeſs Mary, daughter of Staniſlaus, once king of Poland; the contract for the marriage being ſigned by proxy in July.

The duke of Wharton, who had acted with great extravagance and licentiouſneſs of all kinds in England, and ruined his eſtate there, having left his country, went to Vienna, whence he proceeded to Rome, where he was introduced by the Spaniſh miniſter to the pretender, in whoſe houſe he was concealed for ſix days, and then poſted away to Madrid, where the baron de Riperda, his great and intimate friend, was now in high credit and favour. Thither he came with credentials from the pretender; and, as a public mark of confidence in him, adorned with a garter, and the title of Northumberland. King George being informed of theſe proceedings, ſent a letter under the privy ſeal to the duke, commanding him, upon his allegiance, to return forthwith to great-Britain. This letter being carried to Madrid by mr. Crew, the meſſenger, it was delivered, on the 31ſt of June, to the duke in a coach, as he was paſſing through one of the ſtreets of the town; but, as ſoon as he was told the contents of it, he threw the letter out of the coach, and made great clamour at the executing a ſummons upon him by a Britiſh officer of juſtice, even in the ſight of his catholic majeſty's palace. He likewiſe gave out, that he would preſent a memorial upon it to the king of Spain, and demand juſtice againſt the king's meſſenger, who brought him the letter. Colonel Stanhope, the Britiſh miniſter at Madrid, hearing of this, ſent his ſecretary to the marquiſs de Paz, to acquaint him with it. The marquiſs promiſed to repreſent the matter to his catholic majeſty, and deſired the ſecretary to return to him the next morning, when he aſſured him, that the king of Spain knew nothing of the memorial, but had been informed of what had paſſed with relation to the delivery of the letter of privy ſeal, and would not in any manner interpoſe his authority in oppoſition to that proceeding. The duke, about that time, openly profeſſed himſelf a Roman catholic, by making his public abjuration of the proteſtant religion; and, on the 23d of July, N. S. married one of the ladies of the queen of Spain's bed-chamber, by whoſe intereſt he obtained the pay of a lieutenant-colonel.

[1725-26] The king, having ſettled affairs abroad, ſet out from Hanover on the 18th of December, O. S. and came to Helvoet-Sluyce, where ſir John Norris waited with the convoy and yachts, and where he embarked on board the Carolina yacht on New Year's Day, about one in the afternoon. Towards ſeven that evening there aroſe a moſt violent ſtorm with rain and hail, which ſeparated the ſhips one from another, except one man of war, commanded by captain Dancey, who kept company with the king's yacht, on board which was ſir John Norris. The tempeſt continued ſo high, and the ſea ſo boiſterous, for thirty-ſix hours, that the whole fleet was in the utmoſt danger. On the 3d of January, the yachts and men of war were near Dover; and one of the yachts, with ſome of the king's attendants, entered the river; but it was thought more adviſeable, that the king ſhould land at Rye, where he arrived about noon. The king went immediately into a ſmall boat, the tide being down; and as ſoon as he could reach a horſe, which captain Pigram had brought him, he mounted it, rode by the wall, and over the new bridge. The mayor, mr. Lambe, and the jurats, in their formalties with the neighbouring gentlemen, attended the king, who alighted at the mayor's houſe, being ſaluted all the way with loud huzzas and acclamations. He was extremely fatigued, having eat nothing ſince the day he embarked. The lord Townſhend and his lady, who were in the Mary yacht, kept company with the king, and with ſome difficulty landed at the ſame place. On the 4th of January, a meſſenger, diſpatched by the lord Townſhend, arrived at the Cock-pit, with the agreeable news of the king's ſafe landing at Rye, from whence he intended to have ſet out for London on the 6th; but, the roads in that part of the country being unſafe from the fall of ſnow, it was found neceſſary to give orders for the clearing of the ways; which done, the king began his journey the next day, and having croſſed the water from Rye, at a place called the Point, lay that night at Hythe, the next at Sittingburne; and on the 9th arrived in good health at St. James's.

On the 20th of January the parliament met, when the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes by the mouth of the lord-chancellor:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I have had ſuch frequent experience of the wiſdom and zeal of this parliament on many important occaſions, that it is with pleaſure I now meet you again; and I make no doubt, but that your endeavours for the good and ſervice of your country will be as ſucceſsful, as they have hitherto been.

'The diſtreſſed condition of ſome of our proteſtant brethren abroad, and the negotiations and engagements entered into by ſome foreign powers, which ſeem to have laid the foundation of new troubles and diſturbances in Europe, and to threaten my ſubjects with the loſs of ſeveral of the moſt advantageous branches of their trade, obliged me, without any loſs of time, to concert with other powers ſuch meaſures, as might give a chec to the ambitious views of thoſe, who are endeavouring to render themſelves formidable, and put a ſtop to the farther progreſs of ſuch dangerous deſigns. For theſe ends I have entered into a defenſive alliance with the moſt chriſtian king and the king of Pruſſia, to which ſeveral other powers, and particularly the ſtates-general, have been invited to accede; and I have not the leaſt reaſon to doubt of their concurrence. This treaty ſhall in a ſhort time be laid before you. By theſe means, and by your ſupport and aſſiſtance, I truſt in God, I ſhall be able not only to ſecure to my own ſubjects the enjoyment of many valuable rights and privileges long ſince acquired for them by the moſt ſolemn treaties, but effectually to preſerve the peace and balance of Europe, the only view and end of all my endeavours.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I have ordered the eſtimates for the ſervice of this year to be prepared and laid before you, which, from an unwillingneſs I always have to put my ſubjects to an extraordinary expence by any unneceſſary precautions, are formed upon the foot of employing no greater number of forces, than was thought neceſſary the laſt year; for which, if the ſupplies you give, ſhall be fully and effectually raiſed, I ſhall be enabled to have a ſtrong fleet at ſea early in the ſpring. If the poſture of affairs ſhall at any time make it neceſſary to augment our maritime force, I confide ſo intirely in the zeal and affection of my parliament, that I aſſure myſelf you will enable me to make ſuch an addition to the number of ſeamen, as ſhall be found requiſite.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'It is not to be doubted, but the enemies to my government will conceive hopes, that ſome favourable opportunity for renewing their attempts may offer from the proſpect of new troubles and commotions. They are already very buſy by their inſtruments and emiſſaries in thoſe courts, whoſe meaſures ſeem moſt to favour their purpoſes, in ſoliciting and promoting the cauſe of the pretender. But I perſuade myſelf, notwithſtanding the countenance and encouragement they may have received, or flatter themſelves with, the proviſion you ſhall make for the ſafety and defence of the kingdom, will effectually ſecure us from any attempts from abroad, and render all ſuch projects vain and abortive.

'When the world ſhall ſee, that you will not ſuffer the Britiſh crown and nation to be menaced and inſulted, thoſe who moſt envy the preſent happineſs and tranquility of this kingdom, and are endeavouring to make us ſubſervient to their ambition, will conſider their own intereſt and circumſtances, before they make any attempt upon ſo brave a people, ſtrengthened and ſupported by prudent and powerful alliances, and though deſirous to preſerve the peace, able and ready to defend themſelves againſt the efforts of all aggreſſors. Such reſolutions, and ſuch meaſures, timely taken, I am ſatisfied, are the moſt effectual means of preventing a war, and continuing to us the bleſſings of peace and proſperity.'

Addreſſes ſuitable to the ſpeech were preſented by both houſes, and the commons proceeded to conſider of the ſupply. The reduction of the four thouſand additional troops was again inſiſted on, and particularly by mr. Pulteney, who now ſet himſelf up to oppoſe every motion of the court; but, after a warm debate, the ſame number of land-forces, 18,264 men, and the ſame proviſion for them, were voted. A motion by mr. Pulteney for a committee to ſtate the public debts, from the year 1714 to 1725, was rejected by 262 againſt 89. It was obſerved that moſt of the tories then in the houſe were againſt it.
